THE ATHENÆUM
A JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, SCIENCE AND THE ARTS

INDEX FOR JANUARY TO JUNE
1920

Published for the Proprietors of "The Athenæum" by BRITISH PERIODICALS, LTD.,
170, FLEET STREET,
E.C.4.
INDEX OF CONTENTS

JANUARY TO JUNE, 1920.

(All works are indexed under the author’s name. Biographies, Histories, etc., are also indexed under their subjects, and other works under the first word of the title. Titles are sometimes abbreviated to save space.)

Abbey Theatre, Dublin, H. on 25
Abbott, W. C., The Expansion of Europe, 1413-789 (K. S.) 175
Abbe, Pandolfe Carolon, and Guérin, Gabriel (p. W. S.) 765
Abbaard, Adventure, The, by Stanley Guise 815
Account through Letters, by Erica Cotterill, Part V 126
Accused Valley, The, by Leigh Thompson 127
Ackerly, and Anonymous Birds 519
Acland, Sir Arthur, lecture on Dickens ... 519
Acte, a Love Sequence, by May Earle 658
Acxou, Lord, and Liberty, G. E. Passingham on 585
Adam, E. Pearl, Peace and Prosperity, 1914-19 127
Adam, W. A., Whither? Or, the British Dreyfus Case 95
Adams, Henry, The Degradation of the Democratic Dogma (J. N. S.) 665
Adams, J. J. Romantic Relapse, poem, 299: Contortionist, poem 605
Adams, R. C. E., The Modern Crusaders 291
Adkison, W. W., A Short History of Education (G. Santus) 258
Addeshaw, Percy, Last Verses 749
Addresses in America, 1919, by John Galsworthy 74
Addresses to Students, Patna University, 1918, by J. G. Jennings 288
Adelphi Galleria, Drawings by Wyndham Lewis (R. H. W.) 85
Admiral of the Blue, The, by E. Hargrave 158
Adolphe, by Benjamin Constant, ed. Gustave Roder, 187; (G. Santus) 322
Adopted Husband, An, by Fatahatie, tr. B. Mitsui and Grego M. Sinclair 267
Adult Education Committee, Final Report (R. B.) 12
Adventure in Working-Class Education, by Albert Menzies 814
Adventurer's Handbook: Being the Manual of the Order of Woodcraft Chivalry 620
Adventures in Interviewing, by Isaac F. Marston 751
Adventures in Military, by W. G. Mair 194
Esheltes, Agamemnon, tr. by R. K. Davis (J. T. Sheppard) 42
Agassiz, Elizabeth Cary, by Lucy Allen Patton 325
Agaye, James E. Responsibility (K. M) 79
Aimel, Georges, Travels done à la Pécherie 652
Aircraft in Peace, and the Law, by J. M. Speight 656
Airplane Photography, by Herbert E. Ives 782
Aisne pendant la Grande Guerre, by Gabriel Hansot 295
Akhnaton, The Wisdom of, by A. E. Grantham 783
Albanesi, E. Maria, Patricia and Life 389
Album Latinum, by A. G. Roper 192
Aloe, by André Gyselaert (W.) 812
Almico, Hypermetra, Carneaux, by J. P. Warren 95, 814
Almein: Night, tr, by J. H. E. Woods, poem 631
Almroth, J. A. M., Prime Aire 322
Allingkan, Richard, Images-Images of War 14
Alet, Dey, by Francis Marion Beynon 39
All and Sundry, by C. T. Raymond 31
Allmagne de la Défaite, by C. Itañez de Ibero 127
Allmagne Vainece, by E. Lemoone 226
Allen, J. E., Some Changes in the Distribution of the National Income during the War 19
Allen, K. M., on Mr. McKinley's Treaty 378
Allen, Robert, Educational Principles and Missionary Methods 61
Allen, W. F. D., The Turks in Europe (R. C. T.) 73
Allhusen, E. L., on Kautil Hamsun 811
Alhés qu'il nous laudrait, by Pierre Loti (W.) 59
Allsopp, R., tr., Lethbridge, On the Study of Things, Rev. H. 77
All Roads lead to Calvary, by Jerome K. Jerome (K. M.) 79
All the King's Men, by William Price Drury 31
Alma, R. J. L., Sara Videaube; and The Chapel, tr. A. B. 430
Alps and Sanctuaries of the Canton Ticino, by Samuel Butler 323
Amathia Verlag, German publishing house established during the war 556
Ambitions of Jill, The, by May Wynne 784
Ambush and Song, by M. G. Field 322
Ame aux Trois Visages, by Lucie Delarue-Mardrus 95
America, I Saw in 1918-18, by L. H. L. Soulsby 526
American Credo, by G. J. Nathan and H. L. Mencken 498
Amethysts (essays), by David Boardman Jones 783
Among Italian Peasants, by Tony Cyriax 95; (L. C. M.) 334
Ancient Allan, The, by H. Rider Haggard (K. M) 271
Ancient British Earthworks and Trenches in Epping Forest, by W. Curran Reddy 221
Ancient Enthronements and Camps of Gloucestershire, by E. J. Burrow (R. R. M.) 176
Anderson, J. R., Walls and Hedges 588
Anderson, S., and others, Exhibition of Etchings by (R. H. W.) 742
Andrews, J. W., and others, Yale Book of Student Verse, 1919-19 257
Angela kaj Esperanta Etnologio, by C. G. Stuart-mentith 526
Anglo-American Relations, by Brougham Villiers and W. H. Chesson 93
Anglo-American University Library for Central Europe 632
Animal Foodstuffs: Their Production and Consumption 428
Animal Horrors, by Ernest Thompson Seton 540
Animaux et leurs Hommes, by Paul Eluard (H.) 427
Anne, by Olga Hartley 783
Anne of the Marshland, by Hon. Lucy Julian Byng 485
Annual Register for 1919 578
Ansmo, Alfred, on Neglect of Old English History 188
Anselm’s Problem of Truth and Existence, by the Rev. A. E. Davies 805
Anspacher, Louis, Daddahims (D. L. M.) 841
Antichrist, The, by F. W. Nietzsche, tr. H. L. Mencken 557
Antiquaries, Society of: Prof. J. L. Myres and Mr. L. H. D. Buxton on Excavations in Cyprus in 1913, 148; Rev. J. K. Floyer on the Bishop of Winchester’s ancient manor house at Esher, 181; Prof. S. Langdon on a Sumerian figure from Mesopotamia in the Ashmolean Museum, 214; Mr. C. L. Kingstool on ‘Paris Garden and the Bear-baiting.’ 483; Mr. G. H. Hunter Blair on the seal of Harold’s College at Waltham Holy Cross, 578; Mr. E. F. Coyle on arrowheads from the battlefield of Marathon, 626; Col. J. H. P. Karadak on Silchester and its affinitics to the pre-Roman civilization of Gaul, 642; Lieut-Col. H. F. Bider on recent discoveries in the Anglo-Saxon Cemetery at Mitcham, 675
Antonelli, Etienne, Bolshevist Russia 355
Anyte, poem, tr. R. A. Fornes from Flannadough Anthology 272
A Paris, by E. A. Justice 158
Appreciation of Mac, by M. Mugnis, by T. W. Croker 462
Apple, The, a new quarterly 121
Applied Arithmetic, by N. J. Lemoine and Frances Jenkins 320
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Whale, G., British Airships, Past, Present and Future</td>
<td>353</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>What became of the Bones of St. Thomas?</td>
<td>496</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>What is the World of the Classics? by R. S. Sterling</td>
<td>321</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>What the World owes to the Frasiers, by R. T. Herford</td>
<td>320</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wheel, Theo., A Dramatic Tragedy, by Laurence Housman</td>
<td>354</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wheeler, H. F. B., A Little Book of Naval Wisdom</td>
<td>526</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wheeler, The Clarks of Burnley, 1st Ed.</td>
<td>30</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>When We Were Boys, by W. O. Iaiben</td>
<td>216</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>When they were Boys, by W. O. Iaiben</td>
<td>226</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>When Whitaker, Theo.</td>
<td>694</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Whitaker's Almanack, 1920</td>
<td>93</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Whitelocke, The Poem, Intro. Sir Herbert Warren</td>
<td>126</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>White, Robert T., The Teaching of Music</td>
<td>531</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Whitehead, Boy. The, by Lennox Robinson</td>
<td>749</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Whitechase, E. J., ed., John Ruskin, Letters written on the 100th Anniversary of his Birth, by his Contemporaries</td>
<td>207</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>White, Karl von, The New English Dictionary</td>
<td>426</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Whitehead, The, by James H. White</td>
<td>569</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>White, The, by Edward W. Clarke</td>
<td>565</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>White, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert, Concert</td>
<td>150</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Withers, Mr. and Herbert, Concert</td>
<td>150</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Witham, A. H., The Story of the English Church</td>
<td>402</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Who's Who, 1920</td>
<td>32</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Widow's Son, by Jesse Lynch Williams (D. L. M.)</td>
<td>680</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wicked, by Arthur Applin</td>
<td>718</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wilder, M. R., The Study of Ecclesiastical History</td>
<td>179</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wild Bird, by Theodora Clark</td>
<td>782</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wild Life, High Prices in America for Letters and Newspapers</td>
<td>576</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wilderness, by Edmund Blanden</td>
<td>392</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wilkinson, Louis, Brute Gods</td>
<td>750</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wilkinson, Margaret, New Voices</td>
<td>194</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Williams, David, Founder of the Royal Literary Fund, by E. V. Lucas (v. &quot;Marginalia&quot;)</td>
<td>480</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Williams, J., Herbert, Inspiration</td>
<td>192</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Williams, Margaret Lindsay, Pictures (R. H. W.)</td>
<td>837</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Williams, Michael, Christian Symbol</td>
<td>320</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Williams, Nelle, My Sister takes a Rest Cure,</td>
<td>31</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Williams, O. R., Grandizers, 162; Old Clothes</td>
<td>437</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Williams, Randall, and W. Ripman, Continuation School</td>
<td>256</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>French, Part I.</td>
<td>256</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Williams, Reginald G., A Manual of Book Selection</td>
<td>814</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Williams-Ellis, A. L., The Tank Corps</td>
<td>64</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Williams, C. C., H., The Writers of Three Centuries, 429; Alfred Barke on, 488; T. M. Dale on, 522; Allan Wade on</td>
<td>554</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wilson, George, The Philosophy of Speech</td>
<td>383</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wilson, H. W., The, by P. R. Kay and H. H. Drankfirt</td>
<td>686</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wilson, H. W., Hush; or, the Hydrophone Service</td>
<td>493</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wilson, Pearl Cleveland, Wagner's Dramas and Greek Tragedy</td>
<td>647</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wilson, Philip W., The Church We Forget</td>
<td>462</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wilson, R., Servants of the People</td>
<td>525</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wilson, R. A., Paintings and Colour Studies (R. H. W.)</td>
<td>708</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wimbale, Sir Bertram C. A., Science and Morals</td>
<td>126</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Winds of the Carre, The, by V. Locke Ellis, poem</td>
<td>723</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Winn, Wren, Timbers and their Uses</td>
<td>126</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Winningham-Ingoms (Bishop A. P.), Victory and After</td>
<td>125</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Winningham's Way, by Margaret Wildener</td>
<td>456</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Winship, A. E., Danger Signs for Teachers</td>
<td>192</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wish, A., by Joan Arden, poem</td>
<td>823</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Witz, Mr. and Mrs. Herbert, Concert</td>
<td>150</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>With Kitchener to Khartoum, by G. W. Steevens</td>
<td>32</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>With Other Eyes, by Norma Lorimer</td>
<td>31</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>With the Enemy in Palestine, by A. Bluettt</td>
<td>158</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>With the Incomparable 29th, by A. H. Mure</td>
<td>251</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>With the Mid 17th to Italy, by Major E. H. Hody (L. C. M.)</td>
<td>448</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>With the Wits, by F. E. More (A. L. H.)</td>
<td>703</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Woolley, C. M., The Clarks of Burnley, 1st Ed.</td>
<td>322</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Woolmane, Mr. of Forty, The, by Edith B. Lowry</td>
<td>289</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Worden's Man, A. M., by Marjorie Patterson</td>
<td>559</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Women's International Art Club, Exhibition (R. H. W.)</td>
<td>375</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Women's Outdoor Oats, by C. Joan Hinche-Hartley</td>
<td>329</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wonders of Insect Life, by J. H. Crabtree</td>
<td>125</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wood, Charles, Magnificent, Nice Dimitri, &amp;c.</td>
<td>347</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wood, William, and A. J. Mann, The Salamina Front,</td>
<td>751</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Woodmane, Mr. of Forty, The, by Edith B. Lowry</td>
<td>289</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wooldridge, E. C., Handbook of Composition—The Mechanics of Writing</td>
<td>94</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wordsworth, Elizabeth, Essays, Old and New</td>
<td>322</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Author/Title</td>
<td>Pages</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>----------------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
<td>-------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Working Life of Women in the Seventeenth Century, by Alice Clark (E. M. G.)</td>
<td>9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Working Woman's House, The, by A. D. S. Furniss and E. Marion Phillips</td>
<td>288</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Work of V.A.D. Lond. I, during the War, by S. Unwin</td>
<td>431</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>World after the War, by Charles Roden and Dorothy Frances Buxton</td>
<td>688</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>World History, by Viscount Bryce</td>
<td>355</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Worms and Epitaphs, by H. W. Garrod</td>
<td>30</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Worth, by Robert Kane</td>
<td>352</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Worts, F. R., Modern Industrial History</td>
<td>236</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wren, Sir Christopher, N. H. Romanes on his Epitaph</td>
<td>90</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wren, P. C., Cupid in Africa</td>
<td>654</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wright, Dudley, The Eleusinian Mysteries and Rites</td>
<td>83</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wright, John R., on the Influence of Music</td>
<td>842</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wright, Thomas, The Life of John Payne</td>
<td>138</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Writers' and Artists' Year-Book, 1920</td>
<td>30</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Writers of Three Centuries, by C. C. H. Williamson</td>
<td>429, 489, 522, 554</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wyld, H. C., History of Colloquial English (E. W.)</td>
<td>669</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wyne, May, Nipper &amp; Co., 9; A Prince of Intrigue</td>
<td>559</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>The Ambitions of Jill</td>
<td>784</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yates-Thompson Sale</td>
<td>223, 415, 452</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Year, The, by S.</td>
<td>674</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yellow Cockade, The, by Bromley Challenor and Wilfrid Stephens (D. L. M.)</td>
<td>745</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yost, Casper S., Patience Worth</td>
<td>61</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Younger Son, A, by George A. B. Dewar</td>
<td>61</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Young Father, The, by Viola Meynell</td>
<td>13</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Young, Filson, ed., The Trial of Hawley Harvey Crippen, 321;</td>
<td>506</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(F. W. S.)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Young, George, The New Germany</td>
<td>633</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Young Guard, The, by E. W. Hornung</td>
<td>622</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Young Person in Pink, The, by G. E. Jennings (T. J. V.)</td>
<td>487</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zanzibar: the Island Metropolis of Eastern Africa, by F. B. Pearce</td>
<td>431</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zoffany, John, his Life and Works, by Lady Victoria Manners</td>
<td>740</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>and Dr. G. C. Williamson (H. M. Spielmann)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zoological Society</td>
<td>278, 373, 483, 515, 578, 675, 707, 835</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
LIST OF CONTRIBUTORS’ INITIALS.

A, F. ... Feida Arnold
Autolycus ... A. L. Huxley
B ... E. A. Boyd
B, A. F. G. ... A. F. G. Bell
B, A. L. ... A. L. Bazarach
B, C. ... Clive Bell
B, E. ... Edmund Blunden
B, E. (p. 602) ... Edwyn Beyan
B, E. A. ... Dr. E. A. Baker
B, H. I. ... H. Idris Bell
B, L. ... Ivor Brown
B, L. ... Leland Buxton
B, P. ... P. Bagewa
B, R. P. ... R. P. Bedford
Bt. C. ... C. Burchardt
C, E. F. ... E. F. Carritt
C, E. G. ... E. G. Clayton
C, E. M. ... E. M. Cutting
C.-B., A. ... A. Clutton-Brock
C.-M., L. ... Lacy Collison-Morley
D, G. L. ... G. Lowew Dickinson
D, J. H. ... J. H. Doggart
D, W. R. ... W. R. Dawson
E, T. S. ... T. S. Eliot
F, C. ... Cyril Falls
F, E. M. ... E. M. Forster
F, R. ... Robin Flower
F.-K., J. ... J. Fitzmaurice-Kelly
G, E. M. ... E. M. Goodman
G, P. ... P. Guedalla
H ... A. L. Huxley
H, A. L. ... A. L. Huxley
H, G. F. ... G. F. Hill
H, J. ... Julius Huxley
H, P. P. ... P. P. Howe
K ... Geoffrey Keynes
K, S. ... S. Koteliansky
L, F. L. ... F. L. Lucas
L, H. K. ... H. K. Lunn
L, J. ... Ezra Pound
M, D. L. ... John Middleton Murray
M, E. ... Eric Maclagan
M, J. M. ... John Middleton Murray
M, K. ... Katherine Mansfield
M, R. H. ... Rollo H. Myers
M, R. O. ... R. O. Morris
M, R. R. ... R. R. Marett
M, T. ... T. Moul
O, H. ... H. Oelsner
P.-P., de V. ... de V. Paven-Payne
R, B. ... Bertrand Russell
R, F. ... Forrest Reid
R, R. E. ... R. Ellis Roberts
R, V. ... Vernon Rendall
S ... J. W. N. Sullivan
S, A. de ... A. de Selincourt
S, F. W. ... F. W. Storke
S, G. ... G. Shove
S, J. ... James Strachey
S, J. W. N. ... J. W. N. Sullivan
S, L. ... Lloyd Sanders
S, R. ... Robert Steele
S, W. T. S. ... W. T. S. Stallybrass
S, W. W. ... Dr. W. W. Seton
T, H. M. ... H. M. Tomlinson
T, J. B. ... J. B. Trend
T, N. W. ... N. W. Thomas
T, R. C. ... R. Campbell Thompson
V, T. J. ... Ezra Pound
W ... R. H. Wilenski
W, A. D. ... A. D. Waley
W, E. ... Ernest Weekley
W, L. ... Leonard Woolf
W, O. ... Orlando Williams
W, R. H. ... R. H. Wilenski
W, S. ... S. Waterlow
W, V. ... Virginia Woolf
W, W. B. ... Warren B. Wells
THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW

With which is now incorporated
THE INTERNATIONAL REVIEW

With the January issue the Contemporary Review will be considerably enlarged, and with it will be incorporated The International Review.

The addition to the contents will include the outstanding feature of the latter Review, namely, "The World of Nations: Facts and Documents."

It was this feature which gave the International Review its unique character, consisting as it does of unedited treaties, official documents and pronouncements, and other material not otherwise readily accessible to the public. Hitherto, no newspaper or journal in this country has ever made a point of publishing, fully and completely, all the more important data without which any real knowledge of international relations is impossible.

The increase in the size of the Contemporary Review necessitates a slight increase in the price, which in future will be 3s. 6d. monthly.

The Contemporary Review, founded in 1862, is one of the oldest of the British Magazines, and stands in the front rank of European Reviews. It deals with all subjects of current interest—Religion, Politics, Literature, Philosophy, Science, Art, Education, and Social Topics. The first writers of our own and foreign countries are found among the contributors.

CONTENTS—JANUARY:

By Viscount Bryce, O.M.
The Settlement of the Near East.
By Harold Spender.
Is it Peace?
By Sir Charles Mallet.
Free Trade and the Coalition.
By J. D. Bourchier.
V. Victors.
By Norman Angel.
The Economic Crisis in Europe.
By lord Balfour of Burleigh.
The Ecclesiastical Situation in Scotland.
By Charles Woods.
The Dardanelles Campaign.
By R. E. A. Cotton.
Constitution-Making for India.

By T. F. Farman.
The French Elections.
By Dr. P. GeiL.
Holland in the New Era.
By J. G. Muddiman.
Spiritualism in the Days of Charles II.
By Dorothy Henkel.
Madame de Savige.

Literary Supplement—
The Cathedral Ghost, by J. E. G. De Montmorency.
Reviews and Notices of Books.

MONTHLY

OF ALL BOOKSTALLS & NEWSAGENTS or
By Post from 10, ADELPHI TERRACE, W.C 2

By Post

3/6

3/9
Applications Vacant

UNIVERSITY OF CAPE TOWN.

PROFESSOR OF LAW.

Applications are hereby invited for the position of Professor of Law at the University of Cape Town, South Africa.

The salary is £600 p.a. with a temporary war bonus of £40 p.a. for a married professor, £18 p.a. for a professor unmarried. The professor will receive a pension according to the University Teachers' Pension Scheme.

Appointments are generally restricted to candidates under 35 years of age but in the case of a candidate who has been engaged in teaching or has been in practice in South Africa this restriction need not apply.

Candidates should state any special qualifications they possess.

It is essential that they should have a thorough knowledge of Roman Dutch Law.

Applications, together with testimonials, should be made in duplicate to the Registrar, University Buildings, Queen Victoria Street, Cape Town. Further particulars may be obtained from the High Commissioner for the Union of South Africa, Victoria Street, London, S.W. or from the undersigned. Applications should reach the Registrar not later than January 10, 1920.

WILFRID G. R. MURRAY.
Registrar.

University Buildings, Queen Victoria Street, Cape Town.

UNIVERSITY OF CAPE TOWN.

FACULTY OF ARTS.

Applications are invited for the chair of Dutch and Afrikaner Literature.

The salary is £800 per annum with a temporary war bonus for a married man of £54 per annum. £48 per annum for a professor unmarried.

The professor will receive a pension according to the University Teachers' pension scheme.

Appointments are generally restricted to candidates under 35 years of age but in the case of a candidate who has been engaged in teaching in South Africa this restriction need not apply.

Applications together with testimonials should be made in duplicate to the undersigned. Further particulars may be obtained from the High Commissioner for the Union of South Africa, Victoria Street, London, S.W., or from the undersigned.

Applications should reach the undersigned not later than January 10, 1920.

WILFRID G. R. MURRAY.
Registrar.

University of Cape Town, Queen Victoria Street, Cape Town.

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON.

DEPARTMENT OF ZOOLOGY.

An Assistant Lecturer in Zoology is required.

Applications are invited for the above appointment. Salary, £500 to £550 with an additional bonus of £50. Initial salary governed by qualifications of successful candidates. Further particulars may be obtained from the Principal of the College.

By order.

12th December, 1919.

The Committee of Edge Hill Training College will proceed to elect a Principal in the Spring Term, 1920. The selected candidate will be expected to enter on her duties September 1, 1920.

Applications from candidates for this office should be addressed not later than February 14, 1920, to—

F. STANLEY GIBBS,
Secretary,
Edge Hill Training College,
41, North John Street.

From whom information as to the duties and emoluments of the Principal may be obtained.

ROYAL ALBERT MEMORIAL UNIVERSITY COLLEGE EXETER.

LECTURER IN HISTORY (chiefly medieval) £300
LECTURER IN GEOGRAPHY £300

Teachers' Training Department.

LECTURER IN HYGIENE and PHYSICAL DRILL £300

TWO ASSISTANT LECTURERS (men) £200

The Governors invite applications for the following posts:

Applications must be made on a special form obtainable on sending stamped addressed envelope to the undersigned to whom they should be returned as quickly as possible.

HERBERT REED, Chief Education Officer,
Education Offices, 15 John Street, Sunderland.
December 20, 1919.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

The Council invites applications for the appointment of 5 inspectors of district rank in the Education Officer's Department. Both men and women are eligible. The salary will be £600 a year, rising by annual increments of £25 to £800 a year. This salary is based on existing economic conditions. The persons appointed will be required to give their whole time to the duties of their office.

The persons appointed must be qualified to conduct or assist in conducting general inspections of all types of schools and institutions. Ability to inspect and advise on instruction in one special branch of knowledge will be considered. Other duties may be entrusted to them.

In the case of male candidates preference will be given to persons who have served or are serving in His Majesty's Forces. Applications must be on forms to be obtained from the Education Officer, London County Council, Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C.2, to whom they must be returned not later than 11 a.m. on Saturday, 19th January, 1920.

All communications on the subject must be endorsed G.P. 87 and a stamped addressed foolscap envelope must be enclosed. Candidates who desire the receipt of their applications to be acknowledged should enclose a stamped addressed postcard. Canvassing disqualifies.

JAMES BIRD,
Clerk of the London County Council.
Appointments Vacant

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

The Council invites applications for the appointment of two Technical Assistants to act under the supervision of the head of the technology branch of the Education Officer’s department. The work of the Technology Branch embraces Technical and Commercial Institutes, Schools of Art and Continuation Schools (day and evening). The salary will be £300 a year, rising by annual increments of £25 to a maximum of £800 a year. This salary is based on existing economic conditions. The persons appointed will be required to give their whole time to the duties of their office.

Applications must be made on the official form to be obtained from the Education Officer, London County Council, Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C.2, to whom they must be returned not later than 11 a.m. on Saturday, January 21st, 1920. Preference will be given to those persons who have served or attempted to serve with H.M. Forces.

All communications on the subject must be endorsed “G.P. 87,” and a stamped addressed envelope must be enclosed. Candidates who desire the receipt of their applications to be acknowledged should enclose a stamped addressed postcard.

JAMES BIRD, Clerk, or the London County Council.

THE COUNTY BOROUGH OF STOKE-ON-TRENT EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

HANLEY SECONDARY SCHOOL.

Wanted at once the following:

Mathematical Master with honours degree for advanced course work for boys. Commencing salary £300 to £400 per annum, dependent upon qualifications and experience.

Assistant Mistress for Geography. Ability to assist in some other subject will be a recommendation. Salary £160 to £230 per annum, dependent upon qualifications and experience. Teaching experience in a Secondary School essential.

Forms of application (which should be returned duly filled up at once) may be obtained on receipt of stamped addressed envelope, from

Dr. W. LUDFORD FREEMAN, Director of Education, Town Hall, Hanley, Stoke-on-Trent.

Appointments Wanted

GENTLEMAN, 31, about to be married, seeks post. Double first Cambridge Historical Tripos; major scholar and twice Earl of Derby Student, Trinity College; Fellow of the Royal Anthropological Institute. Three years as a Charity Organisation Secretary, with excellent testimonial. Wide additional experience of social work, e.g., with Workers’ Educational Association, School Care Committees, Clubs and Boy Scouts. For three years in charge of juvenile delinquents. A pacifist. Personal references of high standing can be given. Box 538, Athenæum Advertising Office, 170, Fleet Street, London, E.C.4.

Librarian’s Assistant.—Re-engagement desired in a Technical Scientific or Learned Institution. Has had experience in similar post. Box 539, Athenæum Advertising Office, 170, Fleet Street, E.C.4.

Authors’ Agents, etc.

The Authors’ Alliance are prepared to consider and place MSS. for early publication. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors’ interests first. Twenty years’ experience. Please note new address: 90 and 94, Cheaney Lane, London, W.C.2.

Proof Reading, Indexing, Researches, Revision. Linguist, good experience. Mr. F. A. Hadland, 15, Bellevue Mansions, Forest Hill, S.E. 23.

Typewriting &c.

Typewriting of every description carefully and promptly executed at home, 1s. per 1,000 words; carbon copy, 3d. per 1,000 words. Duplicating. Cambridge Local. Mrs. Nancy McFarlane, 11, Palmeira Avenue, Westcliff, Essex.
By WILLIAM C. BRAITHWAITE,
B.A., LL.B.,
President of the Woodbrooke Settlement,
Selly Oak, near Birmingham.
With Introduction by RUFUS M. JONES, M.A., D.Litt.

THE BEGINNINGS
OF QUAKERISM.
With Maps. 8vo. 12s. net.

THE SECOND PERIOD
OF QUAKERISM
8vo. 15s. net.

The Friend:—‘The Beginnings of Quakerism,’ which appeared in 1912, was a great book and was welcomed among us with a zeal similar to that with which the letters of ‘dear George Fox’ were received by our ancestors ten generations ago. And now we have this further splendid gift, completing the Quaker history of the seventeenth century in two volumes of surpassing interest, of immense value, of true learning, and of deep and abiding sympathy and love of truth.”

By RUFUS M. JONES,
M.A., D.Litt.
Assisted by ISAAC SHARPLESS, D.Sc., and AMELIA M. GUMMERE.

THE QUAKERS IN THE AMERICAN COLONIES
8vo. 12s. net.

The Guardian:—‘This is one of the most interesting religious histories that we have ever read.’

Saturday Review:—‘A book which should soon rank as the standard work on the subject.’

STUDIES IN
MYSTICAL RELIGION
Third Impression. 8vo. 12s. net.

The Spectator:—‘Mr. Rufus M. Jones’s ‘Studies’ are full of charm and interest.’

SPIRITUAL REFORMERS
IN THE
16th AND 17th CENTURIES
8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

The Guardian:—‘Written with a singular charm of style (due to a true spiritual earnestness), of which his volume on the Quakers in America showed him to be a master, the author’s present study is one of remarkable attractiveness.’

A New Year’s Present.

HERE is a suggestion for a present which will bring thoughts of the giver every week throughout 1920.

Make your friend a present of an annual subscription to “The Athenæum”—the well-known Journal of Literature, Science, the Fine Arts, Music, and the Drama. If he or she is interested in these subjects, “The Athenæum” would be greatly appreciated.

In addition to being the most informative and the most truly critical of all English periodicals, “The Athenæum” is also the most readable. The variety of the interests with which it deals is equalled by the vigour and quality of the writing in which it treats them. Each number is a proof of the emptiness of the superstition that to be scholarly one must be dull and prosy in order to be critical.

The Annual Subscription Rates are:—Inland, 28/2.
Foreign, 30/-

I enclose...........in order that you may send a copy of “The Athenæum” weekly for one year to

..................................................
..................................................
..................................................

with my Best Wishes.

Signed........................................
A NEW YEAR SUGGESTION

THERE is, at the present time, a ferment of activity among the caravists of the arts, and those who have a perversely cast of mind will say that there is more froth than substance in the ferment. For ourselves we decline to sign an opinion; we merely record the fact that nowadays aesthetic societies are legion, and that they could hardly exist without supplying a need and attracting supporters. Roughly speaking, the function of these societies is to excite the attention and interest of the general public to the modern work that is being done in the various arts, and thereby to create for the artist a larger audience than he has been hitherto able to command. Eventually, it is hoped, there will be a marked increase in the intelligent demand for works of pure and applied art.

No intention could be more laudable; no expectation, it would seem, more reasonable. Yet in actual experience we quickly discover a paradox. We find these organizations, as a rule, addressing themselves not to the general public, but to a very particular audience which has little need of salvation. Go to any one of the public meetings of any one of the societies, and you will meet the old familiar faces of those whom you have known for amateurs or enthusiasts as long as you have been one yourself. Think back, under the influence of this constestation, to the time when you began to take an interest in these things, and it is unlikely that you will find its source or occasion in a society. Perhaps there were not any societies in those days, but probably there were a few, and undoubtedly you might have been saved a great deal of unnecessary pioneer work on your own account if you had had the good fortune to come into contact with one of them.

Something, surely, is wrong. As far as the general public is concerned societies too often vaticinate in vacuo; they preach to the converted, the current short-circuited before it comes into contact with the heathen. No doubt the secretary of any such soci-already half-prepared to receive any message that modern artists may have to impart to them. In the various art and craft schools of London alone there must be some thousands of boys with a natural predilection for the things of art, and a very genuine desire to have their aesthetic horizon broadened. No doubt they imbibe a great deal of solid nutriment from their official masters; but they are taught, as they must be taught, according to a tradition which is, very often, peculiarly cramped and cramping. The authorities themselves are aware of this, and they endeavour to combat the deadening influence of stereotyped methods by calling in various venerable old gentlemen to lecture on the broader aspects of art.

We ourselves love venerable old gentlemen who have spent most of their lives in lecturing, but we have to confess that we have listened to very few of them from whom we have learned anything or by whose influence we have added a cubit to our enthusiasm; and we think that if they have generally bored us, they must bore boys more profoundly still. A boy needs to have formed in him an enthusiastic conviction that art is a sufficient and a possible way of life, that it may be a complete expression of all that is of real value in experience, that it is not some quaint activity of which the patterns are stored up for ever in the remoteness of museums, but one which a number of people not so very much older than himself are pondering, making experiment of, and wrestling with in all seriousness every day.

We fear that pious hands may be uplifted in horror at the suggestion which is dimly adumbrated in these words. Let us therefore make it more explicit. We suggest that the reformers and enthusiasts of modern art in every kind should be given an opportunity of putting their views before boys, and boys given the chance of hearing them. If there is a danger that the good, sound tradition (which has so often nothing to do with the real tradition at all) should be corrupted, we are perfectly willing to amend our suggestion so that respectable traditional young artists should be in the opportunity as freely as those who are voted "rebels." The boy can choose between and take that which suits him from each. Only occasional professors be young; let them be of force. The modern school should supplant or supplement, but must be actual as an instrument to solve problems that are inevitable to their

But, however true it may be that the way of the artist is hard, it is the delights, the importance, the actuality of art that need to be, and are so seldom, exhibited to him. A boy who receives an inking of the rewards and satisfactions of art will confront with enthusiasm its difficulties, and even if he may never become a master, he will never be a hireling, and he will help to create that sympathetic and understanding audience which is the best guarantee of a vital art. Here then, in the boy, is the opportunity for our societies. Hic Rhodus, hic salta. M.

GENII OF THE RING

"L*ES exercices du cirque," says Jules Lemaitre, "consistent essentiellement à contrarier les lois de la nature." Does the charm of the circus lie in that paradox, or in the scope it gives to an inherited instinct, our dormant sense of kinship with the animals? Or is it, as those aver who love to sit close on the curve of the ring and swallow clots of tan, a case of genuine Lippesian Einfühlung, the bliss of feeling the rush and thrill of the movement? Perhaps it is hardly worth while to pursue the discussion. The charm of the circus somehow eludes analysis. Or, if we must go on probing its aesthetics, let us anyhow first take a glance at its evolution. We shall find that, like the drama and the novel, it has always reflected the fashions of the moment.

The foundation-stone of the English circus was laid in the eighteenth century, with a characteristic avoidance of fuss and emphasis. Somewhere about 1770 a cavalry trooper named Philip Astley returned from service abroad with a horse and a medal and roped in a simple pitch on a field near Lambeth, where he showed equestrian feats in the open air. His wife, his son and a pupil or two joined the troupe; success followed, and within a short time there were covered wooden seats for the spectators. Notices proclaimed that Astley could be seen daily "riding, on full speed, with his head on a common pint-pot, at the rate of twelve miles an hour." "Please to ask for a bill at the door," adds the programme with severe probity, "and see that the number of fifty feats are performed." Competition, at Sadler's Wells and elsewhere, failed to kill the enterprise, and in 1780 there rose near Westminster Bridge a building that called itself "Astley's Amphitheatre." With the usual breaks due to fires, enlargements and bankruptcies, this historic house lasted till 1893, when Lord George Sanger, its final proprietor, surrendered it to the L.C.C. for destruction.

The name of George Sanger brings to mind his memoirs, over the pages of which it is impossible not to dawdle. They are a link between the eighteenth century and the Romantic circus and also an entry into a vanished England. We commend them earnestly to the social historian. Their author began life travelling with his father, one of Nelson's old sailors who had taken to the road with a peepshow. But it is the book itself that is the most vivid of peepshows, revealing glimpse by glimpse the fierce and wrae England of the years that followed Waterloo, when Lord George Sanger, its final proprietor, surrendered it to the L.C.C. for destruction.
caravan we hear of the Devil joining the alehouse circle, of unprovoked murders perpetrated with bill-hooks, of mysterious wayfarers who ask for a lift at night, and are betrayed by the horrid contents of their sacks as "body-snatchers." Town populations cower in cellars, while Chartist mobs sweep the streets and are volleyed by soldiery; tribes of gipsies fight set battles with brigades of grim, top-hatted police and leave their dead and wounded on the field; tipsy mobs wreck the showmen’s booths at fairs for sport, and the owners take vengeance with their whips of whalebone; on the road the showmen fight each other for precedence till the maddened elephants rush from the wreck of the wagons and stampede the combatants back into their senses. Justice Shallow, with his constables and beadles, in summary raids deals out vengeance rather than law, reserving a special thick stick for the "strollers and vagabonds."

On such an anvil was forged the generation that gave the circus its place in fancy and literature.

"Now, sir, if you please, inquire for Miss Woolford, sir." Such, according to "Boz," was the formula with which Widdicombe, the famous ringmaster at Astley's in the thirties, would cut short the josting of the clown. On these magic syllables, to a charming galoppe, there arrives the Romantic circus. Miss Woolford, gauzy and roseate dream! She haunts the novels of Dickens, she is the "Donna Inez" of Welfordinez of the cockney laureate Bon Gaultier, it is she (or we like to think it is she) who appears, with her lustrous orbs a trifle exaggerated, at the foot of an illustration by Doyle to the "Newcomes." She is the Taglioni of the ring, the écouvre de panneau in her classical quintessence. It was not for her to vault on and off like a tombow, to throw somersaults from the pad, or hang inverted (Mercy on us, my dear!) with tresses dabbling in the tan as Mazeppa. She might by condescension flit across the outspread "garter" or the "banner," or even burst through the wreck of a paper "balloon," like Phœbe piercing the clouds with silvery visage. But for the rest the art of the ballerina sufficed, entrelacs, attitudes and arabesques. What man (what schoolboy) with a soul could ask more?

Was the hand that looked so ethereal on the neck of the great white horse, curved like a chess knight's, really claimed in mortal marriage by the intrepid Ducrow? History says so, and surely he deserved the prize, the tremendous fellow, who rode his three horses abreast right on to the stage of Drury Lane, where, putting to flight Macbeth and the Prince of Denmark, he regaled the age of the Eglington Tournament with the jests of "King Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table." We discern, also, our old friend Fitzball, a manuscript protruding from his frock. It is "The White Maiden of California," in which the spirits of twelve dead Indian chieftains are to rise through traps on statuesque cream-coloured horses. We have reached the apogee of arena Romanticism—Sylphs, paladins and ghosts—"the charm's wound up!"

It was somewhere in France that a change came over the spirit of the dream: Astley, who built circus there in 1804, handed on the torch to Franecon dynasty. Caroline Loyo, who may be in prints in her waving Grecian draperies, and P-Cuzent, who dressed as a Polish lussar, w
THE ATHENÆUM

January 2, 1920

REVIEWS

COULEUR DE ROSE

ESSAYS ON ART. By A. Clutton Brock. (Methuen. 5s. net.)

IT seemed to us a good thing that two books so unlike in their outward aspect as Mr. Wyndham Lewis’s “Caliph’s Design” and these essays of Mr. Clutton Brock should have appeared with so short an interval between them. Probably, both authors would resist the collocation. Mr. Lewis would not like to be seen with Mr. Brock, and Mr. Brock would (less violently) avoid Mr. Lewis’s company.

Far be it from us to play gooseberry, or, in language more proper to the time, to lend our benevolent offices to establish a modus vivendi between them. Life is not lived in that ideal city in whose corner café we have placed them together over a heap of sauces for which Mr. Brock, as the older man, will pay; and we, alas! are not in reality, as we are sometimes in dream, the patron of that aery caravanseraï. Mr. Lewis will scowl at Mr. Brock, and Mr. Brock will disapprove of Mr. Lewis; and probably they will unite only for one frenzied moment in which our benevolent head is broken for its pains.

Yet we approve of them both. Are we then Laodicean? Do we blow hot and cold in a breath? No, for we disagree with them both. But in both we find—somewhat to our surprise, we confess—a real and impassioned concern for things about which concern must be impassioned or not felt at all. We observe the difference in tone with which they speak, but for a moment the observation is lost, in the thrill of satisfaction with which we hear the words they say: Ecrasons l’infâme. If Mr. Lewis is vitriolic, Mr. Brock is at least vehement; we have no doubt that they mean what they say when these words fall from their lips. To mean what you say is half the battle won, if you aim at conquering our sympathies.

Ecrasons l’infâme, then. Down with humbug! There is enough work for a lifetime here without pausing to break each other’s head. Let us make people like what they like, instead of pretending to like what they cannot possibly like. That is the essential preliminary to making them like what we like. Mr. Lewis and Mr. Brock are bowling at the same ninepins. We prefer Mr. Lewis’s technique. It shows a quickness about his shot which is lar the already punch of Carpentier. Mr. Brock is not so swift, keep it up longer, and he has some effective s own.

craftsman, there is nothing sacred about his work, and made to be sold; and all we expect of it is the fashion, which means that it shall be what seller thinks he can sell. There are, of course, thought of as artists, and their work at story like pictures. They, too, have like; and some people will buy their they would buy pictures—that is and not because they like it.

so guilty of the insincerity who has no conviction and ater to refrain

Besides,

Now we do not for one moment wish to jeer or sneer at Mr. Brock for pointing us to the way of salvation. If he has found it, it is his duty to say it. But to think that so easy is to invite a challenge, because we have looked for it ourselves. We know Mr. Brock’s dream. Have we not dreamed it ourselves? The Magic Flute will play, and the spirits of evil and pain will goose-step backward out of life. There will be beauty and loveliness and love in men’s souls and in the world. It is a dream that has broken many hearts, and will break many more before the race of dreamers has perished from the earth. We are on the side of those who dream these things; they are our friends. But we require more of our friends than of our enemies; we require that they should acknowledge that their dream is only a dream.

Mr. Brock will not acknowledge this, and in this we hold he is not honest. The honest man must choose between two things: either he must declare that this world in which we live is a dream, and that the Kingdom of Heaven, the land of the Magic Flute, is real; or he must say that these are a dream and that the world in which we live is real. And he may not escape a cage in which he is telling the story of the world, for the cage in which we live is the cage of the world, a statement that has echoed so much in many hearts: that the Kingdom of Heaven is within you, for that only means that the Kingdom of Heaven is a dream. Men may live by dreams, it is true, and we pity the man who has no dream of beauty or love to live by. But to project the dream on to the real is a lie—a beautiful, generous lie, no doubt, but a lie in the soul, and one with which the founder of the religion to which Mr. Brock would have us return disdained to compromise.

Unlike that great exemplar, Mr. Brock supplies the place of candour with cleverness—unconsciously, to be sure. Mr. Brock persuades himself. Listen to him:

“So long as human nature is what it is there will always be war.” The school that think of nature as something not ourselves making for unrighteousness, for unhappiness. They know that they themselves do not wish for war; but, looking at mankind in the mass and leaving themselves out of that mass, they see it governed by some force that is not really human nature, but merely nature “red in tooth and claw,” a process become a malignant goddess, who forces mankind to act contrary to their own desires, contrary even to their own interests. She has taken the place of the old original sin; and of the belief that her is far more primitive than the belief in original sin. She is, in fact, but a modern name for all the malignant idols that savages have worshiped with sacrifices of blood and tears that they did not wish to make. It is strange that, priding ourselves as we do on our modern scepticism which has taught us to disbelieve in the miracle of the Greatoreyne, we yet have not dared to affirm the plain fact that this nature, this human nature, does not exist. There is no force, no process, whether within us or outside us, that compels us to act contrary to our desires and our interests. There is nothing but fear; and fear can be conquered, as by individuals, so by the collective will of man.

There is no collective human nature, but there is a collective human will. No, no, no, Mr. Brock. You must accept both, or deny both. To juggle one out of existence and the other into it is disingenuous, as you will confess if you try to examine this process by which you rest the hope of humanity. Is it a good will or a bad one? If it is a bad one, is it not “something not ourselves making for unrighteousness”? If it is a good one, where are its works? Look for them in the abyss of 1914-18 and tell us what you see, not what you dream.

But what, it may be asked, has all this to do with art? We answer: Everything. Mr. Brock is not irrelevant. He desires to change the attitude of the public towards art, and he knows that this is linked up with the attitude the public to other more immediate things. You cannot ser l’infâme in a single corner of men’s minds. Humbug is inseparably bound up with humbug in thought as in life, for the reason that the foundation of art attitude to life. Mr. Brock’s impulse is profoundly ad we should like to believe that it is because of this that he has attained to a popularity that is seldom the lot of the writer in the periodical press. But honesty compels us to suggest an alternative. It may be because Mr. Brock is less disturbing than he sounds, less disturbing by far than he ought to be; it may be because the only way to make Erasez l'infame as popular as "Hang the Han" is ostentatiously to put on your rose-coloured spectacles when you go out to look for the enemy.

WORKING WOMEN IN SEVEN REIGNS

WORKING LIFE OF WOMEN IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY. By Aber Clark. (Routledge. 10s. 6d. net.)

The elder historians thought nothing too trivial for record which concerned kings, queens and battles; the modern research student is of the same mind about details of the common life of common people. Sometimes they are both right, and sometimes their creed results in chronicles of tedious dullness. But their varied outlook on life, and their consequent raids upon State Papers, treaties, official correspondence, diaries, town records, manor rolls and other documents of infinitesimal dignity, do result at least in the complete utilization of such records. Like the hen and the jewel merchant watching smuggled pearls being sifted from grains of corn, they applaud the process, disputing only as to what is the treasure, what the residue to be rejected. A third claimant has lately appeared, collecting first the hitherto unnoticed relics of the division, and then demanding her share from each of the earlier comers, so that she may together some story of women's life in the past. However diligent the student in collecting material, however remarkable the talent with which she arranges, explains and exhibits her mosaic, the story of Jill will never be so complete or so convincing as the story of Jack and his Master. But it is worth making, not only for its own sake, but for its value in correcting or amplifying the histories which have concerned themselves so exclusively with the male half of humanity.

Miss Clark has chosen for herself the life of women in the seventeenth century; her work is in some sense a continuation of the pioneer researches of Mary Bateson, and in another an introductory chapter to Miss B. L.
Hutchins's "Women in Modern Industry." The period presents unusual difficulty: to the investigator and Miss Clark's point of view in taking as its characteristic movement the increasing capitalization of industry leads her to ignore other influences which had even more importance in changing women's industrial status during this century. She sees women under Elizabeth leading comparatively free lives, largely concerned in directing domestic industry, regarded as the partners of their husbands in skilled crafts and in trading operations, freely practising one of the most lucrative branches of the medical profession, and after the Restoration "a profound change in the character of women," their increasingly rigid exclusion from trades requiring apprenticeship, and their economic dependence resulting from the supression of "family industry," by industrialism and the decreasing importance of domestic industries and manufactures.

Some of this change was, no doubt, due to capitalization of industry, but war, pestilence, civil strife and social changes resulting from the recent dissolution of religious communities were not without their part in it. It may be doubted whether capitalization made such great strides in the seventeenth century as is here claimed. In agriculture, at all events, the Open Field system, with its community tillage and common land, continued in force until well into the eighteenth century, and contemporary critics attributed to its wastefulness and conservative methods the high prices and short supplies of food which caused so much distress in the bad harvest years of 1790-97. The years of enclosure had hardly begun, and the multitudes of paupers or cottagers whose sufferings are related seem in many cases to have been poor families deprieved of their bread-winners by the terribly destructive plagues of 1603, 1625 and 1685, and in others, small yeoman farmers who had left their holdings in the hope of doing better near large towns, or at the worst receiving the poor relief which made idleness more profitable than agricultural work. The early years of the century were years of abnormally high prices, owing to the heavy imports of silver and defective national finance; but the latter part of the period shows a marked rise in real wages, and it was the farmers, capitalists in a small way, who were described as "living worse than in Bridewell." In truth, this century, with its recurring visitations of plague, its Civil War, its Dutch and Spanish Wars, its Great Fire, can hardly be said to show a marked progress in capitalization or in any other direction. It was remarkable for much Government interference in trade and industry, like that of our own time well-meant, but often inept; and the population sitting among the ruins of an old order based on family industry, and watching the slow growth of industrialism, suffered from the ills of both systems. In this state of chaos women, whose interests always lie in a settled order of society, fared badly. They lost, as Miss Clark shows, the dignified position occupied by them when they supervised industries carried on in their own homes by dughters and hired women servants; they lost also much of the recognition formerly given by Trade Guilds to wives or widows of their members, and no new rights of apprenticeship recompensed them for the inform interference in trade which was available when skilled crafts were carried on in their own homes. On the other hand, they received in periods of good trade higher money wages than they could have obtained under the old conditions, a point which is made by Miss B. L.

Hutchins in the statement that, "though the growth of capital may have seriously affected the position of the male craftsman, it seems not impossible that the position of women may have been improved by the opportunity of work for wages outside the home."

Whether Miss Clark has proved her thesis or no, she has made available to the general reader and the student of economics a mass of material upon practically possible, and has thrown a great deal of light on a field of history obscure in spite of, perhaps because of, its wealth of documentary material. She has faced the difficult task of presenting a fair sample of her evidence, and has come well out of that searching trial, though reflection would no doubt cause her to admit that on occasion she has read more into her authorities than is quite admissible. Can we take it, for example, that a writer of Henry VII.'s time really "includes the wife's work among the necessary costs of making a loaf," when he allots to the miller one-fifth of every quarter of wheat, and for the baker, "his house, his wife, his dog, and his cuttle seven pence." It is one of the pitfalls of research to see one's subject hung on every bush, but casual lapses of this kind add to the gaity of the reader without lessening the value of the book. We must have some plums as a reward if we are to read as much economic history as is good for us.

E. M. G.

Nuggets of gold, rattlesnakes, adventures in a fever-stricken valley out West, and an assault on an inn by a party of beggars are some of the attractions provided by May Wynne for the readers of Nipper and Co. (Stanley Paul, 218 pp., 3/6 net).
AMERICAN CRITICISM

SCEPTICS : NOTES ON CONTEMPORARY POETRY. By Conrad Aiken. (New York, Knopf.)
PREJUDICES. First Series. By H. L. Mencken. (New York, Knopf. $2.)

I t seems absurd that in a city of seven million inhabitants, a city through which one could march a whole day and never see an end of bricks and mortar—it seems absurd that here in a metropolis one should feel as though one were living in the close, oppressive atmosphere of a cathedral town. And yet there are times when most people who have any dealings with the "literary world" must have felt thus. We live in a narrow world, peopled with private admirations, private scribes and jealousies. One person's business is everybody else's business; the sound of gossip sizzles and simmers round the cathedral close like the confused and multitudinous crying of jackdaws on a summer evening. Our metropolitan dearness is like that charming village of which we have recently been hearing in a certain much-reported case, where "you couldn't stir without having an anonymous letter." Here too you can't stir with impunity; set pen to paper, and the reviews come thick and fast. The gossip of criticism never holds its tongue: X has given birth to an epic, but it is said to have the rickets; Y's last three children are prettier than Z's; A's Muse, in her younger days, had an affair with Browning, and so on. The worst of this critical gossip is that it is not simply spoken into private ears; it is shouted abroad through the megaphones of the press. It is a nightmarish place, our dearness; if only one could get away, far away, somewhere else.

But where? One would only be exchanging one jackdaw-haunted close for another. Certainly, America possesses, safe amidst the hubbub, its own snug little cathedral town of poetry. Mr. Aiken inhabits it, and here, in the pages of "Sceptics," he retails some of the gossip of the place. Mr. Aiken's gossip is amusing enough; we like hearing about Miss Lola Ridge and Mr. Sandburg, about Amy Lowell and Alfred Kreymborg. But, as Mr. Aiken himself points out in his delightfully frank introductory essay, a critic really speaks only of himself and is only interesting in what he reveals about himself. Mr. Aiken is not quite a good enough talker; his gossip is entertaining, but he has not the knack of telling a story well, of putting an idea into a forcible and convincing form. A certain diffuseness—it is noticeable, but to a lesser degree, in his poetry—takes the edge and point off what he says; a fact that is the more regrettable, since we believe his psychological methods of criticism to be fundamentally sound and fruitful. People cannot expect to be listened to with a pleased attention if they give utterance to sentences like this: "A great variety of intellectual energies has been simultaneously catalyzed by a great variety of stimuli, and the result inevitably has been chaos." Mr. Aiken has a terrible weakness for this kind of sentence and for long, pseudo-scientific words such as "holistic," "syneutics," and "synaesthetically," which do much to take the life and meaning out of his criticism. This diffuseness of style and the cathedral-townliness of matter that makes his criticism read as though it were gossip combine to make Mr. Aiken's book less readable than, from its many merits, it should be.

In Mr. Mencken's pages we breathe a more bracing air. We are out of the close now, high up on the tower surveying mankind from China to Peru, or, to be more accurate, from New York to San Francisco.

Mr. Mencken turns a pair of very civilized eyes on the extraordinary and fantastic spectacle which is contemporary American life. It passes before him, a circus parade—vast ponderous elephants, lions, shy gazelles, apes, performing horses—and he comments upon it, laughingly, in that brilliant, masterfully vulgar style of which he knows the strange secret. All the animals interest him, graceful and ugly alike, noble and repulsive; but by preference he lingers, fascinated no doubt by the fabulous grotesque- ness of their wondrous feats. Mr. Mencken contemplates their civilization's pyramids with the solemn mummies of stupidity, mountain-bodied and mouse-brained, slow-moving, prehistoric. They exist everywhere, these monsters; but it is surely in America that they reach their greatest growth. Puritanism there swells into Comstockism; our harmless little European uplift becomes a sinister, rapacious philanthropic beast; religions pullulate, strange and improbable as the saurians of the Mesozoic age. Mr. Mencken contemplates them with a civilized man's astonishment and horror, then sets his pen in rest and charges upon them. His pen is sharp, his aim unerring, and the punctured monsters collapse with a dolorous whistling of escaping gas. It is a wonderful display. Admiring his skill, one thinks of what Dryden said of himself in his Essay on Satire: "There is still a vast difference between the slovenly butchering of a man and the fineness of a stroke that separates the head from the body and leaves it standing in its place. A man may be capable, as Jack Ketch's wife said of his servant, of a plain piece of work, a bare hanging; but to make a malefactor die sweetly was only belonging to her husband." Mr. Mencken is a worthy apprentice of this great Jack Ketch of literature. Of all his performances, perhaps the most brilliantly conducted is his execution of Professor Doctor Thorstein Veblen, author of "The Theory of the Leisure Class" and "The Higher Learning in America." Professor Veblen is almost too good to be true. He is a Great Thinker who teaches us that we have been round our houses because we are "the descendants of a pastoral people inhabiting a region with a humid climate," and that we do not keep cows on these lawns "because a herd of cattle so pointedly suggests thrift and economy," and we, being members of the Leisured Class, have a feudal contempt for thrift. Mr. Mencken, it may be imagined, deals with Veblenism as it deserves; but when one has laughed over Veblen and the other monsters at which he goes a-tilting, one begins to wonder whether, after all, the thing is not too easy. The monsters of America are so undignifiedly monstrous that it is not hard to recognize them and with a hunter's eye to mark out their vulnerable spots. But here in Europe the monstrness of the dragons is quite another matter. They are huge, in distinguished traditional shapes, in lions' skins, or winged with the plumes of eagles. The eye must be sharp indeed that can detect at a glance the true nature of the beasts. We should like to see if Mr. Mencken's critical gift served him as well in an older, more intellectually sophisticated world, where the circus parade of life and letters, though perhaps equally grotesque, is grotesque in a different way from the transatlantic spectacle. In any case, we should welcome his appearance among us here; for we have sore need of critics who hate humbug, who are not afraid of putting out their tongues at pretentiousness however noble an aspect it may wear, who do not mind being vulgar at need, and who, finally, know not only how to make us think, but how to make us laugh as well.

A. L. H.

The Council of the British Academy has awarded the Rose Mary Crawshay Prize for English Literature (of the value of £100) to Miss Mary Paton Ramsey for her work on Donne, entitled Les Doctrines Médicales. Miss Ramsey is a graduate of the University of Aberdeen and Doctor of the University of Paris. The Rose Mary Crawshay Prize is awarded annually to a woman of any nationality who, in the judgment of the Council of the British Academy, has written or published within three years next preceding the date of the award an historical or critical work of sufficient value on any subject connected with English literature.
THE CAREER OF LAMENNAIS

AUTHORITY IN THE MODERN STATE. By Harold J. Laski. (Yale University Press. 12s. 6d. net.)

THE portrait of the Abbé Félicité de Lamennais prefixed to Gibson’s biography shows a thin, keen face, flanked by pattes de lêvre, which might well be that of one of Napoleon’s Marshals. The resemblance was not an outward one only. Lamennais, little as he may have known it, was, like Balzac, dolorous all his days with the fever of the Empire; he was a spiritual Ney, charging battle-fronts of doctrine as his prototype charged the squares on Mont St. Jean. When his final condemnation was made public in the Encyclical “Singulari Nos,” Metternich, M. Budon tells us, “confia au nonce de Vienne, Ostini, que la nouvelle lettre apostolique lui agréât fort.” It reminded him, no doubt, of Waterloo.

It is, indeed, in the idées Napoléoniennes that we find the key to the whole career of Lamennais. He has been called the father of modern Ultramontanism and, but as Friedrich, the historian of the Vatican Council, perceived, even that this office belongs to Napoleon I. It was the Concordat of 1801, empowering Pius VII. to raze the French Church to the ground, as he might have demolished some ancient basilica in Rome, that founded the latter-day Vatican monarchy. That the Emperor should afterwards for his own ends have sought to impose upon the new Church he and the Pope had created the State fetters worn by the Church they had destroyed was bound to be looked on as an inconsequence. It was so regarded by Lamennais, who found Napoleon’s Bourbon imitators even more intolerable as spiritual directors. He learned to see in the annihilation of the Church of the ancien râgne, with its swollen revenues, its Prince Bishops, and its Gallican servitude to the Crown, the bursting of bonds and the promise of fruitful expansion. It was from the Empire he really derived his Liberal Catholicism, as Louis Napoleon his Liberal political creed. As the latter read into his uncle’s testament the plébiscite and the principle of nationalities, so Lamennais deduced from it the separation of Church and State and the liberty of conscience and discussion. But there is a saying that not one of the three seems ever to have pondered: “They that take the sword shall perish by the sword.”

To Mr. Laski—whose book on “Authority in the Modern State” is at the same time a study on authority in the Church—its influence passed by the Papacy on Lamennais is the “first step on the road which led, first through the Syllabus of 1864 and the definition of papal infallibility, and later through the condemnation of Modernism in the ‘Pascendi,’” to the proclamation of war on the basis of modern society by Rome. “It would be pleasant to see in Lamennais a simple martyr to the ideal of “ordered liberty,” a prophet who taught that the Church could join hands with democracy, and that Catholics need no weapons to win their converts but a love of mankind and the right to be heard with their rivals. That, unluckily, is but one half of the gospel of Lamennais. The other half, the product of a mind incorrigibly Latin and authoritarian, is: “Sois mon frère, ou je t’excommunique!” Lamennais did not turn to the Papacy as the natural ally against Erastians only. There was a great deal more in his Ultramontanism. The Pope, in the philosophy of the “Essai sur l’Indifférence,” is the infallible mouthpiece of the redeemed human race. It is for him to speak and the individual to hear; the part has no possible rights against the whole. Individuals cannot reach certainty at all without the assistance of the collective mind, whose consent is the one criterion of truth. The issue of this is, of course, a rigorous theocracy and a frank return to Hildebrandine ideals.

A theorist who thus appealed to Gregory VII. had no retort to Gregory XVI.

In candid moments Lamennais did not deny this fact. He did not in his heart echo those of his partisans who declared the “Mirari Vos,” the first condemnation of his system, a corrupt political deal, the price exacted from Gregory by the Tsar for help in subduing the rebels of the Romagna. He would have been as just to the Pope as he was to the Jesuits when he wrote of them: “Nous croyons que la domination à laquelle aspire la Compagnie de Jésus est celle du Catholicisme; mais elle vient que cette domination soit son œuvre presque exclusive.”

The Pope was as fervid a Catholic as Lamennais, but he had his own system and meant to adhere to it. The Vatican detests adventures. It is always for small, safe gains, tenaciously clung to—for cautious investments yielding rapid returns. The “Red Cap on the Cross” was a chimera; the ancien râgne, as revived by the Congress of Vienna, offered solid benefits if it asked a high price for them. And if the Abbé de Lamennais annoyed its diplomatists, the Abbé de Lamennais must be made to recant. His doctrine was elaborately sheathed in half. The revolutionary element was discarded; the Ultramontane maxims were carefully preserved. In the honest bourgeois Veuillot, with his wit and shrewdness the genius of the common people, the Vatican found the man it required. He fought its battles to the issue demanded of him, but he did not deny his debt to Lamennais.

There appears something harsh, though the harshness was reluctant, in the steps by which Lamennais, after many real sacrifices, was driven to the wall of an unreserved submission. Simplicity, absolute, illimitée, was the Papal vocabulary. He gave up his paper L’Avenir, he disbanded his international association, the Agence Catholique; he could no longer compromise the Church by its doctrines. He might have left the Congress of Rome, but it was not that Rome was despotic, but that it did not exercise the right kind of despotism. He had always pressed to have his opponents condemned. “They that take the sword shall perish by the sword.”

The English Nonjuror Law once pertinently asked a polemical bishop: “Is a limited, conditional government in the State such a wise, excellent, and glorious institution? And is the same authority in the Church such absurdity, nonsense, and nothing at all as to any actual power?” Mr. Laski, we take it, would answer “No” to this question, but Lamennais would have judged that answer absurd. Long after he had become the apostate “we find him declaring: ‘Qu’est-ce qu’un corps religieux, une puissance ecclésiastique, si elle n’est pas revêtue d’infallibilité? Rien, absolument rien.’ Simple, absolu, illimité, he also moved in that circle to the end.

He was the gentlest of apostates, who hardly knew quite how he had come to apostatize. The “hatred” with which Renan charges him he reserved for the oppressors of the people. He did not regret for the “Mirari Vos,” with the vitriolic fury of some of the victims of “Pascendi.” The “Affaires de Rome,” his apologia, is a work of noble charity and restraint. He died unrepented, and his epitaph was spoken in the cry of his brother, the Abbé Jean de Lamennais, “Fêl, Fêl, mon frère!” There was no more to say. But though he never came back to the body of the Church, he had never, we feel, gone out from the soul of it.

D. L.'M.
JAPANESE POETRY FOR BEGINNERS

JAPANESE POETRY: The Uta. By Arthur Waley. (Oxford, Clarendon Press. 6s. 6d. net.)

CHANCE, a manifestation of the Divine which has engrossed both moralists and mathematicians, will throw in our way, among other exotic puzzling waifs, from time to time a poetry-book from the Far East. Profiting by such capricious opportunities, we receive, despite the blurring, discoloration and distortion of translation even the ablest, impressions the more plain that they are stamped on our ignorance of the subject as on virgin clay. And from these emerge a few conclusions which we may hold confidently. In the first place, it is clear that to so many of these Eastern poets may be severally applied the definition given by Théophile Gautier of himself: "un homme pour qui le monde extérieur existe"; and their senses respond to the world outside themselves with a delicacy and precision undreamed of by that voluptuous Romantique. Again, the lyrical form as practised by them presents an elimination of certain ponderous elements of which there are few spontaneous instances in Western verse, outside Folk-Song; a sublimation commonly found in Heine, and occurring, but always, we think, in a qualified form, in Verlaine; and characteristic of no other European poet we can name. It is most immediately apparent in the transition from one poetic moment to another, and may be conveniently illustrated by the lines of the anonymous Lover:

O western wind, when wilt thou blow That the small rain down can rain? Christ, that my love were in my arms And I in my bed again!

Folk-Song would provide abundant examples of this lyrical manner, a fact conducive to more speculation than our present leisure would contain.

We are uncertain as to the essential points of difference between Japanese and Chinese lyric poetry; but we suspect that it is to the former the above remarks chiefly apply; we conceive the latter to manifest a less exquisitely defined sensibility, to expand more indolently in the beats of sentiment, to display more violence at the crisis of emotion.

Approaching Mr. Waley’s book with a simplicity mitigated only by some such considerations as the above, we find him using his incalculable advantage with all possible leniency. He comes not halfway, but all the way to meet an intelligent ignorance. He is instructive without severity; he is learned, but affable. The transliteration and translation of the poems is preceded by an Introduction, a Bibliography, and by Grammar Notes; for Mr. Waley has designed his book with a view to facilitate study of the Japanese text; which may be appreciated in the transliterated form, he considers, after a few months’ work; though the further advance to the enjoyment of the native text will involve the effort of learning, among other things, “some (perhaps about 600) of the commoner Chinese characters” : a remark our anthologist lets fall almost carelessly. There is a vocabulary at the end of the book, and well-chosen information both in the Introduction and in notes appended to the poems. Nowhere, however, can we find — what even students so desultory as ourselves had reason to look for — instruction as to the position of stress in Japanese words, and more generally as to the rhythmic quality of Japanese poetry.

Mr. Waley is undoubtedly correct in saying that “Japanese poetry can only be rightly enjoyed in the original”; but we confess that, however wrongly, we have enjoyed his translations very much indeed. They have, we think, every indispensable quality of good literal translation — especially a kind of negative rhetorical and tone value, and distinction of vocabulary without a trace of preciousness or squamishness. The poems are chosen from the anthologies called the “Manyō Shū” (“Ten-thousand-Leaves Collection”), the “Kokin Shū” (“Ancient and Modern Collection”), and from minor collections. Their form is chiefly that of the five-line Uta, of thirty-one syllables. (In order to economize space, we print the quotations from Mr. Waley’s book with double colons to mark the line-units.)

The first poem in the book is by a woman. It is worthy of a princess of the undemocratized regions of romance, and its author is in fact the Princess Daisaku. She asks:

How will you manage: To cross alone: The autumn mountain: What was so hard to get across: Even when we went the two of us together!

At the time when this poem was written (the seventh century) our own poets were uttering their emotions in some such hoarse strains as those of the “Wife’s Complaint.” The difference leaps to the eye; but it is superficial compared with that which marks off in another respect Japanese poetry from European poetry previous to the late eighteenth century. For the sex-relations brings about emotional crises at all times all the world over; but until the romantic revival there is with us scarcely an instance of the intimate, conscious, constant and absorbing personal relation to nature implied almost everywhere in these lyric. Tsurayuki (883-946 A.D.), a poet remarkable for exquisite responsiveness to impressions even in this company, sings:

On summer nights: When I wonder “shall I go to bed”: At a single note sung: By the cuckoo: Dawn suddenly breaks!

Extreme susceptibility to sense-stimuli results for them at times in a haunted, haunting vision, focussing about a vivid shape or a splash of colour or sound, as in this poem of Tsurayuki’s contemporary, the Emperor Uda:

I thought that the white-crane standing there was a wave unable to go back, driven by the wind which blows towards the river-shore.

But it is time that reader and reviewer returned to their several reflections, to shape them as they may about this conclusion of the seventeenth-century poet Tagaya Masahiro:

As for this world: Would that I had the heart: Of the sea-gull who has learnt to sleep alone: Amid the turmoil of the waves!

F. W. S.

THE NATIONALIZATION OF KNOWLEDGE

ADULT EDUCATION COMMITTEE (MINISTRY OF RECONSTRUCTION): FINAL REPORT. (Stationary Office. Is. 9d. net.)

TOWARDS the extension of educational facilities there are only two logical attitudes. The first accompanies a “caste” philosophy of society, and it denies education to the poor on the ground that it will only unsettle those whom Providence has called to manual service. The lower ranks, in the words of Hannah More, should only receive instruction that will “show the poor how immediately dependent they are upon the rich.” This creed has at least the merit of simplicity, but it is past all hope of revival. Whether we like it or not, the idea of democracy has come to stay; and consequently we must adopt the second attitude, which involves a complete communism of ideas. Not only does democracy logically and morally imply equality of opportunity; but from the standpoint also of pure expedience a division of knowledge must accompany a division of power. To set up the political machinery of people’s power and to withhold its educational basis is worse than a blunder: it is a crime.
THE MODERN LANGUAGE REVIEW

THE October number of the Modern Language Review (Cambridge University Press, 5s. net) is perhaps a little too much overshadowed by the eternal Hamlet problem. Mr. E. L. Ferguson writes a short monograph on the play scene. Mr. Greg contributes two articles: one of them a reply to an earlier article by Mr. Dover Wilson on the subject of Hamlet and the Ghost, and the other on “Hamlet Texts and Recent Work in Shakespearean Bibliography.” The last-named article is an interesting summary of recent Shakespearean researches, in which the author shows how important a part is played in modern criticism by purely bibliographical studies. He justly insists on the fact that the publication in 1909 of Mr. A. W. Pollard’s “Shakespeare Folios and Quartos” marked “the opening of a new era in Shakespearean studies.” To the amateur bibliographical studies tend to appear somewhat dull; but it is well to realize that they are often very fruitful in results.

Emerging from Hamlet, we find an interesting article by Mr. Sarma on “Two Minor Critics of the Age of Pope”—Gildon and Welsted. Professor Zachrisson writes a philological article on the origin of certain English names. Miss Le Duc discusses “The Pastoral Theme in French Literature in the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries.” Miscellaneous notes and reviews complete the number.

With the January issue the Review will enter upon its fifteenth volume. In these hard times a scholarly journal finds some difficulty in even barely existing, and it is to be hoped that the M. L. R. may have the support of an increasing body of subscribers to enable it to go on fulfilling its task with increased efficiency. The literary or philological specialist has very few channels through which he can convey the results of his researches to even the very limited public interested in these studies. The M. L. R. is one of them. The articles published in its pages are all of a scholarly and specialized character; and an important feature of the paper is the publication of notes of literary and philological interest and incited documents.

Owing to the great increase in the cost of production it has been found necessary to raise the price of the Review. The annual subscription will henceforth be 25s. We sincerely hope that this will not deter new subscribers from supporting the M. L. R. in its excellent scholarly work.

THE SICK LODGER

I heard her wailing hour by hour,
Then sobbing short and quick;
And never knew if ’twas her soul
Or body that was sick.

The wall between our bedrooms seemed
A flimsy paper sheet,
So keenly could I feel her pain
And hear her restless feet.

I wondered if I’d ever lose
The joy in life I had,
And have no work to keep me sane
Or love to send me mad,

But turn one day a nerveless lump
No earthly thing could rouse,
A piece of human furniture
Within a boarding-house.

JEAN GUTHRIE-SMITH.

THE YOUNG FATHER

Your children have increased and grown,
Their youth is close upon your own;
And in your grave young days
You must be vigilant, and provide,
From your slight vantage praise and chide,
And guard them in their ways.

But secretly when your children sleep
You have another trust to keep,
Yourself a child.
Experience from your spirit flies,
And fatherhood from your young eyes,
And your young heart is wild.

VIOLA MEYNELL.
IMAGERY

IMAGES. By Richard Aldington. ("The Egoist." 3s. 6d. net.)
IMAGES OF WAR. By Richard Aldington. (Allen & Unwin 3s. 6d. net.)

JUST as "the East" may mean Omar Khayyam, or austere porcelain, or the drawings of Mr. Dulac, or, indeed, almost anything else according to individual taste, so too "Greece," with its implication of nobility, nudity and antiquity, connotes a number of very different notions, which have in common only the nude. Meredith once wrote a poem called "The Teaching of the Nude," which tells how a Satyr spied a Goddess in her bath, and was so much chastened by the sight of immortal beauty that the enticements of common flesh left him merely disgusted. A full-blown dame

In circle by the lusty friskers gripped . . .

. . . beckoned to our Satyr, and he came.

Then twirled she mounds of ripeness, wreath of arms.

His hoof kicked up the clothing for such charms.

But in actual practice the nude does not always teach this lesson. You may think of Greece in terms of the "Chansons de Bilitis" or "Aphrodite," as a place where politely practised vices were capable of yielding those "solid joys and lasting pleasures" of which the hymn makes promise. Or again there is the Sibyl of the burning Greece, luscious, sultry, the Venusberg of a Northern imagination. Then there is the realistic mythology of Boccaccio, where galloping Centaurs are caught in attitudes that only the instantaneous photograph reveals; and after it a whole procession of different Hellases, until finally we come to the peculiar brand of Hellas which belongs to Mr. Aldington.

Transposed from the ethical to the aesthetic sphere, Mr. Aldington’s reaction to the nude is much the same as the Satyr’s. Having looked upon the marmoreal beauty of the past, he is not attracted by the mounds of poetical ripeness which such poets as Swinburne and, conspicuously, Meredith himself twirl before our astonished eyes. Greece is for him a marble nakedness, hard and precise in outline, a definite, palpable beauty standing out against the muddled ugliness of the actual world. Camden Town is a place of flith; the Cyclades are warm and flowery: London cripples have eyes like frogs, but Hermes is beautiful. His poems are mostly variations on this simple theme: "0 to be somewhere else, now that whatever season it may happen to be here!" The trouble is that the theme is almost too simple—so simple that one soon has enough of it.

Mr. Aldington is very much more readable when he ceases to talk about Hellenic gods and places and things, and writes of himself, the dweller in Camden Town or the trenches, and not the bacchic spirit inhabiting an ancient world. "Images of War" is for this reason a more interesting book than "Images." Here he writes of facts as they happened, without referring his experience for comparison with classical standards.

Mr. Aldington’s limitation of theme brings with it a limitation of stylistic resources. One has every sympathy with his desire to get away from lusciousness, prettiness and the tinkling cymbals of drawing-room verses; but the trouble is that the hard, naked technique he has evolved to express the nakedness of his ideas is an inflexible, unadaptable instrument. His poems always read a little as though they were versions of something in a dead language made by a scholar belonging to the second generation of translators after Butcher and Lang. The vocabulary is very small; the phraseology is that of the Bible tempered by the Greek Anthology. At its best this style can be simply and nobly beautiful, as in "Chorics." At its worst it is curiously flat and monotonous.
THE PLAIN AND THE ADORNED

THE OUTLAW. By Maurice Hewlett. (Constable. 6s. net.)
EVANDER. By Eden Phillpotts. (Grant Richards, 6s. net.)

"THE OUTLAW" is the fifth volume of Mr. Hewlett's "Sagas Retold." It is the story of how one Gishi, a quiet, peace-loving man, was forced for honour's sake to take part in quartets that were not his, to fight other people's battles, and to waste all the strength and resourcefulness of his manhood in escaping from his enemies. For a long time he is successful, but there is one foe—and that is a spear called Grayflanks—from whom there is no hiding, and he comes to a tragic end. This spear had been fashioned out of a sword that was taken away from its lawful owner and used against him, and so there was a curse upon it.

Perhaps, according to Norse ideas, it was not enough that a man should live snugly and peacefully as Gishi desired to do with his wife And. And yet he was by no means an idle man. Even in his very young days he was "forever at a work, building, smithing, quarrying, timber-felling," and after Norway got too hot to hold his family he made a great ship and took them to Iceland, and, once there, he it was who built a fine roomy house for them all. We should have supposed that there was place and to spare for such a man in a world of fighters, but he made the fatal mistake of asking no credit for what he did, and "as for his temper—it was perfect." It was, doubtless, this last characteristic that egged them on against him, for a perfect temper is as aggravating to witness as a fire that burns brisk and quiet, never needing the bellows or the poker, never roaring away and setting us at defiance or—reduced to a melancholy flutter—imploring our aid.

In reconstructing the ancient story Mr. Hewlett has chosen to construct a story of great simplicity. He explains in a prefatory note that his version is based on a literal translation published in 1839 and a dramatic version published some thirty years later. "I have added nothing to the substance, and have left out many of the accidents, including (without exception) all the bad verses." We cannot help wishing that he had been a great deal more lenient with himself—that he had added materially to the substance and included a number of good verses. For the tale, as it stands, is so exceedingly plain, and the fights, murders, escapes and pursuits described upon so even a breath, that it is hard to believe the great, more than life-size dolls minded whether they were hit over the head or not. It is as though every deal another a tremendous blow that sends him crashing down like a tree, and as he dies he says: "This is a bad day for me." And the murderer replies: "And for me, too," and goes off to tell his wife:

"So-and-so is dead."
"Did you kill him?"
"Yes."
"Well!" said she, and her face got red.

This is, of course, an exaggeration, but there are passages in "The Outlaw" which are very nearly as bald. There is no doubt that the very large number of words of one syllable help to keep the tone low. They have a curious effect upon the reader. He finds himself, as it were, reading aloud, spelling out the tale, and this is helped by such sentences as: "He was quiet, shy, what we call a dark horse." That "we" seems to belong to a god-like world of pastors and masters who are explaining the dark horse to us for the very first time. The story itself is full of incident, but it moves us as little as a pageant without music or colour. True, we cannot expect these huge heroes, with their peaked helmets, their heavy shields and spears, to break into a dance; but were the horns of warm wine never tossed down to a vocal accom-

This takes place upon the borders of a lake among purple mountains covered with chestnut bloom and carpeted with flowers. Little baby fauns run in and out of the story; an oread, a minor poet, wanders through, always looking for somebody to whom she can recite her verses; in the moonlight the maidens, tired of the water springs, came down to the lake to wash and sing.

But the delicate, bright atmosphere in which this enchanting book is bathed must be left for the reader to enjoy.

K. M.
POETRY FOR BABES

NURSERY LAYS OF NURSERY DAYS. By M. and C. T. Nightingale-(Oxford, Blackwell, 95 pp., 2s. net.)
The FAIRY GREEN. By Rose Fyleman. (Methuen, 63 pp., 3s. 6d. net.)

I've just finished a very satisfying and sombre exposition of mechanistic philosophy, and am wondering whether anyone ever had any preferences, or indeed whether there is any "one" to have preferences, or to wonder about them. The pity of those good, stupefying, philosophic moods is that they never survive the effort to catch a train, or the need to answer a child's questions. So far as I understand the latest mechanism, our standard in future is to be "the tube"—to the idea of the truth corresponds best with the facts of the universe. Well, one of the earliest differences between children is that which separates the prose-child from the verse-child. All very little children have to submit to rhyme: their pillows are stuffed from Mother Goose; but quite soon some children will break away and insist on having prose-stories, while others will demand verse. What are we to give these latter?

Certainly the best thing is to turn the child loose in the library. He will read things then that he will never read later; time is more leisurely, and distraction less easy. If a boy or girl has a real liking for poetry it is a pity to attempt to direct the reading. My great demand for children's verse is that it should make a good noise. But noise alone will not do. Children want a story, and want it very simple and straightforward. Here the nursery rhymes set a very high standard:

A little cock sparrow sat on a tree,
Looking as happy as happy could be,
Till a boy came by with his bow and arrow;
Says he, "I'll shoot the little cock sparrow.
His body will make me a nice little stew,
And his giblets will make me a little pie too."
Says the little cock sparrow, "I'll be shot if I stay,"
So he clapped his wings and flew away.

That's full of meat; and even when you only have a rhyming jingle, there's more to it than many modern poets contrive to fit into their serious verse.

Hink, minx! the old witch winks,
The fat begins to fry;
There's nobody at home but jumping Joan,
Father, mother, and I.

The early nursery-rhymes, couplets and jingles were made by people who were not consciously writing for children; the jingles for grown-ups were much the same. Since we became overawed of children, things have been very different. Compare such a poem as "Mary's Lamb," or Isaac Watts's "Let Dogs Delight," and you realize that one has passed into a different set of values altogether. Lately many poets, influenced partly by Blake (who, like the early authors, wrote in the same way for children and adults), have tried to return to a more direct, objective type of poem for children. Here, for instance, are Miss Nightingale and Miss Fyleman. Miss Nightingale is lucky in having a sister or brother who understands the woodcut: one of the illustrations in the book is not unworthy to be set beside those charming, crowded things of Calvert's, or Blake's series for Virgil. But it is with the poems I am concerned. I gave the book to a little girl, aged nine, and she read it right through to her sister, aged seven; and in the afternoon asked for it again, and read it through again. That is something of a tribute. Then I asked which poem pleased the most, and was told "The Yellow Cat." So here is "The Yellow Cat":

In summer on the sunny wall the yellow cat and I Sit quietly by side and watch the clouds go sailing by;
I love his yellow velvet paws—I love to hear him sing,
But when it's dark and I'm in bed it's quite a different thing.

For when it's dark from every house the cats of every size
Come creeping forth with angry tails and golden, gleaming eyes,
The snarl and shriek and spit and swear—the yellow cat and they;
I love the yellow cat, but still—I love him best by day.

There is no doubt that the ordinary healthy child does like something with a little creep in it—something that has a shiver.

Miss Fyleman has forgotten her fairy stories. A fairy-lore which makes all the fairies sweet, pleasant, beautiful and kindly disposed is a heresy. No nursery will stand an immaculate company of fays. It is no use Miss Fyleman putting the blame on her mother:

And mother says, in fairy tales, those bits are never true
That tell you all the dreadful deeds the wicked fairies do.

The very name given to the fairy tribe—the good people—was given as a protection; and every child knows that there are some fairies which pinch, and tickle, and tie strings at the bottom of the stairs, and leave a nasty piece of margarine on the oil-cloth, or hide under a tumbled leaf on the rain-swept pavement. I find "The Fairy Green," then, rather too pretty, and it was not received by the children with the same joy which greeted Miss Nightingale's book; but that was partly due to the absence of pictures, while in many poems Miss Fyleman is not writing for children. Much of her best verse is not concerned with fairy things at all. This is a really jolly poem, unexpected and complete, about the dentist:

I'd like to be a dentist with a plane upon the door
And a little bubbling fountain in the middle of the floor;
With lots of tiny bottles all arranged in coloured rows
And a page-boy with a line of silver buttons down his clothes.

I'd love to polish up the things and put them every day
Inside the dainty chests of drawers all tidily away;
And every Sunday afternoon when nobody was there
I should go riding up and down upon the velvet chair.

And "Mrs. Brown" has something of the make-believe fantasy of childhood:

As soon as I'm in bed at night
And snugly settled down
The little girl I am by day
Goes very suddenly away
And then I'm Mrs. Brown.

I have a family of six,
And all of them have names:
The girls are Joyce and Nancy Maud,
The boys are Marmaduke and Claude,
And Percival and James.

We have a house with twenty rooms
A mile away from town;
I think it's good for girls and boys
To be allowed to make a noise—
And so does Mr. Brown.

Neither Miss Nightingale nor Miss Fyleman has any nonsense poems; and I'm sure they are right. Children are not great lovers of nonsense. Lear's long narrative poems are not nonsense in the way that Carroll's "Hunting of the Snark" is: Lear tells a quite intelligible story, and there is no reason in a child's philosophy to cause him to disbelieve in the Pobble rather than in the Lion or the Unicorn, while words like "runcible" are quite as possible as a word like "comical." What children really want in their poetry is not nonsense, but something with a rhythm that sings, and with a clear meaning. The great fault of most modern verse for children is the excess of epithets. In the only modern poem which can rank with the old nursery rhymes, Longfellow's "There was a little girl," there are hardly any epithets, and no obtuse ones: Miss Fyleman's poems are full of picturesque adjectives and adjectival phrases—sometimes a whole line ("all shining green and gold") will be nothing but adjectival, and at such children's interest lapses. They want statement, not decoration; in short, poetry for children should be the best poetry.

R. E. R.
NOTES FROM IRELAND

Dublin, December 19, 1919

When Mr. Yeats's "Player Queen," which was produced by the Stage Society last May the press comments indicated bewilderment rather than amusement on the side of the critics. The play was seen in Dublin for the first time a couple of weeks ago, when it was performed at the Abbey Theatre. The first-night audience certainly exhibited no signs of that irritated impatience which, one gathered, was the prevailing impression left upon the Stage Society public. There was a crowded house, and we all appeared to be vastly amused by the fantastic humour of Mr. Yeats. Not since he gave us "Where there is Nothing," some fifteen years ago, has he written anything in the mood of comedy like "The Player Queen." The gaiety of the occasion was diminished by the fact that the Virgilian Committee had sent its "smuthounds"—as the Americans say—to report upon the proceedings. The drunken poet's chivalrous defence of the chastity of the unicorn must have reassured the virtuosi of virtue just at the point where there was a danger of ambiguous reference. It is now being argued in the circles of the intelligentsia that a profound esoteric meaning lies beneath the surface of "The Player Queen." It looks as if the gibe of the cynic is to be justified who asserted, after the first performance, that Mr. Yeats had at last become deliberately humorous where he had been previously merely unconsciously funny. If our frank enjoyment of what we have here, no matter whether the attribution to literature or the actual spirit in Mr. Yeats is misplaced, if "The Player Queen" had, in the author's intention, a serious, symbolic significance, he will doubtless prefer the puzzled solemnity of his first critics. Dublin will have again afforded him proofs of what he has called "the spite of this unmannerly town." The plaint is frequently heard from our visitors, notably Mr. Bernard Shaw, who never fails to deliver a homily upon the "derision of Dublin." Reviewing Mr. G. K. Chesterton's "Irish Impressions" recently in the Irish Statesman, Mr. Shaw again complains of the over-developed derivative sense of Dubliners. It would be quite fair to suggest that he finds in Dublin just what he brings to it himself. It is usually possible for the intelligent traveller to discover in Ireland precisely what he expects. Liberals go away having satisfied themselves as to the iniquities of coercion, Conservatives are confirmed in their respect for "strong government" and their confidence in the wisdom of the Kilkare Street Club. At the same time, it might be suggested to Mr. Shaw that most of the derision which offends him is provoked by the spectacle of our friendly visitors. Like himself, they are quite unfamiliar with contemporary Ireland, but they have no hesitation in dogmatizing from obsolete, or wholly inadequate, data.

Two novels have just been published which can safely be placed in the hands of all Englishmen who desire to understand the evolution of contemporary Ireland: "The Gael," by Mr. Edward E. Lysaght (Maunsell, 6s. 6d. net), and "The Chalking of Chains," by Mr. Brinsley MacNamara (Maunsell, 6s. 6d. net). The two books are radically dissimilar, yet each is true, and the one is the complement of the other. Mr. Lysaght's semi-autobiographical novel is a simple and striking account of what is really growing up behind the political bogey called Sinn Fein. Mr. MacNamara's work is a sombre and disillusioned criticism of the evil which lives on in Ireland after the men who have sown the seeds are long since forgotten. Mr. Lysaght's story is as effective a confession of faith as Mr. MacNamara's is a remarkable example of that self-criticism of which Ireland is popularly supposed to be incapable.

Mr. Forrest Reid's "Pirates of the Spring," to which I referred a couple of months ago, has been unanimously pronounced a failure until next year, and Mr. Leon de Robinson's "Eight Short Stories," which had been simultaneously announced by the Talbot Press.

The Ulster Players have been down here from Belfast with some old and new plays from their repertoire. The new one is their production of Shaw's "Candida." A former director of St. Keverne's, Mr. W. B. Yeates, continues to meet with the success which seems inseparable in these islands from whatever has been performed ad nauseam.

THE ROYAL TOMBS OF THEBES

On December 12 last the second of a course of lectures arranged by the Egypt Exploration Fund (which on January 1 changes its name to Egypt Exploration Society) was delivered by Professor Newberry at the Royal Society's rooms. Professor Newberry chose for his subject the tombs of the Kings of Egypt at Thebes, a theme upon which he is undoubtedly the first authority since he has for over 25 years resided in their immediate vicinity and has made them the subject of a special study. He is moreover the actual discoverer or co-discoverer of several of them. Aidan by an exceptionally fine series of slides, Professor Newberry first traced the rise and growth of Thebes as the civil and religious capital of Egypt.

The complicated and complex funerary system of the ancient Egyptians naturally reaches its culminating point in the equipment of the Kings' tombs, since the Kings were the living representatives o. the gods whilst on earth and in their turn became gods themselves after death. The structure and arrangement of the tombs were described, with special reference to them. The jewellery and precious objects deposited in the tombs made them from the earliest times the object of the greatest curiosity of treasure-seekers. As we learn from a batch of contemporary documents, of which the famous Abbott Papyrus is the best known, the continued spoliation of the royal tombs led to the formation, by the Government counter a day of a special guard, the guard of the necropolises and to arrest and prosecute the wrongdoers, a course which was in the end so unsuccessful that it was eventually found necessary to remove the royal mummies from their tombs and to deposit them in a place of safety, where they rested in peace until their rediscovery in our own times.

A remarkable series of objects recovered from the tombs was shown upon the screen, the most interesting of which is a piece of woven tapestry, the oldest known by a thousand years, which was found by Professor Newberry in the tomb of Tuthmosis IV, and which presents one of the most insoluble problems known to archaeology.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTES

There are now on exhibition in the King's Library, British Museum, the following recent acquisitions of the Department of Printed Books, besides others already mentioned in these notes: St. Bernard, Sermons in Dutch, Pieter van Os, Zwolle, 1484-85. With a fine woodcut representing the Virgin and Child and St. Bernard.—Isidorus Etymologus, 2.ij. Wolff anf Thiellen Kavel, Leiden, 1489.—Walter Thornley, Life of J. M. W. Turner, London, 1862. Extra-illustrated by John Platt, Llandudno, 1889, and bequeathed by him to the Museum. In thirteen volumes the volume exhibited shows the signature of Turner and a number of his fellow-students at the Royal Academy.—A collection of Siamese postage stamps formed by the late R. W. Harold Row, Assistant Lecturer and Demonstrator in Zoology at King's College, and presented to the Museum by his mother in accordance with his wish.

Besides the above exhibits, the following recent accessions may be noted: Lituanus Ambrosianus, Zurajts, Milan, 1538.—A number of Castilian and Spanish royal ordinances, etc., printed at various dates between the years 1528 and 1573.—S. de Porta, Sermones festivitatum B.V.M., J. Jofre, Valencia, 1512.—M. de Azpilcueta, Manual de confessores, J. Barrein, and J. Alvarez, Cambrai, 1553.—Ordinarii Fratrum Pro- dicatorum, A. de Mora Salamanca, 1576.—W. Gublin, Dialogue wherein is a golly regiment against the pestilence J. Kingston, London, 1578.—F. Trussell, Soldier pleading his own cause, N. Oxes for T. Wallcky, London, 1626.—R. S., The Counter Scuffle, W. Stanbye for R. Meighen, London, 1628.—E. Wingeate, Usage de la regle de proportion en l'arithmétique, Paris, 1624.

THE CLUE OF THE IVORY CLAW. By F. Hugh Dunwood. (Perrin, 3s. 6d. net)—The ivory claw of an eagle is found by a Boy Scout in the ruins of his house, which has been burned down. Later he sees his fellow in the house of his employer. The efforts of the Scouts to unravel the mystery of these symbols lead to many exciting incidents.
Science

SIR VICTOR HORSLEY

SIR VICTOR HORSLEY: A STUDY OF HIS LIFE AND WORK. By Stephen Paget. (Constable. 21s. net.)

Seldom can a biographer have had a more congenial task than that of Mr. Stephen Paget. Lady Horsley in her preface says that the author and his subject were widely separated in their mental attitudes, and that the author has softened nothing in his criticisms and has suppressed nothing. But this separation was more apparent than real, for they both had the fundamental qualities of honesty and hatred of all shams, of clear-cut logic and enthusiasm for a cause, of high moral standards, and of a great love for the profession to which they belonged. Mr. Paget’s chief ground for criticism is Horsley’s undisguised contempt for those who disagreed with him or failed to reach his own superhuman standards, and the direct manner in which he usually expressed it. Their aims were strictly parallel, but Mr. Paget’s methods have been more restrained and probably more effectual than Horsley’s were.

Mr. Paget has written in a calm, dispassionate manner without literary tricks or manerisms, though he could have made the book seem almost sensational had he so chosen, for the earlier part of Horsley’s life was nothing less than an epic of the progress of science. He rode on the crest of the advancing wave, and it was the force of his intellect and personality together with an almost unlimited capacity for passionate hard work that put him there at a time of life when most men are only laying the first foundations of their careers. Already at the age of 22 he was publishing papers in Brain on the obscure subject of localization of function in the central nervous system, and a year later, in 1886, was conducting well-conceived researches into the novel subject of bacteriology. His keenness and pugnacity, even when the question at issue was so relatively unimportant as whether it were right that people should take mustard with their food, impressed themselves on everyone with whom he came into contact, and a great future was predicted for him. In 1887, while house-surgeon at University College Hospital, he was planning an attack on the brain of the frog and devising a tiny trephine, an instrument with which to carry out minutely exact intra-cranial operations; and his restless mind even led him to make experiments on himself with various anaesthetics. He never spared anyone, and least of all himself.

In 1884 came his first great chance, when he was appointed Professor-Superintendent of the now forgotten Brown Institution, which, though nominally a veterinary institution, was in those days one of the chief centres for research in pathology, physiology, and surgery. The apostles of anti-vivisection have now made advances in these sciences relatively so difficult that the scientific centre of gravity has shifted elsewhere, but Horsley crowded into his six years of office an amount of important research which as can never have been equalled by anyone in the same space of time. He cautiously, but with unusual exhaustive researches into the functions of the thyroid gland, taking monkeys as the subjects of his experiments, since the effect of the removal of the gland from monkeys is much more gradual and more easily observed than it is if cats or dogs be used. Observations on the connection between the thyroid gland and the conditions known as cretinism, a form of idiocy, and myxedema, a disease of adults characterized by insidious changes in the skin, hair, mentality, and general functions of the body, had been accumulating for many years without much result; but Horsley’s acute mind and direct methods soon threw a flood of light on this obscure problem, though it is a matter for extreme surprise that his discoveries halted just short of finding a successful form of treatment for these diseases, such as is now commonly practised, namely, feeding the patient on an extract of the thyroid glands of sheep. At the same time he was instituting far-reaching investigations into the phenomena of antithesis, and he soon became the chief exponent in England of Pasteur’s doctrines and methods, and was more than any other man instrumental in stamping out the disease in the British Isles. He fought for Pasteurism with characteristic zest, not only in the laboratory, but also on the platform and in the press, and no doubt began to make some of those enemies whose numbers and rancour grew so greatly in later years as his passion for publicity increased. It is unfortunate that in this part of his book Mr. Paget should have allowed the undercurrent of propaganda against anti-vivisection, which can be felt throughout, to come undisguised to the surface. The whole course of Horsley’s life is a sufficient refutation of anti-vivisectional fallacies without the introduction of an unpleasant flavour of pamphleteering.

Meanwhile these researches, though of the first importance, were only the background to his work on the functions and surgery of the brain, and a series of papers published between 1886 and 1890 embodied some of the biggest advances in the knowledge of this subject that have ever been made. His researches were conducted chiefly on the brains of monkeys, parts of which were exposed and stimulated electrically, the resulting movements of the various parts of the body being recorded and analysed with minute care. He thus first mapped out the so-called "motor area," or that part of the brain which governs the various co-ordinated movements of which an animal is capable. He also investigated the “speech centre,” the frontal or “association” areas, the visual centres at the back, or occipital, part of the brain, the functions of the cerebellum, and many other highly technical problems. His hospital appointments enabled him at the same time to apply his results to the treatment of diseases of the brain, since it was now for the first time possible to deduce from the symptoms the exact position of a brain tumour and to expose it almost with certainty. His fame was now rapidly spreading all over the world, and at a Medical Congress in Berlin in 1889 he was one of the most notable figures present, though his age was but 33. His work on the surgical treatment of hemiplegia in children, especially in cases of paralysis of the arm and leg, was made before anyone else; but it was during this early period that the most sensational advances were made. Meanwhile there were growing up those other activities, less directly scientific, which were destined to undermine Horsley’s reputation with his profession, to absorb more and more of his energy, to make for him numberless enemies, and, finally, to tinge with tragedy the later years of his career. Horsley never shirked publicity; and, in fact, the degree to which he courted it amounted almost to a vice. His fighting instincts never allowed him to rest, and his whole tremendous energy was poured out for the sake of any cause which he believed to be on the side of truth and morality. But his very pugnacity and fearlessness almost defeated their own object. His language was never guarded, and the intensity of his convictions often betrayed him into exaggerations of fact which tended to discredit him even in the eyes of those who agreed with him and laid him open to effective attacks by his opponents. Temperance was the most notable cause for which he fought, but so intemperate were his tactics that the world dubbed him “crank,” and his name became almost a laughing-stock even among those who ought most to have respected him. He suffered the common fate of the man who is honest, direct, and above intrigue, and finally, in his struggles on behalf of his profession over the introduction of the Insurance Act, only earned abuse from those whom he sought to help. He was, however, undeterred and made more than one ineffectual attempt to enter Parliament.

By the time the war came his surgical practice had seriously fallen off, since it was naturally supposed that a surgeon who spent so much of his time on public platforms could not devote much of his energy to treating private patients. Apparently he was also distracted by the War Office, and he was unable to obtain the work which he felt best qualified to do, the development of the surgical treatment of gunshot wounds of the head. At last, in May, 1915, the Territorial hospital to which he was attached was sent to Egypt, and a few months later he was appointed Consultant. He went to India in March, 1916, where he died of sunstroke, fighting with all his old intensity against the massed forces of apathy, incompetence, and neglect. His tragedy had reached its consummation.

SOCIETIES

ROYAL.—December 11.—Sir J. J. Thomson, President, in the chair.

"A Further Study of Chromosome Dimensions," by C. F. U. Meek, stated that:

1. The degree of somatic complexity of an animal cannot be correlated with the lengths of the chromosomes composing its complex.

2. The degree of somatic complexity of an animal cannot be correlated with the diameters of the chromosomes composing its complex.

3. The degree of somatic complexity of an animal cannot be correlated with the total volume of the chromosomes composing its complex.

4. The degree of somatic complexity of an animal cannot be correlated with the number of the chromosomes composing its complex.

5. There are many different chromosome diameters.

6. The chromosomes composing the spermatogonial complex of an animal are not necessarily identical in diameter with those composing its secondary spermatocyte complex.

7. All chromosomes composing an individual complex are not necessarily of the same diameter.

LINZEN.—December 11.—Dr. A. Smith Woodward, President, in the chair.

Dr. G. Parker Bidder, Mr. A. R. Thompson, Mr. Stuart Hogg, and Mr. E. Colson Adkin were admitted Fellows.—Mr. Narayana Padmanabha, Professor of Chemistry, was elected a Fellow.

Professor W. A. Herdman read some "Notes on the Abundance of Marine Animals and a Quantitative Survey of their Occurrence," Professor Dendy and Sir H. H. Howorth contributed further observations.

Mr. J. Bronte Gatesby read a paper, "The Germ-Cells and Early Development of Granitia compressa;" the spermatids of Granitia being described for the first time. Professor Dendy and Dr. G. P. Bidder offered some observations, and lantern-slides were employed by the speakers to elucidate their remarks.

ROYAL STATISTICAL.—December 16.—Mr. Herbert Samuel, President, in the chair.

Mr. T. E. Allen read a paper upon "Some Changes in the Distribution of the National Income during the War."

FORFORTHCOMING MEETINGS

Fri. 2. Geographical (Eolian Hall), 3.30.—"A Visit to the Diamond Mountain in Korea," Miss Hilda Bower, (Christmas Lectures.)

Sat. 3. Royal Institution, 3.—"Sounds of the Country," Professor W. H. Bragg. (Christmas Lectures.)

Mon. 5. Geographical (Eolian Hall), 8.30.

Tues. 6. Royal Institution, 3.—"Sounds of the Town," Professor W. H. Bragg. (Christmas Lectures.)

Mathematical Association (London Day Training College, Southampton Row), 5.30.—Annual Meeting.

Thurs. 8. Mathematical Association 10 and 2.30.—Annual Meeting (continued), Royal Institution, 3.—"Sounds of the Sea," Professor W. H. Bragg. (Christmas Lectures.)

Fri. 9. Malacological, 6.

Philological, 8.—"The Perception of Sound," Dr. W. Perrett.
formalization: plastic symbols based on the human profile, contrasted angles embodying figures in motion, resulting in fantastic hybrids, intersecting rhomboids masquerading as fighting men, and semicircles playfully degenerating into human calves—strange scribbles very unlike the drawings of Sir William Orpen, but not unlike the note-books of Leonardo.

Another time he goes to Hampstead Heath and surveys his fellow-man at play. Forthwith he lets loose his abstract rhythms on the unsuspecting merry-makers, but this time they are less relentless, more whimsical, as though they realized the basic bonhomie of their master, who is in jovial mood to-day and claims Rowlandson as his brother. They support the lines that cross the page, and link and choose as they point the mental and adorn the lab of khaki caps and ladies’ hats and upturned faces watching a pole-jump in cockney cheerfulness.

This drawing “Pole-Jump” is in some ways the most successful of the series, and the most characteristic of Mr. Lewis. It is better than a Fleet Street artist’s illustration of the same subject because the humour is both seen and expressed in terms of form and line and proportion. It is better than a Continental caricature by Caran d’Ache or Gullbransson because Mr. Lewis does not start with a fixed and arbitrary formula and compress or stretch nature to fit into it. The principle which guides his formalization permits of an infinite variety in the component parts of the formula and an infinitesimal variety of formula. In the drawing “Pole-Jump” the artist has set out to express in arbitrary black-and-white shapes the specific forms which to his eye constitute the scene; in other words he has set out to draw it. The scene strikes him as funny, and, quite appropriately, he makes the forms funny also. It is just because of this elasticity in his method, because of its power to adapt itself to an emergency, that we regard it as something more than a “stunt”; and it is because Mr. Lewis convinces us of his ability to see the plastic possibilities of a scene that we regard him as a genuine creative artist. He sees the world as material for drawings, and when he draws he does not work in competition with the photographer or in competition with nature. He is merely a professional draughtsman who delights in drawing in the way which seems good to him. Why should we demand more when the vast majority of contemporary output has taught us to expect so much less? R. H. W.

TWO AMERICAN ETCHERS

The Greatorex Galleries in Grafton Street have been showing recently a collection of etchings by two American artists, Mr. D. C. Sturges and Mr. Troy Kinney. Mr. Sturges is influenced technically by Zorn, but he is more sentimental than the Swedish master and more attracted to picturesque types. The best of his plates are “The Money-Lender” and “Woman Threading Needle,” which should appeal to collectors who are attracted by “genre” art. Mr. Kinney exhibits a series of plates called “Impressions of Great Dancers.” In certain cases—notably in the impressions of Spanish dancers—characteristic movements have been happily registered; and there is also a successful reminiscence of Adolf Bolm’s wild dance in “Prince Igor.” But the drawing throughout—though it has a certain chic—is very slight, and Mr. Kinney is clearly not impelled by the relentless curiosity of a great artist. He is content to make pretty etchings of dancers as seen from the stalls by the average playgoer. There is, moreover, to our mind, a weakness in exhibiting both coloured and black-and-white versions of the same plates; one or other must necessarily be unsatisfactory if either is a genuine impression. Colour in an etching can only be tolerated if it is an integral part of the original conception, in which case the etching itself is merely a preparation for the colour; if, on the other hand, the black-and-white etching is a complete impression it cannot be improved by the addition of colour. Yet in spite of their shortcomings these plates may have historical interest to our descendants.

THE IMITATORS OF AUBREY BEARDSLEY

After prolonged opposition publishers and editors of illustrated journals have finally accepted the black-and-white convention evolved by Aubrey Beardsley. It has in fact become a commonplace in popular illustration. Yet none of the numerous artists who employ it have given us drawings which compare in interest with the work of Beardsley himself, and their failure enables us to take the measure of his achievement. In this greater case and certainty than was possible when he represented an isolated phenomenon in the field of illustration.

Every artist of eminence has first his followers, who go to the same sources for their inspiration, and secondly his imitators, who copy his formulae of expression. The first, however, are as a rule the main stream of the current, while the second remain in stagnant backwaters. Yet it is from the backwaters that we can best judge the pace and direction of the stream.

The modern imitators mostly copy the readily comprehensible pen tricks of Beardsley’s technique. Some of them, such as Miss Fish, exhibit a delicacy of touch which rivals that of the master. But nowhere do we see anything of that blend of Renaissance and Rococo which made up the culture of Beardsley, and that blend of intellectual hardness and sense morbita of which made up his outlook. This culture and this outlook have a special significance because they went not only to personal but to moral perfection of English dilettanti. The most important fact about Beardsley—his most valid claim to rank as an artist of note—is that, although a typical aesthete, he had the power and the will to make himself articulate. His culture and his outlook were of a kind which was usually silent or at best found its expression in conversation over the nuts and wine. Beardsley succeeded in translating it into terms of art.

That a streak of morbidity runs through it all is undeniable, but this quality is distinct from the rest of his aesthetic constitution and was the result of his consciousness of fatal illness. It is, however, the only aspect of his psychology which has been obvious to us. It might have been possible to reproduce it, and give us nothing but an unrelieved effect of penny-dreadful perversity.

The imitations of Beardsley are indeed the sincerest flattery, for they serve to remind us of the forces which animated the black-and-white convention in his hands.

CHRISTMAS CARDS

There is a singular lack of consistency between the practice of artists and the theories which they are accustomed to defend in conversation. Most of them, for example, are agreed upon the desirability of democratic art—that is to say upon the desirability of the artist’s influence extending to the human manufacture of common things which find a place in the houses of the poor and the man with moderate means. Yet in practice the great majority of artists work exclusively for the rich amateur, and leave all the more popular forms of art to ignorant and trivial-minded journeymen. Why, for example, do artists permit the general level of Christmas greeting cards to remain so deplorably low? If we wish to suggest that a picture is characterized by nothing but insignificant prettiness and foolish sentiment and feeble technique we habitually compare it to a Christmas card. The custom of sending these cards to friends, though on the one hand, is still largely observed in all classes. Surely here is an opportunity for the spread of art into a larger class. Why should we not have Christmas cards designed by Mr. Augustus John, Mr. William Nicholson, the brothers Nash and Mr. Albert Rutherston, to take a few names at random? They might even etch their designs on copper plates, which might be subsequently steel-faced to permit of large editions which could sell at the same price as the more pretentious of the popular abominations designed by bright “flappers,” quavering spinsters, and fourth-rate magazine illustrators. The plates could be destroyed each year after the edition was printed, which would ensure a collector’s value to the prints. If this were done we might find our grandsons collecting Christmas cards just as we ourselves may have collected postage stamps.

Concerted action by the artists on such experimental lines would go far to justify their proclaimed desire to cater for the great public, and raise the standard of taste.
Music

THE REHEARSAL PROBLEM

WAGNER, describing his visit to London in 1855, when he conducted the Philharmonic Society's concerts, remarks bitterly of the fact that he had no control whatever over the number of rehearsals which he thought necessary for the concerts. "For each concert, which included two symphonies and several minor pieces as well, the Society's economical arrangements allowed me only one rehearsal." The Philharmonic programmes have become, in the last few years, a good deal shorter since those days, and their allowance of rehearsals less economical, but even now it is notoriously the case that a London orchestra has much less time than one in New York or any other city in the world to prepare a concert programme. Our conductors give more time to the musical preparation than do those of some other orchestras. Thus, the Philharmonic is the most business-like and practical. Not a moment has been wasted; everyone concerned has worked like a machine. The thing simply cannot be done. At the opera it is much the same. Every prima donna one meets tells how she was obliged to sing in some part or other for the first time in her life without any rehearsal whatever. No one particular organization is better or worse than another; wherever one turns, these embarrassments are all in the same degree.

Nor is the trouble confined to operas and orchestral concerts. During the last few years there has been a great revival of interest in chamber-music. String Quartets have become popular and works by native composers have been much to the fore. More recently too, especially since the appearance of "On Wenlock Edge," it has become the fashion for singers to give recitals with the assistance of a string quartet. Here again the same story is told of utterly inadequate rehearsal. A group of players agree to form a string quartet. They begin by practising together with great energy. They make up a certain standard repertory, and learn to play their Beethoven and Mozart, their Debussy and Ravel, with an excellent unanimity of style. All honour to them that they desire to turn their well-deserved popularity to account in the interests of the young British composer. The young British composer has indeed reason to be grateful to those quartets which have made a point of playing a new English work at almost every concert. But he may be thankful if his work gets more than one rehearsal. It is not that our performers are either lazy or careless. They are conscientiously determined to do their best, and genuinely interested in furthering the development of British music. The marvel is that they even find time to rehearse at all. Most of them are engaged in teaching, and play in orchestras as well; besides that they have their engagements as a string quartet, in London, in the suburbs and in the provinces. Playing, rehearsing, teaching from early morning to late afternoon, or evening, they yet manage to come together at the end of a hard day's work—and a day which has involved travelling considerable distances in those conditions of discomfort which we all of us know only too well—to wrestle with the intricacies of a new work, with the additional inconvenience of manuscript parts in an unfamiliar handwriting. There are other strings attached that they can barely hold their fiddles; it is only grim determination and will power that keeps them in motion. If this is the case with the preparation of a new string quartet, how much worse is the fate of the singer who is dependent upon these four players for the accompaniments to a song, where there are not merely the actual parts to read, but the singer's elasticity of interpretation to be followed! He is lucky if he can get the quartet to run the things through in the artists' room ten minutes before the concert is due to begin.

Yet our composers are far from being the only ones to suffer under conditions which are absolutely unfavourable for the bringing forth of their works. "The actuality of the work is the object," says Mr. Charles Wood. "We have few orchestral ensembles to choose from, and the conditions under which our players work are worse than those of the orchestral players for the string quartet must find their own time and labour. The cost of living has doubled, but the organizers of concerts are trying to keep professional fees at the old standards. Professional musicians accept them, because they are confronted with the alternatives of a low fee or no engagement. Organizers of concerts, especially provincial musical societies which exist for purely artistic purposes and do not attempt to make commercial profits, find that their audiences are already forced by the entertainments tax to pay more than they can afford for their music, and refuse altogether to tolerate a further rise in the scale of charges. Many of the students of composition, who are the best of modern composers for writing music that is unnecessarily difficult. The most difficult music, as far as chamber and orchestral works are concerned, is the music which is difficult intellectually; and it is precisely the music of this kind which ought to be the most carefully rehearsed and the most often played, so that audiences may have the best opportunities of understanding it. Besides, there is plenty of music of the classical epoch and earlier, the difficulty of which is entirely intellectual, so that it demands as much study as any modern work. The remedy for the trouble lies simply and solely with the public. We have got to pay more for our music, and the only question at issue is, whether we prefer to give shorter concerts at the present prices, or to pay more for our tickets. To have fewer concerts will not solve the problem, for that would merely involve the unfortunate musicians in a deeper abyss of ruin."

EDWARD J. DENT

The Friday Evening Discourses at the Royal Institution begin on the 10th inst. with a lecture by Sir James Dewar on "Low Temperature Studies," and end on March 26 with Sir J. J. Thomson's discourse on Lord Rayleigh's scientific work. Twelve courses of lectures are being delivered between the New Year and Easter, among which is a series of three lectures by Sir Frank Dyson on "The Astronomical Evidence for a Creator," and by Professor E. T. S. Walton on "Einstein's Theory of Relativity." Inquiries should be addressed to the Assistant Secretary of the Royal Institution, 21, Albemarle Street, W. 1.
BEECHAM OPERA
"BORIS GODOUNOV"

Boris Godounov" confronts the producer with an awkward problem. It is characteristic of the Russian method of composition to consider time and space that the opera should be too long to be presented in its entirety at a single sitting; it is equally characteristic of its composer that, having recognized this, and described the work in the title of the original edition as "containing scenes not intended for stage performance," he should have omitted to indicate which these scenes were. Faced by this omission, the producer is necessarily free to pick and choose, and it is not possible to pass a conclusive judgment on the rightness or wrongness of his choice. One is bound, nevertheless, to put forward certain considerations.

Most obvious, though not really most vital, is the question of the third act. The ambitions of Marina, the jostlabl schemes of Rangoni, the betrothal of Marina to the pseudo-Dmitri, are mere episodes, that have little or no bearing on the dramatic development; they were inserted by Moussorgsky, one gathers, in deference to the criticism that the opera was deficient in what we may call "feminine interest." A criticism of singular frivolity when applied to such an overwhelming revelation of the human soul as Moussorgsky has given us in this opera. The most natural method of abridgment, therefore, is to cut this act out altogether; the only objection that can be raised is that it contains some of the most beautiful music in the whole score and some of the most searching musical characterization that has ever been written. One is reluctant to condemn such pages to perpetual silence for the sake of dramatic unity. At Covent Garden they compromised; we had the scene in the garden and the love duet between Marina and the pseudo-Dmitri, but not the opening scene, nor the machinations of Rangoni, who does not appear in the cast at all. One hopes that this arrangement will not become a convention; if part of the act has to go, one would rather sacrifice the Polonaise and the love duet than the wonderful pages at the beginning or the telling musical portraits of Rangoni and Marina.

A more crucial matter is the order in which the last two scenes are to be played. Both in the 1896 and 1908 editions the scene of Pimen's narration and Boris' death is placed at the end of the opera, the crowd scene coming immediately before it: this was the arrangement followed at Covent Garden. But in the original 1875 edition (I take the statement of M. Calvocoressi on trust here, as I cannot find the 1875 edition in the British Museum Catalogue) the order of these two scenes is reversed, and there are compelling reasons why this original order should be observed. In the first place, the crowd scene is clearly an apologue to the whole, and has no particular significance if it is made to precede the death scene; in the second, it is incomparably the more powerful and suggestive of the two scenes, so much so that the death scene, fine as it is in conception and execution, is felt after the other as a decided anticlimax: finally, the transposition of the scenes falsifies the dramatic emphasis. For Boris, vast, tragic figure as he is (and he is the one operatic figure whom one places unquestioningly beside, say, Oedipus or King Lear), is not the protagonist of this drama. As M. Calvocoressi justly observes, the real protagonist is the Russian people, surging and turbulent from beginning to end, with its undeniable suggestion of misery and revolt. Boris must be seized and held throughout in his true relation to the vaster forces looming in the background: the tragedy of a race is a bigger thing than the overthrow of a dynasty. With the people the drama begins, and with them it should close. And what more pitiful characteristic symbol of this people's destiny could one find than the village idiot, grooping and fumbling in the snow for his lost halfpenny?

For the same reason, one regrets the disappearance of the first scene of the first act; one cannot but feel it absolutely vital to the true interpretation of the story, just as the prelude is musically the only possible prelude. The music before the curtain goes up on the second scene is powerful enough and appropriate to its context, but it somehow does not serve as a prelude to the drama as a whole; it does not make you feel you have begun at the beginning, as the real prelude does. If the first scene is omitted, one feels inclined to say in conclusion, let the crowd scene in the last act be omitted also. In this way there would be a saving of time sufficient to enable the third act to be played in its entirety, and the drama could be seen as a real prelude, although not in the perspective that Moussorgsky intended. It would cease to be the tragedy of Russia and become merely what its name intends, the tragedy of Boris Godounov. But even at that it would remain for some of us the biggest music drama that has yet been given to the world.

R.O.M.

CONCERTS

Mr. Ivan Phillipowsky who gave a pianoforte recital on December 15, has at any rate definite intentions with regard to the music which he plays, even if he does not always succeed in carrying them out. He evidently wishes to concentrate firmly on the melodic line, and this is in itself a merit, although his touch is rather hard and uneven. His reading of half-a-dozen familiar pieces by Domenico Scarlatti was quite devoid of the sprightliness which is usually associated with that composer, but it was interesting to hear them played in a deliberately cantabile style. Schumann's Sonata in F sharp minor seemed more adapted to Mr. Phillipowsky's temperament, which inclines to ruggedness rather than to grace.

The London String Quartet reappeared on December 27, but did not give us the unfamiliar quartet by Turina which had been promised. This was a disappointment, but the Mozart D minor Quartet which took its place was given with remarkable purity of tone and finish of style. Precisely the same qualities, sad to say, were found in their playing of the accompaniments to Vaughan Williams' "Wenlock Edge" Cycle—a work where a certain roughness and savagery is essential to the true presentation of the composer's ideas. Mr. Elwes was infected to some extent by the mildness of the quartet, and the performance as a whole lacked the vitality that has made some previous interpretations of this work by the same artists quite memorable.

It is good news to learn that the L.S.Q. are going to give a Beethoven Festival in the week beginning Monday, April 26, during which the whole of the Beethoven quartets will be played in chronological order. Whatever musical events 1920 may have in store, few, if any, will be of greater interest than this. Whether it is wise to adhere to chronological order is debatable; when it comes to the last two or three nights, with one big posthumous quartet after another, the strain on the listener will be very intense, though the reward will be certain.

"Before the War" is the title of Lord Haldane's book announced for publication on the 15th inst. by Messrs. Cassell. The book is a detailed vindication of Britain's pre-war policy, based on the personal memoranda and observation of the author, together with an analysis of present conditions and a forecast of the immediate future.

Dr. J. W. Mellor has been engaged for the last twelve years on the preparation of a compendious survey of Inorganic and General Chemistry. This is intended to be the most comprehensive work on the subject which has hitherto been published in the English language, and it is hoped that it will cover the present state of our knowledge in all the different branches of inorganic chemical science and probably consist of six large volumes, and Messrs. Longmans have the first instalment in the press for publication in 1920.
MUSICAL NOTES FROM PARIS

On December 16 the Queen of Spain attended the "répétition générale" at the Opéra of "Las Goyescas," the work of the Spanish composer Granados, who in 1916 tragically lost his life in the English Channel when the "Sussex" was torpedoed by a German submarine. The "Goyescas" are a series of "tableaux," after the main suite of Goya, and provide a musical presentation of the theme of "Los Majos Enamorados." The vast stage of the Paris Opéra, from which it is notoriously difficult for singers to establish any "contact" with the auditorium, is not really suitable for the piece, which is not, and was not meant to be, grand opera in any sense of the word. None the less, with the help of a large crowd on the stage, some picturesque effects were obtained, and a really Spanish atmosphere was created by the masterly "décor" of Señor Zuloaga. The finishing touch was supplied by the extremely striking and accomplished dancing of Señorita Amalia Molina, one of Spain's most famous dancers, and performance of the "fanfango" in the second act, during the "baile de candil" (or ball by candle-light), transported one to the real Spain, outside of which such dancing is rarely to be seen. The plot, such as it is, is concerned with the loves and jealousies of the Countess Rosario (Mlle. Marthe Chenal) and Fernando (M. Laftitte), Pepa (Mlle. Lapeyrette) and Paulino (M. Corentine). The music (which was originally composed for piano alone) is always agreeable to listen to, full of characteristic rhythms, and redolent of that romantic Spain which changes so little, and which is to-day so surprisingly like what it is traditionally supposed to be. The orchestra was brilliantly conducted by M. Marcel, and the composer's son was the "récit" directing the charming intermezzo between Acts I. and II. The house was packed well-known people, including Marshal Foch and Pétain, who received a small ovation.

Meanwhile at the Théâtre des Champs Elysées, Mme. Pavlova is triumphing once more. Her art is as perfect as ever. Her rendering of "La Mort du Cygne" remains what it always was—an exquisitely tender and imaginative piece of miming and a technically perfect exhibition of the classic style. Pavlova's new male partner, Volonne, is also an remarkable dancer, and the rest of the troupe are all efficient and accomplished. The repertoire, however, is badly chosen, and from a musical point of view devoid of interest. But while Pavlova is keeping alive the purest classical tradition and excelling in her virtuosity (and this is no mean achievement), it is rather the Diaghilev Ballet that we turn for works and ideas. And on Christmas Eve Karsavina, Massine and their troupe, fresh from their London successes, were to appear at the Opéra and perform for the first time in Paris, amongst other things, "La Boutique Fantasque," after which they will alternate with the regular opera performances, appearing twice a week.

The same week also sees the revival of Boito's "Mefistophéles" at the Théâtre Lyrique, with Vanni-Marcoux in the title-role.

Debussy's "Ballet pour Enfants," "La Boîte à Joujoux," is now in the bill at this theatre, and is being delightfully interpreted by M. Quinault (Poulchime), Mlle. Sakhy (La Poupière), Mlle. Ginova (Le Soldat) and other "toys," all of whom are good; but a special word of praise is due to the grey elephant, whose round body, expressive eye and realistic wrinkly legs are unforgettable, though unfortunately, having only a "walking-on" (or rather, "walking-off") part, his presence on the stage is very brief, M. Inghilbrecht conducts.

R. H. M.

NATIVE FAIRY TALES OF SOUTH AFRICA. Retold by Ettel L. McPherson. (Harrap, 191 pp., 5/ net.)—These tales from the Zulu and the Sesuto, simply and cleverly retold by Miss McPherson, should give pleasure not only to children, but to those grown-ups who are interested in imaginative stories.

The Book of Elves and Fairies. (Harrap, 303 pp., 6s. net) contains a varied selection of fairy tales retold by Frances Jenkins Olcott. Some well-known fairy poems are included.

Drama

MR. MARTIN HARVEY IN "HAMLET"

THE conjunction of Mr. Martin Harvey and Covent Garden Theatre was full of anxiety for any playgoer who remembered the lion's part that Mr. Harvey played in that most frightful of theatrical events—the Reinhardt production of Professor Murray's "Edipus." And apart from such haunting memories, the Opera-House, even with its boxes eviscerated, is bound to provide a pretty stiff test for the aesthetic virtues of anyone who is so rash as to act a play in it. These pessimistic anticipations, it is agreeable to confess, were not entirely fulfilled by the event. Mr. Harvey's "Hamlet" was not nearly so bad as one had reasonably expected it would be or as other performers have actually been. And if, nevertheless, it was bad, it was bad in a rather unusual way.

The question of whether a production of "Hamlet" is to be actively painful or not necessarily depends chiefly upon the performance of the part of Hamlet himself. The extraordinary fact that never once throughout the whole evening did Mr. Harvey shout or yell was the outstanding feature of the play. It turned out, however, that there is an alternative to bellowing which in the long run irritates the spectator almost as much. Mr. Harvey represented Hamlet as an incredibly depressed individual, entirely bereft of vitality and initiative, and expressing himself not, as one might have hoped, in the tones of everyday conversation, but, in an affected, drawing-sing-song, which eventually degenerated into a perpetual and lachrymose miaowing. The great advantage of "Hamlet," from the actor's point of view, lies in its extreme length, which gives him every excuse for suppressing anything contradictory to his own conception of the play. If you choose to regard Hamlet as a strong silent man of action, you can cut out all the more talkative and undecided parts of the play and yet have enough left to keep you going (with incidental music and tableaux) for at least three and a half hours. If you persist in considering Hamlet a gentleman, you will leave out all his coarsenesses and jokes, and so find time for him to come tip-toeing back to kiss Ophelia's yellow pigtail. Mr. Martin Harvey, however, though his interpretation was positively inconsistent with a large part of the play, scarcely for a moment resorted to such liberties with the text. His cuts were hardly once determined by prejudice, or even by reason. He gallantly went through the "convocation of politic worms" scene, though it evidently caused him much pain; and on the other hand left out the scene with the King at his prayers—or rather allowed the King to keep his part of the scene and merely left out Hamlet's part of it. Mr. Harvey had more subtle methods for disposing of any recalcitrances on the part of the text. The gentle loom which was his Hamlet's only chatteristic naturally made it impossible for him ever to make a joke; and the jokes, which unluckyly disguise the printed version of the play, had to be severely dealt with. One or two of the more terrible were silently strangled. (How, after that touching scene with his mother, could Hamlet possibly talk of hugging the guts into the neighbour room?) A large number were snuggled through under cover of the quiet and refined craziness which he allowed himself to adopt. (What could be more evident than the half-heartedness with which he pretended to crack a joke or two at Polonius' expense?) But there remained a large number of unusual remarks which had to be met by other means—such, for instance, as the "thrift, thrift, Horatio," uttered before there could be any question of "madness." All of these difficulties were avoided by Mr. Harvey's wonderful method of elocution, which pre vented the jokes and two-thirds of the rest of Hamlet’s observations from being heard at all. Both the intention and the technique of this method (which, amazingly satisfactory in the third row of the stalls, must have been completely successful in the remotest parts of the house) are obvious enough. The technique consists simply in leaving out the consonants. Instead of saying “The rest is silence,” you say “—i—ay,” allowing the words to glide out of your mouth like toothpaste from a tube. The intention is no less plain; it is to envelop Hamlet in the mantle of Pelleas. By the unlimited use of such soft emollients every vestige of feeling, humour and intellect may be removed. How many people in the audience had the faintest notion that that mellifluous complaining trickle of sound really represented:

“Swoonds! show me what thou’lt do; Wouldst keep it woot? woot fast? woot thyself? Wouldst drink up else? eat a crocodile? I’ll do’t. Dost thou come here to whine? To outface me with leaping in her grave? Be buried quick with her, and so will I! And, if thou prate of mountains, let them throw Millions of acres on us, till our ground, Singing his pate against the burning zone, Make Ossau like a wart!”

If Mr. Harvey will look again, he will see that these lines are not by M. Maeterlinck. The same kind of objections applied to the production as a whole. It was inoffensive in its details, but the total effect, the combination of the Craigseque curtains, and the affected lighting, and the pretentious music, was grotesquely remote from the play. It is no doubt possible, by selecting an accidentally predetermined mental attitude, to impose some sort of spurious unity upon such a performance. But a really honest result must depend upon a more unprejudiced examination of Shakespeare’s words than Mr. Harvey has attempted.

J. S.

“DRAMA”

The principal feature of the December issue of Drama (Chatto & Windus, 2s. net) is a symposium on “Some Aspects of the Ballet.” Madame Karsavina writes on the importance of an elaborate technique in ballet-dancing. She confeses that to her acrobatisms “has always had a great appeal as a wonderful miraculous achievement, an art autocratic in itself.” And while allowing the importance of the emotional and expressive side of dance, she contends that technique is its “essential principal element.” M. Massine describes “Choreography and a New School of Dancing,” raising interesting questions as to the relation between movements and music in the ballet. Nijinsky and Fokin, he maintains, believed in a complete correspondence in the development of the musical and the choreographic idea. This theory of the exact analogy to be aimed at between every movement on the stage and every phrase in the orchestra was given its fullest expression in the Nijinsky-Stavinsky ballet “Le Sacre du Printemps.” M. Massine describes this ballet as “the greatest fruit of the Dalcroze theory,” and (with a dogmatism that will not convince everyone) declares that it was a redatio ad absudum of the choreography of Nijinsky and a deathbowl to his reputation. As to the alternative theory, which M. Massine himself supports, it is not easy to gather an exact notion; but the view seems to be that the movements and the music should each express the idea of the whole composition independently, and we gather that the relation of the visual to the auditory design of the work can best be described as “contrapuntal.” The meaning is obscure, but we may look for more light upon the subject from the new Stavinsky “Nightingale” ballet, in which M. Massine tells us he hopes to realize his ideas.

Among the other contents of the magazine may be mentioned an article by Piera Norman and J. V. Bryant of the admirable Pollock toy theatres, and a discursive estimate (illustrated with an alarming chart) by Mr. Huntly Carter of “Modern Influences on Public Dramatic Taste.”

THE NEW THEATRE IN BERLIN

We are able to give some particulars of the Grosses Schauspielhaus which was recently opened in Berlin under the direction of Herr Pölig. The theatre is not an entirely new building, but a reconstruction (of the very complete kind) of the old Zirkus Schumann. Its huge dimensions have given the architect (Herr Pölig) an opportunity for erecting an exterior which is a characteristic specimen of modern German work. The feature of the interior, and indeed the raison d’être of the whole building, is the outer stage, like the “orchestra” in Greek theatre, with space of the floor of the Schauspielhaus, and from which the seats radiate in a semicircle. The level of this outer stage may be fixed at any height that is desired; it is divided into three sections, which may be raised and lowered independently, and which may also be tilted to an angle with one another. Immediately behind the outer stage is the position of the orchestra in an ordinary modern theatre, is the front stage. This is a comparatively shallow platform, running in front of the proscenium-opening, and normally raised well above the level of the outer stage. The front stage is divided into six sections which (as in the case of the outer stage) are capable of being raised or lowered independently and at any height. Whereas the outer stage is intended to be used chiefly for the movements of choruses or crowds, the main dramatic action will as a rule take place upon the front stage. Finally, there is the upper stage, lying behind and above the front stage. The upper stage, in fact, corresponds in all respects to the normal upper stage in other theatres, and is separated from the auditorium (as well as from the front and outer stages) by a proscenium-opening fitted with an act-drop and safety-curtain—the latter divided into eight upright shutters sliding from the sides. The upper stage is armed with all the usual devices of modern stages—it has a turntable, a Kuppelhorizont, and an indirect-lighting installation. Instead, the whole upper stage may be raised or lowered within 4-metre limits. Some conception of the dimensions of the theatre may be formed from the fact that the outer stage (orchestra) is nearly as wide as the proscenium-opening of the Paris Opera, while the front and upper stages are more than twice as wide—the proscenium-opening measuring in fact 31.5 metres across. The auditorium will seat 3,100 spectators, and the average price of a seat is Mk. 3.50.

From this account it will be evident that scenery in the ordinary sense can only be used upon the upper stage, and even there, in any case, only with great difficulty. As for the management, it will be rigorously simple and stiltisirt. As far as the front stage and orchestra are concerned, the creation of the right atmosphere must depend on the efforts of the actor, supported by a powerful ally—the lighting-apparatus. This, which is of the most elaborate description, is operated mainly from the rear of the orchestra. It must be explained that the interior of the dome is not a smooth surface, but is composed of a series of rings suspended one above the other, the lowest being as wide as the largest circumference of the dome, and those above diminishing gradually in size until the summit is reached; from each of these rings moreover there hangs down a kind of fringe of stalactite-shaped projections. Two functions are served by this structure of the dome; for the hanging projections, by breaking up the sound-waves, ensure the excellence of the acoustic properties of the auditorium, while the spaces between the rings are used for the indirect-lighting apparatuses. A special merit is also the lighting of the domed roof, which lights in the theatre are lowered, and the auditorium seems to be in the open air roofed over by a starry night-sky. The theatre (a photograph of whose interior appeared in the Manchester Guardian of December 19) was opened on November 28 with a production of the “Orestes” of Eschylus, translated and restaged by Herr Reinhardt. It is a success.

It is difficult to feel much confidence in the hopes of their management that their efforts are creating a new form of theatrical art, which, by means of a new histrionic technique working upon a three-dimensional stage, will be able to affect the feelings of the audience more powerfully and directly than has previously been attempted. But the new theatre has, at the same time it would be wrong to forget that in spite of an insecurity of taste Herr Reinhardt has done some interesting and intelligent work in the theatre.
Correspondence

SWINBURNE, WATTS-DUNTON, AND THE NEW VOLUME OF SWINBURNE SELECTIONS

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

DEAR SIR,—I read with alarm and distress Mrs. Watts-Dunton’s letter in The Athenæum of December 12 concerning the Publisher’s Note appearing in “Selections from Swinburne,” edited by Messrs. Goss and Wise. Mrs. Watts-Dunton is kind enough to suggest that the statement complained of was made through carelessness and not from any unworthy motive. I need hardly assure her that this is the case. When writing the note I had not a copy of the early selections before me, and did not realize that Swinburne himself had had any hand in that selection, which I cannot help thinking is now insufficient from the point of view of the wider popularity of Swinburne’s works and also on account of the many poems which have been published since 1887. I am withdrawing the prefatory note at once, and substituting for it a new one in strict conformity with the facts. I offer my regrets and apologies to Mrs. Watts-Dunton.

Yours faithfully,
Wm. Heinemann.

20-21, Bedford Street, W.C. 2.
December 19, 1919.

SHENSTONE’S EPIPHANY

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

SIR,—Has it been noticed that of the ten words—
Heu quarto minus est Cum reliquis versari O quam tu Meminisse!
the first six fall exactly into the metre of Horace’s threnody for Quintilius—Quis desidero sit pudor aut modus . . . ?
This is no doubt, in a sense, accidental, but the perfect writer of lapidary prose is as sure of his rhythm as is the perfect poet, and like melodies may well take shape in like cadences.
The candle draws the moth, and I must hazard one more adventure:
Life with the living—Ah! to me
How much less than thy memory!
If the form of the first line is admissible, this gives a more literal substitution for Mr. Harrison’s “All that I feel,” which rather transgresses his own canon of austerity, and the equivalent of meminisse is kept in the same final position.
Mr. Harrison’s letter on translation is incontrovertible except, perhaps, in one point. He considers English monosyllables a weakness in rendering. But it appears that English literature, prose or verse, like English speech, commonly becomes monosyllabic in proportion as it touches heights or depths of feeling. These three examples are given almost at random:
1. And the king was much moved and went up to the chamber over the gate, and wept: and as he went, thus he said: O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom! would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son.
Of these 46 words all are monosyllables except one and the thrice repeated proper name.
2. Leer. And my poor fool is hanged! No, no, no life: Why should a dog, a horse, a rat, have life, And thou no breath at all? Thou must come no more . . .
Kent. Vex not his ghost: O, let him pass! he hates him That would upon the rack of this tough world Stretch his bitter longer.
Fifty-four words, all monosyllables but one.
3. But O for the touch of a Vanish’d hand, And the sweet sound of a voice that is still!
In this poem there are 110 words, and all but ten are monosyllables.
It is difficult to see why the English way of expressing elementary pathos by elementary speech should not obtain also in translation.
Yours, etc.,
George Engeleheart.

THE ABBEY THEATRE

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

SIR,—In your issue of December 26 “Dublin Playgoer” is kind enough to call your attention to the facts of the case of the Abbey Theatre. So far as your correspondent’s letter contains any facts distinct from any opinions of personal opinion, it is in no way invalidates the statements made by me in my “Irish Notes” of December 12. As I wrote on that occasion, the Abbey Theatre is a subject of perennial controversy in Dublin, and I have no doubt “Dublin Playgoer” is prepared to relash the stale arguments, if enough of time is to do so. So far as I am concerned, I have no intention of wasting your space and your readers’ patience—not to mention my time—upon a question which has long since passed beyond the stage of intelligent discussion. As you will remember, my reference to it was provoked by the fact that Mr. W. B. Yeats himself has at last admitted publicly that the “success” of the Abbey Theatre is “the discouragement and a defeat.” For some years past this self-evident fact has been the contention of all those who, like myself, have contrasted the earlier aims and achievements of the Irish Theatre with those of its later popularity. I need, therefore, reply only to the three points on which I am accused of being misleading.

1. “Dublin Playgoer” over-zealously assumes that I attach great importance to the brief period of Mr. St. John Ervine’s managership of the Abbey Theatre. I stated that “the process of disintegration” took “a fatal turn” during that period. Obviously my words implied that the process had already begun, as it had, long before Mr. Ervine was ever heard of. “Dublin Playgoer” admits that a group of the Players left, but omits to explain that they do not assail Mr. Ervine’s methods. In any case, Mr. Ervine’s squabbles do not concern me. I merely noted the departure of the last remnant of the Players who were trained in the Fay tradition. That was the “fatal turn” to which I referred. Without discussing the reasons, I mentioned the undeniable fact that the Abbey Theatre gradually lost all that gave it fame and distinction. Your correspondent seems to imagine that this statement can be disproved by an irrelevant eulogy of Mr. Ervine and a repetition of my point, that “the leading Abbey actors have drifted from the theatre.” The word “drifted” is a pretty euphemism, but to discuss it would be to reopen dead controversies. The important thing is that the phrase used by “Dublin Playgoer” confirms my reference to the “process of disintegration.”

2. So far as the Drama League is concerned, “Dublin Playgoer” again fails to invalidate my reference. I did not say that the League had carried out its full programme, but only that it was yet far from the success which was ascribed to it. Your correspondent reproduces a paragraph which is not, so far as I remember, in the Report of the Committee a substantial balance is at their disposal, and a number of additional members was secured by the performances to which your correspondent refers, apparently because the actors were not English. “Dublin Playgoer” evidently mistakes some personal grievance for widespread dissatisfaction with the Dublin Drama League. It is unfortunate that increased public support should have resulted from those dreadful productions (before crowded houses, by the way) which your correspondent cites as proof of the League’s failure.

3. When I wrote of the death of the Abbey Theatre I was at pains to mention the vast improvement under Mr. Lennox Robinson’s management. With an inadequate company of players he has succeeded in raising the theatre out of the rut into which it had fallen under pressure of circumstances, due largely to the exigencies of commercial success. “Dublin Playgoer’s” list of plays produced in the last few years is as superfluous as it is intrepresative. I did not deny that plays were being reproduced still, but, like Mr. Yeats, I expressed my opinion that the Irish Theatre had abandoned its ideals and had failed to achieve its avowed purpose. In that sense, the Abbey Theatre is dead, although one does, not expect “Dublin Playgoer” to say so.

Your correspondent’s contumacy for “tradition,” and characteristic belief in the superiority of imported players, are most emphatically not the stuff of which the dreams of the Irish Theatre were made.

Yours faithfully,
B.
Foreign Literature

GARCILASO AND BOSCÁN

GARCILASO Y BOSCÁN: POESÍAS. (Madrid, Biblioteca Calpeja. 2.50 ptas.)

GARCILASO DE LA VEGA: POÉSIES. "Collectión Universal." (Madrid, Editorial Calpe. 30c.)

The first appearance of humanism in Spanish letters is marked by a great literary friendship. The names of Boscán and Garcilaso de la Vega were joined in their lifetime, and their works were published posthumously in one book. "Las Obras de Boscán y algunas de Garcilaso de la Vega" appeared after Boscán's death in 1543, and ran into twenty-one editions before the end of the century. Of the newest editions, one might be called "The Works of Garcilaso and some of Boscán," while the others leave Boscán out altogether.

Juan Boscán was the first Catalan poet to write in Castilian. He is greater for what he made possible than for what he accomplished himself; but to call him merely a mediocre poet is to misunderstand the whole situation. Boscán might be described as a cultivated amateur. He had a keen feeling for beauty and poetry, combined with a sense of scholarship; he belonged to the same tradition as those young men who, a hundred years later, gave performances of their own musical dramas in Florentine palaces, and so made opera a possibility in the hands of regular musicians, or to those amateurs who took part in the first private performances of the early dramas of Angel Guimerà. He was the sort of man who, had he lived in the "Georgian period," would have known Rupert Brooke and helped to found the Marlowe Dramatic Society at Cambridge. His acquaintance with Garcilaso de la Vega began in 1519, when the latter had come to Barcelona as one of the youngest members of the suite of the Emperor Charles V. Later on, at Granada, he met the cultivated and sympathetic Venetian ambassador, Andrea Navagero, who asked him why he did not write sonnets in Spanish, as Santillana had already done, and use some of the other forms employed by Italian poets. Boscán took him at his word.

The facts of Boscán's literary life remind us that Italy is the source of nearly all modern culture. Spaniards, and to a certain extent Englishmen, have been accustomed to hearing Paris spoken of as an Athens where all new movements are supposed to arise. But the French originally received their Latin sense of form and clearness of expression from the Italians, in a succession of waves of poetry, painting and music; and the achievement of the French intellect consists in having so clarified and purified Italian culture as to make it a basis for all others. It was owing to Italian studies that a knowledge of the classics was diffused in Spain. All Italian writers of the trecento and quattrocento, from Petrarch onwards, had felt the influence and adopted the attitude of the humanists; and from the perusal of Italian books cultivated Spaniards had caught the fever for classical research, translation and commentary, and were learning to enjoy Greek and Latin authors for their formal beauty and suggestion of unutterable promise. The "Cancioneros," in which the same ideas and the same similes were repeated over and over again, began to appear insufferably dull to the younger generation at the beginning of the sixteenth century. Their reforms, however, were directed not against Spanish national poetry, but against the artificiality of most of the stuff which was being written in the older manner. The introduction and cultivation of the Italian style did not kill the Spanish style; it enabled it to express itself more clearly. The prevalence of modern French music in England and Spain has not destroyed the sterling qualities of good English and Spanish music; on the contrary, the work of Vaughan Williams, Falla and Turina has been enriched and clarified by their study of Ravel. So Spanish poetry in the sixteenth century was not destroyed by Italian influences, but given a wider horizon and a new lease of life.

Catalan literature could not subsist without the sustaining authority of humanism, Castilian gained incalculably from the association; and the contact of the formal beauty of the classics with the remote, adventurous art which was the natural heritage of Castile produced the golden age of Spanish literature. No one with the tradition of Milton and some acquaintance with the great Italians can fail to admire the dignity, volume and sweep, as well as the lapidary quality of the best poetry of sixteenth- and seventeenth-century Spain. And these beauties are due in a great measure to the artistic foresight, the sense of scholarship—and the sense of friendship—of men like Boscán, who pointed the way which Garcilaso de la Vega followed with a more profound knowledge of Italian and a deliberate choice of beautiful forms.

LITERATURE AND HISTORY

ÉTUDES ET FANTAISIES HISTORIQUES. 2e Série. Par E. Rodocanachi. (Hachette.)

The past has often been helpful to men of letters. When they do not feel quite up to the mark they can look at a chronicle or a museum, and ten to one some little creative spurt will result. Events that have happened long ago can acquire a certain air and even a certain shape; though the Muse has not digested them, she has given a preliminary chew, so that a washing bill, provided it belongs to a fifteenth-century convent, or a sucking pig, if given as a prize for the Hundred Yards in 1623, seems already matter for literature. So unexacting is the past, so irretrievably lost is the sequence of its facts, that the man of letters can either, like Mr. Belloc, invent a sequence or he can hop from one fact until he conveniently encounters another, like M. Rodocanachi. Anteas-like, each time he thus hops, he feels an agreeable access of vitality, makes a little joke, sheds a little tear, evokes a little picture, throws a little light upon something small in our daily lives, and all the while the facts that the vitality is inherent in the desired, and that if he decided not to hop he could fly. One doubts it. Intermittent inspiration is so common; almost everyone is, for half a sentence, a fine novelist or a profound poet, and if the sentence would but exist there is no knowing where one would get to. As it is, one always gets to the ground, and only when the subject is historical can one pretend the ground is as lofty as the sky. Essays like these are, in fact, not quite on the square; they are neither history nor art, yet doddle criticism by hiding alternately under the robes of either.

This is the only censure that need be passed upon them. They are done very nicely—only one can think of nothing as neat in English, though Dryden's "Tales of the Byzantines" occur as a possible bal in French. "Open me where you will," M. Rodocanachi seems to say, "you shall never find me inadequate." He spreads a newspaper over brows that the Academy has three times crowned, he leans back in his commodious chair, and one reads:

La vie semblait douce, insouciante, agrémentee de plaisirs. Une fois on édifica un château de bois que des chevaliers durent prendre d'assaut; dans une autre occasion, un groupe de gentilshommes montrent dans une barque pour aller à la conquête d'une ile; mais la barque chavira, les gentilshommes périrent tous noyés; le fils de celui qui avait organisé la fête était du nombre; le duc ne voulut pas qu'elle fût interrompue.
Here in a couple of sentences are gaiety, tragedy, irony, and an implied criticism of the period—the sixteenth century at Ferrara. What more will you? Fantasy? Very well:

Virgile débarrassa Naples d’une invasion de sangsues au moyen d’une sangue d’où qu’il jeta dans un puits. Il créa un marché où les vandales se conservaient pendant six semaines sans se corrompre. Il fit beaucoup mieux encore: il mit Naples dans une bouteille ainsi de la soustraire à ses ennemis. Naples n’en fut pas moins prise par les Impériaux . . . .

And the people who did or believed these things were once alive. This is history, not literature. And yet they raise emotions appropriate to a creative work, so it is literature, not history. Hither and thither the writer hops, from a blob of dates, via a flight of the imagination, into a financial transaction conducted in écus! The dates are right, the imagination is wrong, and only gradually does one realize that the form of his compositions is bastard and their appeal too shifting to be intense.

But the past has another possibility, a subtle and terrible quality which M. Rodocanachi’s temperament will never convey. The past once was alive and it now is dead, and if a writer succeeds in expressing these facts simultaneously, as Hardy does in “The Dynasts,” and D’Annunzio in “La Città Morta,” he has achieved a great literary effect. The expression must be synchronous, there must be a complete fusion of all tenses, or the spell falls.

Napoleon and Agamemnon are men and will not be men, were men and are not men at the same time; even in the flesh they were ghosts, leading phantom armies whose tramp can be heard, and the dust that now blows about the world, influencing Napoleon and Agamemnon. The gates between the living and the dead fly open, as in Beddoes’ strange play, yet though the passage has become easy it has lost nothing of its Mittonic horror. The tenses have not been fused in any philosophic sense; it is an aesthetic that has interwoven them, three in one and one in three, and made them a garment for poetry. And strictly speaking, it is only along lines such as these that Literature should have any commerce with history; otherwise she may suffer from the connection and have to caper more often than she bargained for.

E. M. F.

FRENCH DOMESTIC HUMOUR
LES MEMOIRES D’UN BEAU-PERE. Par Leon de Timseau. (Paris; Calmann-Lévy. 4fr. 90.)

One of the most agreeable features of the genius of the French is the affection which so many of their intelligent men have for the petit bourgeois and his foibles. Such giants as Balzac can envisage the dual nature of French bourgeois society, where le demi-monde is dovetailed into le monde. Lesser men are content to concentrate on one half of the other. “Les Memoires d’un Beau-Pere” belongs to the latter class. Casimir Lecerteux tells us how he found a husband for his daughter and a wife for his son. He describes the revolt of the younger generation as seen by an amiable parent whose son is not ashamed to confess to us, “le souvre sur les lèvres,” that he is beaten all along the line. That Fernand, his son, will decide his matrimonial affairs for himself, is a foregone conclusion to the reader from his first introduction, but there is throughout a sporting chance that M. Lecerteux may escape from the necessity of accepting Théodore as his son-in-law. Though his antipathy for this young man is based on an avowed prejudice, we hope all the time that Antoinette will choose another husband. But it is not to be. “Théodore,” sighs the poor man, “est plus fort que moi.”

The central figure is of course Lecerteux himself. He is a man whom Troilus would have loved. He gives himself away at every turn, but at each confession of weakness he only endears himself the more to us, and we lay down a subtle and humorous book with the sensation of having met a charming Frenchman in the train, who beguiled the miles between Calais and Paris by relating to us an episode of his life.

BOUCHER IN LITERATURE
LA CABANE D’AMOUR; OU, LE RETOUR DE L’ONCLE ARSENE. Par Francis de Miomandre. (Paris, Emil-Paul Frères. 3fr. 50.)

The pleasure which we derive from M. de Miomandre’s charming story is of precisely the same kind as that given us by French sanguine drawings of the eighteenth century. Both the nature of the subject and the method of treatment contribute to the resemblance; there is the same subtle combination of artificiality and fine observation, the same lightness of touch and perfection of technique. Everything in “La Cabane d’Amour” is subordinate to the gentle figure of Géromeine, the seventeen-year-old heroine. M. de Miomandre draws her in a hundred attitudes, each more delightful than the last.

First her portrait as she is introduced to us incarcerated in the sombre interior of grand-father Pierotti’s provincial villa:

Qu’elle était sage, la petite Géromeine ! là, toute seule dans la grande salle à manger obscure, assise devant le déjeuner refroidi qu’elle n’eût pas osé toucher au prix de sa vie, tant elle était docile et bien élevée! . . . Et qu’elle était jolie aussi, avec sa figure régulière, blanche et nette comme l’ivoire, ses yeux noirs et brillants, ses lourds cheveux en masse somptueuse sur sa petite tête ronde et ses mains agiles comme des fusées. Elle attendait. Un doux soufrière voltigeait sur sa bouche enfantine, et l’on eût dit, dans cette pâmoison, vraiment une petite fleur d’innocence et de clarté.

She smiles because she has love in her heart, and contrives to exchange billets doux with an adoring swain as young and innocent as herself. In the early hours of the morning a rustic entremetteuse appears beneath her window and imitates a blackbird’s call:

Alors, une fenêtre du premier étage s’ouvrit précautionneusement, on vit l’éclair d’une main blanche, puis une cordelette se déroula, au bout de laquelle tournoyait une de ces petites corbeilles en tiges de lavande que les jeunes filles du M. d’Amour avaient à dresser de leurs propres mains avec les brins qu’elles ont-mêmes cueillis sur les coteaux. La vieille femme mit dans la corbeille son billet, avec au-dessus un calis pour l’empêcher de s’envoler, et, rapidement, la cordelette remonta, remonta.

But Géromeine’s childish dream of romance is rudely shattered. She is told pointedly that she is to marry a local apothecary who is good enough to forget that her parents delayed their wedding until a few weeks before her birth. Once again we see her alone in the gloomy dining-room:

Géromeine pleurait. A longs sanglots desespérés, elle pleurait, sans même cacher sa pauvre petite figure, et ses larmes tombaient, lentes et grosses, sur le tapi. Elle n’avait jamais éprouvé pareille angoisse. Le monde pour elle avait cessé d’exister, elle ne voyait plus, elle ne comprenait plus rien à rien, elle ne savait plus . . .

She is rescued by l’Oncle Arsène, the black sheep of the family, whose unexpected return from foreign climes has sown consternation in the heart of old Pierotti. Together they fly to la Cabane d’Amour, the cottage still inhabited by Norine, who was the peasant love of Arsène’s youth. There they find Géromeine’s swain, and the quartet prepares for the final tableau. In honour of the déjeuner which is to celebrate the double fiancailles Arsène and Norine dive into an ancient trunk and array themselves in their gala clothes of thirty years ago.

Le repas fut charmant, dans la pénombre fraîche de la pièce basse aux larges portes apparentes et passées au lait de chaux, ainsi que les murs candides . . . Bernard et Géromeine perdus dans leur rêve, n’ayant de leurs yeux que l’image floue. Quand à Norine et Arsène, touchants et saugrenus, ils semblaient, avec leurs défraîches de jadis, deux vieux acteurs costumes qui souriaient à des débutants.

Are not these pictures pure Boucher?

The second story in the book, “Le Journal Interrompu,” has the same disheartening quality, but it is less completely realized, less objectively seen.

R. H. W.
they are not clad in skins, they have no dark Fridays in attendance; and so nobody recognizes them. But surely Friday and a fur jacket do not make a Crusoe! Loneliness, desertness, a boundless, shoreless sea, on which no sail has risen for decades—do not many of our contemporaries live in such circumstances? And are they not Crusoes, to whom the rest of people have become a vague reminiscence, barely distinguishable from a dream?

V.

We think with peculiar intensity during the hard moments of our life—we write only when there is nothing else left to us to do. So that a writer can only communicate something of interest or importance when he reproduces the past. When we are driven to think, we have, unfortunately, no mind to write. That is why all books, after all, are only a feeble echo of what a man has gone through.

VI.

If a man had come to Dostoevsky and said to him, “I am hopelessly unhappy,” the great artist of human misery would probably, at the bottom of his soul, have laughed at him and at his naïveté. May one confess such things of oneself? May one go to such lengths of complaint, and still expect consolation from one’s neighbour?

Hopelessness—it is the most solemn and supreme moment in our life. Hitherto we have been assisted—now we are left to ourselves. Previously we had to do with men and with human laws—now with eternity and the absence of any laws. How can one not be aware of this!

VII.

Scratch a Russian and you will find a Tartar. Culture is an hereditary gift, an age-long development, and the sudden grafting of it upon anyone rarely succeeds. To us, in Russia, civilization came suddenly, whilst we were still savages. At once she assumed the pose of a tamer [of animals], first working with decoys and baits, and later, when she felt her power, with threats. We quickly submitted. In a short time we have swallowed in enormous doses those poisons to which Europe had been gradually accommodating herself, gradually assimilating through centuries with a moderation that renders any poison, even the strongest, innocuous. Hence the transplanting of culture into Russia turned out to be no mild affair. A Russian had only to catch a whiff of European air, and his head began to swim. He interpreted in his own way, savage-like, whatever he happened to see or hear of the successes of Western civilization. He was being told of railways, agricultural machines, schools, municipalities, and his imagination painted miracles: universal happiness, boundless freedom, paradise, wings, etc. And the more unrealizable his dreams, the more eager he was to believe them real, actual. How disillusioned with Europe the Westerner Herzen became, after living for years abroad! Yet, with all the acuteness of his intellect, it did not occur to him that Europe was not in the least to blame for his disillusionment. Europe had abandoned miracles ages ago; she contented herself with ideals. It is the Russian who will go on confusing miracles with ideals, as if the two were identical, whereas they have nothing to do with one another. As a matter of fact, just because Europe had ceased to believe in miracles, and realized that all human problems resolve into more arrangements here on earth, ideas and ideals were invented there. But the Russian crept out of his bear-hold and looked to Europe for the living and dead water, the flying carpet, the seven-leagueed shoes and such-like things, thinking in his naïveté that railways and electricity were only the beginning of things, signs which clearly proved that the old nurse had only told a lie in her fairy tales. But all this happened just at the moment when Europe had finally made away with astrology and alchemy, and had started on positive researches resulting in chemistry and astronomy.

VIII.

Man is used to having convictions, so there we are. We can none of us do without our hangers-on, though we despise them at the bottom of our souls.

(To be continued.)
List of New Books

Prepared in co-operation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding with the Dewey Decimal System, the sub-classes being indicated, for the benefit of librarians and others familiar with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. The first numeral in these represents the main class, the second one of the subdivisions, and so on.

Those works in the List which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

GENERAL WORKS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY, ENCYCLOPÆDIA, MAGAZINES, &c.

*Studies : an Irish quarterly journal of letters, philosophy, and science. Dublin, Educational Company of Ireland, December, 1919. 9 in. 172 pp. paper, 2/6 n. 050

The Professor of Politics at University College, Dublin, Dr. Michael Cronin, takes the leading place in this issue with a methodical study of the new German Constitution, which, he considers, should afford lessons of immense value to the rest of Europe. "Even in the revolution we see that Germany has kept her head, and is proof against the insidious allurements of Socialism." Yet the "ideal of a thoroughgoing democracy is operative in every part of the Constitution." Mr. Hilaire Belloc, in an elaborate fabrication in his account of Julian the Apostate. In "The League of Nations of a Century Ago" Professor J. M. O'Sullivan writes at large of the reactionary Holy Alliance. Miss Virginia Crawford has a well-timed appreciation of André Lalou, poet and novelist; and among other contributions are "Law and Order in Ireland" (Erskine Childers), "What is the Matter with India?" (T. Gavan Duffy), and a second paper on "Spiritualism and its Dangers" (Herbert Thurston).

100 PHILOSOPHY.

Barker (Elsa). Last Letters from the Living Dead Man. Written down by Elsa Barker. With an introduction. Rider, 1919. 8 in. 240 pp., 4/6 n. 133.9

The writer of these "Letters," and of previous similar books, mentions in the introduction that before March, 1914, she had been "known as a poet and a novelist," refers to "the swampings" of her literary career by "automatic writings," and states that her present book was written between February, 1917, and February, 1918, and that then she "lost the ability... to do automatic writing."

The editor of the Quest deals in a brief and clear manner with some of the literature of the Platonic schools, of the alchemists, and of the Mithra cult, in support of the view that the human body is an exteriorization of a spiritual one.

300 SOCIOLOGY.

The thirtieth issue of this indispensable year-book. It includes statements of the position and requirements, with chapters on the management, revenue and cost of the charities, as well as much other matter of interest to all who are concerned with the welfare of philanthropic and similar public institutions.

Child welfare and the health of the school-child are well-worn subjects; Dr. Chancellor calls attention to the importance of the teacher's health, on which efficiency depends. He finds that, in the United States at any rate, "the death-rate is much higher in the teaching profession than in most other professions and trades—it has a higher death-rate from tuberculosis than any other occupation." His book is a useful and interesting contribution to the hygiene of education.

Child psychology, modern educational problems and attempts to solve them, and the successes and failures of schools, are here treated and discussed in an original way. The preface describes the book as "a criticism of the existing school system and a plea for the New Education."

500 NATURAL SCIENCE.

Karpinski (Louis C.), Benedic (Harry W.), and Calhoun (John W.). Unified Mathematics. Harrap [1919]. 7½ in. 530 pp. tables, index, 10/6 n. 510.2

This first-year course for American college students embraces the elements of Algebra, Trigonometry, Conic Sections, and surfaces of the second degree. The treatment is clear, and the illustrations are well chosen. It is an advantage to have the whole of this elementary mathematics included in one volume.

*Moir (J. Reid). Pre-Palaeolithic Man. Ipswich, W. E. Harrison (Simpkin & Marshall) [1919]. 10 in. 67 pp. il. diag. 571.1

The importance of Mr. Reid Moir's contribution to the vexed question of the coliths is that, by minute scientific observation of the ripple-marks and other results of flaking flakes by blows of pressure at different angles, he is able to distinguish between artefacts and those flakes which have acquired their shape through fortuitous collisions without human agency. His reasoning is clear, if highly technical, and is illustrated by numerous comparative drawings. He has examined with satisfactory results the prolific detritus-bed under the Piltdown-Red Crags near Ipswich and elsewhere in East Anglia. He points out that the implements found associated with the Piltdown man are apparently dolithic, and precursors of the rostro-carniform fossils found in the sub-Crag detritus-bed, whence it would appear that "the human remains from the Piltdown gravel must be relegated to the Pre-Palaeolithic period."

600 USEFUL ARTS.

Though there is nothing new in this short handbook, it contains some useful hints. At the beginning of the book the writer states that it pays to grow oak in England, yet later on he himself shows that it does not pay. At the prices now ruling there is bound to be a considerable loss on a crop 120 years old.

This instructive booklet covers the ground very thoroughly.

A little book of illustrations representing the ships of the British navy in black profile. More than 150 pictures, accompanied by particulars of the armaments of the vessels, are comprised in the book, which should be useful to land-men as well as to seafaring people.

800 LITERATURE.

Castle (Agnes and Egerton). Little Hours in Great Days. Constable [1919]. 8 in. 272 pp., 6/6 n. 824.9

"Garden Friendships." "The Garden of my Youth," and two other horticultural or autobiographical sketches appear to be by Mrs. Castle; the rest of the book, concerning Tommies, hospitals, and the coming of peace, by the author of "A Little House in War-time."

An English translation follows the Gaelic text of this literary study. Pearse's object in the stories he wrote for his Claintairí Éireannach was to "acclimatize in Ireland the principles of storytelling as they were understood and practised in foreign lands, and above all to interpret the modern formulae of the short story." This was a new departure in the literary revival of the Irish language, which had hitherto concentrated itself on perpetuating the native canons dating from the era of the Celtic Sianachie. Pearse's pathos and melancholy found in his stories apt and often poetic expression.

This volume is mainly composed of aphorisms; cameocut appreciations of living authors, including MM. Paul Claudel, Georg Brandes, Romain Rolland, and André Gide, Messrs. G. K. Chesterton and H. G. Wells, and Signor D'Annunzio; and thumbnail characterizations of the teachings of Virgil, Racine, Shakespeare, Ariosto, Goethe, Mistral, Dickens, Carlyle, and other literary colossi of the past.

Morrell (Albert).  THE EROTIC MOTIVE IN LITERATURE. New York, Boni & Liveright, 1919. 8 in. 250 pp., $1.75 n. 814

An interesting application of the principles of psychoanalysis to literary criticism. The human interest in the works as expressions of personality is undoubtedly increased by the exposition of the emotional springs of action. Swinburne, Charlotte Brontë, Dickens, Browning, Poe, Shelley, Byron, and Keats are all dealt with; and the critical method of Lafcadio Hearn is shown to have been of the same kind as that adopted here. There are two misprints in quotations from Swinburne on pp. 77 and 79.

Quevedo y Villegas (Francisco de).  PAGINAS ESCOGIDAS. Selección, prólogo y comentarios de Alfonso Reyes. Madrid, Casa Editorial Calleja, 1917. 6¼ in. 404 pp., 2.50 pts n. 865

A selection containing part of the "Vida de Buscón" and other "Obras Festivas," satire, criticism, political and ascetic writings, letters, and some of the best known of Quevedo's verse.

The Writers and Artists' Year-Book, 1920: a directory for writers, artists and photographers. Edited by G. E. Mitchell. Black [1919]. 7 in. 228 pp., index, 6½ in. 817.2

A very useful book of reference, of which this is the thirteenth year of issue. The contents are brought well up to date; and the lists of journals and magazines (British, Overseas, and American), and of British and American publishers, are important and valuable features. To these, in a future edition, might usefully be added a list of prominent French and other Continental publishers.

POETRY.

Alken (Conrad).  SCENICISMS: notes on contemporary poetry. New York, Knopf, 1919. 8 in. 306 pp. 821.64

See review, p. 10.

Aldington (Richard).  IMAGES. "The Egoist," 1919. 7½ in. 60 pp., 3/8 n. 821.9

Aldington (Richard).  IMAGES OF WAR. Allen & Unwin, 1919. 7½ in. 64 pp., 3/6 n. 821.9

Mr. Garrod's chief poetical virtue is an elegance deliberately and elaborately achieved—so deliberately and so elaborately, indeed, that we sometimes secretly wish he might make a slip and fall. At their best his verses have great charm, are rhythmically, wittily and prettily. His favourite poetical form is the octosyllable, which he handles with skill, exploiting all the traditional devices used by the poets to give variety to that facile measure.

Machado (Antonio).  PAGINAS ESCOGIDAS. Madrid, Casa Editorial Calleja, 1917. 6½ in. 326 pp., 2.50 ptas. 861.6

An interesting edition, selected by the poet himself, and containing an autobiographical note and prologue.

See review, p. 12.

FICTION.

Set in Manitoba, this story is essentially an apologia for pacifism. The arguments are presented with moderation; and though passionate as the following there is an evident endeavour to realize, and give due weight to, the mental position of those whose consciences urge them to admit the necessity of occasional recourse to the dreadful decision of war: "I believe that if they allowed the most perfect freedom the majority of the people would still choose war, for there is something in the human heart which answers 'present' to the roll call of force."

A well-to-do person discovers with the aid of a genealogist some poor relations whom in various ways he befriends. His narrow-minded wife is annoyed, and becomes jealous of one of the girl-cousins. Explanations follow, and the fortunes of several sets of lovers are more or less satisfactorily decided.

This book by the author of "Spud Tamson," and of other contributions to the lighter class of war literature, is, like its predecessors, pleasant and readable. It gives a good idea of the psychology of our war cadets, and of their camp and social life, from the time of entering the cadet school to the day of the commandant's farewell, when the lads depart to join their battalions.

Nine short stories, of a spiritist character. Perhaps the best two are "The Wreck of a World" and "When the War Went Over Me." The latter refers to the loss of the "Titanic."

The elusive submarine and the unsuspected spy offer to the story-writer tempting opportunities, of which Mr. Cook has successfully availed himself in the stirring tales in this volume. The chief characters are Donald Bruce, the representative at Malaga and elsewhere of a Scottish firm of wine-shippers, who sub rosa is actively helping the British authorities, and a brave Catalan contrabandista, fisherman, and secret agent, who is known as the Pajarillo, or "Little Bird," and has a vendetta against the German murderers of his brother. "The Shark's Cage" (a vigorous narrative of the kidnaping of a German submarine and its entire crew), "The Coast Patrol," and the title-story are among the best of the items.

Marco Fieravanti, of Forli, a great sculptor who is known as "The Maker of Saints," is the hero of this picturesque romance of Italy in the thirteenth century. One of the personages introduced as Dante. A prominent episode is the savage attack upon the castle of a proud old count, Fieravanti's chief patron, whose daughter and the sculptor are lovers. It is by no means easy to infuse much vitality into an imaginative tale of so long ago, but the author has undoubtedly achieved a measure of success in his undertaking.
910 GEOGRAPHY, TOPOGRAPHY, ANTIQUITIES, &c.
 914.267
The sixth of Mr. Bosworth's admirable monographs relating to the topography of Walthamstow.

 913.4267
A posthumous article by Professor Haverfield on "Centuration in Roman Essex" holds the place of honour in this issue, which contains also Professor J. H. Round's "Anchorage and Local History" and two local articles, and Mr. W. M. Minet's "Stewards' Accounts at Hadham Hall, 1628-9," together with notes on recent discoveries of deneholes, &c. The illustrations are of church chests and effigies. Altogether it is an interesting number.

 914.259
Tastefully illustrated and admirably printed, this book is an attractive and detailed history of a building which for more than seven centuries has been the temple of worship of distinguished and saintly men and women. For three and a half centuries the house was possessed by a Benedictine sisterhood, but the nunnery was dissolved in 1496, and Jesus College was founded on its site. The nuns' buildings to a great extent survived, and the church is unique in the University, as the sole chapel which was designed for a conventual, not a collegiate house; but it is only a fragment of the great church which was dedicated to St. Radegund, founder of the Abbey of Pottiers. It is remarked by the authors that the College is a link with "the grandeur Cambridge of a dim pre-academic age, at least a century before any definite collegiate community was founded."

 914.21
A brief recital of the vicissitudes of a region which from a monastic retreat became the seat of government of the empire, the favourite place of residence of the elect and powerful, and a great and great the centre of England itself. The conciseness of treatment incumbent upon the author has scarcely enabled him to do justice to his subject.

920 BIOGRAPHY.
Bridges (J. A.). Victorian Recollections. Bell, 1919. 7 in. 203 pp. 7/6 n.
 920
Mr. Bridges, who proclaims himself a laudator temporis acti, was born in 1835, so that he may be allowed to speak with authority of the Victorian age. He has seen the last of many excellent things and persons—the stage coach, the three-bottle man, the old-fashioned Oxford don—and the first of many others. He writes of the army, the navy, and the Church of the forties and fifties. His belief in the gloriousness of those happy days leads him into occasional statements of a kind that might perhaps be questioned. Thus, speaking of the port-carrying capacity of our ancestors, he says: "There is the fact that constitutions are not so strong as they used to be." As a whole, the book makes excellent light reading.

Horsley (Sir Victor).
 920
See review, p. 18.

 9 in. 283 pp. 10/6 n.
 920
The author of "Uncensored Celebrities," which someone called "a sort of malicious Debrett," here exonerates himself from the charge of satire, or even criticism, by a series of unbiased character-sketches of President Wilson, the Bishop of London, Sir Thomas Beecham, Sir A. Conan Doyle, Mr. Speaker, the Duke of Somerset, and others of all sorts.

To acclaim a book as "indispensable" is sometimes a mere figure of speech, and the adjective is decidedly overused. There is, however, a very limited class of annually appearing volumes—belonging to the order of "books which are no books," but nevertheless absolutely necessary to men of letters, to workers in the fields of literature, art, science, education, politics, and finance, and even to the social loungers—to which no other word is so fittingly applicable. In this aristocracy of annals, "Who's Who" is not far from holding the first place. The seventy-second issue is before us; and what can be said of this excellent year-book which has not been expressed many times already? Nearly 3,000 pages, filled with admirably concentrated biographies of distinguished and notable men and women, are comprised in the volume, which, as usual, is of a convenient size, and is handsomely produced. "Who's Who" for 1920, in spite of the years of arrest and convulsion through which we have latterly passed, more than maintains its unshakable position.

930-990 HISTORY.

Hurry (Jamieson B.), The Trial by Combat of Henry de Essex and Robert de Montr at Reading Abbey. Elliot Stock, 1919. 10 in. 31 pp. index, boards, 3/6 n. 942.031

An interesting and well-produced monograph, published in association with the exhibition to the Art Gallery at Reading of a picture, by Harry Morley, representing the trial by combat of Henry de Essex, Standard-Bearer to Henry II., and Robert de Montfort, at Reading Abbey in 1163—a famous duel & entrave recorded in the chronicle of Jocelin de Brakelond.

Josephus (Flavius), Selections from Josephus. Translated by H. St. J. Thackeray ("Translations of Early Documents; series 2, Hellenistic-Jewish Texts"). S.P.C.K. 1919. 8 in. 213 pp. app. table of dates, index, 8/6 n. 933

An acceptable Garner from the "Jewish Antiquities;" "Jewish War," "Treatise against Apion," and the "Life," preceded by an introduction dealing with the historian and his works, and with the literature on the subject.

Pollock (John), The Bolshevist Adventure. Constable, 1919. 8 in. 279 pp. index, 7/6 n. 947.08

Mr. Pollock was in Russia from 1915 to 1919, and his book pretends to be nothing more than a calm statement of facts as he saw them. In more than one place he says, "Russia is living, barely living, on the remains of the industry of the past." This year [1919], if the Bolshevist régime is allowed to last, there will be no sowing beyond the peasants' immediate needs, the need of food for that, no wood will be cut or transported to the cities, and it seems inevitable that unless Petrograd is taken this summer by Koltchak or by the slavaged allies of Russia, a large proportion of some thirty million human beings in the northern governments must perish of cold and hunger. Petrograd has not been taken. Koltchak seems to be out of the game, and Denikin on the verge of checkmate: will Mr. Pollock's forecast be verified?

*Stevens (G. W.), With Kitchener to Khartoum ("Edinburgh Library of Non-Fiction Books"). Nelson [1919]. 7 1/2 in. 384 pp., 2/6 n. 962.6

A reprint of the famous war correspondent's account of Kitchener's work on the Nile.

940.9 THE GREAT EUROPEAN WAR.

*Bodley (James Edward Courtesy), The Romance of the Battle Line in France; with an additional chapter on the results of the late war as affecting our national life and imperial interests. Constable [1919]. 8 in. 269 pp. map, index, 7/6 n. 949.9

The first century and a half ago were fought much the same ground as the late struggle on the Western Front; Malplaquet was the scene of our last fight—these interesting points emerge from Mr. Bodley's topographical and strategic study. He brings out, on the economic side, that we have imitated Germany rather in what is evil than in what is good. We might have copied Germany's town-planning. Our modern architecture is inferior, and was a bitter disillusionment to our overseas troops—who also founded the British Museum and the art galleries closed. We hung money away with one hand, and exercised a contemptible economy with the other. It will be seen that Mr. Bodley's book is very miscellaneous in its contents; but his observations are thoughtful and salutary.

Corlford (Leslie Cope), The Paravane Adventure. Hodder & Stoughton [1919]. 8 in. 294 pp. por. il. app., 7/6 n. 940.9

The whole story of Commander C. Dennis Burney's invention, the obstacles and discouragement put in his way by official apathy, and the final success achieved by a new kind of anchor devised by the use of paravanes in defeating mine and submarine attacks on our shipping, is picturesquely related by Mr. Cope Cornford.

Czernin (Count Ottokar), In the World War. Cassell, 1919. 9 1/2 in. 352 pp. index, 25/ n. 940.9

It is greatly to be regretted that this translation of an interesting and important book should have been entrusted to someone with a half knowledge of German, and a complete ignorance of the elementary facts about Austria. Whole pages are turned into sheer nonsense. For instance, the translator believes that Oktroyierung means "customs duties," with the result that an interesting letter to Tisza (p. 168) on the question of the Socialists and Stockholm becomes balderdash. Kirchenamtspolitik becomes "a petty ecclesiastical policy," which makes Czernin's enlightening analysis of Tisza. A competent German scholar may be able to grope in some cases at the original, but the ordinary reader will be simply bewildered. Such minor gems as circular virtuous (p. 187) or ad oculos are not worth mentioning. A characteristic sentence is the following:

"It was Franz Ferdinand's wish that I should be in the Herrenhaus as he was anxious for me to be one of a delegation and also to profit by my extensive training in foreign affairs.

The translator knows nothing of the Delegations, even though Czernin explains the system at length in his book. It is, in our opinion, deplorable that such a disgraceful piece of work should appear over the imprint of a famous and honoured firm.

Hanotius (Gabriel), L'Aisne pendant la Grande Guerre (Collection "La France Dévastée, série 1; Les Régions"). Paris, Alcan, 1919. 7 in. 135 pp. il. maps, paper, 3fr. 30. 940.9

No French Department has suffered more cruelly than that of the Aisne during the past five years; and M. Hanotous, whose authority, as an inhabitant of the region and as a historian, is incomparable, has brought us a poignant and vivid picture of the ravages of war which the German invasion brought to the doors of the people of St. Quentin, Rheims, and numerous other places.

Percin (Général), Lille. Paris, Grasset, 1919. 7 1/2 in. 328 pp. apps. index, paper, 4fr. 55. 940.9

The regional command at Lille in August, 1914, who was accused of abandoning this fortress, here assembles a mass of documents which he weaves into a graphic narrative, &c. to show that the case was the exact antithesis of the charge made by his enemies. He belonged to the strategic school who foresaw that the Germans would come up the left bank of the Meuse, and not make their grand attack on the German-French frontier. These views, he affirms, were entirely disregarded, and those who held them were supposed to be otherwise victimized. He paints a terrible picture of the disorder and the sacrifice of invaluable material at Lille.

Vedel (Emile), Quatre Années de Guerre Sousmarine. Paris, Plon-Nourrit [1919]. 7 1/2 in. 382 pp. index, tables, paper. 940.9

Commandant Emil Vedel furnishes a very full account of the German submarine campaign and our modes of countering it. The first hundred pages of the book are devoted to chronological developments on each side year by year, and well documented, concluding with a list of German U-boats destroyed. There are short descriptions also of the work of the flying boats, minesweepers, &c. While we offer our congratulations on the appearance of an index in a French book, our satisfaction is qualified by the amateurishness of some of the entries.
THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW

With which is now incorporated
THE INTERNATIONAL REVIEW

With the January issue the Contemporary Review will be considerably enlarged, and with it will be incorporated The International Review. The addition to the contents will include the outstanding feature of the latter Review, namely, "The World of Nations: Facts and Documents." It was this feature which gave the International Review its unique character, consisting as it does of unedited treaties, official documents and pronouncements, and other material not otherwise readily accessible to the public. Hitherto, no newspaper or journal in this country has ever made a point of publishing, fully and completely, all the more important data without which any real knowledge of international relations is impossible.

The increase in the size of the Contemporary Review necessitates a slight increase in the price, which in future will be 3s. 6d. monthly.

The Contemporary Review, founded in 1862, is one of the oldest of the British Magazines, and stands in the front rank of European Reviews. It deals with all subjects of current interest—Religion, Politics, Literature, Philosophy, Science, Art, Education, and Social Topics. The first writers of our own and foreign countries are found among the contributors.

CONTENTS—JANUARY:

By VISCOUNT Bryce, O.M.,
THE SETTLEMENT OF THE NEAR EAST.

By HAROLD SPENDER,
IS IT PEACE?

By Sir CHARLES MALLET,
FREE TRADE AND THE COALITION.

By J. D. BOURCHIER,
VICTIS.

By NORMAN ANGELL,
THE ECONOMIC CRISIS IN EUROPE.

By LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH,
The Ecclesiastical Situation in Scotland.

By CHARLES WOODS,
The Dardanelles Campaign.

By H. E. A. COTTON,
Constitution-Making for India.

By T. F. FARMA,
The French Elections.

By Dr. P. GEYL,
Holland in the New Era.

By J. G. MUDDEMAN,
Spiritualism in the Days of Charles II.

By DOROTHY BENNET,
Holland in the New Era.

By Madame De SEVIGNE,
WORLD OF NATIONS: FACTS & DOCUMENTS—RAILWAY NATIONALIZATION: Mr. Plumb Explains His Plan, Germany in the Confessional.

LITERARY SUPPLEMENT—
THE CATHEDRAL GHOST, by J. E. G. DE MONTMORENCY.

REVIEWS AND NOTICES OF BOOKS.

OF ALL BOOKSTALLS & NEWSAGENTS or
By Post from 10, ADELPHI TERRACE, W.C. 2

BY POST

3/6

3/9
Appointments Vacant

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

The Council invites applications for the appointment of two TECHNICAL ASSISTANTS to act under the supervision of the head of the technology branch in the Education Officer's department. The work of the Technology Branch embraces Technical and Commercial Institutes, Schools of Art and Continuation Schools (day and evening). The salary will be £600 a year, rising by annual increments of £25 to a maximum of £900 a year. This salary is based on existing economic conditions. The persons appointed will be required to give their whole time to the duties of their office.

Applications must be made on the official form to be obtained from the Education Officer, London County Council, Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C.2, to whom they must be returned not later than 11 a.m. on Saturday, January 31, 1920. Preference will be given to those persons who have served or attempted to serve with H.M Forces.

All communications on the subject must be endorsed "G.P. 87" and a stamped addressed foolscap envelope must be enclosed. Candidates who desire the receipt of their applications to be acknowledged should enclose a stamped addressed postcard. Canvassing disqualifies.

JAMES BIRD,
Clerk to the London County Council,

CITY OF BRADFORD EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

TECHNICAL COLLEGE.

ASSISTANT LECTURER in PHYSICS.

ASSISTANT LECTURER in ELECTRICAL ENGINEERING.

ASSISTANT LECTURER in TEXTILE MECHANICS.

Applications are desired for the above. Salaries: Salary Scale, £150 to £350 with an additional bonus of £78. Initial salary governed by qualifications of successful candidates. Further particulars may be obtained from the Principal of the College.

By order.

12th December, 1919.

THERE is a VACANCY for a WOMAN INSPECTOR of REFORMATORY AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS, for which applications are invited. Candidates must be under 40 years of age. Preference will be given to Women of University training who have had experience of residential schools or social work among girls. The salary is £350, rising by increments of £18 a year to £435 a year on the initial salary.

Applications giving full particulars of qualifications and experience and copies of testimonials should be sent to the Chief Inspector of REFORMATORY AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS, Home Office, Whitehall, on or before January 17.

Appointments Vacant

HARROGATE, ASHVILLE COLLEGE.—Wanted, for Spring term, MASTER (resident preferred), qualified to teach Chemistry and Physics. Salary commencing (resident) £180, (non-resident) £200; annual increments £10. Eligible for pension scheme.

Appointment Wanted

Authors’ Agents, etc.

THE AUTHORS’ ALLIANCE are prepared to consider and place MSS. for early publication. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors’ interests first. Twenty years’ experience. Please note new address: 93 and 94, CHANCERY LANE, LONDON, W.C.2.

LITERARY Translations and Typewriting. Highest refs.—PHILOGLOT BUREAU, 43, Palatine Rd., Stoke Newington, N.

TYPEWRITING OF EVERY DESCRIPTION carefully and promptly executed at home, 1s. per 1,000 words; carbon copy, 3d. per 1,000 words. Duplicating—Cambridge Local.—Miss Nancy McFarlane, 11, Palmieri Avenue, Westcliff Edgew.

NORWICH UNION FIRE OFFICE.

Founded 1797. HEAD OFFICES, NORWICH and LONDON. (London Head Office, 50, FLEET STREET, E.C.4.) CHIEF (71 and 72, King William Street, E.C.4. LONDON BRANCHES, 22, Birchin Lane, E.C.3 (Marine and Accident). CLAIMS PAID EXCEED £34,000,000. Branches and Agencies throughout the World.

BOOKSELLERS’ PROVIDENT INSTITUTION

A Registered Friendly Society founded in the year 1837 for the assistance of members and their widows and children when in necessitous circumstances.

Patron: HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

President: CHARLES JAMES LONGMAN, Esq.

An Annual Subscription of One Guinea, or a Donation of Ten Guineas, entitles the donor to Honorary Membership with the privilege of voting at General Meetings; whilst a bequest of Twenty Guineas constitutes the executor an Honorary Member for life, with power to vote.

Subscriptions or Donations will be thankfully received by the Secretary, Mr. WILLIAM POULTEN, Stationers’ Hall Court, London, E.C.4, who will gladly furnish any further particulars that may be desired.

NOW READY AT THE BOMB SHOP

COTERIE A QUARTERLY ART, PROSE AND POETRY

No. 3 Now Ready, 2s. 8d. Post Free
Art Exhibitions

ROYAL ACADEMY
The Nation's War Paintings
IMPERIAL WAR MUSEUM EXHIBITION.
Weekdays, 10-6. 1/3 TEA-ROOM.

NEW ENGLISH ART CLUB
61st Exhibition, January 1—30,
R.W.S. Galleries, 5a, Pall Mall East. (Nr. National Gallery.)
Daily 10-17.30

The ETCHINGS of AUGUSTUS JOHN
"It is a wonderful exhibition, a résumé of a great part of John's artistic life, a revelation of one of the very greatest artists of our own times."
Sunday Times.
THE CHENIL GALLERY, CHELSEA.
BY THE TOWN HALL, KING'S ROAD.

THE CHINESE GALLERY
20, James Street, Oxford Street, W.1
CHINESE WORKS OF ART
Porcelains, Jade, Embroideries, Lace, etc.
Frequent direct consignments

Miscellaneous

 Lectures
THE course of lectures by BERTRAND RUSSELL on the ANALYSIS OF MIND will be continued at Dr. Williams' Library, Gordon Square, W.C.I. on Monday, January 12, 1920, at 6 p.m. and the seven following Mondays.

Sales by Auction
STEVENS' AUCTION ROOMS. Established 1760.
TUESDAY, JANUARY 13, AT 12.30.
By order of the Executors of the late Sydney Webb, Esq., the property of a lady, and from various sources.

M R. J. C. STEVENS will SELL the above Property by AUCTION at his Rooms, 38, King Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.2
On view day prior, 9.30 to 5.30, and morning of Sale till 12 o'clock. Catalogues on application.

INDEX TO THE ATHENÆUM
For JANUARY to DECEMBER, 1918, is NOW READY
And may be obtained FREE on application to The Manager, The Athenæum, 10, Adelphi Terrace, Strand, W.C.4.

PLEASE HELP
THE CHURCH ARMY
Because it helps others

Its EVANGELISTIC BRANCHES include TRAINING COLLEGES for evangelists and sisters; evangelists and sisters working in hundreds of town and country parishes; 70 MISSION-VANS itinerating the country districts; Missions of many kinds, including those in PRISONS, WORKHOUSES, and SLUMS; and many others.

For Men still serving it has RECREATION CENTRES in Rhineland, and in France and Belgium.

FOR EX-SERVICE MEN it has a flourishing EMPLOYMENT BUREAU, HOSTELS for the LIMBLESS AND DISABLED, and for men learning trades or seeking work; care of SOLDIERS' MOTHERLESS CHILDREN, &c., &c.

Its SOCIAL BRANCHES include Hostels, Homes, Clubs, &c., of many sorts for men and women, boys and girls, relief of DISTRESS by non-pauperising methods; uplifting DISCHARGED PRISONERS; OVERSEAS SETTLEMENT, and many others.

Prebendary Carlile, D.D., Hon. Chief Secretary, Headquarters, Bryanston Street, Marble Arch, London, W.1, will gladly give all information and gratefully receive gifts towards the heavy expenses; cheques being crossed "Payable to Prebendary Carlile."
Fourth edition now ready.

A Century of British Foreign Policy

BY

G. P. GOOCH, M.A.

AND

THE REV. CANON

J. H. B. MASTERMAN, M.A.

Crown 8vo. Cloth.

Price 3/6 net. Post free 3/8

The two Essays contained in this volume were written at the suggestion of the Council for the study of International Relations. It was felt that there was considerable need for a concise treatment of British Foreign Policy during the last century. Mr. Gooch and Canon Masterman have supplied this need. The book will be found of value to all who desire to understand the development of British Foreign Relations.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS.

"A Century of British Foreign Policy” is an admirable little book—concise, well arranged, well combined."—The Nation.

"War, however, has brought a revulsion in feeling: and there will be a general welcome for the little book of only just over 100 pages in which Mr. Gooch and Canon Masterman undertake to enlighten the ignorance of the British public, and to show how simple and straightforward in its broad lines has been British foreign policy in the last hundred years."—The Times Literary Supplement.

"In this the authors set before us in simple style and with admirable clearness of exposition the main motives and intentions of British statesmen for the last century and a-half."—W. L. Courtney in The Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. G. P. Gooch and Canon J. H. B. Masterman have done a useful piece of work in writing 'A Century of British Foreign Policy.' One may differ from some of the judgments of the authors—though they are unusually far-minded—but as a brief survey of important events their book is admirable."—Daily News and Leader.

"This little book should be particularly useful for refreshing the memory of readers who are fairly familiar with the general history of the period covered."—The Guardian.

"Both authors have the historic instinct, and have won reputations as historians"—Sheffield Telegraph.

"... this grave, thorough, and impartial review of the currents of foreign policy which have brought us to the World-War."—Plymouth Western Mercury.

Published for the Council for the Study of International Relations.

BY

GEORGE ALLEN & UNWIN Ltd.

RUSKIN HOUSE, 40, MUSEUM STREET, W.C.1
The False Dawn

People are, at all times, inclined to believe what they desire; but in ordinary matters a number of correctives are provided. There is our old friend, experience, who teaches us that if we insist on believing that we can run a hundred yards in ten seconds we invariably miss our trains. That belief does not work; it comes into immediate collision with brute fact and suffers ignominious disaster. But there is another kind of beliefs which cannot be compelled to this salutary contact, beliefs which are expressed in what the philosophers call judgments of value. If we hold, for instance, that we are mighty fine fellows, our belief is not destroyed by the fact that we lose our trains, or even our jobs. As Mr. Arthur Balfour once said, to Mr. Will Crooks's bewilderment, the refutation does not lie in pari materia. You cannot prove a man is not a genius by knocking him out; indeed, as the recent annals of British pugilism show, to have been knocked out is hardly accepted as a sufficient proof that a man is not a genius at boxing.

But the correctives to such beliefs as that we are mighty fine fellows have to be subtle and subtly applied; and they are, of course, unpopular. As a nation we are said, with some justice, to have a profound distaste for irony and satire. Nevertheless, in normal times we can assimilate a large dose of these admirable restoratives. The difficulty is vastly increased when the times are abnormal, as they may fairly be said to be abnormal now. For a period of some five years it was thought essential that we should be told every day, with all the scientific emphasis of modern methods of publicity, not only that we were fine fellows, but also that we were about to create a new world. Such beliefs had their uses during a period of national danger, though it may be questioned whether the new world would not have stood a better chance of being created if people had not been taught that it was bound to be. But the general result has been that the national tendency to see things rose-coloured has become almost a national habit.

At such a time it is more than ever incumbent upon those who are able to react to exert their full strength to correct the habit. It is imperative that objectivity should somehow be rehabilitated, and the immutable standards once more set up in the market-place. The people upon whom this duty falls are the intellectuals—those who by definition have some predilection for the truth, who have learned that a judgment to be of any worth must be based upon knowledge, and that the truth has no necessary affinity with what is desired. It is indeed time that the intellectual party should have an innings, and the longer the innings the better it will be for the country and the world. For the confusion of values is becoming bewildering. By a curious but quite explicable trick of mind, the growing awareness (stimulated by collision with fact) that things political are falling quite perceptibly short of the millennium does not engender a habit of criticism with regard to things intellectual. On the contrary: all the disappointments of the world of fact are naively compensated by imaginary triumphs in the world of idea. If Europe is in a very bad way and England herself is a matter for anxiety, our professional optimists have only to turn to modern English art and literature to be more amply confirmed in their faith that God's in his heaven and all's right with the world.

The tendency is natural, as we have said. If you cannot find what you desire to believe in one sphere where facts have an obvious weight of their own, you will look for and find it in another where facts are, or seem to be, less adamantine. But the tendency, natural though it is, is unhealthy, and it fills us with dismay to find it manifested in quarters which we should have supposed the most unlikely. Thus in a recent number of the weekly Manchester Guardian we read with considerable surprise two articles, one by Professor Holmes, the Director of the National Gallery, and the other by Professor Ramsay Muir. Professor Holmes's article was, we gladly admit, much the less surprising... of the two. He merely declared that the exhibition of the nation's war pictures at Burlington House "marked the arrival of a new artistic movement as novel and as startling as that which began some sixty years ago when the first works of the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood stung a drowsy world to fury." There is a belated air about this act of recognition which strikes us as somewhat droll, much as if someone should declare that the industrial era had arrived. For all these young painters have been hard at work for years. They are interesting, even though there is not much genius among them. But this "new movement," which is in truth only the reaction to a movement which really was novel and startling when it burst upon London and Professor Holmes in 1912, is a thing of shreds and patches. What is valuable in it is manifestly experimental; and the only sense in which it can be said to have arrived is that it has managed to find a way inside the doors of Burlington House.

Professor Holmes's ipse dixit, however, gave Professor Muir his cue. The gentle-sounding flute was taken up by a most brazen trumpet. Professor Muir is, we believe, a professor of history, which will explain the turn of his preliminary sentence:

"It is already clear that the war is to be followed by a great intellectual renaissance in England, comparable with that which arose out of the life-and-death struggle with Spain in the Elizabethan age and with that which sprang from the ferment of the French Revolution and the wars which followed it."

"This is already clear." In the case of axioms evidence is unnecessary; but Professor Muir generously supplies it. It is threefold. There is, first, Professor Holmes's article, which through Professor Muir's megaphone roars: "We may well be on the eve of the greatest and most original period in English painting"; there is the fact that "operas have already translated itself into English," whatever that may mean; there is the revival of poetry, manifest, as we surmised, in the volumes of "Georgian Poetry." Shame on those doubting hearts whose arithmetic is incapable of summing these three items into "a great intellectual renaissance!" But a professor of history will plant fresh courage in them. We wonder what Professor Muir would have discovered if he had been a professor of literature. Is it merely a slight accident of vocation which has prevented him from seeing a great revival in historical writing?

So the rolling snowball grows. A legitimate but somewhat excessive opinion of one professor who knows his subject becomes a certainty of miracle on the lips of another professor who knows nothing about the subject at all. The only thing left for any third professor who reads the second professor is to discover that Herr Einstein is an Englishman. The snowball descends with the sound of Boom, boom, boom, until it reposes in the valley, gigantic and wonderful to behold, with the legs and heads of a few enthusiastic professors sticking out of it, a complete and authenticated "great intellectual renaissance." Then a pale sun slowly rises and looks at the snowball a little while. A little while longer, and there remains, of the great renaissance only the bones of the reputation of the professors who doomed it.

That an intellectual renaissance will come we hope and believe. We conceive it our duty to do all we can to prepare the way for it. And the first essential is to apply the corrective of disinterested criticism to that capacity for self-deception which seems to have become infinite under the stress of war; for there is nothing so wearisome as a barndoor cock who ruins a necessary repose by crowing at the false dawn. Not only is he himself exasperating, but there are always so many stupid fowls to follow him.

THE REALITY

THERE was a country town of which we heard wonderful tales as children. But it was as far as Cathay. It had many of the qualities that once made Cathay desirable and almost unbelievable. We heard of it at the same time as we heard of the cities of Vanity Fair and Baghdad, and all from a man with a beard, who once sat by a London fire, just before bedtime, smoking a pipe and telling those who were below him on the rug about the past, and of more fortunate times, and of cities that were fair and fat. Nothing was easier for us than to believe fair reports. Good dreams must be true, for they are good. Some day, he said, he would take us to Torhaven; but he did not, for his luck was not like that.

Nothing like that; so instead we used to look westward to where Torhaven would be, whenever the sunset happened to seem the right splendour for the sky that would be over what was detectable and elsewhere. We made that do, for years. That Torhaven existed there was no doubt, for once we made a journey to Paddington Station—a long walk—and saw the very name on a railway carriage. It was a surprising and a happy thought that that carriage would go into such a town that very day. What is more confident than the innocence of youth? Where, if not with youth, could be found such willing and generous reliance in noble legend?

And how enduring is its faith! Long after, but not too long after, for fine appearances to us still meant fine prospects, we arrived one morning bodily in the haven of good report. Its genius was as bright as we expected. It had a shining face. It was the equal of the morning. Its folk could not be the same as those who lived within dark walls under a heaven that was usually but fumes. It lost nothing because we could examine its streets. We went from it with even a warmer and more comforting memory. What would happen to us if youth did not more than merely believe the pleasant tales that are told, if it did even loyally desire to believe that things are what they are said to be?

This country town is of the Southern kind which, with satisfaction, we show to strangers as something peculiarly of our country. It is ancient and luminous in an amphitheatre of hills, and schooners and barques come right among its gables. It is wealthy; but not of the common sort, for it never shows haste. It knows, of course, that wealth is cheap, until it has matured, and has attained that dignity which only leisure and the indifference of usage can confer. The region around has a long history of well-sounding family names, as native as its hills—they arrived together, or thereabouts—and the lodge gates on its highways, with their weathered and mossy heraldic devices, have a way of acquainting you with the measure of your inconstancy as you pass them when on the tramp. Torhaven has no poverty. It tolerates some clean and obscure but very profitable manufactures. But its shipping is venerable, and is really not an industry at all, being as august as the owning of deer-parks. On market day you would think you were in a French town, so many are the agriculturists, and such the quiet and solid evidence of their well-being. They own their farms, they love good horses, their waggons are built like ships, and their cattle, as aboriginal as the county families, might be the embodiment of the sleek genius of those hills and meadows, so famous are they for cream. The people of that country live well. They know their worth, and the substance which they add to the strength of the British community. And they pride themselves on the legends, peculiarly theirs, which tell of their independence of mind, of their vehement love of freedom, of their challenging liberal opinions and the nonconformity of their religious views. They are stout folk, kind and companionable, well-to-do, and do not love masters of any sort.

It was the first summer after the war had ended, and we were back again in Torhaven. The recollection of its ancient peace, of its stillness and light, of the refuge it offered, had got us there. Its very name had been the suggestion of escape. Where should we find people more likely to be quick and responsive? They would be among the first to understand the nature of the calamity which had overtaken us. They would know, long before amorphous and alien London, what that new world should be like which we owed to the young, a world in which might spring another hope for the bruised and amazed souls of the survivors.

Its light was the same. It was not only unalloyed by such knowledge as we brought with us; it was radiant. Yet it was not without its memory of the disaster. We went into the church, whose porch had been restored; symbolical, perhaps, of our entry into a world from which, happily, the old things had passed. The church was empty, for this was market day, and current prices need close attention. Through its gloom, as through the penumbra of antiquity, faintly shone the pale forms of a few recumbent knights, and the permanent appeal of their upturned hands and faces kept the roof aware of human contrition. Above one of the figures, which was transfigured by a bright rod of sunlight, was a new Union Jack, crowned with laurels. The sun made a too vivid scarlet patch of one of its folds. We left, for that was the last suggestion of a better time expected in any sanctuary.

Just below the church was the theatre, devoted now to "the movies." It being market day the house was full. A poster outside pictured a bridge blowing up, and a motor-car falling into space. The midday sun was looking full at Torhaven's high street, which runs south and downhill steeply to the quay—a schooner filled the bottom of the street that day. Anything a not too unreasonable man could desire was offered in the shops of that thoroughfare. This being a time of change, when our thoughts are all un-fixed and we have had rumours of the New Jerusalem the side window of a fashionable jeweller's was devoted to tiny jade pigs, minute dolls, silver acorns and other propitiators of luck which time and experience have tested. Next door to the jeweller's was a studio supporting the arts, with local pottery shaped as etiolated blue cats and yellow puppies; and there one could get picture postcards of the London favourites in revue, and some water-colour paintings of the local coast which an advertisement affirmed were real.

That was not all. The place for readers of the Athenæum was opposite—the one bookshop of the town. Its famous bay front and old diamond panes frankly presented the bright day with ladies' handbags, ludo and other games, fountain pens, mounted texts from Ella Wilcox, local guide-books and apparently a complete series—as much as the length of the window would hold, at least—of Mr. Garvice's works; and in one corner a number of prayer books in a variety of bindings.

Down on the quay, sitting on a bollard, with one leg stretched stiffly before him, was a young native we had not met since one day on the Menin Road. We had known him before that strange occasion, long before the war, as an ardent student of letters. He had entered a profession in which sound learning is an essential, though the reward is slight, just when the war began. Then he believed, in high seriousness, as a young and enthusiastic student would, all he was told in that August; and his professional career is now over.

He pointed out to me, mildly and with a little reproach, that I was wrong in supposing Torhaven had not changed. I learned that the war had made a great change there. Motor-cars were now as commonly owned as bicycles used to be, though he admitted that it did not seem that the queue waiting to buy books, our sort of books, was in need of control by the police. But farmers who had been tenants, when Germany violated the independence of Belgium, were now freeholders. Men who were in essential industries, and so could not be spared for the guns, were now shipowners. We could see for ourselves how free and encouraging was the new wealth in this new world; true, the size of his pension did not fairly reflect the new and more liberal ideals of a better world, but we must admit he had no need to travel to Bond Street to spend it. What fear is there, he asked, pointing with his crutch up the busy High Street behind us, that what our young friends in France learned was wrong with that old European society out of which came the war, will not be known and registered there? Have you seen, he said, our bookshop, our cinema, and the new memorial porch of our church?

Near us was waiting a resplendent motor-car, in which reposed a young lady whose face decorates the covers of the popular magazines every month, and, as the young soldier finished speaking, it moved away with a raucous hoot.

H. M. Tomlinson.
REVIEWS

SEVENTEENTH-CENTURY POETRY

A Treasury of Seventeenth-Century Verse from the Death of Shakespeare to the Restoration (1616-60). Chosen and edited by H. J. Massingham. Golden Treasury Series. (Macmillan, 3s. 6d. net.)

ABOUT a hundred years ago, or at a time to which only the memory of hoary fossils runneth, there used to be current one of those curious catchwords which arise among schoolboys and undergraduates, exist for a time, and pass, no man knows how or why. It was "Making no error," Mr. Massingham has made either in choosing the subject of his anthology, or in executing it, one little reservation under the latter head having to be made presently. There is perhaps no century in English poetry at which it is so tempting to "cut and come again"—its extraordinary richness, in which only the nineteenth can vie with it, being accompanied by certain other qualities very convenient to the anthologist. There is the striking contrast between its earlier harvest and its after-crop; the strong and yet not monotonous characteristics of its greatest flourishing; and, last but not least, one other peculiarity. No time is quite barren of those curious objects of the Muse's captor whom she enables to do one or two charming things and then cruelly turns her back on them. But in the best period of the seventeenth century you can hardly neglect the smallest poetaster without the danger of missing, often detached passages, sometimes whole pieces of "absolute and earth-born" poetry—poetry such as you may at other times search libraries of quite respectable verse-writers without finding. And what is more, its poetry is as extraordinarily varied in kind: lyric, narrative and dramatic; sacred and profane; melancholy and playful; virtuous and naughty, with not a few other "excellent differences." It is thus a province made to the anthologist's hand; and any first lion who has tried it and "thinks the next a bore" must be not a lion at all, but a cur or at least a curmudgeon.

Mr. Massingham has marked out as his claim the most characteristic part of the century in time, and has not excluded any kind except the dramatic. Most of his selections are naturally lyrical, but by no means all; and he has thus been able to find room for at least specimen fruits from the half-wilderness gardens of "Pharomida" and "Cupid and Psyche." He has also cast his gathering net unusually wide, and his readers will make acquaintance with authors who will pretty certainly be new to them, such as Thomas Fettipace and Robert Gomersal. (By the way, he has had more mercy on Gomersal than the present writer, who had thought of including the author of "The Levite's Revenge," in "Caroline Poets," and felt constrained to turn him out.) In giving uniform modern spelling throughout Mr. Massingham may invite censure from some purists, but certainly not in this place. Whatever may be the case earlier, the printers' spelling of the mid-seventeenth century is, as he justly says, "only externally archaic." Half its differences from present use are not uniform and are evidently haphazard.

One may not perhaps approve quite so heartily his practice of excluding some beautiful things as "too well known." In the first place, the fact is very doubtful. He may fittingly leave out Milton and Herrick; but is he quite sure that Drummond is "pretty well," and the sudden blaze at the end of Crashaw's "Teresa" "unnecessarily," known among readers of poetry? Has either ever been so well known as Snodgrass's "Ballad on a Wedding," which duly appears?

However, on this point one would not be too positive: there can hardly be a sounder maxim of criticism than that the critic should attend to what is in a book, and not to what is not. An exception to even this maxim may still be found, and it is the only matter on which we feel inclined to quarrel (in the least quarrelsome fashion in the world) with Mr. Massingham. He has followed the fashion of printing his extracts with omissions always confessed in the notes, but not always indicated in the text. This is surely wrong. If it is done pudoris causa there is not much to be said for it, as it would be better to leave out the whole piece from the ultra-moral point of view, while frequently in the notes there is no need to leave out anything at all. But when passages are left out because they are thought unequal, or otiose, or too well known already, etc., etc., a rather serious aesthetic liberty is taken, a work of art being presented not as the artist wrought it. It might have been better if Crashaw had not written "Portable and compendious oceans." But as he did the fact should not be hidden from the everyday reader.

However, we may let that pass and take the goods with which Mr. Massingham has provided us. They are very good goods; and the sauce of notes which he has served with them is not, as such things too often are, unworthy of them. One may not always agree with him—it would be rather dull if one did; but one hardly ever disables his judgment, merely noting a difference of opinion when he belittles cheerful Mr. Patrick Cary and glorious Montrose, or when he allows Vaughan's admittedly magnificent exceptions to carry off, too triumphantly, his less inspiring rule, and lets Wither's early freshness compound for his dreadful dotages. One never need cavil at too generous admiration unless it is slightly expressed, which is not the case here. The authors are alphabetically arranged, and so one has the unexpected pleasure of starting with good Philip Ayres's "Beggar" and its charming second line, of following it up soon with some of the pretty little things which Joseph Beaumont managed somehow to devise as a contrast to that "Psyche" of his who was certainly not the mother of Voluptas; and to rejoice once more in those remarkable verses which open "The Anatomy of Melancholy." So it goes on through the whole range to Wither and Wotton. They in their turn give place to the great "Mr. Anon," who puts his best foot forward with "Phyllida," and keeps things up for full fifty pages. Here one meets with the only surprise of the book—that Mr. Massingham includes among the "adespota" Tell me no more how fair she is." Now the present writer (from whose hand a completer edition of Bishop King's poems than has ever appeared has been long waiting for publication in the third volume of the above-named "Caroline Poets") knows absolutely no external evidence against the bishop's authorship. And while internal evidence is notoriously always more untrustworthy on the negative than on the affirmative side, it is never so much to be distrusted as in regard to the seventeenth century, when almost anybody might have written almost anything. Probably Mr. Massingham has given too much weight to the non-appearance of the piece in Hannah's volume. But that book, admirable as far as it goes, is awesomely incomplete.

She whom the Heavens at once made poor and fair;

To end with a still more personal note, perhaps allowable in a signed review, I have to thank Mr. Massingham for a certain correction of a misreading ("less for "life") in my edition of Godolphin—the only attempt I ever made to edit a photographed manuscript with a pair of very weak eyes and little paleographic experience—whence came deserved tribulation. He may like to know two clearly accidental misprints in his own work: "quorum" for "quorum" in a note on Bundeswes (p. 320) and "Staffordshire" for "Shafesbury" in one on Chamberlayne at p. 326. At least I know nothing of a Staffordshire chorus for this poet, while his third page has "Shafesbury in the county of Dorset" (or), and he certainly practised, died, and was buried there. But these things will happen, and we are all guilty of them or troubled with them. My blunder was less excusable: there was no rhyme to guide me.

George Saintsbury.

WITHOUT TEARS

In India. By Sir Harry Johnston, With Coloured Frontispiece by E. Walker, and a few Black-and-White Illustrations. (Blackie, 3s. 6d. net.)

HISTORIOGRAPHY (is there not a Historiographer Royal of Scotland or some other intellectual dependency, and who are we to challenge the validity of Greco-Roman derivatives that have received the Royal Assent?)—historiography—it really takes a parenthesis or two to bring out the full value of a word like that—is looking up in these days. The male population of Europe and North America has only recently returned from making history. Mr. H. G. Wells (with him, a galaxy of scientific and scholarly talent) is busily engaged in writing history. And the only missing detail in the whole gratifying picture of historical activity is that there is not the slightest evidence that anybody is reading history.

It is unfortunate, because history is the only subject that is worth reading, and the present, if only one can sufficiently gild the pill, is the time to make them read it. But it is not the least good suspending seven volumes of "The Decline and Fall" from the cracking branch of one's Christmas tree, or hiding Buckle's "History of Civilization" among the candles and glass balls, because the Little Fingers will not stray in their direction if there is a model Zeppelin or a book by L. T. Meade to beguile them on their way there. One must go about the business with subtility. Introducing history to the young is like teaching a Foreign Secretary geography: one has to pretend that it is really something else, and convey the instruction whilst they are busy looking the other way. Mr. Marshall's method, which he has already applied with some success to the cases of England, Scotland, and the British Empire, is to advance with cat-like tread behind a smoke barrage of highly decorative illustrations and to pour in a deadly fire of information whilst his unwary young reader is enjoying the pictures. He was inspired to produce his "History of France" by the complaint of a small boy that "we can't find anything nice about France." The young man was right. There is a distressing contrast between the stream of adulation that poured from war-time platforms and the sombre insular respect that Paris taught in English schools by persons who were apparently embittered in extreme youth by the passions of the Hundred Years' War, and a plain presentation of the facts may go far to counteract both sets of misconceptions. It is a little too late in the European day for us to continue to represent the French record as an alternation between Brutal Excesses and Goings On.

Mr. Marshall's method is a combination of the pictorial with the anecdotic which is quite adequate for the purpose of his book. The French story is told with an abundance of colour and incident that should make it more interesting to the young than any page in history—even the Hundlebury Page. The break-up of the Roman Empire and the rise of the yellow-haired kingdoms is really more entertaining than "The Doom of the U 14" or "With Pershing to Coblenz." But one cannot help feeling that Mr. Marshall missed a valuable pictorial touch in his story of Attila (if, indeed, history is always becoming more engaging it?) when he omitted to tell his reader that the Huns who cantered horribly across Europe were a sort of Chinamen on horseback. The bulk of his volume contains that excellent type of medieval anecdote which generally stimulates the young boy to say, "Not so, sir king," at irrelevant moments in their more serious occupations. But he manages to retain his lucidity through the bewildering and attractive by-ways of the French Revolution, and he shows great discernment in exploiting the dramatic and pictorial value of French history in the early nineteenth century. The average summarist tends to lay down his pen after he has successfully transported the Emperor to St. Helena, and to mention in a perfunctory way that "France, after many political vicissitudes, decided to have no more kings, and became the gallant ally of the British and Russian monarchies." But Mr. Marshall has made full use of the shifting scenes across which Louis Philippe and Napoleon III. passed, with their gestures of royalty, and the donors of his book will find much in his later chapters that they scarce knew themselves. The illustrations by (Mr., Mrs., Miss, or Rev.) A. C. Michael are extremely, as they say, adequate. His Napoleon is a proper tribute to the master of all pictorial Bonapartists, Meissonier, and his medieval scenes squeeze the full value out of costumes coloured with pre-aniline dyes without deteriorating into that orgy of flat colour which is so depressing on the minds of monochrome.

The best of them is really the conversation between Bismarck and Napoleon III. outside that little square house beyond Sedan on the Bellevue road; but one doubts, in view of his appearance at the Congress of Berlin eight years later, whether the cares of victory had so far aged the Chancellor in 1870.

One approaches with still greater confidence Sir Harry Johnston's early history of India. Nothing is more offensive than the belief that the history of India began when the East India Company disputed with France for some trading stations in the middle eighteenth century. No man seems better qualified than Sir Harry Johnston to dispel historical illusions about the British Empire. On the imperial side they are really something else, and we shall only get into his true perspective when we are no longer there to see him; and on the side of history, is he not one of that chosen band of ciceroes, whom Mr. H. G. Wells has selected to pilot him round the solar system and across the sands of time? His early history of the East is really incredibly interesting, far too interesting to summarize, or, one may add, to issue in this unpretentious form. His scholarship in such matters is unimpeachable, and if the chapters of his book had been delivered as the (Winwood) Reade Lectures and reprinted by the Wigan University Press, they would have been received with subdued and academical cheers. As the British Empire would have taken notice of them. And nobody would have read them. But they would undoubtedly have received the solemn historical reviewing which undeservingly they deserve.

As it is, one can only express profound gratitude for the unobtrusive issue of a brilliant and original piece of history. It is indisputably fit for the purpose for which its author appears to have designed it. It tells one in simple terms all about the pre-history of the British East, and it summarizes in two closing chapters the English record itself. But above and beyond that it may be recommended to uncles as a book to be looked into before it is presented to the descendants of their collaterals. And one very much doubts whether they will ever pass it on.
The "Agamemnon" of Aeschylus, Translated by R. K. Davis. (Oxford, Blackwell. 4s. 6d. net.)

TWENTY years ago the Master of Dulwich College read the "Agamemnon" with his Sixth Form. I suppose he often did so. A Greek play read with the Master was not like a Greek play read with anybody else. For once we were less concerned with our own anxieties about the construe and the grammatical tip from Mr. Sidgwick's indispensable, inaccurate notes than with the fascination of an introduction to great literature. We sat in affectionate terror—aeleus, the Greeks would have called it, certainly not "profane"—and the Master, before a word of Aeschylus had been construed, raised his forefinger, smiled, stammered a little, and then, very quietly, very seriously—in a voice that thrilled us partly because it was so simple and sincere, partly no doubt because it came with so strange a modesty and gentleness from that tall, imposing figure in its Oxford gown and somewhat clumsily cut coat and trousers—he said: "What! Kill a King?" That is how he made us realize that the drama we were about to read was neither an exercise in syntax nor an essay in a half-Hellenic, half-Hebraic moral philosophy, but an extract from real life, tremendously exciting and worth while. He made us feel that the killing of King Agamemnon by his own wife in the moment of his triumph somehow mattered. He made us feel—or rather he let Aeschylus make us feel—that Clytemnestra was an extraordinarily beautiful and strong woman that Agisthus was contemptible, Cassandra not only pitiful, but lovely and lovable; and Agamemnon himself, in spite of his magnificence of gesture and achievement, rotten at heart. He did not teach us, for he did not profess to understand, the principles of the Aeschylean lyric, the careful ingenuity by which the details of the poem are elaborated, balanced and combined, like musical motifs, for the purpose of the grand dramatic movement of the whole. Indeed, until Walter Headlam had delivered his Cambridge "Profection," the best of the modern interpreters of Aeschylus conceived him not as a deliberate and skilful artist, but rather as a meteoric genius, now brilliant, now obscure, like some Pandaric giant, hurling from the depths of a turbulent imagination huge masses of crude rock and molten metal, magnificent but formless, creating in great moments an unparalleled sublimity of tragic thought and of dramatic diction, but as a rule exuberant, undisciplined, chaotic. Headlam revealed the true relation of the details to the whole. The rhetoric, the imagery, the moralizing, are not mere ornaments, but are essential elements of one great pattern, of an ordered composition constructed like a symphony out of many strands of music, of a drama which (because the details are precisely what they are, and are arranged precisely as they are) represents and illuminates the love and hate, the joy and suffering, the failure and achievement, the tragic littleness and greatness, not merely of an Agamemnon and a Clytemnestra, but of our own humanity.

But the treasure to which Headlam gave us the key is not to be enjoyed without some trouble. Headlam's own version, although, if you will work at it, it will explain the text of Aeschylus as no other modern commentary can, is in itself, considered as an English dramatic poem, a failure. It is a noble failure, but for schoolboys, and for many other English readers, it is too difficult. For such readers the Headmaster of Woodbridge School, who knows about the needs of schoolboys, has provided in his version a safe and unadventurous, but not unpleasant introduction to the study of the "Agamemnon." His aim is to convey first, the philosophy and the religion, and secondly, "something of the dramatic movement" of the poem. The order is significant, and, I think, unfortunate; but at any rate the modesty of the translator's design enables us to admit—as we admit with pleasure—that on the whole he has succeeded in his enterprise. The boys of Woodbridge School are fortunate in their Headmaster, and we believe that many older persons will be glad to win their first impression of the religious gravity and the dramatic power of Aeschylus from a scholar so amiable, so modest, and so tasteful as Mr. Davis. The bare formula of the Aeschylean view of life can perhaps more easily be gathered by the uninitiated from the simple lyrics into which he has transmuted the great choral odes than from the more elaborate schemes which Headlam used for illustration of the intricacies of the original. It is in the lyrics that the modern reader most needs help, and it is fortunately here that Mr. Davis has most nearly achieved success. For example:

The dear live forms of those they sped,
They knew them well: and in their stead
Unto the house of each one nought
Save ashes and the urn is brought.
For Ares, trafficker in death,
Who holds his scales mid fields of strife,
All charred from Ilion bartereth
Aches for flesh, and dust for life.
With brief and bitter freight both fill
Each slender urn, that men may tell
How this was wise in warrior skill,
How this in battle nobly fell—
"All for another's lady light!"
Though hushed the murmurs, all may hear,
And stifled wrath and hate requite
The lords that bought revenge so dear,
And some that lie in Trojan mould
About the ramparts where they fell,
Far hence, in fastless beauty hold
O'er foemen's earth their sentinel.

We quote this passage because it illustrates the merits of Mr. Davis' simple method, and also because it shows that he has made good use of Headlam's scholarship. When we turn to his blank verse we are less satisfied. It is often dull and undistinguished, and although, its author claims, it has at least the merit of lucidity, we venture to think that in a translator of Aeschylus lucidity is a poor substitute for fire, imagination, beauty and variety and life.

J. T. SHEPPARD.

OLD-FASHIONED WIDOW'S SONG

She handed me a gay bouquet
Of roses pulled in the rain,
Delicate beauties frail and cold
Could roses heal my pain?

She smiled: "Ah, c'est un triste temps!"
I laughed and answered "Yes,"
Pressing the roses in my palms.
How could the roses guess?

She sang, "Madame est seule?" Her eye
Snapped like a rain-washed berry.
How could the solemn roses tell
Which of us was more merry?

She turned to go: she stopped to chat:
"Adieu," at last she cried.
"Mille mercis pour ces jolies fleurs!"...
At that the roses died.

The petals drooped, the petals fell,
The leaves hung crisped and curled.
And I stood holding my dead bouquet
In a dead world.

ELIZABETH STANLEY.
THE WISDOM OF OUR ANCESTORS

IMMEDIATE EXPERIENCE AND MEDITATION: AN INAUGURAL LECTURE DELIVERED BEFORE THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD, 20 NOVEMBER, 1919, BY HAROLD H. JOACHIM, WYKES PROFESSOR OF LOGIC. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1s. 6d. net.)

PROFESSOR JOACHIM, who has succeeded Cook Wilson as Professor of Logic at Oxford, is chiefly known to the philosophical public in this country through his work on Spinoza and his book on the nature of truth. His writing is characterized always by modesty and candour: if his faith is unshakeable, that arises, not from self-confidence, but from reverence for the great men who have preceded him in holding the same opinions. The truth in philosophy, he apparently believes, is known: it is adumbrated in Plato, contained with some admixture of obscurity and error in Aristotle, and finally revealed to the world in the pages of Hegel. It is, therefore, not the business of a philosopher to seek new truth; his business is, rather, to defend our heritage against the attacks of erring innovators. Accordingly he disclaims, in his inaugural lecture, any novelty of method or result. "Nor is there," he tells us, "anything original in what I have to say. It is old, and perhaps for that reason apt to be forgotten and worth reviving."

The question chosen by Professor Joachim is the question in what sense, if any, our knowledge can be divided into two parts, one consisting of premises known by their immediate evidence, the other consisting of conclusions drawn from these premises according to the rules of logical inference. He quotes Aristotle and Descartes in support of this opinion, and then proceeds to give his own grounds for rejecting it, especially in the case of mathematical axioms and the so-called "laws of thought." He accuses Aristotle of inconsistency in maintaining that immediate premises must be immediate premises in the texture of knowledge and at the same time holding the views which he advocates as to the relation of premises to conclusion:

For if, as he steadily insists, the demonstrated conclusion is the fulfilment of its premises; if it is their realization, in which alone they attain their full significance: they cannot be self-contained, self-evident truths in their isolation.

He goes on to say that the process of mediation "is the unfolding of a germ—a natural development or growth; and there is, so to say, nothing in it which comes out at the end as it went in at the beginning. This depends upon the view which he shares with all Hegelians, that relations modify their terms, so that a proposition after it has been proved by its relation to certain premises is not the same proposition as it was when we first began to seek a proof of it. Similarly if you go to see a friend you cannot hope to find him, since your seeing him will change him. This is a useless doctrine, by the help of which much can be proved.

It is curious that Professor Joachim nevertheless admits, as a matter of practice, that there are fundamental principles, both in logic and in the special sciences, in a sense which has been abandoned both by students of modern logic and by men of science: "I doubt not anything could be intelligible, and there would be no same reasoning, unless there were certain conditions sine qua non of being and of Truth to which any and every fact and conjunction of facts, and any and every reasoning, are bound to conform. The unshakable, namely, for each special science or body of knowledge, there are certain more special and concrete conditions—conditions sine qua non of the intelligible, quasi-individual, wholes of Space, of Number, of Life, of Political Society.

He proceeds to a somewhat unfortunate instance:

Nevertheless, the evidence for such an axiom as that "two straight lines cannot enclose a space" is clearly overwhelming. Deny it—even doubt it—and the whole of plane geometry comes tumbling about your ears; and who shall say where the wreckage will stop, or what department of our knowledge would survive?

It is probable that (with the exception of Lhasa) there is no other university in the world where these words could have been written by a Professor of Logic. It has been known for over 60 years that the axiom in question is in no way necessary to plane geometry, and that without it self-consistent systems can be constructed which there is no reason, either empirical or a priori, to suppose false. On this all competent authorities have long been agreed; they have only been divided on the question whether the axiom is a mere convention or an empirical generalization known to have a certain approximate truth. The former view has increasingly prevailed; and Einstein's theory of gravitation has given some ground for supposing that Euclid's is not even the most convenient convention. Of all this, however, there is no hint in Aristotle or Hegel; therefore Oxford cannot take cognizance of it.

What applies to Euclid's axioms applies with equal force to other general scientific principles. Not one of them is essential to the existence of the science to which it applies. Not one of them has as much certainty as its application. The evidence for a general scientific principle, such as it is, is always derived from the special cases in which it is found to hold. From these it is in err by induction, a process for which, so far, no logical justification has been forthcoming. As for logic and the so-called "Laws of Thought," they are concerned with symbols; they give different ways of saying the same thing. It is for this reason that the truth of logical propositions can be known without studying the things to which they apply. The proposition "If Socrates is a man, then Socrates est un homme," can be known without studying Socrates, by merely knowing the English and French languages. In logical propositions it is the syntax, not the vocabulary, that is translated, but it remains the case that only an understanding of the language is necessary in order to know a proposition of logic.

Logic has made, during the last 60 years, greater advances than in the whole previous history of mankind. These advances have all been made by men whose training was predominantly scientific or mathematical, and have been opposed or ignored by orthodox philosophers. Three different directions may be mentioned in which work of fundamental importance has been done. (1) The mathematical logicians have revolutionized the technical formulation and procedure of logic, producing an instrument as much more powerful than the syllogism as an Atlantic liner is more powerful than a rowing boat. (2) The physicist, by destroying the confines of space, time and matter, have made visible the dependence of traditional philosophy upon many indefensible common-sense prejudices. (3) The psychologists, who derive their inspiration from biology and physiology, have thrown a flood of light upon the conception of meaning, which has hitherto been treated by philosophers in connexion with irrelevant ethical and quasi-theological conceptions. An understanding of these three kinds of modern work is indispensable to the student of logic. But official academic philosophy, now as at the time of the Renaissance, is engaged in the endeavour to keep alive an antiquated technique, and to ignore the new knowledge which is rendering old problems trivial. Philosophy is associated traditionally with two studies with which it has no essential affinity, namely, theology and Greek. If it is to become vital in our universities, it must come to be associated instead with science. But it would be almost as difficult to effect such a change as to carry through the Social Revolution.

B. R.

A series of public lectures on "The Life of the Ancient Greeks and Romans," will be given at University College, Gover Street, every Friday, at 5.30 p.m. Beginning on January 16.
EARLY SEMITIC MIGRATIONS
THE EMPIRE OF THE AMORITES. By A. T. Clay. Yale Oriental Series, Researches, Vol. VI. (Yale University Press. 10s. 6d. net.)

WITH every sympathy towards research in new paths, an innate conservatism on this side of the Atlantic predisposes Englishmen against iconoclastic theories until they are well attested. Professor Clay sets forth in his preface his purpose of offering additional evidence to his previous thesis "Amurru," of showing that Ur of the Chaldees was very probably the capital of the Amorite Empire," and of demonstrating "that the generally accepted theory of the Arabian origin of the Semites is utterly baseless." When, however, on p. 30 he says that it is not his purpose to discuss or attempt to decide between contending scientists concerning the ultimate origin and gradual formation of the Semitic race, its separation from the so-called Hamito-Semitic race, the millenniums required to develop the striking racial difference, the conditions under which Semitic characters developed, and all other anthropological inquiries concerning the origin of Semitic society, how is the perplexed reader to understand him? To the present writer the two purposes are at variance: you cannot demonstrate that the Arabian origin is baseless, if you are not prepared to discuss all theories of the origin of the Semites. Any consideration of the migrations of primeval and early Semites demands a wide range of reading, and unless a scholar proposes to consider the problem from all points of view, his work must necessarily be one-sided. It is like playing a tune on the piano with one finger at a concert. When Professor Clay says that "the evidence of the early existence of the Amorites, as well as the proof of the futility of the Arabian theory, depends largely upon a study of names of countries, cities, temples, deities and persons," he closes his watertight compartments, and the conservative (but inquiring) mind wants to know captiously what other sciences say. He has, it is true, discussed to a certain extent some of the books which touch on these other subjects remote from those in which his own reputation was made, but has not, as it seems to us, a sufficiently close acquaintance with the original authorities for anthropology, ethnology, archaeology, or geography to carry out his investigations to full advantage. He admits the problems, but by his narrower thesis omits for a proper and full discussion, for instance, of the evidence of pre-dynastic Egyptian connection with Arabia, such as the admirable work of Petrie, Reisner, and Elliot Smith demands; or the effect of Sorgi's theory of a Mediterranean race; or of the invention of copper implements or the history of pottery; or of the question of the so-called Armenoid grafting on the Semitic stock which resulted apparently in the luxuriant beard of the Northern Semites.

These are but a few of the essentials of the complex data which must be considered before any conclusion approximating to scientific demands can be reached; and we do not believe that a scholar can be satisfactorily equipped for an answer until he has seen something of the countries themselves.

The archeology of the earliest inhabitants of the narrow tube of the Mesopotamian delta goes far to throw a glimmering of light on their early migrations. According to our present knowledge the earliest people there of whom we know the name were of the same stock as the Elamites who had originally migrated to the western border of Persia from Anan, east of the Caspian. These must have come down to the very south of Babylonia, between the Euphrates marshes and the Persian Gulf, from the Persian highlands as far west as they could stretch towards the north Arabian deserts. De Morgan assigns the date of their existence in Susa to about the fifth millennium B.C., and the pottery discovered by the present writer in Southern Babylonia (Eridu and Ur) can hardly have been begun at a much later period. These Babylonian Elamites were ousted about the end of the fourth millennium by the Sumerians, an entirely different race, who can therefore hardly be regarded as the same line as the Elamites with whom they were constantly at war; nor do De Morgan's earlier researches in the Caucasus offer any trustworthy hope that their origin is to be found in that direction. King was of opinion, when he wrote his History of Sumer and Akkad, that they had come over from the Eastern side; but there seems to be some ground for the view that they were in occupation of Kalah Sherghat at an early date, and if so it is conceivable that they followed the Tigris down for some of its length having come in north of the Elamites. There are many possibilities.

Contemporary with these Sumerians in historic times we find a Semitic race occupying Northern Babylonia, and so effectively blocking the entrance to the south by the river routes that the Sumerians die out for lack of successive immigrants. Clearly these Semites cannot have entered the river valleys from the south, for the Elamites and the Sumerians must have been in sturdy occupation there. Also it would be expected that the southernmost remains would show Semitic traces, which is not the case. They must therefore have entered above the Sumerians by some west, north-west, or northern direction, certainly at least by the fourth millennium. If therefore we could find evidence of an original and early civilization in the district which Professor Clay labels Amurru (from the Mediterranean sea eastwards across the Empire about the latitude of Cyprus) we should be inclined to admit the possibilities of the theory that an empire of Amurru existed here even to the fifth millennium, as demanded by him. But there is no reason to believe in such an early empire or civilization in this part, in our view. Professor Clay himself admits that there is no evidence of any native Amorite script, and surely, when the Babylonians were using a writing far earlier than any other Semites, it is not too much to postulate that "the great empire of the Amorites" should display an equal civilization. To suggest, as Professor Clay does, that the Amorites had a script of their own, which has now been lost on account of its having been used on perishable materials and in that case. Similarly, when he says that excavations have not been conducted as yet in the land of the Amorites except in Palestine, and "this is the least important part of the Empire of the Amorites," we are again not inclined to trust ourselves to evidence still underground, if any exists. Least of all do we like the equivalence of Amurru (=AWR) =Ur (of the Chaldees). Amurru may have been represented in late Aramaic doockets as AWR, but to maintain that the Hebrew Ur (written AWR) of the Chaldees has anything to do with it demands a tremendous battery of proof, and we are not satisfied that the author has produced it.

Leaving aside the question of the Amurru civilization and empire and its extreme age, however, we have to reckon certainly on some occupation by the Northern Semites in some such district as that in question, as has long been known. The linguistic and physical differences between the Northern and Southern Semites are so great that it is obvious that the parent stock divided a long time ago, but whether such a cleavage took place gradually and successively, or often, or suddenly, it is impossible to decide. The history of the migrations of Shammar and Aniazah in the eighteenth century A.D. perhaps affords a parallel. That such early divisions could be considered in terms of civilization or empire is exceedingly problematical; the Semites are a receptive race and very quick. to adopt benefits from their neighbours, and it may well be that throughout their history from the very beginning we should seek parallels to the absorbed culture of both early Babylonians and the Caliphs of Baghdad.

Professor Clay's book thus gives the Orientalist much to consider, even from its somewhat limited view of the case. It shows a great amount of work by a scholar versed in cuneiform, especially the older script, but its subject must of necessity be dealt with almost entirely from scattered evidence in very many branches of learning. As, however, any estimate of this result can be but a personal opinion, we can only reiterate the opening sentence of this review.

R. CAMPBELL THOMPSON.

THE UNDENIABLE SHIVER

Six Ghost Stories. By Sir Thomas Graham Jackson, R.A
(Murray. 6s. net.)
A Thin Ghost, and Others. By Montague Rhodes James.
(Arnold. 4s. 6d. net.)

In its higher branches, fiction—which by what we mean ultimately both its writers and its readers—has become so self-conscious, especially within the last twenty years, that it is in danger of ceasing to be an art. The one good reason for writing a novel—that you have a story to tell—is overgrown and choked by irrelevant considerations. Sociology, psychology, economics, ethics—extremely interesting subjects when treated by experts—become extremely dull when treated by novelists in the pseudo-scientific manner. Taking the case of the 'psychological' novel, one may trace its dreary proliferation largely to the fact that one or two writers of genius have been psychologically imaginative. But Meredith and Henry James did not write "psychological" novels; having an almost incredibly good story to tell, they tell it. That is the essence of their greatness, as it is the essence of the greatness of Dostoevsky, Balzac and Dickens.

All arts, perhaps, have their origin in a humbler level of production which one may term craftsmanship, as the flower appears in its necessary relation to root, stalk, branch and leaf. The stonemason prepares the way for the sculptor; Beethoven emerges from a background of singing people and existing errand-boys. The craft of story-telling is still piled, among us, and here sap that fails to reach the upper branches still flowing vigorously, in fiction which does not quite touch the level of art, but is more closely related to it than is usually acknowledged. We may call it the literature of sensation, and assign the volumes before us to this class.

It seems reasonable to ask of a ghost story that it make us shiver; the tales contained in Sir T. G. Jackson's book do not achieve this end, even in so willing and easy a victim as the present reviewer. Ghosts, people and things, all are sawn here out of the same neutral material. The author's aptitude to strike the wrong note is sufficiently illustrated by the motto on the title-page: Dulce est despere in loco. The critical wink and smile are needed to assure us that the narrator does not take his fictions very seriously; he can expect no more of his readers.

The undeniable shiver these six ghost stories fail to give us is provoked by Dr. James's book, which is quite another pair of dead men's shoes. In the five stories of "A Thin Ghost, and Others," Dr. James has used once more the kind of settings with which the "Ghost Stories of an Antiquary" familiarized us; and not less felicitously here than in the earlier collections. His sureness of touch in describing or suggesting his stage accessories has a preliminary effect upon the reader, most favourable to the production of the state of mind he wishes to bring about. The repairs in the Cathedral at Southminster, the auction-room in which Mr. Poynter's manuscript diary was sold, the ecclesiastical atmosphere of the residence at Whit-
PICTURES AND PORTRAITS

Personalities. Twenty-four drawings by Edmond X. Kapp.
(Secer. 21s. net boards, 68s. net cl.)

THERE are two buildings on the same promontory of pavement, washed by the same incessant tide—the National Gallery and the National Portrait Gallery. In order to enter either it is only necessary to pass through a turnstile, and, on some days of the week, to part with a sixpenny bit. But always, on the paving stone at the doorway, it seems as if the pressure of humanity glued you to its side. As easily might a pitchfork leap from the shawl and join the free spirits of dolphins as a single individual ascend those steps and enter those doors. The current of the crowd, so swift and deep, the omnibuses swimming bravely on the surface, here a little string of soldiers caught in an eddy, there a hearse, next a pantenchnicon van, then the discreet coach of royalty, followed by a black cell upon wheels with a wander at the grating,—all this, floated along in a stream of sound at once continuous and broken up into a kind of rough music, makes it vain to think of pictures. They are too still, too silent.

It would never occur to anyone with a highly developed plastic sense to think of painting as the silent art. Yet that perhaps is at the root of the ordinary English regard for portraits. There they hang as if the passage of centuries had left them indifferently. In private stress or public disaster we can wring no message from them. What they see across the room I am not sure: perhaps some gondola in Venice hundreds of years ago. But let who can and will indulge his fancy thus; the little token, the penny bunch of violets brought in from the street, is silently rejected. Our loves, our desires, the moment's eagerness, the passing problem, receive no sort of sympathy or solution. Under the solemn stare we fade and dwindle and dissolve. Yet it cannot be denied that our resurrection, should it come to pass, is singularly august. We rise, purged and purified; deprived, it is true, of a tongue, but free from the impertinences and solicitations of that too animated and active member. The silence is hollow and vast as that of a cathedralseome. After the first shock and chill those used to deal in words seek out the pictures with the least of language about them—canvases taciturn and congealed like emerald or aquamarine—landscapes hollowed from transparent stone, green hillsides, skies in which the clouds are eternally at rest. Let us wash the roofs of our eyes in colour; let us dive till the deep seas close above our heads. That these sensations are not aesthetic becomes evident soon enough, for, after a prolonged dumb gaze, the very paint on the canvas begins to distil itself into words—sluggish, slow-dropping words that would, if they could, stain the page with colour; not writers' words, but it is not our business to define what sort of words they are; we are only concerned to prove our unfitness to review the caricatures of Mr. Kapp. His critics are all agreed that he combines the gifts of the artist with those of the caricaturist. We have nothing to say of the artist, but having the National Portrait Gallery in mind, perhaps it may not be presumptuous to approach him from that point of view.

It needs an effort, but scarcely a great one, to enter the National Portrait Gallery. Sometimes indeed an urgent desire to identify one among the dead sends us post haste to its portals. The case we have in mind is that of Mrs. John Stuart Mill. Never was there such a paragon among women. Noble, magnanimous, inspired, thinker, reformer, saint, she possessed every gift and every virtue. One thing alone she lacked, and that, no doubt, the National Portrait Gallery could supply. She had no face. But the National Portrait Gallery, interrogated, wished to be satisfied that the inquirer was dependent upon a soldier; pensions they provided, not portraits; and thus set adrift in Trafalgar Square once more the student might reflect upon the paramount importance of faces. Without a face Mrs. John Stuart Mill was without a soul. Had her husband spared three lines of eulogy to describe her personal appearance we should hold her in memory. Without eyes or hair, cheeks or lips, her stupendous genius, her consummate virtue, availed her nothing. She is a mist, a wraith, a misma of anonymous merit. The face is the thing. Therefore we turn eagerly, though we have paused too long about it, to see what faces Mr. Kapp provides for the twenty-three gentlemen and the one old lady whom he calls "Persons of importance."

There is very little of the anonymous about any of the twenty-four. There is scarcely a personality, from Mr. Bernard Shaw to Mrs. Grundy, whom we have not seen in the flesh. We turn the pages, therefore, to see not what their bodies look like, but whether Mr. Kapp can add anything to our estimate of their souls. We look, in particular, at the portraits of Lord Morley and of Mr. Bernard Shaw. Years ago Lord Morley shook the hand that writes these words. Whether he was Chief Secretary for Ireland or Prime Minister of England was a matter of complete indifference to a child; a child, presumably, was less than nothing whatever to him. But his manner—cordial, genial, quick, as if stepping forward from a genuine impulse of friendliness—has never ceased to shed lustre upon every mention of his name. Where is the handshake in Mr. Kapp's portrait? The lean, smoke-dried pedant's face looks as if scored upon paper by a pen clogged and corroded, as pens are in advertisements, with old ink. It may be so; to Mr. Kapp it must be so: the handshake, perhaps, could only be rendered by a wash of sepia, which would have spoiled the picture as a work of art. Then there is Mr. Bernard Shaw. Gazing from the gallery of some dismal gas-lit hall, one has seen him, often enough, alert, slight, erect, as if combating in his solitary person the forces of inertia and stupidity massed in a sea upon the floor. On a nearer glance, he appeared much of a knight-crant, cadid, indeed innocent of aspect; a Don Quixote born in the Northern mists—shrewd, that is to say, rather than romantic. Mr. Kapp has the legendary version—the diabolic, Moustache and eyebrows are twisted into points. The fingers are contorted into stamping hooves. There is no hint of blue in the eye. But again one must remember the limitations of black and white. It is a question of design, texture, handwriting, the relation of this with that, of art in short, which we pass by with our eyes shut. When we know little or nothing about the subject, and thus have no human or literary susceptibilities to place, the effect is far more satisfactory. That "The Physician" (Mr. Masterman) has the long body cut into segments and the round face marked with alarming black bars of the Oak Eggar caterpillar, we find it easy and illuminating to believe. There is something sinister about him; he swarms rapidly across roads; he smudges when crushed; he devours leaf after leaf. "The Bishop" (the Bishop of Norwich) is equally symbolical. He is emitting something sonorous through an oblong slit of a mouth; you can almost hear the heavy particle descending through the upper stories of the elongated countenance until it pops with a hollow click out of the orifice. The Duke of Devonshire for all the world resembles a seal skulking from the sea; his mouth pursed to a button signifies a desire for mackerel. But the mackerel he is offered is not fresh, and, tossing himself wearily backwards, he flops with a yawning into the depths. By what sleight of hand Mr. Kapp has conveyed the fact that the golden thread extracted by Sir Henry Wood from the sound of the Queen's Hall Orchestra is really a hair from his soup we do not know. The truth of the suggestion, however unpleasant, is undeniable. But words, words! How inadequate you are! How weary one gets of you! You will always be saying too much or too little! Oh to be silent! Oh to be a painter! Oh (in short) to be Mr. Kapp! — V. W.

A WORDSWORTH ANTHOLOGY

WORDSWORTH: AN ANTHOLOGY. Edited, with a Preface, by T. J. Cobden-Sanderson. (R. Cobden-Sanderson. 8s. 6d. net.)

To regard Wordsworth critically, impersonally, is to some of us a rather difficult matter. With the disintegration of the solid orthodoxies Wordsworth became for many intelligent liberal-minded families the Bible of that sort of pantheism, that dim faith in the existence of a spiritual world, which filled, somewhat inadequately, the place of the older dogmas. Brought up as children in the Wordsworthian tradition, we were taught to believe that a Sunday walk among the hills was somehow equivalent to church-going; the First Lesson was to be read among the clouds, the Second in the primroses; the birds and the running waters sang hymns, and the whole blue landscape preached a sermon of moral evil and of good.' From this dim religious education we brought away a not very well-informed veneration for the name of Wordsworth, a dutiful conviction about the spirituality of Nature in general, and an extraordinary superstition about mountains in particular—a superstition that it took at least three seasons of Alpine Sports to dissipate entirely. Consequently, on reaching men's estate, when we actually came to read our Wordsworth, we found it extremely difficult to apprehend his greatness, so many veils of preconceived ideas had to be pushed aside, so many inveterate deflections of vision allowed for. However, it became possible at last to look at Wordsworth as a detached phenomenon in the world of ideas and not as part of the family tradition of childhood.

Like many philosophers, and especially philosophers of a mystical tinge of thought, Wordsworth based his philosophy on his emotions. The conversion of emotions into intellectual terms is a process that has been repeated a thousand times in the history of the human mind. We feel a powerful emotion before a work of art, therefore it partakes of the divine, is a reconstruction of the idea of which the object is a reflection. Love moves us deeply, therefore human love is a type of divine love. Nature in her various aspects inspires us with fear, joy, contentment, despair, therefore nature is a soul that expresses anger, sympathy, love and hatred. One could go on indefinitely multiplying examples of the way in which man objectifies the kingdoms of heaven and hell that are within him. The process is often a dangerous one. The mystic who feels within himself the stirrings of inenarrable emotions is not content with these emotions as they are in themselves. He feels it necessary to invent a whole cosmogony that will account for them. To him this philosophy will be true, in so far as it is an expression in intellectual terms of these emotions. But to those who do not know these emotions at first hand, it will be simply misleading. The mystical emotions have what may be termed a conduct value; they enable the man who feels them to live his life with a serenity and confidence unknown to other men. But the philosophical terms in which these emotions are expressed have not necessarily any truth value. This mystical philosophy will be valuable only in so far as it revives, in the minds of its students, those conduct-affecting emotions which originally gave it birth. Accepted at its intellectual face value, such a philosophy may not only have no worth; it may be actually harmful.

Into this beautifully printed volume Mr. Cobden-Sanderson has gathered together most of the passages in Wordsworth's poetry which possess the power of reviving the emotions that inspired them. It is astonishing to find that they fill the best part of two hundred and fifty pages, and that there are still plenty of poems—"Peter Bell!" for example—that one would like to see included. "The Prelude" yields a rich tribute of what our ancestors would have called "beauties." There is that astonishing passage in which the poet describes how, as a boy, he rowed by moonlight across the lake:

And, as I rose upon the stroke, my bote
Went heaving through the water like a swan;
When, from behind that craggy steep still then
The horizon's bound, a huge peak, black and huge.
As if with voluntary power instinc
Uperced its head, I struck and struck again,
And growing still in stature the grim shape
Towered rough and me and the stars, and still,
For so it seemed, with purpose of its own
And measured motion, like a living thing,
Strode after me.

There is the history of that other fearful moment when I heard among the solitary hills
Low breathings coming after me, and sounds
Of undistinguishable motion, and scene
Almost as silent as the turf they trod.

And there are other passages telling of nature in less awful and menacing aspects, nature the giver of comfort and strong serenity. Reading these we are able in some measure to live for ourselves the emotions that were Wordsworth's. If we can feel his "shadowy exaltations," we have got all that Wordsworth can give us. There is no need to read the theology of his mysticism, the pantheistic explanation of his emotions. To Peter Bell a primrose by a river's brink was only a yellow primrose. Its beauty stirred in him no feeling. But one can be moved by the sight of the primrose without necessarily thinking, in the words of Mr. Cobden-Sanderson's preface, of "the infinite tenderness of the infinitely great, of the infinitely great which, from out the infinite and amid its own stupendous tasks, stoops to strove in man, the infinitely little, with sunshine and with flowers." This is the theology of our primrose emotion. But it is the emotion itself which is important, not the theology. The emotion has its own powerful conduct value, whereas the philosophy derived from it, suspiciously anthropocentric, possesses, we should imagine, only the smallest value as truth.

A. L. H.

IRELAND THE OUTPOST, By Grenville A. J. Cole. (Oxford University Press. 3s. 6d. net.)—We have become much accustomed of late to hearing disputed historical and political questions decided (to the satisfaction of the decider) by an appeal to the verdict of this or that science. The Middle Ages were wont to appeal to the theological verdict interpreted in a national sense. Thus the French chronicler would write of "Gesta Dei per Francos," "the doings of God—with the assistance of the French," and in our own day we have heard something of the same kind, though with a significant shifting of the emphasis: "Gesta Germaniae per Deum," "the doings of Germany—with the assistance of God." But the modern appeal is more usually to one or other of the natural or political sciences, biology, anthropology, political economy or the like. The present writer calls in geology. And the Muse Geologia rises to the occasion and shows herself a good Unionist.

For, so far as this pamphlet is something more than an interesting and valuable statement of the geological structure of Ireland and an ingenious account of the course of Irish history, it is an attempt to suggest that the present political relation between Ireland and England is a necessary corollary of the geographical relation between Ireland and Europe. This is not a very convincing argument, since obviously it is not Ireland alone, but the British Isles that are the outpost of Europe, and, if geology is to determine political arrangements, those islands should be governed by a dominant European Power.
DRAGONFLIES

BLINDMAN. By Ethel Colburn Mayne. (Chapman & Hall. 7s. net.)

NEW WINE IN OLD BOTTLES. By Eleanor Mordaunt. (Hutchinson. 6s. 9d. net.)

INTERIM. By Dorothy Richardson. (Duckworth. 7s. net.)

ashtra can tell, watching the dragonfly, at what point in its swift angular flight it will suddenly pause and hover, quivering over this or that? The strange little jerk—the quivering moment of suspension—we might almost fancy they were the signs of a minute inward shock of recognition felt by the dragonfly. "There is something here; something here for me. What is it?" it seems to say. And then, at the same instant, it is gone. Away it darts, glancing over the deep pool until another floating water-goose but or tangle of shadowy weed attracts it, and again it is still, curious, hovering over.

But this behaviour, enchanting though it may be in the dragonfly, is scarcely adequate when adopted by the writer of fiction. Nevertheless, there are certain modern authors who do not appear to recognize its limitations. For them the whole art of writing consists in the power with which they are able to register that faint inward shock of recognition. Glancing through life they make the discovery that there are certain experiences which are, as it were, peculiarly theirs. There is a quality in the familiarity of these experiences or in their strangeness which evokes an immediate mysterious response—a desire for expression. But now, instead of going any further, instead of attempting to relate their "experiences" to life or to see them against any kind of background, these writers are, as we see them, content to remain in the air, hovering over, as if the thrilling moment were enough and more than enough. Indeed, far from desiring to explore it, it is as though they would guard the secret for themselves as well as for us, so that when they do dart away all is as untouched, as unbroken as before.

But what is the effect of this kind of writing upon the reader? How is he to judge the importance of one thing rather than another if each is to be seen in isolation? And is it not rather cold comfort to be offered a share in a secret on the express understanding that you do not ask what the secret is—more especially if you cherish the unconfessed suspicion that the author is no wiser than you, that the author is in love with the secret and would not discover it if he could?

Miss Ethel Colburn Mayne is a case in point. In these short stories which she has published under the title of "Blindman" we have the impression that what she wishes to convey is not the event itself, but what happens immediately after. That is, one might say, her moment—when the party is over and the lights are turned down, but the room is still left just as it was with the chairs in little groups, with somebody’s flowers left to wither, with a scrap of the paper on the floor that somebody has dropped. One might almost fancy that there still lingered in the air the vibration of voices and music—that the mirrors still held the style of shadows that has happened without disturbing anything, without letting in any more light and, as far as possible, adding nothing—that would seem to be the author’s desire. But she is so fearful lest the atmosphere of her story be broken by a harsh word or a loud footfall that she is ever on the point of pulling down another blind, silently locking another door, holding up a warning finger and tip-toeing away until the reader feels himself positively bewildered. His bewilderment is not decreased by the queer sensation that he shares it with the author and that she would not have it less. "There is something here—something strange..." But does she ever get any nearer to the strange thing than that? We feel that she is so content with the strangeness, with the fascination of just hinting, just suggesting, that she loses sight of all else.

Mrs. Eleanor Mordaunt’s latest book, “Old Wine in New Bottles,” is a collection of short stories likewise. But never, never could she be accused of dropping the bone to grasp the shadow. This is a book without a shadow, without—for all its obese Chinamen, foul opium dens, prostitutes, negroes, criminals, squallid cafes, murders at sea and lecherous Prussian officers—a hint of strangeness. It would be interesting to know Mrs. Eleanor Mordaunt’s opinion of these stories. Are they merely the expression of her contempt for the public taste? We cannot think so. She has catered for it too lavishly, too cunningly—she has even set new dishes before it with unfamiliar spices. But on the other hand she can hardly agree with the publishers’ announcement that these pretentious, preposterous stories are "vibrating with the common passions of humanity." Let us examine one which is typical of them all. It is called “Peepers All.” Rhoda Keyes is a girl in a jam factory. She is beautiful—with her yellow hair... the creamy pillow of her neck, the full curve of her breast in the flimsy blouse, the shapely hips beneath the tight sheath skirt.” She lives with her man, who is a sailor, in a first-floor room opposite a Chinaman’s shop. Every afternoon at five o’clock she comes home, strips to the waist, carefully washes herself, and then changes her clothes before going off for a lark in the street with her pals. Now it happens that the filthy, fat old Chinaman can see into her bedroom, so every afternoon he sits looking through the blind. “More than once he put out the tip of his tongue and licked his lips; the handkerchief on his nose opened and shut.” He is not the only spectator. Unknown to him, his two friends, Fleischmann, a German Jew, in the White Slave Traffic, and Randor, an Eurasian, share the exhibition, and all three of them determine to seduce the innocent, careless, heedless Rhoda. They are repulsed, and in their anger confide in each other and arrange that she shall be lured to the Chinaman’s room and discovered there by her husband. But at the last moment her place is taken by a poor cripple, wearing her hat and coat, who receives the blow meant for Rhoda, and dies murmuring: “Greater love—eh, dearie me, ‘ow does it go, I’ve lost a bit—but summut—summut o’ this sort—ter lay down is life fur—fur the paws.”

We protest that such a story, such a mixture of vulgarity, absurdity and ugliness, is an insult to any public that can spell its letters.

"Interim," which is the latest slice from the life of Miriam Henderson, might almost be described as a nest of short stories. There is Miriam Henderson, the box which holds them all, and really it seems there is no end to the number of smaller boxes that Miss Richardson can make her contain. But "Interim" is a very little one indeed. In it Miriam is enclosed in a Bloomsbury boarding-house, and though she receives, as usual, shock after shock of inward recognition, they are produced by such things as well-browned mutton, gas jets, varnished drawers, mutton, varnished drawers. During her life, hovering, exulting in the familiarity and the strangeness of all that comes within her tiny circle, she leaves us feeling, as before, that everything being of equal importance to her, it is impossible that everything should not be of equal unimportance.

K. M.

The University of Nancy, untouched until the Armistice negotiations were actually in progress, was struck by an incendiary shell on October 31, 1918, and in the resulting conflagration 160,000 volumes were destroyed. A number of the leading British publishing houses have most generously given copies of their publications, thus contributing substantially towards the reconstitution of the British department of the Library. Anyone wishing to supplement these contributions should address the Universities Bureau, 50, Russell Square, W.C.1.
ABRAHAM LINCOLN AS A MYSTIC

ABRAHAM LINCOLN, THE PRACTICAL MYSTIC. By Francis Grierson. With an Introduction by John Drinkwater. (Lane. 5s. net.)

T
HE mystic has this advantage over the metaphysician or the moralist: he cannot be argued with. He sees. A myopic world is informed as to what he sees, and there the matter ends.

Take, for instance, a certain engraving of Blake's for Dante's "Inferno." The engraving represents four fiends with cruel faces torturing a soul in hell. Good! Four fiends with cruel faces torturing a soul in hell: the ordinary non-mystical person examines the engraving, muses vaguely, it may be, on medieval theology, and passes on without an afterthought. Not so the mystic. Mr. Grierson writes:

The face of the chief devil, who is not actually engaged in the torture, but is an eager and interested spectator, might easily be taken for a portrait of the German Emperor. As suggested by W. F. Bourdillon, the familiar upturned moustachios have puzzled Blake in his visit. He represented them as tusks growing from the corners of the mouth—it is to be noted that this fiend alone among the four has tusks.

As evidence of the quality of Mr. Grierson's mystica vision, this quotation might seem sufficient. But as it is irrelevant to the subject of this book, Abraham Lincoln, it may be as well to extract a passage to show how Lincoln himself is illumined by Mr. Grierson's mystical search-light:

Everything is related to everything else. In 1838 a new party came into being headed by the prophet from the wilderness, who was as much a phenomenon in the human world as the comet of that year was in the starry heavens—an apparition first observed by the Florentine astronomer, Donati... Its advent [Donati's comet] was as unexpected as Lincoln [here follows a description of the comet]... Such was the celestial apparition that ushered in the new party which was to support Abraham Lincoln and send him to the White House.

No wonder Mr. Grierson cries, "A mystical epoch is upon us"... no wonder, too, that he is impatient with commonplace attempts to explain Lincoln's achievement: it is futile [he writes] to continue to harp on Lincoln's political acumen, to admire his biographical stories, his judgment of individuals, his poverty, his disregard of the conventional, as causes of his greatness.

We would ask Mr. Grierson one question. Admitting that the appearance of Donati's comet and the appearance of Abraham Lincoln as the leader of a new party were directly related to each other, how does this admission assist us to a better understanding of Abraham Lincoln? No one disputes that, Lincoln was a man of extraordinary genius. Had the moon revealed its hidden side on the day of Lincoln's birth, or, contrariwise, had Donati's comet postponed its arrival till the General Election of 1918, our feeling that Lincoln possessed extraordinary genius would be unaffected. No one wants to be convinced, astronomically or otherwise, that Lincoln was remarkable. It is his portrait, not his horoscope, that we desire.

Mr. Grierson, however, is not a portrait painter. One cannot be everything. Astrologer, mystic, and prophet, when he gets hold of a metaphor he may be relied upon to keep it unixed—for example: "The war has crushed the juice out of the orange on the tree of pleasure, and nothing is left but the peel, over which materialism is slipping to its doom."

H. K. L.

An important reorganisation of architectural societies in Scotland has just been completed. The independent societies which previously existed have united to form the Institute of Scottish Architects, with five Chapters at Glasgow, Edinburgh, Dundee, Aberdeen and Inverness. The first President of the new body is Mr. William Kelly, A.R.S.A., of Aberdeen. The constitution and by-laws have been approved, and the new body has been admitted as an allied society under the provisions of the charter of the Royal Institute of British Architects.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTES

The following books are among recent accessions to the Library of the British Museum:—Augustinus Datus, eloquentiae praecepta, Phil. de Lavagna, Milan, 1475.—Albertus de Eyb, margarita poetica [Stephanus Plannck, Rome], 1430. A handsome folio printed in double columns, and mentioned in the second list of books recorded of the press at Plancck, whose output otherwise consisted almost entirely of small thin quarto.—Salterium latinum, Petrus Levet, Paris, 1488-9.—Auctoritas Aristotelis, Senecae, &c. [Richardus Pafract], Deventer, 1489.—Robertus Gaguinus, de mundissima B.V.M. concepione [Petrus Levet], Paris, "M. cccc. nno... [i.e. 1489 ?]. With a second part, containing the commentary of Carolus Fernandau... [Garcia de Valdavilas, binder]... a cum glossa Monachi Lombardi, Petrus Levet, Paris, 1490. Nothing seems to be known concerning the author of this gloss, several editions of which were printed in France in the fifteenth century. The present is the first copy of any of these to find its way into the Museum Library.—Modus legendi in utroque irre, Petrus Levet, Paris, 1480.—Boethius, de consolatione philosophiae cum commento, Jacobus de Breda, Deventer, 1491.—Jacobus Lupi Rebello, tractatus qui dictatur fructus sacramento poenitentiae, Guido Mercatorius, Paris, "M. cccc. cxiiij" [i.e. 1494].—Vergilii, bacullia cum commento familiarissimo, Henricus Quentell, Cologne, 1485.—Robertus Gaguinus, de mundissima B.V.M. concepione, et alio, ad signum capitii diui Dionysii [for Durandus Gerlier, Paris, c. 1495].—Isidorus de Iosanis, de regnum principum omnium institutis, Petrus Martyr et fratres de Monteageli, Milan [c. 1500].—Historia nuda del bienaventurado doctor san Hieronymo con el libro de su transito, &c., Georgius Coci, Saragossa, 1514. With two woodcuts.—Summa cuiusdam [sic] universi et magnitudinis Margarita confessorum, Seville, 1526.—Enchiridion suum manuale Pratrum Minorum, Joannes Varela, Seville, 1535.—Antonio de Aranda, veridica informacion de la Tierra Santa, Juan de Ayala, Toledo, 1537. With woodcuts.—Fernando Diaz de Valdepeñas, Suma de notas copiosas, J. de Medina, Toledo, 1545.—Juan Ignacio, Historia de la cortes de las Juana de Castilla, Salamanca, 1543.—Thomas Phaer, the regiment of life, Edward Whitchurch, London, 1550.—John Venaesus, a notable oration in defence of the sacrament of the altar, pronounced before the University of Paris in 1537, translated by John Bullingham, John Cawood, London, 1534. The "John Venaesus" of the title-page has not been identified, and the real author is perhaps Bullingham himself.—Fernando de Texeda, Texeda recetxius, or the Spanish monk his bill of divorce against the Church of Rome, T. S. for Robert Mylbourne, London, 1623.—A true Relation of a brave English stragel practised lately upon a sea-town in Galiza, printed for John Outham, London, 1565.—Marchius Polydore, De officiis hominum, Dantisio, Galateo Espanol, or the Spanish gallant, done into English by William Style, E. G. for William Lee, London 1640.—James Holder, the peaman's recreation, or a coppybook newly published, engraved by Edward Cocke, John Overton, London, 1673.—William Congreve, the double dealer, Jacob Tonson, London, 1694, and the old batchelour, Peter Buck, London, 1683. The first edition in each case.

The Supreme Adventure. By Mercedes MacAndrew. (Chapman & Hall. 7s. 6d. net.)—It is not easy to see why people should want to rewrite the Gospels. They have been criticized as history, but they are above criticism as literature. Visionaries like Sister Katherine Emmerich, who have seen the Passion re-enacted in trances, have won the attention even of sceptical critics by the vividness of their experiences, and George Moore has claimed the licence of genius to produce a Fifth Gospel which captures the charm, but loses the majesty, of the original four. But it would be more within the power of the author of "The Supreme Adventure to write a commentary on the life of Christ than to write a "new" version of the Gospels. Mr. MacAndrew would have found ample scope in that. When St. John says of Judas at the Last Supper, "He then, having received the sop, went out straightway; and it was night," nothing is really gained by adding "And night, and night, black night, within the heart of that 'son of perdition,'" which is a sample of the author's way of writing.
BOOK SALES

On Tuesday, December 16, Messrs Sotheby sold exceedingly choice, rare and valuable books from the Britwell Court Library, the chief prices being: Shakespeare, Venus and Adonis, 1599; The Passionate Pilgrim, 1599; Sir J. Davies and C. Marlow, Epigrammas, n.d. (1598), in one volume, from the Lamott Hall Library, £3,100; Nothing, 1600, £1,400. King Richard III., 1594, £2,000 (this is the foundation play of Shakespeare's drama). Comedies, Histories and Tragedies, 1623, £2,360; Shakespeare's Tragedies, £4,200.

The total of the sale was £110,356.

On Wednesday, December 17, and the two following days, Messrs Sotheby sold a large portion of printed books, including the property of the late Mr. P. F. Pittar, the late Mr. James Howell, the Earl Waldegrave, and his Honor Judge Granger, the chief prices being: Burns, autograph MS. of his poem The Bonnie Monarch, £1,153. Shakespeare, five autograph letters, £95. Rimel, his holograph will with four codicils, £255. Seven rare Elizabethan tracts formerly in the library of Gabriel Harvey, £780. Peele, G., Merry Conceited Jests, n.d. (1620) £108. Shelley, autograph MS. of his ode To the Cuckoo, £1,475. Baths, autograph MS. of his essay On the Life and Writings of John S. of Oxford and Wynkyn de Worde, £255. Martyn, P., The Decades of the Newe World, 1588, £100. Chaucer, Kelmscott Press edition, 1896, £363. Alken, H., National Sports 1821, £150. A collection of the works of Banyan in 47 lots, £225. Horne French, 18th-century MS., £235. A present writer read it greedily from cover to cover, and sympathized with Dr. James: he was in the sale-room when St. Margaret's Gospel were sold, and had not enough money to buy them, cheap as they went. The only return we can make to the author is to suggest an amendment on p. 9. "Hernogius" must surely be Juvencus, the Base reader to whom we owe the first edition of most of the works of Bede. We wonder whether the story of the Eton Athanasius will help in tracing the "vetusta, obscura, lectu difficilia, interdum etiam depravata, perverse scripta" ninth- to tenth-century MSS. of Bede from which he printed the hymns and scientific treatises of which he claims to be the only author. The story of the dispersion of manuscripts is a sad one, but we in England have on the whole rather profited by it, and many of our own treasures sold abroad at the Reformation returned in the next few years. The series of "Helps for Students of History" has several useful and well-written handbooks on its list, but none more inspiring to the beginner in the study of manuscripts: it warns him of the importance of little things.
what satisfactory answer could be returned to the objection. Here we have the first glimpse of the remarkable combination of qualities with which it was found necessary to dowser the aether. The mathematical examination of the properties of the aether, undertaken by such men as Xavier, Cauchy, Poisson, Green, was continually leading to queer and unsatisfactory results, unsatisfactory, that is, in the light of our experience of the properties of matter. Cauchy, in particular, deduced a number of remarkable physical properties which were irreconcilable with one another, although one of his theories, that of the aether considered as a kind of fluid, accounted for most of the known facts.

With the rise of Maxwell's electromagnetic theory, the elastic solid aether received less attention. Maxwell himself, in his great treatise, gives no mechanical explanation of his theory; he merely shows that an infinite number of mechanical explanations are possible. With the publication of Einstein's first principle of relativity in 1905, however, the aether began to disappear; and now, with the generalized theory of relativity, it has become a mere ghost. There are still sturdy champions of the aether, and, indeed, it seems a pity to have to abandon the mechanical explanations it promised. But possibly the attempt to find dynamical explanations of this kind doomed to failure; perhaps, after all, nature is not flexible enough, and we cannot say what a science is in another direction. It is towards a more abstract class of theories altogether—those which tell us nothing about the mechanism of a process, but tell us the principles the process must obey. Such theories effect a vast unification of knowledge. They are magnificently comprehensive, and it is possible that they contain all that we can really know, although men will long be reluctant to abandon all hope of ever approaching reality with the intimacy that the theory of the aether seemed to promise.

S.

SOCITIES

ARTHISTOTELIAN.—December 15.—Professor A. X. Whitehead in the chair.—Dr. G. E. Moore read a paper on "External and Internal Relations". The most important part of what is meant by: those who say that no relations are purely external seems to be the proposition that every relational property belongs necessarily to every term to which it belongs in part. This proposition is false, the truth being that some only and not all relational properties belong necessarily to the terms which possess them. To say that the property P belongs necessarily to the subject S is to say that from the proposition holding in general, it follows that if A is opposite to B, then A is necessarily opposite to B. And this has been falsely taken to be true of every P and every S, because it is in fact true that from the proposition "S is P" it follows that any term A which has not got P is true, and it follows that A is numerically different from S. And this has been falsely taken to be true of every P and every S, because it is in fact true that from the proposition "S is P" it follows that any term A which has not got P, if true, then the conjunction "q is true and r false" must be false, and compared with the proposition that, if p is true, then the conjunction "q is true and r false" is necessarily false in the sense that r follows from q. From this, the proposition that, if p is true, then the conjunction "q is true and r false" it follows that "q is true and r false" it does not follow that, if p is true, then r follows from q.

GEOLOGICAL.—December 17.—Mr. G. W. Lampugh, President, in the chair.

The Secretary read a communication (received from the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies) from Brigadier-General G. J. John, on address to the Secretary for Defence, Melbourne, and describing a severe earthquake-shock experienced in Holland on the morning of May 7, 1919. The General wrote: "Ordinary earth-tremors are of such common occurrence here that they do not even draw comment. But during the exceptionally wet season, there had been a marked absence of "gouirys" (as the natives call these shocks) for several weeks. Whether the shock, in question was the result of the long-drawn energy thereby consumed, or not, is a fact that is not more likely to come up more or less in the immunity. The morning of the 7th was marked by an extraordinary vivid sunrise, and many natives affirmed that the vivid colour in the sky foretold the earthquake. None of them, however, appear to have actually felt the shock, which was not felt very severely on Canaanula Hill, outside Rakah, upon the summit of which Government House is built. The two portions of the building, connected by a wide gangway, rocked in opposite directions, until persons on the veranda had all the sensations of being tossed about in a gale at sea... When the earthquake subsided, most of the houses built on the hill presented an extraordinary appearance, the supports being tilted at all angles. Heavy 1000-gallon tanks were rolled over like toys, and our Government Printing Office was completely wrecked. These earthquakes appear to be closely associated with the volcanic belt in this region, and the earthquake on the 7th was followed by great activity in the sulphur-springs at the foot of Mount Mather, the green fumes spreading over the town of about 6,000. A vivid wave of some magnitude was experienced at Kokopo, where the s.s. "Niva" was compelled to pull hastily to sea, so as not to be swept on to the beach."

The Secretary then read a communication from Dr. Reginald Lumjumpire concerning a raised bench at South Hill, St. Helier (Jersey) of which a description was originally published by the late Dr. Andrew Dunlop in J. G. S. vol. xix. (1903) pp. 523-5.

In the absence of Professor S. James Aylard, his paper entitled "The yacht in Western Persia" was read by Mr. R. D. Oldham, The President, Sir Jethro Fedd and Professor W. W. Wat. offered some observations on the paper.

A cast of an Italian silver issue medal of Leonello Pio, Count of Capri, dating from about A.D. 1509, and bearing on its reverse a design representing a volcano in eruption (Vesuvius), was exhibited by Mr. C. Davies Shepherd.

ROYAL NUMISMATIC.—December 18.—Sir Henry H. Howorth, Vice-President, in the chair.

Mr. G. F. Hill read a paper entitled "The Mint of Crosgaull Abbey," by Dr. George Macdonald, who was unable to be present. Recent excavations at Crosgaull "(Gravegill)," the monastery in Ayrshire, founded in 1224, and endowed by the Scottish kings with extraordinary privileges, resulted in the discovery in a latrine-drain of a large number of small objects, some of a miscellaneous character, some of a narrowly restricted nature. A portion of a mint: large quantities of small tags of brass, needles, portions of thin sheets, etc., as well as objects and pieces of copper and lead, together with 107 coins of billon, bronze or copper and brass. The coins are (a) contemporary imitations of pennies of James III, 1323-4, and of various kings, of James IV, including 20 which are combination of the obverse of one type with the reverse of another; (b) 31 copper pennies bearing a cross on one side and a regal orb on the other; and the (c) 46 foreign coins. The importance of these findings is increased by the fact that the coins have been found in Scotland, though they have hitherto been attributed to one or other James of Aragon. They were clearly minted at Crosgaull, the types having a punning significance. They and the farthing are the only known instances in Great Britain of an abbey coinage, such as is very frequent on the Continent, e.g., at Chivy. The inscription "Moneta Pauperum" shows that the coins were intended to provide small change for the special benefit of the poor, like the seventeenth-century tokens. The mint was possibly suppressed by James IV. In the discussion that followed, Mr. C. R. Peers, Mr. Lawrence, Mr. Gruber, Miss Farquhar, Colonel Morrison and Sir Henry Howorth took part.

FORTHCOMING MEETINGS

Fri. 9, Malacological, 6.
Philo logical, 8.—"The Perception of Sound," Dr. W. Perrett.
Sat. 10, Royal Institution, 3. —"Sound in War," Professor J. W. Briggs (Christmas Lecture).
Mon. 12, Geographical (Lowther Lodge), 5. —Dr. Williams' Library (41, Gordon Square, W.4), 6. —"The Analysis of Mind," Lecture IX, Mr. Bertrand Russell.
Surveyors' Institution, 8.
Tues. 13, Royal Institution, 3.—"The Miner's Safety Lamp."—Sir John Franklin.
Royal Anthropological Institute, 8.15. —"The Outrider of Indonesian Canoes," Dr. V. C. Haddon.
Wed. 14, Keio's "History and Study of Naval History," Professor J. Holland Rose.
Thurs. 15, Royal Institution, 3. —"Renaissance in Music in Italy and England," Lecture I, Dr. R. C. Levy.
Linnean Society of London, 4th. —"Illustration during Four Centuries," The General Secretary.
University College, S. —"The Origin of Ornamental Design, Mr. H. S. Sperling.
Fine Arts

THE MORAL FACTOR IN ART

HAROLD GILMAN was a failure as a painter, in the sense that his achievement fell short of his intentions. He was a failure in the sense that Courbet was a failure and Cézanne was a failure, in the sense in which it is more difficult and more honourable and of more service to fail than to succeed.

Success could not reckon Gilman among her admirers; for he was not prepared to make the necessary sacrifices, least of all the first and most important sacrifice—to give up doing his best. He knew, too, that Art had secrets which he could never share: that he lacked the creative impulse, the thirst for experiment, the splendid assurance of genius. And he fell back on the next best thing, the will to work, knowledge, and a calm faith in a method of painting.

But even these qualities are rare to-day, and because they are rare they have value in the world. They made Gilman a force in English art during the period covered by his activities. His influence on his contemporaries was quite out of proportion to his level as a painter. But it was not out of proportion to the worth of his artist-personality. Because the thing he did—his best—was a thing of price in a makeshift civilization. Big men knew their hearts that this is one thing they seldom do, and small men know it is the one thing they never do at all; the first can succeed without it; and the second cannot succeed unless they let it go; and they were all humble before Gilman because they recognized that he stood for the moral factor in art.

Mr. Wyndham Lewis and Mr. Louis F. Fergusson, who are responsible for the monograph devoted to Gilman's work, have shown a wise discrimination in reproducing a number of his drawings as well as the paintings. First, because the pictures lose a great deal in reduced black-and-white photographs, which tend to exaggerate the fortuitous lumpiness of the texture and the general heaviness of touch, defects which are less obtrusive in the actual paintings. Secondly, because as many respects the paintings are less valuable than the drawings. Gilman's stern outlook which refused to allow him to take advantage of accident, and his arbitrary use of colour, give his later and most characteristic paintings a rather machine-made look. They are too obviously intellectual; they lack the spontaneity and the subtleties of the drawings which preceded them, and which contain the essence of Gilman as an artist.

Gilman's drawings are mainly studies for pictures. He aimed at making a drawing complete in all save colour, from which he could, at will, paint a finished picture. He drew in pen, putting down his statements of tone in meshes of dots of different weight and closeness, reserving conventional line shading for major shadows and a flowing line for the contours. There is no swagger or brilliance about his drawing, but it is real drawing, nevertheless: It is as free from histrionics as an architect's plan and much the same in essence.

Take the drawing called "Small Waves." The subject is a calm day when low waves topple gently forward over their retreating predecessors. The process repeats itself a thousand times; it is always the same and always different. There are all the elements of beauty in the scene—the long lines of the waves and the delicate filigree of the dispersing surf upon the sand. But it all vanishes and reappears with maddening rapidity, and the variations are infinite. And Gilman sat down to draw this; not to make an approximation or impression of it, but to make a coherent statement of it in his system of dots and lines and dashes. He failed, of course. But Gilman was a draughtsman than Gilman would have failed also. But only an artist of Gilman's moral fibre would have made the attempt.

Or take the study for the portrait of his landlady, Mrs. Monter. The subject this time has no pretensions to beauty. It is just an ugly old woman sitting at a table, and about to drink tea from a large common teapot and a large common cup. There is nothing romantic or picturesque about her. She is the typical London charwoman; she is old, incredibly old; she has had perhaps a dozen children, and a life of drudgery has filled the pores of her skin with grime and hardened it to a tanned hide. And Gilman set out to make a drawing of her which should be as good as a drawing by Van Gogh. He did not succeed, though he came very near it. But Van Gogh only beat him because he was not mad. Everything that a sane man could do with the subject in the Van Gogh way Gilman did in this drawing; it is his most eminent work, and one which we think Rembrandt himself would have admired.

We have laid stress on the moral aspect of Gilman's art because we believe it is the aspect which will be recognized by posterity. But it must not be supposed that he was nothing but a stern moralist. He could look occasionally, as Mr. Lewis tells us, uncannily like George Robey, and he had a hundred droll and human facets to his character which are now lost to the world except in so far as they are perpetuated in Mr. Lewis's book and sympathized in it from the pictures. If there is no hint of these facets in his pictures, it is because painting was his work and not his recreation; and the gods had denied him their choicest gift—the power to do great work for fun.

R. H. W.

EXHIBITIONS OF THE WEEK

The New English Art Club is the Mecca of the Slade School students, who habitually make their bow to the public at its exhibitions. But it is not only as a dumping ground for their first pictures that the Slade students think of the Club. It stands for something much more tremendous to them—it stands for ART. When a Slade student applies the term 'good' to Piero della Francesca's 'Baptism,' he means that it reminds him of things he has seen at the New English Art Club; when he calls a girl's head 'good,' he means that she is something like one of Mr. Augustus John's models; and when he calls a modern picture 'good' he means that it is good enough for the New English Art Club.

The new-comers in the present exhibition are not very interesting; they appear to be mainly young ladies who admire the art of Mr. Albert Rutherston. The recognized pillars of the institution are inadequately represented. There is no work from Professor Tonks or Mr. Rusell, and nothing from Sir William Orpen, R.A. Mr. John's main work is, owing to the bad lighting arrangements, completely invisible, and Mr. Steer sends only very slight water-colours which, though accomplished, do scant justice to his powers.

The most considerable effort has been made by the
PURCELL ON THE STAGE

1.

That Purcell never succeeded in composing the greatest operas produced in any country during the last half of the seventeenth century was due less to the shortness of his life—a circumstance which had no such hampering effect on Mozart a hundred years later—than to the ineradicable romanticism of Englishmen. Lulli and Alessandro Scarlatti have gone down to posterity as great figures in the history of opera; but the English operas have a much deeper musical inspiration than Lulli and a much livelier sense of the stage than Scarlatti. There is an architectural grandeur about Lulli which Purcell never attained, and he never attained it because the conditions of the English theatre made it impossible. But Lulli's grandeur is terribly monotonous: both in the pure musical invention of melody and harmony and in the application of these devices to the delicate and subtle interpretation of human passions he is far behind Purcell. Scarlatti can surpass Purcell in vocal expression, and in concentration of form, but only in vocal movements. Scarlatti's own contemporaries said that his operas were written more in the style of chamber music. His outlook on drama is purely personal and vocal; there are only fewstandards to which the audience have to adapt their minds, and they have had any visual idea of movements or grouping on the stage. He could write a procession march, or a comic scene of song and dance, but his ballet-music is negligible both in quantity and in quality. Purcell on the other hand, assimilating quickly the best devices of his contemporaries both in France and Italy, eventually acquired a very Italian flow of melody and at the same time never lost the sense of the stage. It is a fascinating task to prepare an opera of Purcell for actual performance, for almost every number suggests the rhythmical treatment of gesture and concerted movement.

Opera failed to establish itself in England because, at the moment when the principle of opera was first conceived in Italy, England had already a highly developed spoken drama of her own. The chorister actors of Elizabeth's reign had attempted musical plays which were in their essentials operas, since the persons of the drama were wont to break into song at moments of tense emotion, as if speech were no longer adequate for its expression. These too were being acted in England long before the first operatic experiments of the Italians. But the Shakespearean theatre, which as we know was definitely hostile to the chorister theatre, took an entirely different view of the function of music in drama. It was a characteristically English view. It regarded music not as the most normal and poetical medium in which human beings can express their own individual emotions, but as an experience from outside, not the effect but the cause of emotion. Thus Shakespeare habitually employs music (as Mr. Percy Scholes pointed out in a valuable paper read before the Musical Association) in connection with supernatural characters. It may be the expression of their own emotions, but as they are supernatural we have no means of knowing whether they are subject to emotions: the function of the music is not to express supernatural emotions, but to induce effects of emotion in the normal characters on the stage, who are supposed to hear it, and then both directly and indirectly to affect the emotions of the audience.

It is obvious that if "The Tempest" survived into the period of the Restoration, it was largely owing to the opportunities which it afforded for music, dancing and stage machinery. "The Tempest" is the foundation of the typical English opera, and during the last half of the seventeenth century we can watch "The Tempest" being gradually expanded in the operatic direction until it became the artistic monstrosity which we are obliged to generation which appeared shortly before the war, the generation of the brothers Nash and the brothers Spencer. Mr. Stanley Spencer's ambitious "Swan Upping at Cookham" lacks the rhythmic design of his picture in the War Museum collection. It is also far less convincing as a conception and far less assured in handling. Mr. John Nash's "Wooded Hill" is probably the best picture in the exhibition; the immediate background is not well realized, and the whole composition would gain if two inches were cut off the bottom, but it is nevertheless a notable voyage in waters first navigated by his brother. The same is true of his excellent drawing "Orchard, Whiteleaf." Mr. Paul Nash's best exhibit is the drawing called "Summer Rain"; but this sensitive and intelligent artist is clearly in a transition stage in his development. We believe that Mr. Ethelbert White's drawing "The Dead Tree" and Mr. Stanley Spencer's "Dedication of Cookham War Memorials" are worth examining, but as it stands, it is only as a chair to stand on a chair and to kneel or crouch on the floor to see the second, we confess to having shirked duty in these instances.

Mr. Edward Wadsworth's exhibition of drawings at the Leicester Galleries is an event of importance because he is the first English artist who has evolved a coherent personal art from the conflicting doctrines of present-day esthetics. He graduated at the Slade School, but rapidly outgrew the period of N.E.A.C. Schwannreu, and set out in search of a creed more in harmony with his individual sensibilities. He found it in Vorticism, and it was as a Vorticist that he first attracted attention.

He is a North-Countryman, with a detestation of artistic flummery and a love of everything clear, bright and orderly, and everything structural and well-knit. He delights in iron girders and steel shafts and huge machines functioning with delicate precision. He delights, too, in all things which recall or suggest his favourite phenomena, and he tries to make his drawings recall and suggest them. Had he never found Vorticism, he might have developed into a regulation painter of cranes and scaffolding and machinery. Vorticism taught him to construct his pictures on the same principle that machinery is constructed; to dovetail the parts with the ingenuity of a cabinet-maker; to imbue a sketch of anything under the sun with something of the logic of a motor-car and the deadly accuracy of a field gun. He has no desire to make drawings which will look charming in a Georgian dining-room or a Louis XVI. boudoir, but he has an undoubted ambition to create something which would look sensible beside the Pyramids. And for a man of thirty-one he has come remarkably near it.

His drawing has the uncanny confidence and decision of a master. He makes up his mind before each stroke of the pen, and puts down a final statement without hesitation. He never puts down anything to see how it will look; and his chances moving to change nothing in his mind. Every line is as convinced and obstinate as Wordsworth's little village maid. Mr. Wadsworth would make short work of any line that attempted to compromise with a sentimental poet or a benevolent old gentleman. Every line has its allotted job for which it is individually responsible; it has no chance of sheltering behind other lines or hiding its tail in a bundle of romantic shadow. Every form, too, has its allotted job, and the artist finds no form too geometric or too ragged for acceptance, and no maze of forms too intricate for comprehension. Every inch of these forty drawings is completely realized; you could pick out any passage of link and hand, and Mr. Wadsworth could draw it upside down for you on his cuff.

There can be no question of the pictorial value of these drawings of the Black Country; they are impeccable from the point of view of design and balance, and so intimate they are terrifying in their rhythmic menace. It is possible that a visitor from the Black Country could not recognize the slag-heaps in the more relentless work of Mr. Wadsworth's drawings; but it would be quite impossible for him to recognize the drawings in the slag-heaps when he returned home. For when an artist has once grasped and clearly felt the absolute qualities of a subject in public, he rapidly assimilates his vision, which is, of course, what Winstler meant by Nature "creeping up." Certainly, slag-heaps will have to "creep up" after this exhibition or Art has perished from the earth.
associate with the name of Purcell. For these baroque distortions of Shakespeare’s play D’Avenant, Dryden and Shadwell were responsible. All three were men deeply and seriously interested in the relation of poetry and music, especially on the stage. D’Avenant was evidently a great admirer of the style of Lawes. His heroic poem “Gondibert” was intended to be sung and was designed in a metre adapted to a plain and stately composing of Music.” And the Musician, in “The Playhouse To Let,” tells us that Recitative Music is not composed

Of matter so familiar, as may serve
For every low occasion of discourse.
In Tragedy, the language of the Stage
Is raised above the common dialect:
Our passion rising with the height of Verse
And Vocal Music adds new wings to all
The flights of Poetry.

Later on in the same play, just before “Sir Francis Drake” is acted, the Housekeeper says:

Now we shall be in Stilo Reusitativo.
I’m in a trance when I hear Vocal Music.

Shadwell, in the ludicrously concocted preface to “Psyche,” the opera which he wrote for Matthew Locke (1679), tells how he “chalk’d out the way to the Composer” in most of the musical parts. His self-praise is by no means unjustified, for he had a remarkable understanding of the function of music in a play and had further a very genuine admiration for Locke’s “excellent composition.” It is most interesting to compare Shadwell’s arrangement of “Psyche” with the original comédie-ballet of Mollière and Lulli on which it was based. The French drama is a spoken play with a prologue and intermezzi which are set to music. The musical sections are quite distinct from the play, which like “Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme” is almost complete without them. Shadwell takes a very different view of the scheme, and works his musical episodes into the texture of the play with a strong sense of picturesqueness and dramatic effect. There is indeed one episode which Locke has clothed with music of real beauty—the moment when Psyche is about to throw herself into the river, and is prevented from doing so by the river-god and his attendant nymphs, who rise from the water and sing. Shadwell may have been a bad poet and playwright, but he certainly had the makings of a very effective librettist.

Dryden’s interest in music is well known. “Albion and Albanius” was a failure partly because it was an attempt to carry out in English a purely French theatrical conception, but mainly because it was set to music by a feeble French composer who had little understanding of English. “King Arthur,” which he wrote for Purcell, has a wonderful sense of musical effect. The spoken dialogue contains much that strikes the modern reader as laughable; but the same may be said of many other plays of the period. What is important in the history of opera is Dryden’s understanding of the points at which the introduction of music enhances the dramatic effect. Dryden had further a very clear conception of the singable qualities of the English language. He admits its inferiority to Italian as a singer’s language, owing, as he says, to a certain “eeminacy” in English pronunciation. It seems even probable that he rewrote some of his songs to suit Purcell’s music; in any case Dryden’s songs are always exquisitely adapted to musical setting.

It is further probable that Purcell shared to some extent Dryden’s views on English pronunciation, and that he adopted the to us rather ludicrous repetition of a word e.g., “neve” repeated five or six times, for the sake of emphasis, because he knew that true English singing could not reproduce the prolongation of a vowel so natural and so effective in Italian.

Edward J. Dent.

(To be continued.)
Drama

CHRISTMAS IN THE THEATRES
1.—FAIRY PLAYS

THE Christmas fairy play is an institution of quite recent date. It took its rise in a revolt of the public conscience, a revolt against the gaudy racket which Augustus Harris used to stage each year at Drury Lane. Pantomime had become a nefarious transaction, whereby people who boasted they never entered a music-hall obtained at Christmas a full meal of music-hall fare. This dishonest bargain sometimes failed of its aim. One of Harris' most loyal henchmen describes in his memoirs a certain frost-bitten Boxing Night, when fourteen highly-paid "stars" stood in clumps on the stage and failed to explode a single laugh between them. There were also pantomime "boys" of a shape.

At the Scala in "Fifinella" this tale is retold. We see in burlesque the pantomime of the nineties, with Miss Minnie Rayner performing self-immolation in an admirable skit on the buxom "Fairy Queen." A little party in the stalls—a girl, a boy and a gay young uncle—begin to shout protests against the lugubrious spectacle, and presently climb on the stage to rebuke the players. The demon manager with his sprites threatens violence, the children call the real fairies to their aid, in all parts of the house there is a sudden murmer and patter, and hosts of small fairies armed with bulrush spears come swarming down the gangways and storm the position. So far all is fresh, ingenious and rather touching.

We are transported next to a hill-top in fairyland, a design of lovely simplicity. In the absence of the elfin guards the summer fairy Fifinella peeps out of her winter cave, and is promptly carried off by the whistling East Wind. The Elf King in his wrath dooms the faithless sentinels to listen to an eternal pantomime, while the mortal children who lured them from their post are set the task of recovering Fifinella. "The fun," says the programme, "begins," but, alas! it also ends, abruptly. The whole fabric falls to pieces from this point. Perhaps that demon was not completely exorcised; even bad traditions are difficult to uproot.

Instead of action where action is essential, we are kept chewing opium in the Dream Merchant's House. The Dream Merchant (Malcolm Keen) has a beautiful delivery; it only makes us sleepier. We watch long dances, not very well done, and explore the symbolism of dreams. At last a couple of medieval visions reveal the whereabouts of Fifinella, who is suffering like the Nun in the "Miracle." Princes fight duels over her and kings kill their sons for her. The nice young uncle, who owns that he finds his ideal in this fleeting fairy, plunges right into one of these dreams and pulls her out. This snaps the spell, and we are back again on the hill-top, where we learn that Fifinella, being quite the ideal, can never be held by the arms of any mortal.

If this is for children it is not quite what they want. Speaking for the boys—their sisters are too 'cute to give away their likings and dislikes—we should say that they take life more seriously than we do and are not yet reduced to crying out for fairies. They will look on Fifinella (Vera Lennox) as a very pretty big girl and Mary (Primrose Morgan) as a peculiarly charming small one, and fairyland will not count when they make their choice. They will deny, of course, that they are interested in either. They will doze while we enjoy Mr. Alfred Heather's singing as the Man in the Moon, will wake up when the lighting begins, and sigh because it is over so soon. They will wonder why our eyes get filmy about a dozen times in the course of the evening, will find M. Wanja's leaping as the East Wind incredible and defend a theory of invisible wires, and will privately esteem the two pantomime comedians, "Utter" and "Rot," a pair of choice spirits, whom nobody ought to despise. On one point they and we will most likely agree: Fifinella is too good not to have been much better.

In the case of the St. Martin's entertainment, "Once upon a Time," we have no need to draw up a hypothetical balance sheet. There the children give us their opinion plainly, and, since they are laughing and cheating most of the time, we presume they are getting exactly what they want. On our side we must formulate a few reserves. We pass the knockabout of the Esquimau fishing scene because we admit that we should (once upon a time) have enjoyed it hugely ourselves, but the episode of the "prehistoric peeps" did really strike us as rather futile fooling. What is there about cavemen and mediavilism that always sets a certain public hee-hawing? Nor did the struggle of romantic Balkan peasants with their Turkish oppressors greatly thrill us; we live after all in 1920. We thought, too, that the critics who count were inclined to get red and hot at so much weeping—it is terribly hard for them not to follow suit—but we all cheered up when the pistolling began, and counted the rich crop of corpses with avidity. When the last story of the series was reached, "The Proud Princess," there was no more ground for complaint. Mr. William Stack (whose voice makes whatever he has to say sound like poetry) is just the man for the hero of a fairy tale; while Miss Betty Fair is quite her name as the Princess, and nicely set off by dark-haired Miss Dorothy Fane, who leads her picturesque band of maids-of-honour. And then the magic pipe, to the sound of which all who hear must dance! It is the moment for the hero's execution. "One last boon, sire, a little tune upon my pipe!" Fortwith the cruel King, the sombre hangman, the astronomer royal, the jester, all the court, are footing it till they beg for mercy, exhausted. How surely these old, old fancies hit the mark! Beside them the modern inventions are nothing at all.

Miss Margaret Morris has the wit to see this. In her "theatre" at Chelsea, with her youthful troupe led by graceful Angela Baddeley, she plays "Puss in Boots," and "The Princess and the Swineherd," and plays them straight, without turning to right or to left. The swiftly running story, the business-like fairies, recreate our nursery impression of these tales. The show succeeds well within its somewhat strait limits. What makes the authors of fairy plays go so far afield when all this treasure lies to hand at home? It is the notion that Cinderella, Aladdin and the rest are the copyright property of the pantomime producer. What has he done, this year, with his precious heritage?

(To be continued.)

WHEN IT WAS DARK

KINGSWAY THEATRE—"In the Night."

While the elderly Judge d'Instruction is away on business at Fontainebleau, his wife and his wife's lover (for the play is founded on the French) pass seven hours of the momentous Night together in his Paris flat. Their paridiac loneliness is not, however, complete; for a serpent in the shape of a burlar makes his entrance through the window, and after seeing the lovers parting in the chilly, uncomfortable dawn, makes off with two hundred thousand francs, for which the husband, in his judicial capacity, was responsible. The theft is discovered, the husband returns, the police are called in, and a most disquieting searchlight of inquiry is turned on to these dark hours during which the Judge d'Instruction was away from home. Now the rain begins. The unhappy lovers find themselves in a situation which grows every moment more and more uncomfortable. Meanwhile the ingenious Burglar, finding that the numbers of the notes are known and that he cannot use them, presents himself to the lover and offers to... give them back; but the offer is coupled with a demand for hush-money—for has he not seen the guilty pair in a very compromising moment? The lover bays the notes back, and at this moment the police burst in, find the lost property and arrest him. The case against him is overwhelmingly strong. There follows a scene in the Jug d’Instruction's office. French justice, as we all know, is peculiar; but we doubt whether it is administered quite as oddly as it seems to have been in M. Levardier's office. But let that pass. To save her lover, the wife confesses. The Juge is hot for revenge, and as the lover is too noble to allow his master's reputation to be smirched by the revelation of the truth, it looks as though he were going to get what he wants. But no: the burglar descends, a god from the machine, and saves the situation—saves his own skin too, by pointing out to the Juge what ridicule will fall upon him if the details of his congeve are made public in court. And the curtain falls on a charming Restoration farce. The Intruder, master of the situation, "makes horns" and disappears, leaving the baffled husband gnashing his teeth in impotent fury.

"In the Night" is a pleasant entertainment, though we could wish that Mr. Harcourt had taken the trouble to clear up a few of the manifest improbabilities of the plot. It is not agreeable to realize that a playwright is treating us with the contempt we no doubt deserve.

The best performance was undoubtedly that of Mr. Leslie Faber as the Intruder. His personification of the eccentric gentleman turned scoundrel deservedly brought the house down. Mr. Alfred Grayton as Levardier was admirable till he had to become passionate and emotional in the last act. Here he evolved a most painful style of eloquence with an explosion at the end of every sentence. The effect when he denounced the lover as "the apex of the eternal triangle"—this must surely have come straight from the French—was, it may be imagined, terrific. Miss Jessie Winter, who had to debut a great deal of well-worn eloquence about mariages de convenance, acquitted herself very creditably in the part of Mme. Levardier.

Correspondence

"THEATRICALITY"

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—In reviewing Mr. Loraine's production of "Arms and the Man", your dramatic critic (Athenæum, December 26) seems to take too many things for granted. He asserts that "Arms and the Man" is a realistic play demanding a realistic production, and accordingly upbraids the "theatricality" of some characters as they were acted at the Duke of York's, criticizes Mr. Loraine's acting as not sufficiently realistic, and dismisses Mr. Rumbold's scenery and dresses as turning the play into a costume-piece.

To do your critic justice, he is quite consistent in his views, but unfortunately his principal contention, both as regards the realistic nature of "Arms and the Man" and the relative aesthetic value of realism and theatricality, is to my mind extremely questionable.

Perhaps Mr. Shaw himself is to blame for the traditional view of his plays as works of realism. His denunciation of romanticism and sentimentality in life, and his advocacy of common sense and naturalness, have always been regarded, and not without his approval, as expressions of his realistic creed. But in art, and in the theatre in particular, realism is merely a method, and not a philosophy of life, and it may be said that the two can diverge. It is best seen in the play in question.

Bluntschli, Saranoff and Raina, the three principal characters on which the action of "Arms and the Man" is based, are conceived as only a rationalist and a realist could conceive them. But their portraits as actually painted are not in the least degree purer than are the other characters in the play. They are not without certain reservations. Mr. Shaw seems to have forestalled Severini, Marinetti and their kind in the idea of portraying an object not as a single whole, but as a sum total of individual and separately recorded impressions which one would get by looking at the object from all sides. Only the Futurists, perhaps, have the moment of time, and lie happily within a single picture, thus showing their failure to understand the true nature of their medium, whereas Mr. Shaw paints his dissected characters on a canvas belt which is gradually unrolled before the spectator.

If such is the convention employed by Mr. Shaw, and the Man "and the Man" (and I fail to see what psychological explanation could be suggested for the sudden twists and turns of the characters mentioned), I submit that the play is not realistic, but, in its principal motif at least, essentially theatrical.

Now, theatricality is usually associated with false sentiment affectation, melodramatic effects, and—at the other end of the scale—with buffoonery. It is certainly not quite that, and, at the same time, very far from being that. In most cases, the conventional forms of expressing sentiment and exaggerations of acting which one is accustomed to see on the stage are theatrical only in so far as they have become a stage tradition cultivated and carried on by talentless actors.

But theatricality can have a wider and loftier meaning. It denotes a frank recognition of the peculiar nature of the theatre as a medium. The play—whereas merely a show, and not a slice of life, realistic or imaginative, discovered behind the footlights. The stage—its is—just a part of the theatre-building, and not a realm endowed with Proorean qualities, but always existing as a separate world in no way resembling the real stage. In the same way it regards the actor as the person on the stage who "serves up" the play to the audience, practising, without diminishing it, his art of make-believe, and not as the spirit incarnate of a character by some accident descended into the theatre. And finally it recognizes the audience as a gathering of spectators who are in the auditorium to be served with the play, and not as a number of Peepers, or a public, watching the transformations which go on behind the footlights.

It is in this sense that I call "Arms and the Man" theatrical. Whether intentionally or not, Mr. Shaw "serves up" or "presents" as I would prefer to say) his characters and all their striking convolutions by a method which can be justified only as a theatrical convention. The play therefore demands theatrical emphasis. And it is this emphasis that I find somewhat lacking in Mr. Loraine's production. While the parts of Saranoff and Raina were conceived theatrically, Mr. Loraine's Bluntschli, instead of being theatrically prosaic, was just realistically grey and undistinguished. The tempo of the action was also wrong. It should have been much quicker, illumining the characters with flash-lights of self-revelation, and making the dialogue terse and incisive. As to the setting, it is the best one can see in London at present (the garden scene is particularly good for its true sense of the architectural nature of the stage). But it is not theatrical. Alas! theatricality leaves but little room for the virtuosity of the modern stage-decorator.

But perhaps it will be asked whether theatricality is at all worth troubling about. To demonstrate its aesthetic truth as a stage-piece, the art of the theatre would, of course, be impossible within the scope of a letter. But those inclined to sneer at it may, perhaps, be reminded of the fact that it was fully understood and practised in the classical Greek theatre, the medieval pageants, the Elizabethan theatre, and the theatre of Molière, and that it still animates the art of the theatre in Japan and China. It will certainly come back into its own in the theatres of Europe. But this will happen only when it is realized that in the art of the theatre the choice lies not between realism and symbolisms, or between elaborate settings and simplified ones, or between pictorial scenery (decorative, Impressionistic, or Cubistic) and scenery and curtains, but between all these as methods of representation (or in so far as they are used as such) and theatricality as a method of "presenting" the play through the undisguised medium of the actor and the stage. By choosing the latter method the art of the theatre will come into line with the modern development of other art forms. And all seem more the significance of their respective media, whereas mere assimilation of forms evolved in other arts, however advanced these forms may be, will leave the theatre still lagging behind in the modern progress of aesthetic consciousness.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully;

Alexander Bakshy.

38, Finsbury Pavement, E.C. 2.
MODERN ART CRITICISM

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—In your recent article on Renoir (Athenæum, December 12) you point out that this artist was both a great painter and a great man, and at the same time you emphasize the fact that as an artist he was in the direct line of our Western tradition. It is true. So it is true of Manet, of Degas, of Whistler. So it is true of any great artist you care to mention.

Why then this obsession on your part with one particular aspect of modern painting, what I may call the anti-traditional movement? We are becoming a little weary of Matisse, Picasso, Derain, Vlaminck, Marchand, Wyndham Lewis, Nash, Friesz, Lhote, and all the rest of them, mostly imported from France, so it seems we must go to Paris for our painting, just as our wives and sisters go there for their hats. (We are a little weary even of the great Cézanne himself.) These artists, so far as we can see, are aiming at anything at all, are deliberately breaking away from the main stream of tradition, and striving after new forms of expression on some little side trickle of their own. My best wishes to all of them. Many of them are artists of ability. Much of their work is interesting and vital. But to many of us its value is chiefly experimental; it is far removed from the main line of tradition to have the permanent and universal appeal of great art. Can any responsible critic maintain that any one of these men—I do not of course include Cézanne—has produced work at all comparable in emotional quality with the paintings of—let us say—John or Steer, or the etchings of Muirhead Bone?

This being so, why then should The Athenæum confine its appreciation so exclusively to this aspect of modern painting? In literature, in science, there is nothing limited or one-sided in your attitude; nor is there in music, though here, it is true, I have noticed that Scriabine and Stravinsky keep popping up perhaps a little more frequently than would seem necessary. But it is in the matter of painting that I wish to call you—oh! ever so timidly—to account. Here your point of view seems to be a little unbalanced, a little callow, a little—may I say it?—foolish.

Of course you are not alone. I find the same deficiencies in nearly all the more vigorous art critics of the day. It is the mark of immaturity. Of what use is it for them to tell us that Picasso is a great master, that the latest pictures of Matisse surpass anything that has been done since Cézanne, that the new work of Wyndham Lewis is wonderfully significant and vital, or that Vlaminck has now established his position in the front rank of the world's artists? Another critic will say exactly the same thing of J. J. Slanuov, of Peacock, of Salisbury, or of any other popular Academician. Why should one opinion be of any more value than another? This question seems to lie at the root of all the trouble. It is not opinion we want, but criticism.

Is it not easier to writing to you—now—to plead for a larger critical attitude towards the Fine Arts, a definite standard and a sense of proportion more in harmony with your own attitude in literature, so that those of us who have left our salad days behind may find, in one journal at least, an appreciation of modern painting that is not so vividly green as elsewhere?

Yours faithfully,

EDWARD GREGORY.

31, Lambolle Road, Hampstead, N.W.3.

SHENSTONE'S EPIGRAPH

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—One word more! In writing about paroxysms of words and the weakness of our monosyllables, I was referring entirely to epigraphs, i.e. to inscriptions in stone or bronze on a tomb. Here brevity, conciseness, are essential to the monument. In the Latin, much superior to Greek, and still more so to English, in a speech with its articles, particles, and endLims, the effect of the two or three permissible lines is frittered away. Take one of the grandest of modern epigraphs, that on Wren in St. Paul's: No monumen tum quaeius circumspice—four words, only one monosyllable. In literal English it runs thus: If you ask for his monument look around—eight words with six monosyllables. It is obvious how much more impressive is the Latin.

I have said nothing about the use of monosyllables in poetry, especially nouns and verbs, in prose and poetry, above all in drama and lyrics. Our short Saxon words are eminently needed in Biblical, devotional, language, and in dialogue, where big Latin phrases would be affectation. In the Bible, in the Prayer Book, in Shakespeare's passionate scenes, monosyllables are inevitable, and so they are in the lyrics of fancy, where Johnsonian Latinisms would be ludicrous.

What is more lovely than Tell me where is Fancy bred, Or in the heart, or in the head?

Or again:

I arise from dreams of Thee
In the first sweet sleep of night.

But inscriptions on a tomb are a totally different thing. In my book, "Tennyson, Ruskin, Mill, &c., 1889," I have discussed the use of short d'Anne d'Aristocratic blank verse. Milton has a mannerism of polysyllabic words, as Tennyson in his "Idylls" had a mannerism of monosyllables. In the first 100 lines of "Paradise Lost," book iii, there are only four monosyllabic lines. Tennyson's "Passing of Arthur" is almost entirely constructed of monosyllabic words. Shakespeare's great speeches hold a middle and just proportion. In my letter on "Epitaphs" I said nothing of prose, poetry, or drama.

Yours, etc.,

FREDERICK HARRISON.

"THE THREE MUSKETEERS"

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—One more attempt at the "Hen, quanto minus," &c. Oh, how much less to talk with those we see every day!—I remember the phrase.

The fine emphasis of the last three words in the Latin can only, I think, be met in English by repetition.

F. B.

A VOLUME of studies entitled "Indian Nationality," which aims at setting forth the fundamental facts of Indian social, religious and political life, and their bearing on Indian responsible government, has been written by Mr. R. N. Gilchrist, Principal and Professor of Political Economy and Political Philosophy, Krishnagar College, Bengal, and will shortly be published by Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co. R. N. Gilchrist has contributed an Introduction. Messrs. Longmans also have in the press, for publication at an early date, a volume on the Life and Work of Sir Jagadis Chandra Bose, the founder of the Bose Research Institute in Calcutta. It is interesting that Sir J. C. Bose is the native of India to obtain a European reputation in physical science. The volume has been written by Professor Patrick Geddes, of the Department of Sociology and Geography, Bombay University.
Foreign Literature

THE ARCHPRIEST OF HITA

LIBRO DE BUEN AMOR. Por Juan Ruiz, Archipre de Hita. Edición, prólogo y notas de Alfonso Reyes. (Madrid, Casa Editorial Calleja. 1.50 ptas.)

I must in candour be confessed that comparatively few personal details have come down to us concerning the Archpriest of Hita. Señor Reyes, to whom the Casa Calleja has, with sound judgment, entrusted the preparation of the present edition, provisionally accepts the conjecture of Señor Puyol y Alonso that Ruiz was born about 1283, and died towards the middle of the fourteenth century. These dates are approximate only, but they go to show that Ruiz was alive at the same time as Chaucer, and it is conceivable that this partial contemporaneity may have suggested to Ticknor the idea of comparing Ruiz with Chaucer. There is something to be said in favour of this comparison, not so much on the score of similarity of genius as because the Archpriest of Hita and Chaucer were perhaps the first writers in their respective countries to display an unmistakably individual talent.

So far as our precise information about the Archpriest extends, we may presume it to be accurate inasmuch as it comes to us from the author himself. According to the version of the facts given in three fourteenth-century manuscripts, the Archpriest was called Juan Ruiz, and he appears to have been a native of Alcalá de Henares. This is not quite certain, for the extant manuscripts differ slightly in the reading of the stanza (1510) which refers to this particular. We are glad to gather that Señor Reyes favours the reading which makes Juan Ruiz a fellow-townsmen of Cervantes. At some date unknown Juan Ruiz became Archpriest of Hita; at some date equally undetermined he was imprisoned by order of Cardinal Don Gil de Albornoz, who was Archbishop of Toledo from 1339 to 1367. What his offence was is not clear. We are equally in the dark as to when he was released. It would seem that a certain Pedro Fernández was the Archpriest of Hita on January 7, 1351. What had meanwhile become of Juan Ruiz? Had he died in prison, or did he join Albornoz at Avignon, where the Cardinal went when exiled by Peter the Cruel in 1359? No decisive answer is forthcoming. What seems to be certain is that much, if not all, of the "Libro de buen amor" was composed during the period of the Archbishop's imprisonment. This we learn on the authority of Alfonso Paratín, the copyist of an existing manuscript, and apparently a conscientious person whose report on this head is confirmed by the evidence of the Archpriest himself in the text of the "Libro de buen amor."

It is not an easy matter to feel confident that we are interpreting aright any fourteenth-century Spanish poem. As Señor Reyes points out in his able "Prólogo," narrative was as much the characteristic of the verse of that age as lyricism is dominant in modern poetry. Señor Reyes follows Menéndez y Pelayo in disintegrating the "Libro de buen amor" into its constituent elements. Among these elements the writer distinguishes the stuff of a picaresque novel, a collection of "exemplos," paraphrases of Chaucer, and the pseudo-traditions and satirical fables, lyrical passages remarkable for their variety of theme and form, and a series of moral reflections. The analysis bears out, to a great extent, the conclusion of M. Jeanroy: "Mais qui ne sait que l'œuvre de Hita est une macédoine d'imitations françaises, qui témoignent du reste de la plus grande originalité d'esprit?" Señor Reyes cautions us against assuming that the "Libro de buen amor" embodies the personal experience of Juan Ruiz. No doubt many of us have erred in that direction. Still, reading between the lines, we rather imagine that Señor Reyes tends to hold the view that Juan Ruiz had an unedifying, intimate acquaintance with the seamiest sides of life. However, the personal character of the Archpriest does not concern his editor so closely as the writer's artistic qualifications. Señor Reyes dwells with keen insight on the accomplishment of Ruiz as a metrist. He makes it clear that Juan Ruiz, while not above practising the popular "mester de juglaría," was compelled, if only in virtue of his position, to cultivate the monarchical and courtly laments which go by the name of the "mester de cleresca."

Not less prominent among the Archbishop's faculties is his success in creating figures which were destined to endure and to be re-incarnated. His "Urraca" (better known by the nickname of Trota Conventos) is undeniably the first rough sketch of the celebrated "Celestina," whose name, at some date after 1519, supplanted the original title of the "Comedia de Calisto y Melibea"; his Don Furón is the prototype of the charming hidalgos in "La vida de Lazarillo de Tormes." Again, some of Santillana's earliest characteristic masterpieces are paler, more delicate, aristocratic versions of the Archpriest's creations. Nor was his influence confined to the Peninsula. Some faint reminiscence of his work appears in the "Roman de la Rose"; Regnier's Mazarin is undoubtedly of Urraca's stock, and it is not impossible that the name in "Romeo and Juliet" may be traced to the same source.

Where Ruiz picked up his versatile learning it is difficult to guess. We may assume that in part it was due to his ecclesiastical training; but this would not explain his acquaintance with fabliaux or the Arthurian stories, though it might account for his familiarity with the "Libro de Apolonio." He might trust to his memory for "exempi" to quote contemporary Payás, Pintor de Bretaña (p. 81-84). He perhaps wrote the episode of Don Carnal and Doña Quaresma with the "Bataille de Caresme et de Charnage" before him, and if that be so, it would follow that his imprisonment was not very severe. His adaptations are indeed remarkable. But his most transcendent faculty is his power of evocation, his quality of creating a dramatic atmosphere, nowhere more visible than in his rehandling of Pampelus. A man of the people, he never allows his fancy to obscure his realistic vision. His harsh crudity perhaps revolted his immediate contemporaries and the courtly "makers" who succeeded them. Few of them refer to him. Santillana mentions him in passing: he is twice named by Alfonso Martínez de Toledo, another Archpriest who won celebrity with a "Reparación de loco amor." Ruiz was never fashionable. Nevertheless he would seem to have enjoyed a reputation out of Spain as well as in it. About thirty-eight years ago Theophilo Braga indicated the existence of a fragmentary translation of the "Libro de buen amor" in Portuguese; Braga's transcription is defective, and readers curious as to this rendering cannot do better than consult the study of Señor Solalinde. By a freak of chance, the "Libro de buen amor" was mentioned in an English work before it struggled into print in Spain. But time tells in the Archpriest's favour. On his first appearance in print in 1790, despite the protests of Jovellanos, Juan Ruiz was issued in a bowdlerized form. The Archpriest then had the malicious pleasure of seeing his name increased, and he is reprinted and "introduced" with a skill which does credit to his latest editor, who, though a Mexican, is settled in Madrid, and is a very competent member of the "Junta para Ampliación de Estudios." As might be expected, Señor Reyes has gained distinction as an editor of Ruiz de Alarcón. Manifestly he can deal adequately with more difficult texts of earlier date.

J. F. K.
THE ART OF SAYING NOTHING

MADAME PRUNE. By Pierre Loti. Translated by S. R. C. Plimsoll. Illustrations in colour by Mortimer Menpes, (Werner Laurie. 10s. 6d. net.)

LES ALIÉES QU'IL SOUS FAUDRAIT. Par Pierre Loti. (Paris, Calmann Lévy. 3fr.)

MORE years ago than most of them care to remember, the jeunes filles of a dozen lands wept ecstatic tears over "Pêcheur d'Islande," and they felt that they owed the author a debt of gratitude for having provided them with a real yellow-back French novel, recognized in the world of letters, which they could carry abroad without fear of scandal, and leave in the drawing-room without incurring parental reproof. They repaid their debt with interest. They clustered round Pierre Loti in their thousands, and begged for another book soon. And what, my dears, would you like me to write about this time?" said the master. "About yourself, cher monsieur," chorused the young ladies with genteel enthusiasm; and one bolder than the others may have added, "Tell us, Monsieur Loti, if you have ever been in love.

And Pierre Loti has been writing books for them about himself from that day to this. True, they have not always been strictly suitable for the traditional jeune fille; M. Loti is sometimes a little indiscreet; but he is always so soulful and so sad, and so remote from the gross faults of common clay, that the indiscretions become etherealized, and the contours are, anyway, obscured by the gauze curtains of his "atmospheric" style.

It is unfortunate that M. Loti selected this path for his development, because the author of "Pêcheur d'Islande" knew something of the novelist's art. There was invention in the book, and imagination, and evidence of a pretty descriptive talent. There are scenes one remembers: the Marie-Christine's bedroom, the storm, and old Yvonne staggering down the village street after the death of Silvestre and chanting lavel songs in sonne delirium. Above all, there was a definite and coherent story in it, and the author remained outside the cover.

But there is nothing of the novelist's art in the later books; there is only the art of saying nothing gracefully. The centre of focus has become the author, and the figure hardly warrants so continuous a concentration of the limelight. As he emerges from the grisâtre atmosphere of these books, Pierre Loti is a kind of musical-comedy juvenile lead. In one act he appears in naval uniform, plagiarizing with gaiety; in another he is disguised as a Turk; in a third he wears a tourist's garb, and postures beneath the palms of India. The male figures in musical comedy are notoriously unreal and fatuous, but they require a certain youth and agility in the actor to give verisimilitude to their incredible globe-trotting and their amorous adventures. As the years wear on we find M. Loti incapable of fulfilling even the modest demands of his trivial roles. In spite of a heavy make-up, the effect grows more and more incongruous, and we can scarcely believe that the most easily pleased jeune fille will find Romance in the unheroic hero who potters through the pages of "La Trisème Jeunesse de Madame Prune," which under the title of "MADAME PRUNE" has just made its bow in an English translation.

On the other hand, M. Loti may confidently expect success from his appeal to the maternal instinct in "Prime Jeunesse," which is designed as a sequel to "Le Roman d'un Enfant," and is the latest addition to the autobiographical series. The female eye will doubtless find something engaging in the figure of little Pierre weeping in the folds of his mother's dress or playing Chopin with sentiment, or—in more robust mood—"checking" his form-master at school. He was, at any rate, we understand, beloved of his auntie Lalie, Clarisse, Corinne and Eugénie. But to the unemotional male eye he appears a most uninteresting child.

It is fashionable at present for novelists to write long books about their childhood, and the almost inevitable failure of the result is largely due, we believe, to two causes. The first is the fragmentary and fortuitous character of the adults' recollections. It is impossible to recall sufficient of our childhood to fill a long book with any uniform story. We cannot evoke at will the mental processes or the special emotions of our early years. We cannot even remember a great number of episodes, and the small number available only a small proportion have any generic significance, in the sense that they throw light on the development of character or the psychology of the genius child. Few indeed of the average adult's recollections have the import of the child George Moore's shame when reproved by servants for brutally ill-treating a sow. Certainly there are no such recollections in "Prime Jeunesse."

The second reason for the frequent failure of the child biography is the difficulty in deciding on the appropriate angle of vision when dealing with the family circle. A child remains a child just as long as he can view the members of his family circle without the background of the outside world. When he acquires the faculty of seeing his family circle in relation to other people he has taken on the specifically adult outlook. The change of vision may come gradually, it may be hammered into a child at school; or it may come in a single devastating moment, as it came to the little boy in "Jean Christophe" when he heard his mother scolded by her employer. It may come early, as it comes generally to the poor, and to Jewish children in countries where pogroms threaten. It may come late, as it normally does to the children of the upper and upper middle classes in England. It is only in the most exceptional cases that the genuine outlook of childhood persists throughout adolescence. But the novelist, who is nowadays recruited mainly from the upper middle classes, and who has usually had a comparatively agreeable childhood, invariably writes his confessions with the period of adolescence behind him. In dealing with the family circle he has to choose between a series of haphazard rose-coloured impressions, the sediment in his mind of his child-vision, and a set of coherent pictures evolved from the knowledge of later years. In the latter case he runs the risk of appearing artificial, even if he draws his pictures with the cinematographic rapidity and illusion of Mr. James Joyce. In the former he runs the risk of appearing sentimental and absurd, which is very much what M. Loti appears in "Prime Jeunesse."

We are the more disoriented to welcome the child-vision in M. Loti's new book because his adult vision has always seemed to us so remarkably immature that we have sometimes suspected him of being a unique case of the child vision persisting into middle age. The spectacles which obscure his vision have certainly a strange resemblance to the rosy type of childhood. And he has a great distaste for acquiring knowledge of hard facts; he prefers to view things through a haze of prejudice. Take, for example, his recent publication, "Les Aliées qu'il nous faudrait," where he launches into international politics. The articles which constitute this book gave the French Censorship some trouble when they first appeared. For the author adjoins his dislike of Greeks and Armenians, and his pique for the Turk. Moreover, he advocates a Franco-Turkish alliance in the interests of France, and accuses the English of hostility to the interests of France. In short, the book is a résumé of prejudices which are well known to the readers of his former works.
It may be possible to substantiate in a scientific work the alleged chivalry of the Turk in warfare, and even to make out a convincing case for M. Loti’s major theories. But “Les Alliés qu’ils nous faudrait” is, of course, in none a scientific author. His long years of apprenticeship to the art of saying nothing have unfitted him for the production of such a work, and it would be strange indeed if he were now to plough systematically in the stubborn field of the Turkish problem. Nevertheless, even such a statement of personal prejudices, coming from almost any other author of M. Loti’s international literary reputation, might be taken seriously and do harm. But there is little danger of the world heeding M. Loti. It is more likely to see in “Les Alliés qu’ils nous faudrait” merely another of the author’s musical-comedy impersonations, and to leave him—as we propose to do ourselves—sitting cross-legged in his fez, and accosting all and sundry with “Pity the poor Turk, kind sir; pity the poor Turk.”

W.

SOME ASPECTS OF URDU POETRY

We, who live in India amidst the turmoil of political strife and social reforms, have often wondered why Englishmen may not study our various literary and artistic movements. Perhaps they have unconsciously been influenced by the prejudices of those of their countrymen who return to them after long years of service in India, and who have as a rule a most defective and incorrect knowledge of Indian languages; almost all the nates with whom they come into contact know English, so it seems to them unnecessary to study any of the vernaculars. In nothing are the Englishmen and the Indians further apart than in intellectual movements, and this gulf is unfortunately becoming wider daily.

Of the numerous languages spoken in India, by far the most important in India, and only a portion as to Sanskrit and Persian, it has become the tongue not only of Mohammedans, but also of several millions of Hindus. In architecture this intermingling of the two races produced the Taj at Agra; and in literature it has given us a great poetry. Though Urdu began as the camp dialect of the soldiers of the Mohammedan invaders and conquerors, yet so great has been its progress that to-day it is capable of the finest literary expression, and has gained for itself the chief place amongst our living languages of India.

As might be expected from its origin, its early poets aimed at aspiring Persian models; and though they thus increased the power of expression of the language, yet the fact that they did not give it that individuality and distinctive quality which it developed later. Their works are full of the imagery and mysticism so familiar to readers of Persian. Indeed, at times so closely have Persian poets been copied that one comes across identical expressions, and can tell which of the Persians the Urdu poet is trying to emulate. Owing to these false ideals, for quite a long time Urdu poetry remained rigid and conventional, and though some of the poets showed considerable subtlety of thought, nothing intrinsically original was written. Yet the old school did produce one great master—Ghalib. His poems, in spite of his use of strange words and long-obscure metaphors, have something of the beauty and pathos, and whether we like it or not, we are swept off our feet by the sheer force of his vehemence. The chief note in his poetry is that of pessimism. Living as he did when the old order of things was falling to pieces around him, and when Bahadur Shah, the last of the Moguls, was sent as a prisoner to Rangoon, Ghalib expressed to the world his own feelings of poignant sorrow and anguish. In the fall of his Mogul king he saw the disappearance of all that was to him noble and refine; and it is fascinating to see how again and again he tries to plunge himself into a philosophic frame of mind, and to forget the misery ever gnawing at his heart, as of new arts, sounds the death knell of the old society to which he was so intensely devoted and of which he was such a brilliant ornament. Again and again in his poems he tries to recall it, and gives us some of the most beautiful and pathetic passages in our literature:

The only thing now left to me, to remind me of the company that was wont to gather of an evening round the festive board, is the thought of love, alas! the thought of love is all that is left out.

The words here employed by him are extraordinarily beautiful, and their effect cannot be reproduced in a translation. Elsewhere he thus expresses the regrets with which his heart is full and his longing for things new no more:

Some Allah! only a few, have come back to us in the form of tulips and roses.

How beautiful, O God! must have been some of the faces that he hidden in the dust.

But Ghalib is of the past. He is still read, but only with the reverence due to an old master, and as in England one reads Milton. The new generation does not find in him an expression of the complex cravings of the modern man. With the first real contact of India and the West, fresh influences began to make themselves felt in Urdu literature. The poetry, based on older models, has given place to an artificial and frequently artificial conception of love, grew weaker and weaker till it came to an end in the eighties, when the great poet Hali openly declared himself against it. Hali is the preacher of the new movement. He had been in his younger days an ardent disciple of Ghalib, and had for years written poetry in the old style. But he came under the influence of the Mohammedan social reformer Sir Syed Ahmad Khan, and threw himself body and soul into the great struggle which was then going on in the land, between the pioneers of modernism and their numerically stronger opponents—the conservatives. The result was the publication of 1890 of the poet’s work known as the “Masaddas-i-Hali” or “The Sextains of Hali.”

This poem is the first of its kind in Urdu, and heralded in a new era in the literary annals of our language, for it laid the foundations of that patriotic and nationalistic poetry which has become such a power in our country-to-day. Hali’s message echoed from one end of the country to the other, and the great influence that it had on the Mohammedans of India is thus described by a well-known Indian critic:

Out burst the innermost heart of the poet in strains unheard of before, yet so beautiful, so touching, so mournful, so rousing, so truly poetical, that for once at least they roused even the most lethargic of the Mohammedans from their communal deep.

I have seen men destitute of principle, almost dead to a sense of religion or brotherly feeling, and given up entirely to pleasure-seeking, who used to avoid the mention of sorrow in their pleasure-meetings and abused the singers if they happened to sing a mournful piece, letting the “Masaddas” pass without objection and finding a pleasure in weeping while it was recited.

I have observed our fellow-countrypeople of other faiths being melted to tears, for genuine because spontaneous, by its pathos.

For with us in the East, poetry is still a living force, and we are not ashamed of giving vent to the emotions it evokes. The theme of this wonderful poem is the Rise and Fall of Islam, and it is described with all the sacred fervour of a poet’s soul; it expresses in the most forcible and beautiful language all that was then passing in the minds of the Mohammedans of India, all their sorrows and all their hopes. People began to feel that something great had appeared in their language, and that a great source of inspiration had been pointed out to them. The poem has outlived the opposition shown to it by the conservatives, and to-day there is no one in India who will deny that it is one of the very greatest things in Urdu.

The movement begun by Hali is still going on. The works of contemporary poets like Ikbal and Chakabat (the latter a Hindu) are read by thousands, and in them is reflected the new soul which the so-called Awakening has given to India. The “Tarana” by Ikbal has been adopted as the national song of Urdu-speaking India, and even as it carries the whole country is impatiently awaiting the publication of his latest poems.

SYED ROSS MASOOD.

Dr. Tancred Borenius will give two courses of nine lectures each at the Slade School of Fine Art, University College. To be delivered on Fridays at 8 p.m., beginning January 16; the second, on “The Florentine Art of the Renaissance,” will begin on April 20. Particulars of these and other courses on subjects connected with Fine Arts may be obtained from Mr. W. W. Seton, D.Lit., Secretary, University College, Gower Street.
List of New Books
Prepared in co-operation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding with the Dewey Decimal System, the sub-classes being indicated, for the benefit of librarians and others familiar with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. The first numeral in these represents the main class, the second one of the subdivisions, and so on.

Those works in the List which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

GENERAL WORKS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY, ENCYCLOPEDIAS, MAGAZINES.

See notice, p. 50.

Contains articles by Principal Forsyth, Sir Henry S. Lunn, Dr. J. Agar Beet, and others.

100 PHILOSOPHY.

See review, p. 43.

Le Breton (Mrs. John), The White-Magic Book. Pearson [1919]. 7 1/2 in. 125 pp. ill. 2/6 n. 133.3
An appropriate book for those persons who find entertainment in trying to tell their own fortunes.

Yost (Casper S.), Patience Worth: a psychic mystery. Skelton [1919]. 8 in. 255 pp. index. 7/6 n. 133.1
One telling criticism of so-called evidence of communications from the spirit world is the contemptible nonsense with which the supernatural beings regale their trustful devotees. The publishers and author of this compilation undertake to remedy this defect, and it is boldly announced that the deliverances herein set down "for intellectual vigour and literary quality are without precedent in chronicles of Psychical Research." Patience Worth contributes long disquisitions in prose, and reels off both rhyme and vers libres at great length:

Patter, patter, briney drops,
On my kitchel drying,
Snatter, spatter, salty stream,
Down my poor cheeks flying,
Brine enough to 'merse a ham,
Salt enough to build a dam!

This is the first time Wardour Street has been enlisted in the service of the pseudo-scientific, and from its very feeble success we expect it will be the last.

200 RELIGION.

Allen (Roland). Educational Principles and Missionsary Methods: the application of educational principles to missionary evangelism ("Library of Historic Theology"). Scott, 1919. 9 in. 160 pp. biblog. index. 7/6 n. 226.3
In this work, which is written by an Anglican Churchman, in Anglican phraseology, Mr. Allen pleads for the cultivation by missionaries of the spirit of the educator, the four specially important elements of which the author considers to be faith, scientific curiosity, respect for the pupils, and self-restraint. Dr. Gore contributes an introduction.

"Pan-Islam is an elementary handbook," explains the author, "not a text-book, still less an exhaustive treatise." It is a study of the Pan-Islamic problem on the political, social, religious, and many other sides, by one who served in the Hedjaz and Arabia during the war, but has also had a quarter of a century's experience of Mohammedan countries and peoples. As a rule he abstains from political criticism, but his remarks on progressive apostasy are sensible and illustrated by a plenty of facts.

Macandrew (Mercedes). The Supreme Adventure: being the amazing story of the Lord Jesus' descent on earth. Chapman & Hall, 1919. 7 1/2 in. 461 pp. front. index, 7/6 n. 223.9
See notice, p. 49.

*Plummer (Alfred). A Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Philippians. Scott, 1919. 9 in. 138 pp. indexes, 7/6 n. 227.6
An able commentary, preceded by an introduction in which Dr. Plummer has included a short selective bibliography.

The author of this learned and interesting work lays emphasis on the bond which linked together the religious associations of the thirteenth century. This, he shows, was the belief in the efficacy of masses and prayers for the dead, and the doctrine of purgatory, Canon Westlake considers, was the origin of the purely religious gilds, which must have come into being had the thirteenth-century never existed. The religious gild of the fourteenth and earlier centuries might best be defined as "a co-operative charity," says the author, who, after dealing with the abolition of the gilds at the period of the Reformation, remarks that the "old simple spirit of devotion . . . had passed for ever. . . . It may be that the gilds had served their purpose, but . . . there was nothing ready to take their place."

300 SOCIOLOGY.

Bond (Beverley W.), Jr. The Quit-Rent System in the American Colonies ("Yale Historical Publications," Miscellany, vol. 6). New Haven, Conn., Yale Univ. Press (Milford), 1919. 9 in. 492 pp. biblog. index, 12/6 n. 347.2
The Associate Professor of History in Purdue University describes the feudal restraints upon the land which existed in America in colonial times, and shows that the quit-tenant system contributed to the discontent that led to the revolution. The introduction is by Mr. C. M. Andrews.

Dewar (George A. B.). A Younger Son: his recollections and opinions in middle age. Grant Richards, 1920. 9 in. 276 pp., 12/6 n. 304
In the light of a mind richly stored with reminiscence, the late Editor of the Saturday Review considers the general situation during the war and after, and various subsidiary problems. He believes that the war is the first act only in the mightiest drama of evolution and revolution mingled which has been played since Christ was on the scene. He is a firm believer in the genius and the star of Mr. Lloyd George, and is inclined to disparage our secret diplomats and the other clever men of affairs who helped to bring about the war. A good deal of the book is a sketchy and entertaining narrative of his own career, with sidelong at the world in general.

*Hammond (J. L. and Barbara). The Skilled Labourer, 1760-1832. Longmans, 1919. 9 in. 407 pp. app. index, 12 8 n. 331
A review will appear.

Foch (Ferdinand), Marshal of France. Precepts and Judgments. With a sketch of the military career of Marshal Foch by Major A. Grasset. Translated by Hilahre Balloc. Chapman & Hall, 1919. 7 1/2 in. 370 pp., 9 n. 355
The introduction of 26 pages is chiefly occupied with the part played by Foch in the recent war. The rest of the book deals with (1) his theoretical teachings on war, and (2) his analyses of past campaigns. It is a volume of great interest to the student of war.

500 NATURAL SCIENCE.

Professor Harvey-Gibson discusses the more important features in the advance of botanical knowledge from the earliest times down to approximately the present day. The work is based on a course of lectures to students of the University of Liverpool. It should help a reader to form an accurate mental picture of the evolution of botanical science as a whole, and enable him to appraise the values of the results achieved by famous investigators. A very useful phylogenetic table is appended to the text, and there is a serviceable list of English works of reference.

600 USEFUL ARTS.

Davis (Kary Cadmus). HORTICULTURE ("Farm Life Text Series"). Lippincott [1919]. 8° in. 424 pp. il. app. index, 8/6 n. 635

A thorough treatise on plant propagation, vegetable gardening, orcharding, etc. The information is abundant and clearly presented, and the illustrations are excellent.

*Jacobi (Charles Thomas). PRINTING: a practical treatise on the art of typography as applied more particularly to the printing of books. Bell, 1919. 7° in. 429 pp. il. glossarial index, samples of paper, 10/6 n. 655

This sixth edition of Mr. Jacobi's well-known manual of the art and business of the printer is the recognized authority for students preparing for the examinations of H.M. Stationery Office and the City and Guilds of London Institute. Sets of examination papers are appended. The new matter comprises a chapter on methods of book-illustration.

Miles (Eustace). SELF-HEALTH AS A HABIT. Dent, 1919. 7° in. 338 pp. por. diag. index, 5/ n. 613.02

Self-health, according to Mr. Eustace Miles, is mainly an affair of balanced (vegetarian) diets, good cooking and mastication, no alcohol, but habitual sipping of hot water, deep breathing, and "sensible exercises"—more particularly "the daily stretch." The book itself is rather stretched out.

In excellent English the Japanese author of this learned and entertaining disquisition sets forth the history of "the cup of humanity," in the East and the West; describes "Teaism," a religion of aestheticism,; "a cult founded on the adoration of the beautiful among the sordid facts of everyday existence"; traces the connexion of Taoism and Zenism, and of both with Teaism; dilates on the simplicity and purism of the tea-room; and proceeds, by a natural train of thought, to an excursion on the appreciation of art and the cult of flowers. The book is finely printed, and has some pretty illustrations. The appendix deals with the ritual of the tea-room in Japan and China.

700 FINE ARTS.

See review, p. 46.

Lewis (Wyndham) and Fergusson (Louis F.). HAROLD GILMAN, Painter: an appreciation. Chatto & Windus, 1919. 12 ill. 21/ n. 758.2

See review, p. 52.

Reiss (Richard). THE HOME I WANT. Hodder & Stoughton, 1919. 7 in. 194 pp. il. apps. biblog. index, paper, 2/6 n., cl. 4/ n. 712

The housing problem is one for local authorities, the author maintains, and "greater interest, knowledge, and determination on the part of electors might long ago have forced the Council to utilize to a far greater extent the powers which they possess." He supplies a mass of instructive material, including views and plans of buildings, town-planning schemes, legal and other information; and certainly helps local authorities considerably in the task of knowing what they should do. It might be wished that more had been said about the first and last impulse to all current housing schemes that are on any scale commensurable with the nation's requirements, that is to say, the land question. "By clearing slum areas," he observes, "and by closing dilapidated houses before new ones have been erected, we shall only make matters worse." Such is the present impasse.

790 AMUSEMENTS, GAMES, SPORTS.

The editor of Golfing discourses pleasantly upon world's records, Marathon golf, shots that went astray, the giving of odds, and other topics of interest to the wielder of the niblick and the brassie.

Fulford (Harry). GOLF'S LITTLE IRONIES. Simpkin & Marshall [1919]. 141 ill. pt. 2/6 n. 796

The author, who is professional to Le Touquet Golf Club, amusingly sketches various more or less representative golf personalities, such as "The Secretary," "The Scratch Man," and "The Intimidator"; and has something to say about "The Language of the Links," "Caddies," and the like.

800 LITERATURE.

Baraja (Pio). PAGINAS ESCOGIDAS. Selección, prólogo y notas del autor. Madrid, Casa Editorial Calleja, 1918. 6° in. 502 pp. 2.30 ptas. 860.8

"Clarín" (Leopoldo Alas). PÁGINAS ESCOGIDAS. Selección, prólogo y comentarios de Azorín [J. Martínez Ruiz]. Madrid, Casa Editorial Calleja, 1917. 6° in. 394 pp. 2.50 ptas. 860.8

Palacios Véliz (Armando). PÁGINAS ESCOGIDAS. Madrid, Casa Editorial Calleja, 1917. 6° in. 378 pp. 2.50 ptas. 860.8

A convenient series of anthologies of nineteenth-century Spanish writers.

Cooper (Elizabethe), ed. THE LOVE LETTERS OF A CHINESE LADY. Edinburgh, Foulis [1919]. 8° in. 78 pp. ill. 6/ n. 885

Written by a Chinese lady, daughter of a viceroy of Chih-li, to her husband, a very high Chinese official, who is travelling round the world with his master, Prince Chung, these letters are beautifully expressed, and full of feeling and pathos.

POETRY.

Buchanan, the Sacred Bard of the Scottish Highlands: his confessions and his spiritual songs. Rendered into English verse, with his letters and a sketch of his life, by Lachlan Macbean. Simpkin & Marshall [1919]. 6° in. 224 pp. apps., 5/ n. 891.63

This Highland Bunyan is ranked by native scholars with Alexander Macdonald and Duncan Bàn MacIntyre as one of the three greatest Gaelic poets. Mr. Macbean's renderings give little idea of what the work is in the original—probably the Gaelic is untranslatable. But the account of Buchanan's life, spiritual conflicts, and almost superhuman influence over his countrymen is interesting in the extreme.

Lancelot and Guinevere: a study in three scenes. Bell, 1919- 7° in. 25 pp. paper, 1/6 n.

Three scenes in prose and verse on the well-worn theme of the loves of Lancelot and Guinevere. The blank verse is more distinguished than the prose, which has a rather sham-antique appearance. It is a pity that in Guinevere's last speech, containing the whole point and kernel of the piece, the misprint "foolstool" for "footstool" should have been overlooked.

See review, p. 40.

Ross (Sir Ronald). PSYCHOLOGIES. Murray, 1919. 7° in. 69 pp. 2/6 n. 821.9

In this volume of "psychologies" we like best the two pieces that are not psychological—"The Crump," and "The Boy's Dream." In these fantasies Sir Ronald Ross lets himself go more wholeheartedly than in the little scenes of realistic drama contained in the earlier part of the book. In his lyrics he exploits to the full those good old-fashioned metrical devices, those chimeras and rhymings so dear to Edgar Allan Poe, but so seldom heard in contemporary poetry. This faint reverberation of "The Bells" makes Sir Ronald Ross's poems all the more enjoyable.

It is not hard to detect who is Mr. Watt's master. In versification and in the general tone of their subject these thirteen pieces in blank verse are distinctly Wordsworthian. The theme is the "still sad music of humanity" somewhat sentimentalized, as it is heard in the Highlands of Scotland.
FICTION.

The theme of this novel is the clash of two strong natures, father and son, the elder wishing, from love of his son, to decide whether he shall marry. The scene is laid in the West Country, and the rustic characters are real people.

Chambers (Robert W.). In the Quarter ("Constable's Popular Series"). Constable [1919]. 7 in. 291 pp., 2/6 n.

Chambers (Robert W.). The King in Yellow ("Constable's Popular Series"). Constable [1919]. 7 in. 312 pp., 2/6 n.

The Hallcroyd in this long and somewhat didactic novel is filled by the schoolmaster and organist of a country parish. He loves beauty in all things, and looks for sincerity in every man. Coming under the influence of Christopher Smith, a young artisan who preaches altruism and the doctrine of universal brotherhood, Auberon Hope sacrifices himself for the sake of a worthless girl, whom he makes his wife, but deliverance comes at length.

Loti (Pierre). Madame Prune. Translated by S. R. C. Pimsoll. Illustrated in colour by Mortimer Menpes. Werner Laurie, 1919. S½ in. 240 pp., 10/6 n. 843.9

See review, p. 59.

*Mayne (Ethel Colburn). Blindman. Chapman & Hall, 1919. 8 in. 225 pp., 7/6 n.

See review, p. 48.

Rathkyle (M. A.). Farewell to Garrymore. Dublin, Talbot Press (Fisher Unwin) [1919]. 7½ in. 155 pp. boards, 3/6 n.

A sentimental little story of life in Ireland prior to the disestablishment of the Irish Church. The hero, accused of an act of intimidation, escapes to Philadelphia, and is joined by the girl he loves. Years after, the two return to Ireland, and all is well.

Seymour (Arthur). The Fall of the Mighty. Odhams [1919]. 7 in. 214 pp., 2/6 n.

A formidable variety of the bold and bad baronet is "Black Sir Bryan," of which things we learn from this readable story, which deals with a struggle for the hand of an heiress. The villain's machinations are defeated, but not before the detective and his friends have had an exciting "run for their money."

The best chapters of this book relate to the experiences of an Irish nurse in an English hospital. The training of a probationer, and the intimate side of hospital life, are described in considerable detail. The heroine is an Irish girl who takes up nursing as a means of livelihood, becomes a member of the Gaelic League, and finally marries a Nationalist. There is a good deal of criticism of English ways in Miss Smithson's book.

It is possible to be so good at dialect as to overdo it, and one or two of these tales of Canadians consist almost entirely of dialogue in hybrid patois, no doubt accurately reproduced, but exceeding artistic measure. Dialogue should be a commodity rather than a dish. Nevertheless, Mr. Thomson is an expert in the art of the short story and its possibilities of humour, adventure, and pathos. Realistic, diverting, or tragic, whatever the motive, he never fails to hold the reader absorbed.

Thornton (Mary Taylor). Delphine Decides. Sampson Low [1919]. 7½ in. 271 pp., 6/6 n.

Delphine de Vries, having lost her father, decides to visit some cousins living in an Eastern county. She has the gift of making herself agreeable and winning admiration, though there is something peculiar about her. The author writes well, and skilfully describes the part played by Delphine in several love-affairs.

Tremayne (Sydney). Echo Lane. Constable, 1919. 7½ in. 297 pp., 7/6 n.

Echo Stapylton is unlucky in her mother, whose husband has not to obtain a divorce. Echo lives in Belgrade with a brother-aunt, but in an impossible existence by escaping to Paris. She has there full scope for her Bohemianism, inherited from the flighty mother. But in Echo it is tempered by particularity, and the Quartier Latin leaves the heroine unscathed. She marries unfortunately, however, and is deserted by her husband. The tale is clever and readable, and eventuallly an old friend and lover responds to Echo's appeal for help and affection.

910 GEOGRAPHY, TOPOGRAPHY, ANTIQUITIES.

An agreeable narrative of a missionary's travels in Nyasaland and North-Eastern Rhodesia. The Victoria Falls, Lake Nyasa, Mrs. Livingstone's grave at Shupanga, and the monument to Livingstone at Chipundu are described by the author, whose style is light and readable. Mr. Morrison refers to the colonial dislike for missions, and to the common white prejudice against the natives, which he deprecates.

*Richardson (Ethel M.). The Story of Purton: a collection of notes and hearsay, gathered by Ethel M. Richardson. Bristol, Arrowsmith (Simpkin & Marshall), 1919. 9 in. 143 pp. il. app., 7/6 n. 914.231

An adequate and readable description of a pleasant Wiltshire village, the fine parish church of which is notable as possessing a western tower and central spire. Only two other examples of this type of building are said to exist in England—the churches at Ormskirk and Wanborough. Mrs. Richardson includes accounts of the Maskelyne and other Purton families, together with notes concerning well-known inhabitants.

*Savory (Isabel). The Romanic Roussillon: in the French Pyrenees. Fisher Unwin [1919]. 10 in. 226 pp. il. bibliog. 25/6 n. 914.489

In a delightful narrative of her own rambling in this picturesque and secluded region, Miss Savory brings vividly before the eye its scenery, towns, villages, and buildings, and its people and manners; she also gives entrancing glimpses of the romantic part of a country closely associated with Roland and Charlemagne. Useful notes for travellers are appended; there are charming pencil drawings by Miss Muriel Landseer McKenzie, reproduced by collotype; but it is a pity that the two maps are utilized as end-papers, and are thus liable to be defaced in use.

Serao (Matilde). In the Country of Jesus. Translated from the Italian by Richard Davy. Nelson [1919]. 7½ in. 250 pp., 2/6 n. 915.69

Signora Serao's account of her journey through Palestine is eminently pleasing and readable. She accepts without question the traditions concerning the places reported to be the sites of Scriptural happenings.

*Sharpe (Montagu). Middlesex in British, Roman, and Saxon Times ("Antiquities of Middlesex"). Bell, 1919. 10 in. 200 pp. maps, il. tables, index, boards, 12/6 n. 913.421

This book contains two kinds of matters: an account of the antiquities of the county pertaining to British, Roman, and Saxon times, with references to the Chronicle and other documents; and the exposition of the results of special researches on such problems as the orientation of ancient ways, the fords over the Thames, the Roman land survey, sites of churches—identified with those of pagan chapels—and the homesteads. Mr. Sharpe demonstrates that the Saxon virgate was identical with the Roman centuria of 50 jugera; 25 centuria, with an extra 50 jugera allotted for roads, etc., formed a possessio; and the boundaries of several possessio can still be traced, showing a different orientation in different districts. The maps make this and other results perfectly clear.
920 BIOGRAPHY.

These agreeable papers, dealing with Sussex ball teams, old rectors, haying, harvesting, Sussex smugglers, specimens of old Sussex dial plate, steel traps and springs, and numerous other topics, were first published for private circulation. The edition before us has been revised, extended, and largely rewritten. The author is a well-known Sussex surgeon.

Catherine (Saint) of Siena.

A sympathetic sketch of Catherine Benincasa, the fourteenth-century Sienese dyer's daughter, who, if her life was a failure in the worldly sense, has exerted an unquestionably great moral influence, which in her day was sufficient to bring back Pope Urban VI. from Avignon to Rome, in the face of tremendously powerful opposition.

Court hope (William John).

This brief biography of W. J. Courthope contains an interesting summary of his critical doctrines, as they were expressed in his History of English Poetry, and in "The Liberal Movement in English Literature," and in the chapter contributed to the "Cambridge History of English Literature" on the poetry of Spenser.

The author's recollections of the Eton of Dr. Hornby are followed by anecdotal reminiscences of Bonn, Frankfort, Paris, and elsewhere, and of English society in general. A not particularly pleasant impression is given of a young officer's life in the British army forty or fifty years ago.

Lincoln (Abraham).

Judge Wanamaker ably discusses the great President's character, and quotes from letters, speeches, and conversations, with the object of illustrating the principles upon which Lincoln moulded his life. His passion for justice and truth, his honourable and brilliant professional career, and his marvellous power as a leader of men are well brought out in this notable book.

Manly and characteristic as are these letters, they will naturally appeal chiefly to Americans, especially to those who knew the man and his family. Roosevelt was not only a lover of children, his own and others, but one whom children instinctively loved.

"This little sheaf of childish memories," says Mrs. Sedgwick, "has been put together from many talks, in her own tongue, with an old French friend." The names have been changed or slightly altered, but otherwise the character of the Breton original has been preserved. The autobiographer describes her home life eighty years ago, her father, mother, grandmother and two predecessors (one of whom descends from Bertrand du Guesclin), and draws their characters with skill and some humour—a humour reflected in the illustrations by Paul de Leslie. The book gives an attractive picture of old-world life in this corner of France.

Wilson (Harry).

Dalton (Lillian). Harry: Schoolboy and Soldier. Elliot Stock [1919]. 7 1/2 in. 64 pp. por. paper, 1/ n.

The life of Harry Wilson, son of the Vicar of Leyton, one of the many lads who fell in the war, is recorded in a simple, affectionate manner, and makes an interesting story for young people. Dr. F. S. Guy Warman, Bishop of Truro, contributes a foreword.

930-990 HISTORY.

943.08

The author, a lieutenant in the Belgian army, went on an official mission to Berlin, and wrote the history and the Armistice, and interviewed notable personages in various sections of society, including Count Brockdorff-Rantzau, General von Kluck, the late Cardinal von Hartmann, and Herren Theodor Wolff, Richard Strauss, and Maximilian Harden.

944.09

A knowledge of France, of French achievements in art, science, literature, and commerce, and of the intellectual, industrial, economic, and other resources of our ally, is at the present time more desirable than ever before, especially to the English-speaking races. This book, the general editor of which is Dr. A. S. Rappoport, supplies in a compact and convenient form just the particulars required. It begins with an excellent summary of the history of France, to which is added an account of Alsace and Lorraine and the history of the great war. Following with historical and geographical France, administrative and political France, intellectual France, social France, economic France, and Colonial France. The information in each part is extremely full and detailed, and the volume is a useful addition to the family of really necessary year-books.

949.9 THE GREAT EUROPEAN WAR.

949.9

The Greeks, the Serbs, Ukraina, the Czecho-Slovaks, Jews and Christians, the pretensions of Bulgaria, the Danube question, and the problem of nationalities in Austria-Hungary are some of the themes discussed in the forty-two papers in this volume.

Williams-Elis (Clough and A.). The Tank Corps. "Country Life" [1919]. 9 1/2 in. 304 pp. il. por. index, 10/6 n. 949.9

This well-illustrated book will be generally welcomed; for most civilians have an intelligent curiosity as to the construction and functions of one of the oddest-looking, but most terrible of modern engines of war—the "new " tank," as the author calls it—"a weapon forged in England." The author concludes that "in the phase at which military science has arrived, and at which it will probably remain for at least a generation, a superior force of Tanks can always tip the scales of the military balance of power."

J. CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

310.4

Not a bad way of introducing children to economic and industrial history is this series of stories from the times of the guilds, the wool-merchants, weavers, goldsmiths, master-carvers, and their apprentices, with graphic descriptions of medieval towns, manners, travelling and trading. The stories have the one defect, as a child would put it, "of not ending up properly;" but this is inherent in truth that is stranger than fiction.

940.9

Mr. Pearce's volume contains not merely an account of the heroic exploits of British soldiers, but also a compendious history of the war. The individual acts are fitted into their place in the larger strategic movements, whether on land or on sea. The book is illustrated by half-tone drawings, reproduced for the most part from the picture papers of the war.

For the Proprietors of THE ATHENÆUM by BRITISH PERIODICALS, LTD., 15 and 16, Gough Square, Fleet Street, London, E.C., and Published by THE ATHENÆUM PUBLISHING CO., LTD., at their Offices, 10, Adolph Terrace, W.C.2.
By RUFUS M. JONES, M.A., D.Litt.

Assisted by Isaac Sharpless, D.Sc., and Amelia M. Gummere.

THE QUAKERS IN THE AMERICAN COLONIES.
8vo. 12s. net.

_The Guardian—"This is one of the most interesting religious histories that we have ever read."

_Saturday Review—"A book which should soon rank as the standard work on the subject."

Mystical Religion.
Third Impression. 8vo. 12s. net.

_The Spectator—"Mr. Rufus M. Jones's 'Studies' are full of charm and interest."

SPIRITUAL REFORMERS IN THE 16TH & 17TH CENTURIES.
8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

_The Guardian—"Written with a singular charm of style (due to a true spiritual earnestness), of which his volume on the Quakers in America showed him to be a master, the author's present study is one of remarkable attractiveness."

Appointments Vacant

THE COMMITTEE OF EDGE HILL TRAINING COLLEGE will proceed to elect a PRINCIPAL in the Spring Term, 1920. The selected candidate will be expected to enter on her duties September 1, 1920.

Applications from candidates for this office should be addressed not later than February 14, 1920, to—

F. STANLEY MORRIS,
Secretary,
Edge Hill Training College,
Lancashire, North John Street,
Liverpool.

From whom information as to the duties and emoluments of the Principal may be obtained.

REFORMATORY AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS.
VACANCY FOR A WOMAN INSPECTOR.

There is a Vacancy for a Woman Inspector of Reformatory and Industrial Schools for which applications are invited. Candidates must be under 40 years of age. Preference will be given to Women of University training who have had experience of residential schools or social work among girls. The salary is £250, rising by increments of £15 a year to £350 (excluding war bonus which would amount at present rate to £353 a year on the initial salary).

Applications giving full particulars of qualifications and experience and copies of testimonials should be sent to the Chief Inspector of Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Home Office, Whitehall, on or before January 17.

BRIDLINGTON HIGH SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.—REQUIRED at once, Music Mistress, Piano and some Singing.—Apply Head Mistress.

EAST SUFFOLK COUNTY EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

Woman Instructor and Inspector of Physical Training.

The Committee invite applications from women for appointment as Instructor and Inspector of Physical Training. The applicants must be prepared to devote all the time to the work. They must have full knowledge of Swedish Drill and of the requirements of the latest syllabus issued by the Board of Education. The selected candidate will be required to organize and inspect Physical Exercises in Secondary and Elementary Schools maintained by the Committee, and to give instruction to Teachers and Children of such Schools. Salary will be at the rate of £200 per annum, rising to £250, with travelling expenses according to scale.

Applications giving full particulars of qualifications, including experience in similar positions (if any), and stating age, together with copies of not more than three recent testimonials, must be sent to the undersigned not later than January 31, 1920.

W. E. WATKINS,
Secretary.

Education Office,
County Hall,
Ipswich.

TRAVELLER REQUIRED to represent Export Booksellers in Scandinavia. Must speak German. State age, previous experience and salary expected, to H.G., c/o Dawsons, 121, Cannon Street, E.C.4.

COUNTY BOROUGH OF STOKE-ON-TRENT EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

HANLEY SECONDARY SCHOOL.

WANTED
(1) MATHEMATICAL MASTER with an HONOURS DEGREE for ADVANCED COURSE WORK with the BOYS. Commencing salary £300-£400, dependent upon qualifications and experience.

(2) ASSISTANT MISTRESS with good qualifications in GEOGRAPHY, ability to assist in some other subject will be a recommendation. Salary £160-£200, according to scale.

(3) ASSISTANT MISTRESS to teach LATIN and some ELEMENTARY MATHEMATICS to the GIRLS. Teaching experience essential.

Forms of application (which should be returned duly filled up as soon as possible) may be obtained on receipt of stamped addressed foolscap envelope from Town Hall, Hanley.

DR. W. LUDFORD FREEMAN,
Director of Education.

Appointments Vacant

CITY OF BRADFORD EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

SCHOOL OF ART.

WANTED, for the end of April, PRINCIPAL for SCHOOL OF ART. Applicants, besides possessing Art qualifications, must also be prepared to undertake the business organisation of the general school work, the Trade Craft Classes, and the Pre-Apprenticeship Classes. Commencing salary not less than £600, rising to £600. Further particulars, together with form of application, may be obtained from the Director of Education, Town Hall, Bradford. Applications should be forwarded not later than the 29th February, 1920.

Appointments Wanted

LIBRARY WORK of any kind anxiously desired by demobilised lieutenant-scholar of leading public school and of college at Cambridge. First-class Classical Tripos, good French and German; age 40; schoolmaster till enlistment (1915).—Box 543, Athenæum Advert, Office, 170, Fleet Street, London, E.C.4.

WOMAN SECRETARY (own portable typewriter) offers whole or part-time services.—Write X. care of Athenæum Advert, Office, 170, Fleet Street, London, E.C.4.

Partnership

PARTNERSHIPS WANTED from £1,000 to £10,000. No sum too large, as men of the largest means seek employment with investment.—The Officers' Partnership Guardian, 53, Victoria Street, S.W.1.

Booksellers & Catalogues

OFFERED AT 3/- PER VOLUME POST FREE.

Three Books by AUGUST STRINDBERG in English.

(1) HISTORICAL MINIATURES. Twenty-three Essays.

(2) IN MIDSUMMER DAYS, AND OTHER TALES. Thirteen Stories.

(3) ZONES OF THE SPIRIT. A Book of Thoughts.

L. CHAUDY OF OXFORD, LTD.,
2, ALBEMAREL STREET, LONDON, W.1.

BOOKS AND AUTOGRAPHHS.
CATALOGUES FREE.

EGYPT, PALESTINE, and the FAR EAST; Travel; Arabian Nights; and Napoleon Era. New Catalogue post free on application.—J. A. ALLEN & Co., 16, Grenville Street, London, W.C.1.

Authors' Agents, etc.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE are prepared to consider and place MSS. for early publication. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interests first. Twenty years' experience. Please note new address: 93 and 94, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.2.

LITERARY Translations and Typewriting. Highest refs.—Philologit Bureau, 43, Palatine Rd., Stoke Newington, N.

AUTHORS'—MSS. placed at highest prices; free monthly prizes; terms for stamp.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 0, Henrietta St., W.C.2

PROOF READING, INDEXING, RESEARCHES, REVISION—Lingist, good experience.—Mr. F. A. HARDMAN, 15, Bellevue Mansions, Forest Hill, S.E.23.

TO AUTHORS.—Harold B. Browne has special facilities for placing MSS. for new writers on favourable terms.—10, Adam Street, Strand, W.C.2.
Art Exhibitions

ROYAL ACADEMY
The Nation's War Paintings
IMPERIAL WAR MUSEUM EXHIBITION.
Weekdays, 10-6. "1/3 TEA-ROOM.

GRAFTON GALLERIES.
Paintings and Sculpture by representative artists; also works by PAUL SARRUT and FRANK CALDERON.
10 - 6.

NEW ENGLISH ART CLUB
61st Exhibition, January 1-30,
R.W.S. Galleries, 5a, Pall Mall East. (Nr. National Gallery.)
Daily 10-17.30

THE CHINESE GALLERY
20, James Street, Oxford Street, W.1
CHINESE WORKS OF ART
Porcelains, Jade, Embroideries, Lace, etc.
Frequent direct consignments

Typewriting &c.

TYPEWRITING OF EVERY DESCRIPTION carefully and promptly executed at home, 1s. per 1,000 words; carbon copy, 3d. per 1,000 words. Duplicating. Cambridge Local.—Miss NANCY MCFARLANE, 11, Palmeira Avenue, Westcliffe Essex.

AUTHORS MSS., etc., neatly and correctly typed. University qualifications.—G. CUMMINS, 10, King Street, W.C.2.

Miscellaneous

NORWICH UNION FIRE OFFICE.
Founded 1797. HEAD OFFICE, NORWICH and LONDON (London Head Office, 50, FLEET STREET, E.C.4.)
CHIEF A71 and 72, King William Street, E.C.4.
LONDON BRANCHES 122, Birch Lane, E.C.3 (Marine and Accident).

CLAIMS PAID EXCEED........... £31,000,000.
Branches and Agencies throughout the World.

STEVENS' AUCTION ROOMS. Estd. 1760.
TUESDAY, JANUARY 20th, at 12.30.
COLLECTION of JAPANESE WORKS OF ART, including Cabinets, Lacquer Panels, Ivory Carvings, etc., Bronzes, Pottery, Kyllins, Oriental Curtains and Hangings, Egyptian Curios, Weapons and Fabrics; Moorish Glass and Metal Works of Art; Persian and Indian Weapons and Metal Ware; West African Figures and Curios from all parts of the globe. Collected by Mrs. Charlotte Cameron, the Authoress and Traveller.
M R. J. C. STEVENS will SELL the above PROPERTY by AUCTION, at his Rooms, 38, King Street, Covent Garden, W.C.2.
On view day prior 9.30 to 5.30 and morning of sale till 12 o'clock.
Catalogues on application.

THE POEMS OF WILFRID WILSON
GIBSON &c

Price 6d. Postage 1d.

No. II. of The Westminster Classics consists of a collection of twenty-five of the Poems of Wilfrid Wilson Gibson the special merits of which have been widely recognised by the Press.

The Nation says of them:—"The main thing about these poems is that they are extraordinary poems; by means of their psychology, no less and no more than by means of their metre, their rhyme, their intellectual form and their concrete imagery, they pierce us with flashing understanding of what war is and means—not merely what it is to these individual pieces of ordinary human nature who are injured by it and who yet dominate it, but, by evident implication what war is in itself, as a grisly multi- lated whole. It seems to us beyond question that Mr. Gibson's 'Battle' is one of the most remarkable results the war has had in literature."

THE ATHENÆUM
LITERATURE DEPT.,
10, ADELPHI TERR., W.C.2.

Important.
The Publisher will be glad to hear from readers of "The Athenæum" who experience any difficulty in obtaining copies. All communications sent to 10 Adelphi Terrace, W.C.2, will receive immediate attention.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES:
INLAND, FOREIGN,
£1 8s. 2d. per annum £1 10s. per annum
post free. post free.
Shorter periods in proportion.

Subscriptions should be sent to The Publisher,
2 QUESTIONS
Will Test Your Investment Position.

1. IS YOUR CAPITAL SAFE?
2. IS THE INCOME YOU RECEIVE FROM YOUR CAPITAL SUFFICIENTLY HIGH TO COMPENSATE FOR THE RISKS YOU ARE RUNNING?

If you feel any difficulty in answering these Questions you are invited to join the BRITISH INVESTORS ASSOCIATION LTD.

4, LONDON WALL BUILDINGS, E.C.

The Directors are:

The Right Hon. Lord Morris, K.C., P.C., D.C.L., Chairman, Director, General Accident, Fire & Life Assurance Corporation Limited.
Chairman, Investment Registry Limited.

Rowland F. W. Hodge, Esq., M.I.N.A. M.I.C.E., Chipstead Place, Sevenoaks, Kent.

Sidney Van Den Bergh, Esq., Mark Lane Station Buildings, E.C.3.
Director, Messrs. Van Den Berghs, Limited.

Lt.-Col. E. G. H. Cox, C.B.E., 60A, Redcliffe Square, S.W.

Joint Managing Directors:
Arthur G. Cousins, Esq., C.B.E.
Edgar G. Cubbins, Esq.

The Association has recently issued a publication:

"Underwriting for the Investor," which is full of valuable and interesting information for Investors. It also explains generally the business of the Association, how it can help you, and how you can join if you wish to do so. A copy will be sent free of charge to all applicants mentioning this paper.
THE CONSOLATIONS OF HISTORY

IT is pleasant to be transferred from an office where one is afraid of a sergeant-major into an office where one can intimidate generals, and perhaps this is why History is so attractive to the more timid amongst us. We can recover self-confidence by snubbing the dead. The captains and the kings depart at our slightest censure, while as for the “hosts of minor officials” who cumber court and camp, we heed them not, although in actual life they entirely block our social horizon. We cannot visit either the great or the rich when they are our contemporaries, but by a fortunate arrangement the palaces of Ujjain and the warehouses of Ormus are open for ever, and we can even behave outrageously in them without being expelled. The King of Ujjain, we announce, is extravagant, the merchants of Ormus unspeakably licentious...and sure enough Ormus is a desert now and Ujjain a jungle, and neither of them will be immortalized by a visit from the Prince of Wales. Difficult to realize that the past was once the present, and that, transferred to it, one would be just the same little worm as to-day, unimportant, parasitic, nervous, occupied with trifles, unable to go anywhere or alter anything, friendly only with the obscure, and only at ease with the dead; while up on the heights the figures and forces who make History would contend in their habitual fashion, with incomprehensible noises or in ominous quiet. “There is money in my house...there is no money...no house.” That is all that our sort can ever know about doom. The extravagant king, the licentious merchants—they escape, knowing the ropes.

If only the sense of actuality can be lulled—and it sleeps for ever in most historians—there is no passion that cannot be gratified in the past. The past is devoid of all dangers, social and moral, and one can meet with perfect ease not only kings, but people who are ever rarer on one’s visiting list. We faces from Cambridge—we cannot help having our dreams. Was life then warm and tremendous? Did the Vijayanagar Government really succeed in adjusting the balance between society and sex?—a task that has baffled even Mrs. Humphry Ward. We cannot tell; we can only be certain that it acted with circumspection and pomposity, and that most of its subjects did not know what it was up to. The myriads of nomenities who thronged its courts and camps, and were allotted inferior courtesans or none at all—alas! it is with these alone that readers of THE ATHENÆUM can claim kinship.

Yet sweet though it is to daily with the past, one returns to its inner pleasures of morality in the end. The schoolmaster in each of us awakes, examines the facts of History, and marks them on the result of the examination. Not all the marks need be bad. Some incidents, like the Risorgimento, get excellent as a matter of course, while others, such as the character of Queen Elizabeth, get excellent in the long run. Nor must events be marked at their face value. Why was it right of Drake to play bowls when he heard the Armada was approaching, but wrong of Charles II. to catch moths when he heard that the Dutch Fleet had entered the Medway? The answer is “Because Drake won.” Why was it right of Alexander the Great to throw away water when his army was perishing, but wrong of Marie Antoinette to say “Let them eat cake”? The answer is “Because Marie Antoinette was executed.” Why was George Washington right because he would not tell a lie, and Jael right because she told nothing else? Answers on similar lines. We must take a larger view of the past than of the present, because when examining the present we can never be sure what is going to pay. As a general rule, anything that ends abruptly must be given bad marks; for instance, the Fourth Century B.C. at Athens, the year 1492 in Italy, and the summer of 1914 everywhere. A civilization that passes quickly must be decadent, therefore let us censure those epochs that thought themselves so bright, let us show that their joys were hectic and their pleasures vile, and clouded by the premonition of doom. On the other hand, a civilization that does not pass, like the Chinese, must be stagnant, and is to be censured on that account. Nor can one approve anarchy. What then survives? O, a greater purpose, the slow evolution of Good through the centuries—an evolution less slow than it seems, because a thousand years are as yesterday, and consequently Christianity was only, so to speak, established on Wednesday last. And if this argument should seem flimsy (it is the Bishop of London’s, not our own—he put it into his Christmas sermon) one can at all events return to an indubitable triumph of evolution—one self, sitting untouched and untouchable in the professorial chair, and giving marks to men.

Sweet then is dalliance, censure sweeter. Yet sweetest of all is pity; because it subtly combines the pleasures of the other two. To pity the dead because they are dead is to experience an exquisite pleasure, identical with the agreeable heat that comes to the eyes in a churchyard. The heat has nothing to do with sorrow, it has no connection with anything that one has personally known and held dear. It is half a sensuous delight, half gratified vanity, and Shakespeare knew what he was about when he ascribed such a sensation to the fantastical Armado. They had been laughing at Hector, and Armado, with every appearance of generosity, exclaims: “The sweet war-man is dead and rotten; sweet chuck, beat not the bones of the buried; when he breathed he was a man.” It was his happiest moment; he had never felt more certain either that he was alive himself, or that he was Hector. And it is a happiness that we can all experience until the sense of actuality breaks in. Pity wraps the student of the past in an ambrosial cloud, and washes his limbs with eternal youth. “Dear dead women with such hair too,” but not “I feel chilly and grown old.” That comes with the awakening.

E. M. F.
Mr. Archer proved by himself translating some of Sir Arthur Pinero’s vivid and flexible dialogue into a characteristic piece of Elizabethan rhetoric which ended: “I am a married man, you ain’t.”

But Mr. Archer never allows himself to be merely witty. Every shaft carries a sound moral lesson in its tail. And if we can afford to laugh at the Elizabethans for their form, their content must be dealt with more sternly. They, in the first place, never inculcate a lesson: no sound morals on the tails of their shafts. What is there, Mr. Archer might well ask with a sigh, in the whole range of the Elizabethan theatre, to compare in elevation of thought with the didactic works of Mr. Galsworthy? Even, however, if the Elizabethans were forgiven for their omissions, the sins they have committed would make them unforgivable. Their indecency! and their brutality! As to the indecency there is nothing more to be said; but the brutality may be enlarged upon, and we may follow Mr. Archer as he enumerates with a look of horror upon his face the immense list of tortures of every kind which he has extracted from the Elizabethan drama. So profound indeed is the look of horror upon his face that it is difficult to avoid a suspicion of this warm-hearted man being under the impression that at the “Phoenix” performance the other day he was the unwilling witness of eight real deaths. If this were so—but we doubt it—and of such practices attended every performance of the “Duchess of Malfi,” Mr. Archer and Sir Leo Chiozza-Money would be thoroughly justified in demanding the suppression of the “Phoenix” and in declaring that the seventeenth century was barbarous. The police, however, no doubt have their eye on the matter.

But unluckily Mr. Archer is far too late in the launching of his offensive. While he leads on his troops, ably supported by those gallant lieutenants, Mr. Baughan and Sir Leo Money, he has failed to observe in the heat of the battle that he has been taken in the rear by an overwhelming enemy force, and that his own positions are in imminent risk of capture. Thirty years ago there would have been some slight chance of a few people attending to what Mr. Archer has to say. But the younger generation to-day is entirely unable to sympathize with or even to understand the basis upon which his attitude rests. If he is impressed by the warmth of his reception by the young men and women at King’s College it will be only another sign of his remoteness from the facts. He was applauded not because of his views, but because of the liveliness and violence with which he expressed them. The younger generation has nothing but amused contempt for the naturalism which is the standard of all Mr. Archer’s aesthetic judgments; the “repertory play” is a byword of abuse among them; they believe that “colour” must be brought into the theatre and that “rhythm” is the foundation of the universe; even the most sacred dogmas of Mr. Archer’s system of ethics tremble to-day before their final collapse. What melancholy folly urges him to waste his last moments upon this fluttering in the face of destiny? Is it too late to urge him to some more useful task? to persuade him that this is a time for defence rather than offence? that this is no moment for reckless onslaughts upon Ben Jonson and Webster when the citadel of Ibsen himself reels before the gleaming cohorts of Lord Dunsany and Mr. Drinkwater?

J. S.

INSENSIBILITY

Happy are men who yet before they are killed
Can let their veins run cold;
Whom no compassion fleers
Or makes their feet
Sore on the alleys cobbled with their brothers,
The front line withers,
But they are troops who fade, not flowers
For poets’ tearful foiling:
Men, gaps for filling,
Losses who might have fought
Louder, but no one bothers.

And some cease feeling
Even themselves or for themselves,
Dullness best solves
The tease and doubt of shelling,
And Chance’s strange arithmetic
Comes simpler than the reckoning of their shining;
They keep no check on Armies’ decimation.

Happy are these who lose imagination:
They have enough to carry with ammunition,
Their spirit drags no pack,
Their old wounds save with cold can not more ache;
Having seen all things red,
Their eyes are rid
Of the hurt of the colour of blood for ever,
And terror’s first constriction over
Their hearts remain small drawn,
Their senses, in some scorching cautery of battle
Now long since ironed,
Can laugh among the dying unconcerned.

Happy the soldier home, with not a notion
How somewhere every dawn some men attack
And many sighs are drained.
Happy the lad whose mind was never trained;
His days are worth forgetting more than not,
He sings along the march
Which we march taciturn because of dusk—
The long, forlorn, relentless trend
From larger day to luger night.

We wise, who with a thought besmirch
Blood over all our soul,
How should we see our task
But through his blunt and lashless eyes?
Alive he is not vital overmuch,
Dying, not mortal overmuch,
Nor sad nor proud
Nor curious at all;
He cannot tell
Old men’s placidity from his.

But cursed are dulcets whom no cannon stuns,
That they should be as stones.
Wretched are they and mean
With paucity that never was simplicity.
By choice they made themselves immune
To pity and whatever mourns in man
Before the last sea and the hapless stars,
Whatever mourns when many leave these shores,
Whatever shares
The eternal reciprocity of tears.

Wilfred Owen.

[Wilfred Owen was killed in action on November 4, 1918.]
REVIEWS
SWINBURNE

SELECTIONS FROM SWINBURNE. Edited by Edmund Gosse and Thomas James Wise. (Heinemann. 6s. net.)

Without having at hand the older volume of Selections made by Swinburne himself it may yet be said that the present selection is a good one. It would have been more "representative" if it had included one or two of the "Songs before Sunrise," and the omission of "Laus Veneris" and especially "The Leper" is regrettable. What one would like to have would be a volume of selections including these poems and omitting the two choruses from "Atalanta," and another volume containing the whole of "Atalanta." The student, of course, wants to read one of the Stuart plays and to dip into "Tristram of Lyonesse." Very few people will want to read these, and almost no one will want to read the whole of Swinburne. A selection is therefore necessary, and also is sufficient. It is not because Swinburne is voluminous; certain other poets, equally voluminous, must be read complete. And it is not that a few of Swinburne's poems are much better than the rest. The necessity and the difficulty of a selection are due to the peculiar nature of Swinburne's "contribution," which, it is hardly too much to say, is of a very different kind from that of any other poet of equal reputation.

We may agree that Swinburne did make a contribution; that he did something that had not been done before, and that what he did will not turn out to be a fraud. And from that we may proceed to inquire what Swinburne's contribution was, and why, whatever critical solvents we employ to break down the structure of his verse, this contribution remains. The test is this: agreed that we do not (and I think that the present generation does not) enjoy Swinburne, and agreed that (a more serious condemnation) at one period of our lives we did enjoy him, and now no longer enjoy him; nevertheless, the words which we use to state our grounds for dislike or indifference cannot be applied to Swinburne as they can to bad poetry. The words of condemnation are words which express his qualities. You may say "diffuse." But the diffuseness is essential; had Swinburne practised greater concentration his verse would be, not better in the same kind, but a different thing. His diffuseness is one of his glories. That so little material as appears to be employed in "The Triumph of Time" should release such an amazing number of words, requires what there is no reason to call anything but genius. You could not condense "The Triumph of Time." You could only leave out. And this would destroy the poem; though no one stanza seem essential. Similarly, a considerable quantity—a volume of selections—is necessary to give the quality of Swinburne, although there is perhaps no one poem essential in this selection.

If then we must be very careful in applying terms of censure, like "diffuse," we must be equally careful in praise. "The beauty of Swinburne's verse is the sound," people say, explaining "he had little visual imagination." I am inclined to think that the word "beauty" is hardly to be used in connection with Swinburne's verse at all; but in any case the beauty or effect of sound is neither that of music nor that of poetry which can be set to music. There is no reason why verse intended to be sung should not present a sharp visual image or convey an important intellectual meaning, it for supplements the music by another means of affecting the feelings. What we get in Swinburne is an expression by sound, which could not possibly associate itself with music. For what he gives is not images and ideas and music, it is one thing which is a curious mixture of suggestions of all three.

Shall I come, if I swim? wide are the waves, you see:
Shall I come, if I fly, my dear Love, to thee?

This is Campion, and an example of the kind of music that is not to be found in Swinburne. It is an arrangement and choice of words which has a sound-value and at the same time a coherent comprehensible meaning, and the two things, the musical beauty and the meaning, are two things and not one. But in Swinburne there is no pure beauty; no pure beauty of sound, or of image or of idea.

Music, when soft voices die,
Vibrates in the memory.
Ondors, when sweet violets sicken,
Live within the sense they quicken.
Rose leaves, when the rose is dead,
Are heaped for the beloved bed;
And so thy thoughts, when thou art gone,
Love itself shall slumber on.

I quote from Shelley because Shelley is supposed to be the master of Swinburne; and because his song, like that of Campion, has what Swinburne has not—a beauty of music and a beauty of content; and because it is clearly and simply expressed, with only two adjectives. Now, in Swinburne the meaning and the sound are one thing. He is concerned with the meaning of the word in a peculiar way: he employs, or rather "works," the word's meaning. And this is connected with an interesting fact about his vocabulary: he uses the most general word, because his emotion is never particular, never in direct line of vision, never focussed; it is emotion reinforced, not by intensification, but by expansion.

There lived a singer in France of old
By the tideless dolorous midland sea.
In a land of sand and ruin and gold
There shone one woman, and none but she.

You see that Provence is the merest point of diffusion here. Swinburne defines the place by the most general word, which has for him its own value. "Gold," "ruin," "dolorous": it is not merely the sound that he wants, but the vague associations of idea that the words give him. He has not his eye on a particular place.

Lui ruscelletti che del verdi colli
Del Casentino discendono in Arno . . .

It is, in fact, the word that gives him the thrill, not the object. When you take to pieces any verse of Swinburne, you find always that the object was not there—only the word. Compare

Snowdrops that plead for pardon
And pine for fright with the daffodils that come before the swallow dares. The snowdrop of Swinburne disappears, the daffodil of Shakespeare remains. The swallow of Shakespeare remains, in the verse in "Macbeth"; the bird of Wordsworth

Breaking the silence of the seas remains; the swallow of "Ithyus" disappears. Compare, again a chorus of "Atalanta" with a chorus from Athenian tragedy. Your specimen of the latter may possibly be full of sententious commonplace; but it is significant commonplace. The chorus of Swinburne is almost a parody of the Athenian: it is sententious, but it has not even the significance of commonplace.

At least we witness of thee ere we die
That these things are not otherwise, but thus . . .

Before the beginning of years
There came to the making of man
Time with a gift of tears;
Grief with a glass that ran . . .

This is not merely "music": it is effective because it appears to be a tremendous statement, like statements made in our dreams; when we wake up we find that the "glass that ran" would do better for time than for grief, and that the gift of tears would be as appropriately bestowed by grief as by time.
It might seem to be intimated, by what has been said, that the work of Swinburne can be shown to be a sham just as bad verse is often a sham. It would only be so if you could produce or suggest something that it pretends to be and is not. The world of Swinburne does not depend upon some other world which it simulates; it has the necessary completeness and self-sufficiency for justification and permanence. It is impersonal, and no one else could have made it. The deductions are true to the pastiches. It is indestructible. None of the obvious complaints that were or might have been brought to bear upon the first "Poems and Ballads" hold good. It is not morbid, it is not erotic, it is not destructive. These are adjectives which can be applied to the material, the human feelings, which, in Swinburne's case, do not exist. The morbidity is not of human feeling, but of language. Language in a healthy state presents the object, is so close to the object that they are one thing. They are one thing in the verse of Swinburne simply because the object has ceased to exist, because the meaning is merely the hallucination of meaning, because language, uprooted, has adapted itself to an independent life of atmospheric nourishment. In Swinburne, for example, we see the word "wearies" flourishing in the void independent of the particular and actual weariness of flesh or spirit. The bad poet dwells partly in a world of objects and partly in a world of words, and he never can get them to fit. Only a man of genius could dwell so exclusively and consistently among words as Swinburne. His language is not, like the language of bad poetry, dead. It is very much alive, with this singular life of its own. But the language which is more important to us is that which is struggling to digest and express new objects, new groups of objects, new feelings, new aspects, as, for instance, the prose of Mr. James Joyce or Mr. Joseph Conrad.

T. S. E.

AN ANOMALY IN EUROPE

The Turks in Europe: A Sketch-Study. By W. E. D. Allen,
With preface by Brigadier-General H. C. Surtees. (Murray, 1920. 6d net)

I was but a little before the time when the Norman adventurers were conquering England that the first Turkish Seljuk dynasty was founded. Toghrul Bey swept down from the northern districts of Khorasan and overran Persia and Armenia, overthrowing the Mohammedan dynasties of Ghazna and Isfahan; two hundred years later the Tartar mongol swarmed at its height, and the hordes of Jengis Khan had devastated Asia Minor. Then in 16th century it was that a little Turkish shepherd tribe under Er-Toghrul, fugitive from the Tatars, which had wandered into Asia Minor, laid the foundations of the Turkish Empire; tradition relates how one day by accident they happened on a battle in progress, and took part of the losing side, which turned out to be the troops of Aladdin, the Seljuk Sultan of Konya, and with the resultant victory were rewarded with the towns of Eskh-Shehr (to-day the junction of Angora on the Anatolian Railway) and Sugut.

From that time Amurath to Amurath has succeeded in this battered caravanserai of Turkey, Sultan after Sultan has abode with his pomp and gone his way, until the Empire, a very sick man in the Nineteenth Century, came, thanks to its German physicians, to its agony. Its long history shows how little the Turks have advanced in civilization; worship of violence, ignorance of the peasantry, corruption, injustice, are as great to-day as when they were three centuries ago, when Sir Thomas Roe wrote of them as he found them in 1622. It would be illuminating to discover how few lines would be enough to describe the quota provided by Turkish brains to the advancement of the humanities. Even in war, that "fresh and joyous" pastime in which they have so frequently indulged, when there was no opportunity for massacring Armenians, the Turks have long been dependent for their weapons on Western invention. To follow the rise of Turkish power in the Near East is to trace a dreary story of murder, massacre, harem intrigue and violence. Well does Mr. Allen quote Arsène Perlan: "Turkey is the classic land of massacres.
Its history may be briefly stated as robberies, murders, revolts, civil wars, foreign, civil, and counter-revolutions, seditions and mutinies." Even as a soldier the Turk has been overrated, as many an intelligence officer will tell.

Osman succeeds Er-Toghrul, and gives his name to the Osmans; Orkhan, his son, organizes the army, and before he dies achieves the complete expulsion of Greeks from Asia and the establishment of Turkish power on European soil. Yet within half a century Timur Leng leads a fresh wave of Tatar invasion across Asia, and this leaves the Ottoman Empire weakened and disorganized, only to revive again under Mohammed II, in the fifteenth century, to rise to its zenith under Sulaiman the Magnificent. Then the decay natural to all Eastern nations sets in; the decay of Activity, of progress, of being always the first in results. The Peace of Carlowicz in 1698 marks the end of the Turkish menace to Christendom, and twenty years later the Turks lose their last foothold in Hungary.

Apart from trading ventures, British interest in Turkey was stirred when Napoleon boasted that he would destroy our Eastern empire, and in the Baghdad Residency to-day one of the walls bears an inscription setting forth the intention of the British Raj of counteracting his machinations in the East. Turkey and Egypt were on our highway to India, and until the Battle of the Nile our position was precarious. Exactly the same threat was conveyed by the Baghdad Railway, which was to link Berlin with the Persian Gulf, and yet both these now lie abandoned, and the threat to have costly results. Politically, as long as our Eastern empire lasts, the lands on both sides of the Suez Canal will be big with possibilities for us.

Mr. Allen's book is, therefore, one which those Englishmen who take to heart the perils to which the British Empire will be exposed in the future should study. All our ambassadors to Turkey have not been Cunnings, to cope with the unscrupulous wits which flourish in Constantinople; Enver, Talat, and their like are types reproducible in the Turkey of to-morrow. The Committee of Union and Progress is still in existence, and doubtless the spirit of the Donmés is still a potential force in Constantinople.

Whether Mr. Allen is right in his estimate of Enver, time alone can show: "Enver, the popular hero of Stamboul, favoured the Germans. But it would be unjust to assume that he accepted bribes from Berlin." This history makes it clear that the Turks are an anachronism, and are quite unfit to be entrusted with the government of races other than their own. The massacres of the Armenians (on which Mr. Allen does not lay sufficient stress) are just as the German callousness in this regard, are ample evidence for this opinion. Actually so infamous have these massacres been that a few Germans, to whom the blood-lust of their allies was abhorrent, raised vigorous but useless protests, notably Dr. Lampsin, whose account,"printed as manuscript" "secretly confidential," escaped the German Censor in one or two instances, and has now been printed in French. In assessing the Turkish character in future, these massacres should not be forgotten.

Mr. Allen slips in a few unimportant points: "the thirsty mad agony of Kut" is not a good description of the besieged town, placed as it was exactly on the brink of the Tigris; the Turkish army in 1895 was destroyed by Ibrahim, not at Nisbin, but at Nezib, a few miles west of Birejik, on the Euphrates. But these are of little moment.

R. C. T.
PROFESSOR DOBSON'S "GREEK ORATORS"

The Greek Orators. By J. F. Dobson, Professor of Greek in the University of Bristol. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)

"This book," says the wrapper, "is designed for University students and for Sixth Forms in public schools." Discretion would have ended the sentence here. If a Sixth Form boy or a candidate for a Tripos is set the task of reading a selection from the Attic orators, he will find that the cheapest way of scoring marks in his examination (and no bad way of gathering some profit from a rather barren field) is to study Mr. Dobson's book. He will find there much that is worth remembering about the lives, the style, the subject-matter of the ten great pleaders, and he will find it all more tersely, more conveniently expressed than on the volumes of the late Professors Jebb and Blass. His task will be made less irksome by the fact that Mr. Dobson is not destitute of humour. He will be cheered on his somewhat tedious journey by noticing from time to time that his guide, while carefully recording the opinions of the Alexandrine pedants, has moments of independent courage, as, for instance, when he dares to own that Lysias, for all his perfect Attic style, seems often dull, or that Andocides, at whose lack of art the ancient critics grumble, is really at his best when he is least affected. In fact, had the wrapper ended with the public schools, we might have been content to congratulate the author on a modest, useful piece of academic work, or, as modern undergraduates might phrase it, on a perfectly good text-book.

Unfortunately the wrapper makes a larger claim. It informs us that the author has endeavoured to make his book intelligible not to specialists alone, but "to persons of general education who find, or ought to find, interest in the subject." Intelligible, we admit, he has made it, and of general interest, so far as the subject he has chosen has allowed. But discussions of the style, the periodic structure of the sentences, the rhythms and the treatment of hiatus cannot, with the best will in the world, be made intelligible to a reader who does not know Greek. To a Greek or a "specialist" the metaphor of ἔσχελος, ἄθροισθεν ὑπὸ πίστεως, may or may not appear as vivid and well-chosen as Mr. Dobson thinks, but what can a general public be asked to understand by "it was good rhetoric, everybody's ears"? Or what of "ἐκστασις, ἀποκαλύπτει "to bridge the war-party," as a specimen of forcible expressions "probably caricatures of Demostenes' daring phrases"?

id, even if we ignore the great part of the book which quite properly devoted to stylistic criticism, and turn to Mr. Dobson's often excellent sketches of the personality and aims of the Greek orators (marred sometimes by a certain donnish tendency to depreciate "scurrility" and "personalities," we are still uncomfortably thinking of the wrapper. "Persons of general education who find, or ought to find, interest," Ought to find it?

If a person, be he generally educated or not, finds interest, let him begin by reading, in Apollonius Tomitana, or even in fox-trotting, we are far from blaming him. Verrall, we remember, once found interest in a county guide-book, dreary enough to less ingenious readers, because he saw between the lines the symptoms of the author's character. He had contrived (so Verrall alleged) to lead the tourist by a series of converging routes towards and round and about a country mansion where resided, surrounded by a wealth of curious treasures, an antiquary whom the author for some reason hated. The routes all tended to this mansion, but they never reached it. At the end the tourist left the county without the knowledge that he had been circling for a month of boredom on the edge of the antiquary's treasure-houses and pride. When Verrall found in this design an interest more absorbing than in all the circles of the "Inferno," we were delighted, not indignant. But then Verrall never said that educated persons ought to find an interest in the county guide-book. We generally educated persons are so touchy, so quick to cry "tactlessness," that we might have believed that Mr. Dobson would have made a better book if he had thought more of communicating to us what in fact most interested and delighted him, and less of faithfully reporting what, in the opinion of good schoolmasters, ought perhaps to interest generally educated persons.

But, after all, Mr. Dobson's book is more important than the wrapper. Mr. Dobson is to be congratulated on a sensible and learned piece of work, which will be of great value to all students of Greek oratory.

J. T. Sheppard.

A TACTFUL SPEAKER

Addresses in America, 1919. By John Galsworthy. (Heinemann. 6s. net.)

In reading Mr. Galsworthy's American addresses one must take into account the circumstances of their delivery. The war has enabled Englishmen to see that cordial relations with America are very desirable, and to discover profound affinities between the peoples of the two countries. Unfortunately this reciprocity is, as the Irishman said, still a little one-sided, and it has been necessary to explain to the Americans, somewhat extensively, how much they really like the English. Mr. Galsworthy's addresses show us how this may be done. First of all, of course, the Englishman must be presented to the American. He must be presented attractively, but at the same time no impossible virtues must be claimed for him—for one must remember that Americans have their own vanity and that they have already met Englishmen. The result is achieved by making the Englishman's bad qualities the defects of his virtues. In fact, if we follow Mr. Galsworthy's analysis, we shall find that the English have no really bad points at all; regarded properly, their bad qualities turn out to be rather humorous. Not that they are merely comic figures; there is a wealth of deep feeling and noble sentiment behind the mask of wooden superiority that the Englishman presents to the rest of the world, and that is why the American, when he meets the Englishman, is pleased to be and what he is accounts for his misrepresentation and his loneliness. He is that pathetic figure, the man nobody understands and that nobody really loves. But just as this well-known character hopes to find the one woman who really understands, so England, bashfully and wistfully, is courting America. "Deep in our hearts, I think, we feel that only the American people could ever really understand us."

It would be unfair to say that Mr. Galsworthy's book is really as sentimental as this; we have deliberately heightened our picture in order to indicate the presence of a quality that pervades all Mr. Galsworthy's addresses. That quality we may call tact. It consists, not in ignoring disagreeable things, but in refraining from discussing them in a disagreeable way. Mr. Galsworthy says many pleasant things to the Americans about America, and, when he has occasion to condemn something, he makes his condemnation general. A plentiful supply of tact is doubtless necessary to a public speaker; in a book, however, the absence of sharp points and hard outlines makes for dullness. Post-prandial standards do not satisfy the sharper scrutiny of the morning, and, outside their proper setting of wine-fumes, cigar-smoke and general good-fellowship, there are few "good things" worth repeating. We should have been charmed to hear Mr. Galsworthy's addresses; we read them with a colder eye.
SOCIAL HISTORY

THE Skilled Labourer, 1760-1832. By J. L. Hammond and Barbara Hammond. (Longmans. 12s. 6d. net.)

THE work of Mr. and Mrs. Hammond raises an important question with regard to the writing of history. They have taken and made their own a "period" of history, that of the industrial revolution. They belong to the modern school which believes that history has been written not by the famous but by the obscure, not in the doings of armies, princes, and parliaments, but in the lives of common people. If you consult their index you will find that Mr. Lloyd, the magistrate's clerk at Stockport, is more important and plays a much larger part than Viscount Castlereagh. Oliver, the agent provocateur and the spy, has a chapter all to himself, not to speak of an Appendix. This, of course, shows how intensively they have cultivated the little garden of history which they have chosen as their period. Intensive horticulture means that you have to work the soil over and over and over again. So Mr. and Mrs. Hammond in their first book dealt with the lives of the village labourers. In their second they dug over the same period and described the general character of the new life of town and factory, and the conditions and difficulties of the class in power and the outlook and the temper of the workers. Now in their present volume the soil is turned over for a third time. "This book," they tell us, "treats the same period from a different aspect. Its aim is to present the detailed history of particular bodies of skilled workers during those changes [of the industrial revolution]."

It is clear that what Mr. and Mrs. Hammond intend to do in these three books is to paint us a picture of the lives of the working people during the seventy years in which with pain and misery the modern industrial world was born. As the world of chivalry changed to one of "sophisters, economists, and calculators," and the twin gods machinery and capital remodelled the whole of society into new forms and new classes, we are to watch the effects of this transition upon the lives of yeoman, labourer, and artisan. There can be no question as to the very great merits of Mr. and Mrs. Hammond's achievement. They have deservedly taken their place in the front rank of social or industrial historians. Their work is conscientious, scholarly, well written, of the greatest interest and the highest importance, and they have the instinct of the born "researcher" who tracks down a relevant fact in the records of the Home Office as unerringly as a beagle on the trail of a hare.

The present volume in no way falls below the standard which they set for themselves and for us in "The Village Labourer" and "The Town Labourer." If we do not dwell upon its very obvious merits, it is not that we do not appreciate them. The reason is that when we turned the last page, having read every word with unfailing interest and pleasure, we were conscious of a certain intellectual and emotional flatness, the kind of arid disappointment which affects one who climbs a long bare hill, expecting to get a fine view from the top of it, and, when he gets to what he thought was the top, sees only another long bare down rise up in front of him. The authors had given us so much, but they had not given us something which unconsciously we had come to expect of them. They had left us to supply ourselves something which instinctively we had expected that they would supply before they wrote "finis." Their very excellences raised for us the question of the real function of the historian and, particularly in our age, of the social historian. Looking back over their work, we see an infinite number of facts. It is true that these facts are interesting, it is true that they are in their place important, it is true that they form themselves into some kind of a picture of the lives of cotton workers, woollen workers, silk weavers, frame-work knitters, during the years of the industrial revolution. The authors are, however, content to let the facts speak for themselves: it is not merely that they rarely express a personal opinion, it is that they are content to let a little curtain and show us the treasures of the Home Office records; and those treasures are facts—facts about the skilled workers' demands, strikes, and organizations, facts about hand machines and power machines, about machinery and rioting and riots, about Government spies and agents provocateurs, about General Byng, and Lord Sidmouth, and Mr. Lloyd of Stockport, Mr. and Mrs. Hammond, and those of their school both in England and in France, seem to think that facts, provided that there are enough of them, are of themselves enough; that if only you give them to the reader in sufficient quantities, either they will shape themselves, or he will shape them, into some kind of a picture, some kind of a whole. This raises the question of how much the historian should do for the reader and how much he should leave the reader to do for himself.

The idea that facts can historically speak for themselves is essentially a modern view, dating from the discovery that you can write each fact on a slip of paper and convert it into a card index of mankind's miseries, follies, and crimes. The ancestors conceived of the writer as something more than a mere manipulator of such a machine. If you examine the technique of one of the oldest, and perhaps the greatest of historians, Thucydides, you see that he gives the facts plainly and barely to his reader, but he does not leave it at that; at intervals he gathers them up and shapes them into a picture which is something more than an aggregation of connected facts. And in the Macaulay school, which is the antithesis of Mr. and Mrs. Hammond's, you find historians who believe that a reader is no more to be trusted with a fact than a dog with a bone, and who are only concerned with painting a picture of the past in harmony with their own view of the present. It is a reaction against the Macaulays which has produced Mr. and Mrs. Webb and Mr. and Mrs. Hammond. It seems to us that the reaction has gone too far. When historians are as good as they are, we want them to be something more than historiographers. There is no reason why the annals of weavers and miners and frame-work knitters should not be shaped into a work of art, and it is not true that such shaping destroys the scientific value of history. The difference between Mr. and Mrs. Hammond and ourselves can best be explained geometrically. They conceive of a book as a straight line which is formed of an infinite series of points; they begin at one point, a fact, and proceed to another point or fact, and there end, and they trust that their central idea running like a thread through each point, and therefore the line, will emerge in the reader's brain when he reaches the final point. Their book is not therefore a completed whole; it is a straight line which might be extended both ways indefinitely and would never meet. But a book, in our opinion, should be like a circle: the central idea should be a true centre, and the facts should be grouped around to form radii and a circumference, and the whole figure should end where it began, leaving in the reader's mind a sense of completeness. At the beginning of Mr. and Mrs. Hammond's book they led us to believe that they shared our view of the functions of the historian. In the first sentence of their first chapter they tell us that "the history of England at the time discussed in these pages reads like a history of civil war." They develop this idea all through their introductory chapter. Here then, we thought, is the central idea of the book: this idea will not only be proved by the facts in the following pages, but will itself weld those facts into a whole, into a picture of the civil war, into a book. But that is precisely what does not happen. The facts prove that the statement and the idea were true; the idea does not weld, or shape, or affect the facts. The book remains a straight line, which may or may not be continued in a fourth, a fifth, or an nth volume.

L. W.

HEROIC ADVENTURE IN THE ANTARCTIC

M.

AN is distinguished from other animals by intelligence and the power of persistent pursuit of ends. Of these qualities he has always devoted by far the greatest part to victory over other men, but a small residual effort has been devoted to the conquest of Nature, by science and the exploration of the earth. This part rouses less enthusiasm than that devoted to victory over other men, since the gain to ourselves is not enhanced by any injury to others. It would rouse still less, but for the intervention of national rivalries, such rivalries abound in the history of Antarctic exploration, and culminate in the race for the South Pole between Amundsen and Scott, in which the former won by a few days only. The two confederates of man with nature, and of man with each other—are brought into dramatic opposition by Sir Ernest Shackleton's expedition. After long preparation, it was ready to start in the first days of August, 1914. By a unanimous decision, the men composing the expedition placed themselves at the disposal of the Government for the purposes of the war, and only proceeded on their voyage after receiving express orders from the Admiralty to do so. Their last news of the war was at Buenos Ayres, from which they sailed on October 26, 1914, under the belief that the Russian Steam Roller would bring speedy victory. After that, they were cut off from all news of the world until May, 1916.

The object of the expedition was to cross the whole Antarctic continent—the main achievement still to be accomplished after the Pole had been reached. Sir Ernest Shackleton was to start from the Weddell Sea, while another ship was to land men in or near McMurdo Sound, at the opposite point of the continent from the Weddell Sea. This second party was to lay depots along the route by which the polar party should emerge.

The whole history of polar exploration shows that success can only come when good fortune is added to forethought, skill and courage. Good fortune was lacking to the voyage of the "Endurance," and the results that had been hoped for were not achieved. Nevertheless, the record of what was done is full of vivid interest, and the difficulties that were not wholly insuperable were splendidly surmounted. Prolonged northerly gales and an abnormally cold summer caused the "Endurance" to become frozen fast in the pack ice of the Weddell Sea, so that no possibility of reaching the land remained. From January 18, 1915, to November 21, the ship drifted, first slightly towards the south, then, through the greater part of the time, northward. The ice pressure increased, and at last cracked and broke the ship as though it had been an eggshell. The boats, and as many as possible of the stores, were saved, and until the 9th of April, 1916, the northward drift on the ice continued. On that day, at last, it became possible to launch the boats. A precarious landing was effected on Elephant Island, an unhabited speck of land swept by hurricanes, leaving only a narrow strip of sand-safety between avalanches from above and mountainous seas from below. Here, using one upturned boat as their house, the greater part of the men of the expedition remained while Sir Ernest Shackleton, with five others, set off to seek relief.

The story of their voyage is the most thrilling part of the book. They had only a small open boat in which to accomplish over 800 miles, over the stormiest ocean in the world, at the very worst season of the year. As we read, although the man who tells the story was himself in the boat, it seems impossible to believe that they will ever reach land alive. Nevertheless they succeeded in effecting a landing on the west coast of South Georgia. The west coast is uninhabited, but on the east coast there is a whaling station. Between them runs a chain of lofty mountains, hitherto regarded as inaccessible. The six men were, as may be imagined, worn out with thirst, hunger, cold and fatigue. Nevertheless it was necessary to cross the mountains. Sir Ernest, with two of the others, effected this last extraordinarily difficult piece of work. Their first contact with civilization, after their long seclusion, must be told in Sir Ernest's own words:

We met an old man, who started as if he had seen the devil himself and gave us no time to ask any question. He hurried away. This greeting was not friendly. Then we came to the wharf, where the man in charge stuck to his station. I asked him if Mr. Sorlie (the manager) was in the house. "Yes," he said as he stared at us. "We would like to see him," said I. "Who are you?" he asked. "Callers from the sea, and eye lost our ship come over the island," I replied. "You have come over the island?" he said in a tone of entire disbelief. Mr. Sorlie came out to the door and said, "Well?" "Don't you know me?" I said. "I know your voice," he replied doubtfully. "You're the mate of the 'Daisy,'" "My name is Shackleton," I said. Immediately he put out his hand and said, "Come in. Come in." "Tell me, when was the war over?" I asked. "The war is not over," he answered. "Millions are being killed. Europe is mad. The world is mad!"

In this madness, as in duty bound, the rescued members of the expedition took part at the earliest possible moment. The scientific results of the expedition are dealt with in separate memoirs by different experts. Captain Hussey, who contributes the memoir on meteorology, states, as showing the practical utility of Antarctic exploration, a very singular fact, namely, that a cold winter in the Weddell Sea is followed by a drought in Argentina three and a half years later. This, he says, has been proved from observations carried out in the South Orkneys. The fascination of South Polar voyages, however, is not due to their scientific results. It is due partly to the sheer sense of adventure, but partly also to a deeper cause: the feeling that the worth of the human race is increased by what the voyagers have suffered. On a former occasion Sir Ernest Shackleton had all but reached the Pole, penetrating much further South than any of his predecessors. On this occasion fortune was against him, but the conquest of difficulties was on the heroic scale, and cannot but rejoice the heart of any generous reader.

B. R.

PUBLISHING DYNASTIES

John Murray III., 1808-1892: A Brief Memoir. By John Murray IV. (Murray. 3s. 6d. net.)

The Publishing Family of Rivington. By Septimus Rivington. (Rivington. 10s. net.)

Publishers are usually interesting only because of their relations with the men who do the dirty work of the trade, the pen-and-ink and midnight-oil part of book-producing. We hear of them because they foster, or smother, genius. But in the case of John Murray III. all is different. Here we have a publisher who was himself a creator. Murray III. invented (though, alas, he did no patent could protect his invention) an entirely new literary form, the guide-book.

In days when railways did not exist, "when North Germany was yet ignorant of Macadam," and "the high road from Hamburg to Berlin... was a mere wheel track in the deep sand of Brandenburg," Murray began to satisfy that insatiable thirst for sightseeing with which he seems to have been born, and which tormented him to the end of his days. Year by year he set out on his explorations, note-book in hand. On his return the seeds sown in the note-books grew and flourished, and in due course became full-sized guide-books, whose fruits, it is to be hoped, were pleasingly golden. But the fruits were not for John Murray's picking alone. In 1839, three years after Murray's first Handbook had appeared, there was published in Germany a "Handbuchlein" for Holland, the work of Herr Karl Baedeker. In an article reprinted in the present volume John Murray III. points out how clearly Baedeker's footsteps may be traced in his own. The heart of the textual critic will be delighted by such a fine example of source-citing as the following: "In one of the southern Swiss valleys Murray says 'the slate rocks here are full of red garnets,' rendered by B. 'are overgrown with red pomegranates,' a mistake which runs through many editions, but which I find corrected in that of 1873."

The present Mr. John Murray's brief biography of his father has been supplemented by a number of the guide-book writer's letters from abroad. These are excellent reading, and we venture to ask for more, if more are to be had.

The Rivingtons started publishing in 1711, and, except for a small hitch about the year 1890, they have never stopped publishing since. Mr. Septimus Rivington's history of the dynasty is an interesting work, containing as it does much curious information of an odd Notes-and-Queries kind about the book trade of the eighteenth century. We hear a good deal, for instance, of the institution called the "Conger," an association of publishers and booksellers gathered together for the joint undertaking of publishing enterprises. Thus, a bookseller would buy a sixteenth of Pope's works or a hundred and twenty of Watt's Hymns. In this way financial risks, as well as possible profits, were widely distributed. The book sales of the period were evidently delightful functions.

Mr. Rivington prints an advertisement of one at "The Bear in Avey-Mary-Lane. Beginning at Nine in the Morning; Where the Company shall be entertained with a Breakfast; and at Noon with a good Dinner, and a Glass of Wine; and then proceed with the sale in order to finish the evening." Times have changed for the worse; Mr. Smith of New York, who bought eighty thousand pounds' worth of books last month at Sotheby's, was not even offered a cup of tea.

The Rivingtons specialized, for the most part, in theological publications (you will find many of them, alas! being sold by weight in the Farringdon Road). It was, for example, their house which issued "Tracts for the Times." But at last, Quand la religion baisait comme une mer, the firm turned its attention to education. It was the writer of the present volume, Mr. Septimus Rivington, who made Rivington's famous as an educational house. It was he who introduced Abbott to Mansfield, who brought North into touch with Hillard, who plotted almost all those conjunctions of names that remind one so painfully of the struggles of a classical education. It is through him we know that "such languages do exist"; we are duly grateful.

The main body and Romanesque letters of this announcement for the Royal Society have been used, with the title and name of the place, for a discussion on "The Theory of Relativity." This will be opened by Mr. Jeans, and continued by Prof. Eddington, the Astronomer Royal and others.

The Aristotelian Society will in future hold its meetings at 74, Grosvenor Street, W. 1, where on Monday, the 19th inst., Professor J. A. Smith will read a paper on "The Philosophy of Giovanni Gentile."

LUCRETIUS

Lucretius: On the Nature of Things. Translated by Sir R. Allison. (A. L. Humphreys. 7s. 6d. net.)

However scanty may be the available details of Lucretius' life, his poem indicates a sensitive intelligence and rare sympathy. Many will execrate the helter-skelter confusion of his atoms, and perhaps even the romantic meteorology will sometimes fail to arouse interest. Yet such partial lack of appreciation is comparatively unimportant, for it is not in his attempts at natural science, with all their vivid beauty and brilliant intuition, that the value of Lucretius chiefly lies, nor would the quality of his verse alone justify his permanence. Our admiration should first be evoked by his magnificent attempt to console humanity, to encourage those whose wavering temper and sinister environment expose them to superstition, the prelude to despair or dishonesty. The arrival of a new translation of Lucretius may well serve as a reminder of his perpetual significance, and previous translations ought not to obscure the merit of Sir R. Allison's. Even if the grace of his work is not consummate, the assiduous care for which it is remarkable deserves high praise. It is assuredly the result of long toil and devoted concentration.

In exposing the abject frenzy typical of those who fear death, Lucretius is impelled not by those extremes of cynicism which banish the faculty of correct judgment, but by genuine sorrow and tender passion. So far from being himself appalled at the consideration of mortality, he assigns the conception of survival after death to the realm of meaningless absurdity. The description of the world's youth and development reveals the enthusiasm of genius, and, when he insists on the degradation of ill-gotten prestige, he is no antiquated seer. Again, it is better by far to make a few mistakes in the interpretation of phenomena than to share the misery of persons

With fearful minds all hanging in suspense, Trembling before the Gods in fear, depressed To very earth, and all this just because Their ignorance of causes forces them To hand things to the Empire of the Gods.

The bombardment of the citadel of fanaticism, the onslaught against over-indulged fancy—of such adventures he is well fitted to be the leader. Victors are still enrolled by the lethargy of passive despair. Even now the coils of superstition entangle every nation. There are many still whose panacea for the ills of mortality is agitated whispering. As the apostle of individual responsibility, Lucretius opposes the wailing of indecision. The appeal against reactionary hysteria is dignified and reasonable:

Cease then to be alarmed at what is new And so reject the truth: but rather weigh These things with your keen mind, and if they're true Yield your consent, if not, then take the field Against them.

In his eyes the ascendancy of error is more disastrous than his own discomfiture.

J. H. D.
A PERSUASIVE SPIRITUALIST

HUMAN PERSONALITY AND ITS SURVIVAL OF BODILY DEATH. By F. W. H. Myers. (Longmans. 15s. 6d. net.)

This edition of Myers' well-known book is an abridgment of the first edition. Nearly all the appendices, containing the evidence on which Myers based his conclusions, are omitted. The cases included serve merely as samples, and the text itself, the theoretical discussion, is very materially condensed. It may be assumed, therefore, that the present edition gives but a weakened presentation of Myers' case. Nevertheless the result is sufficiently arresting. Myers differed from most other writers on what we may roughly describe as "spiritist phenomena" by his sobriety. He had a fairly high standard of evidence, and he was cautious and tentative in framing explanations. The one quality which prevented his being a completely satisfactory investigator was his own personal rectitude. It is a difficult paradox. We require an investigator of these phenomena to be a perfectly upright man, one free from all suspicion of exaggerated statement, and one who would never consciously doctor or invent. Not of this type, however, are only too prone to assume a higher level of general trustworthiness in others than the hard facts of this world warrant. The simple-minded gentleman is a perfectly useless investigator. Chaffery's test for investigators was not a bad one; he was completely unimpressed by the fact that a man was a professor of physics; what he wanted to know was, how far could he travel without a ticket and not be caught. The late Mr. Myers was a perfectly honourable man; he admits, however, that he had no knowledge of conjuring. That seems to us a grave defect.

Besides personal integrity and an exhaustive acquaintance with all forms of trickery, we require from the ideal investigator a thorough knowledge of the value of human testimony in cases of unconscious phenomena. We know more about this latter subject than was known when Myers wrote. Apart altogether from conscious deception, we know that the average value of human testimony, especially in unusual circumstances, is quite remarkably low. The complete honesty of a witness, and the vehemence of his assertion, afford but slight ground for supposing his statements to be true. We mention these facts because their recognition affects one's sense of probability, and the effect of a book like this of Myers will depend, in the first place, on the preconceptions with which one approaches it. We think that an attitude of extreme scepticism is the attitude justified by our knowledge of the general behaviour of human beings. What, then, is the effect of Myers' book on a mind so fortified?

The first part of the book contains nothing that we may not believe. The evidence for the existence of the "sub conscious" mind is unescapable, and we are prepared to attribute to this mind very remarkable powers. Myers considers that genius is the result of an exceptional sensitiveness to, or control of, subconscious processes. At the time he wrote, the evidence for this view was less than it is now. Recent investigation has certainly tended to show that subconscious activities are, in some way, the cause of those manifestations we call genius. The testimony of Henri Poinsac and of other mathematicians, besides the evidence of various sorts of artists, seems to show conclusively that an "inspiration" is the result of an intense, but hidden, mental activity. If this be granted, the preconceptions with which we approach claims to "intuition" will undergo a change. The phenomena of dual personality may be fitted into the general hypothesis of the subconscious mind. We have only to imagine that the "centre of control" is somehow shifted, so that a different section of the total mind is able to manifest itself in the conscious region. This way of regarding the pheno-

...
WORDS—WORDS—WORDS

Responsibility. By James E. Agate. (Grant Richards. 7s. net.)

Mr. James Agate’s new novel, “Responsibility,” put us in mind of a conjurer whose performance we witnessed many years ago at a little tin theatre up country. The curtain rose upon a stage bare except for a small table. On the table there were an egg, a glass of water, a fan—and a pistol. The conjurer walked rapidly on to the stage, and with outstretched arm and bow, at the close of his evening, he seized the pistol and fired. This was by way of capturing our attention; our attention was caught. Whereupon, after roundly denouncing those of his profession whose intention it was to hold us in suspense and deceive us, he swore that with him there was positively no deception. What he proposed to juggle with was laid upon the table plain to see—an egg, a glass of water and a fan. But “pray do not imagine . . . he for his part absolutely refused to promise . . . if we were fools enough to suppose . . .” Away he flew into rapid, extravagant speech, never pausing for one moment, but now and again in the thick of it, when the fun was at its highest, seizing the pistol and firing a shot or two. Until suddenly—down came the curtain and remained there. And there the egg remained, the glass of water, and the fan, untouched, unaltered.

On page 1 of the introduction the hero of Mr. Agate’s novel rushes on to the stage and seizes the pistol. On page 3 he cries: “I hate to hold you, sir, in suspense; a dénouement which depends upon the element of surprise is essentially a disappointment at the second reading—and who is the writer who will be content with a single taste of his quality? . . . So I lay my cards on the table. They consist of a sorry hero, a mistress adored and abandoned, and a son.”

And then—away he flies through forty-four pages of introduction plentifully sprinkled with pistol shots—faster and faster, until on page 339 down comes the curtain, the performance is over, and there are the cards lying on the table—the sorry hero, the mistress adored and abandoned, the son—untouched, unaltered.

Well, what matter? Is not this soliloquy brilliant enough positively to exhaust our capacity for attending? What should we have done if, plus the pistol shots, Mr. Agate had juggled with a plot as well? Nevertheless we are left with the queer suspicion that there is some deception after all. We are not his enemies, neither are we dumfoundered and dismayed by the excessive novelty of his opinions, nor can we discover any need for him to exhort us to “calm yourselves, good readers.” Why, then, does he think it necessary to shout so loud, to be so defiant, so sure we are bound to disagree with him, so scornful whether we do or whether we don’t, so eager to shock us, so determined to stand no nonsense from us—why does he, in fine, protest so much?

This manner of his sets us wondering what it is all about—what it all amounts to. It sets us searching for the real Edward Marston without his table and his audience. If we were led to expect no more than entertainment our search would not be justified, for there are parts of “Responsibility” which are entertainment of a very high order; but the author, if we read him aright, flies a great deal higher. His hero is not content to take life as it comes; he goes towards it urgently, loving, hating, wanting “to know a million things,” nothing. It is never merely a question of Edward Marston living in Manchester in the nineties; it is the case of Edward Marston v. The Universe. It is a brave theme, but the author’s treatment of it is a deal too confident to be successful. He cannot resist his hero’s passion for display. And this passion is so ungoverned that we cannot see the stars for the fireworks.

K. M.

THE STALE AND THE FRESH

All Roads Lead to Calvary. By Jerome K. Jerome. (Hutchinson. 6s. 9d. net.)

Invisible Tides. By Beatrice Kean Seymour. (Chapman & Hall. 7s. net.)

All Roads Lead to Calvary” is another novel. It is not more; it is one of that enormous pile of novels “Are they fresh? ” “Yes, baked to-day, Madame.” But they are just the same as those that were baked yesterday and the day before—and the day before that. So much flour, a sprinkle of currants, a smear of sugar on the top. Melancholy, melancholy thought of all those people steadily munching, asking for another, and carrying perhaps a third one home with them in case they should wake up in the night and feel—not hungry, exactly—but “just a little empty.”

Joan Allway comes to London to be a journalist. She meets a great many people. She has an immediate success, first with a series of articles on Old London Churches and then with Sermons, which are published every Sunday in a famous newspaper, the editor making it a condition that her photograph appears at the head of each. For she is a great beauty. She falls in love with a married man who may well be Prime Minister one of these days, if the breath of scandal never blows him into the mire. He turns to her for help, for with all her beauty and womanliness she has a Man’s Mind. And then, because his pitiful wife, who paints her face and wears a wig and tries to smoke cigarettes, attempts to poison herself, so that her husband and Joan may be happy, Joan makes the great sacrifice. Comes the war. Again she loves—this time the editor who found her “Old London Churches” had the Stevensonian touch. She is a nurse. She goes to France. She sheds her hair and uniform—really why sees what a front-line trench is like. And comes home, and is found by the editor turned airman, “beneath the withered trees beside the shattered fountain.” Here is the last mufphul:

“Perhaps you are right,” she admitted. “Perhaps that is why he made us male and female: to teach us to love.”

A robin broke into a song of triumph. He had seen the sad-faced ghosts steal silently away.

Mrs. Seymour’s first novel, “Invisible Tides,” is of a very different quality. It has its weaknesses, but it is full of feeling. If the author were not so conscious that she is writing a novel, she would be a great deal more successful. She is over-anxious to fit all together, to explain, and to make us part of that little world which she has found so passionately interesting. The early part of the book, which describes the childhood of the hero, Hilary Sargent, and of the heroine, Helena, is, to our thinking, unimportant. Hilary is quite a nice little boy, and his mother, telling him about the man who wrote “Treasure Island,” is an attractive mother, but even the tragedy when this same gay young mother drowns herself does not really affect the later life of Hilary. As to Helena’s childhood, it is the familiar childhood of our young person who is shaping to be a heroine. She is “not understood,” she is difficult; her mother wishes she were more like other girls. But when these two meet, in spite of Mrs. Seymour’s leaning towards sentimentality, they do become individual, and we are convinced that they love each other. The war enters into their lives, and from this moment there is a great quickening of the emotion, and the description of how these two lives are laid waste is very moving. With the war, all the pretty, delicate, quaint, fanciful flowers that grow too thickly in Mrs. Seymour’s garden and that she is far too ready to make into garlands whereby to adorn her pages, are withered. We feel it is unbearable for her to see them gone, but we assure her that the hardy roots which remain are those she ought to cultivate.

K. M.
OXFORD NOTES

Last term little of decisive importance was transacted. The seeds of change were sown; it remains to be seen whether they will bear fruit in the new term which starts to-day—a term which may determine for good or ill the future of the University.

The importers of the Statute for the amendment of Responsions did not sit down under their defeat in the summer, and the Statute was reintroduced last term with a wider preamble to enable Professor Murray to introduce certain amendments designed to embody a compromise. The present position, it will be remembered, is that before a member of the University can take the degree of B.A. he must have passed two of the examiners in Responsions (or some examination accepted as equivalent thereto) that he has a knowledge of both the Latin and Greek languages and of Mathematics. The proposed Statute provides (amongst other things) that it shall be sufficient to have satisfied the examiners in either Latin or Greek and in either Mathematics, Natural Science, or translation ille lucamine. The great majority of the teaching staff of the University desire the change, but there is a considerable minority who feel strongly that the position of Greek, already precarious, will be entirely undermined if the Statute is passed. This minority summoned the non-resident members of Convocation to their aid. They, to their views, succeeded in securing the rejection of the Statute by six votes in a house of 618. The repetition of this performance is the big stick with which they threaten the supporters of the Statute. These latter in their turn can also play the bully, since they are sure of a majority in Congregation (where, speaking generally, the only three exceptions are the B.A. and Mason, who have a vote), and can threaten that even if Convocation persists in its unintelligent opposition, which is by no means certain, the State will give effect to the wishes of Congregation over the heads of Convocation. Professor Murray, the protagonist of those who like to consider themselves as the champions of Greek, in the circumstances very properly desired to find a via media. If the Statute be not passed, will the University provide for the qualification of women as members of the Hebdomadal Council, of Congregation and of Faculties and of Boards of Faculties? Surely the time is not yet ripe for gynaeocracy in Oxford.

Finally there is the Commission. Its composition inspires confidence. It has already put out an elaborate questionnaire, the answers to which will take much time and consideration. We believe that the College system is safe. It is that system which renders possible the private tuition and the intimate and close personal contact between teacher and taught that are the special characteristics of Oxford of which we are all so proud. The Colleges are Oxford. "It is easy to carp at what is written, but when we look at those which have been, and the college, if we wait for it, will have its own turn. Genius exists there also, but it will not answer a call of a committee of the House of Commons." Fortunately the members of the Commission know more about Oxford than some of our recently imported Professors, and we feel that the preservation of our special virtues is safe in their hands.

The first £15,000 of our mess of pottage from the Government came last term. Some of the Science teachers held that as it was they who were responsible for the sale of the birthright of all of us they alone should have the pottage; fortunately Council did not accept this view. Recent benefactions to this University and the response given to the appeal for funds for Manchester University make us more than ever wish that before throwing us into the stranglehold of the State our scientists had made proper efforts to obtain the necessary funds from voluntary contributions from elsewhere.

The increase of the cost of service and food and coal and everything else (except only tuition) is inevitably reflected in the charges made by Colleges for their undergraduates. College batels are some £6 to £10 higher per term than they were before the war. This, of course, is a very slight increase compared with the general rise in prices. That it is not greater is due to the efforts made by the Colleges in the direction of economy, and in some cases to the fact that corporate revenue has been brought to bear. It is the case of the poorer undergraduates. There is no excuse for the statement several times repeated by the Westminster Gazette, which ought to know better, that an undergraduate cannot, with the greatest economy, live on less than £260 to £300. Holders of Government grants for war services are, in fact, managing to live on £165; but £260 would probably be a great deal for an undergraduate, on which it is possible for a student who lives at home in the vacations to get the full benefit of an Oxford career.

I do not know—I doubt if anyone yet knows—the exact number of undergraduates in residence last term. There were probably about 3,600 up, or some 500 more than in 1914. Nobody quite knows how accommodation was found for them all, but found it somehow was. This term we shall be reinforced by a considerable number of newly elected Rhodes Scholars. And we may hope to learn from the Oxford Magazine how many we are, all told.

Since I last wrote the University has suffered some serious losses by death. Dr. Daniel, the Provost of Wadham, and my many friends and no enemies; Sir William Osler lent unusual distinction to our School of Medicine; scholars came from all parts of the world to learn from Professor Haverfield; and Mr. Cannan was the moving spirit of the University Press. They are all taken from us. There have been many new appointments during the same period. Professor Halstead had been appointed at the rate of more than one a week. Mr. Stuart Jones succeeds Professor Haverfield as Camden Professor of Ancient History; Mr. de Zulueta has taken the place of Professor Goudy (who is happily still amongst us) as Regius Professor of Civil Law; Dr. Lock, the Warden of Kobe, is Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity; Dr. D.O.R.A., W. of N., who resigned; Mr. G. H. Hardy of Cambridge was elected Savilian Professor of Geometry; and Sir William Schlich is succeeded as Professor of Forestry by Mr. Troup, and Professor Vines as Sherardian Professor of Botany by Mr. Keeble, who, like Mr. Hardy, comes from Cambridge. Three new chairs have received their first occupant: Dr. Gustave Rudler is the first Marshal Foch Professor of French Literature, our well-tried friend Mr. Follino the first Sena Professor of Italian, and Mr. R. M. Dawkins leaves his Fellowship at Emmanuel, Cambridge, to take up the duties of the Bywater and Sotheby Professorship of Byzantine and Modern Greek.

Two of the smaller Colleges have elected new Heads, and in both cases they are to be congratulated upon their wisdom in doing the obvious thing. Mr. Lys is well known for his strong common sense and great business qualities; Worcester's debt to him as Bursar is already great. Mr. Munro has deserved equally well as Bursar of Lincoln, and we suspect that before he resigns his office he will have been responsible for some of those epigrammatic sayings which keep the memory of Heads of Houses fresh amongst after generations. Under the new Provost and the new Rector these two Colleges may look forward confidently to reaping the fruits of the progressive policy which they have recently been pursuing. The other Heads of Houses have received a very real accession of strength.

W. T. S. S.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTES

The Arbury Hall collection, which was to have been sold by Messrs. Sotheby on the 22nd and 23rd inst., has been disposed of privately, and, unless for a possible sale of duplicates, we shall have only the illustrated catalogue (price 2s. 6d.) to remind us of the existence of many very rare books. The collection is a good example of the sort of books a young man should have preserved years of the seventeenth century, a time when there appears to have been a real market for the sale of pamphlets which were issued at a small cost, probably a penny for each eight pages. A man of careful habits might thus have preserved a large number of plays and other light literature in the way that some papers and magazines are preserved without setting much value either on them or their authors. Provided that no one comes along in the next century "to clear out the rubbish," the fortune of the library is made, while the more stately volumes which were its pride descend gradually to the libraries of the world. To rule. record, we may refer to an important first folio Shakespeare, Greene's "Pandosto," Lodge's "Rosalynd," and an uncatalogued quartino, some valuable Americana, some Elizabethan plays and tracts of the very rarest occurrence, and a first edition of Homer in Greek (1488).

Two of the manuscripts and autograph letters are to take place on the 30th inst., and the 5th and 6th prox. The first of these includes a very interesting collection of fifteenth-century manuscripts and early printed editions of the classics, made about 1490. It shows a real taste in the person who formed the collection, Mr. Henry Ellis Allen, and it should be looked upon as a collection of the autographs of the late Mr. Fairfax Murray, which were mainly got together as recalling great artists and then works. Illustrated catalogues may be had.

NOTES FROM IRELAND

Dublin, January 9, 1920.

Since the death of the Dublin Drama League was premeditated, it was natural that, in the absence of the Athenæum, the League held its annual general meeting at the Abbey Theatre. The chairman presented a report of the year's work, and the balance sheet, showing a credit balance of £115, was adopted. A resolution of thanks to the outgoing Committee was passed unanimously, and the meeting adjourned until such date as arrangements could be made for the election of a new Committee. The League will start its second season in a very prosperous condition, with an increased membership and with all the initial organization of such enterprises completed and in working order. Whether the next Committee will be able to satisfy such criticism as that of the Dublin Players remains to be seen. Since the outbreak of a Defence of the Drama Act, there is no possibility of conscripting English producers and players for service in Ireland. At the annual meeting the chairman had to report a series of disappointments in cases where the Committee had been in negotiation with various English companies. If not more than three successful plays were produced in the first season it was because of circumstances beyond the control of the League.

Here, as in London and New York, the enormous increase in the manufacturing cost of books does not seem to have deterred newcomers. While the public recoils in horror from the—relatively—slight increase in the price of books, the great publishers and minor millionaires wave their alarm in the press, new publishers are rising up to face the (apparently) impossible conditions. They must be as optimistic as the authors themselves, who continue without even the hope of war bonuses, or a strike for larger cheques. No comment seems to have been aroused by the fact that, in the tables of expenses recently published in the newspapers to show the increase in every item of book production, one item remains unchanged. Needless to say, it is the amount payable to the author.

The new Dublin publisher is Mr. Martin Lester, who has issued quite a lengthy list of his first season's books. The Wasted Island is a novel of Sinn Féin Ireland by Mr. Eimar O'Duffy, lished to known as the author of two interesting plays. It is a voluminous tome, which demands from the reader more interest in local affairs than for the craft of novel-writing. The most interesting announcement is a work entitled "An Irish Community," the story of the famous Ithaliane experiment in the creation of a cooperative of farmers, adapted from E. T. Craig's forgotten but valuable account of a curious chapter in Irish history. Mr. George W. Russell has written an introduction to the volume. For the rest, as is becoming a noticeable feature of Irish publishing, Mr. Martin Lester's catalogue numbers more than a few volumes.

There is a large Irish public which has hitherto been satisfied with newspapers, but is now demanding books, and it is in response to this demand that publishing here has developed. In such circumstances it is inevitable that the supply reflects the taste of the plain people whose "clarified common sense" excited the enthusiasm of Dr. Woodrow Wilson more than it has usually appealed to critics of literature.

Last winter the Abbey Theatre was opened on Sunday evenings for lectures and public debates. Messrs. Chesterton, Shaw, Nevinson and others came over to assist the native intellect. To the younger generation the place was ideally fitted. As the Censor's writ did not run there, the theatre became a sort of intellectual "catholica, where the "unadulterated" and the "solenisms" uttered with impunity the thoughts that arose in them. Although we are still formidably in the grasp of D. O. C. A., and read the Irish, English, French and German newspapers, the indisputable "Abbey" has been turned to other purposes on Sundays. On the 4th of this month we had the first of a series of concerts at chamber music, which have been arranged by Mr. Lennox Robinson. The house was packed when Signor Esposito, Signor Simonetti and Mr. J. M. Gilby played the following programme of piano and cornet duet: Two Melodies (Op. 18) by Saint-Saëns; Sonata in A (Op. 100), Brahms; and Beethoven's Trio in B flat (Op. 97). There was prolonged applause and conversation after each movement, as is the amazing practice of the musical borbarous town, but the unfeigned enjoyment of the audience was an encouragement which Mr. Robinson deserved. He has disposed of the notion, prevalent in Dublin, that music must be reserved strictly for members of the Royal Dublin Society, whose extensive influence still gives them almost the same opportunity one has over here of hearing good music. Apart from that, there is merely the vast absurdity of the loudly boomed "concert tours," for which big names are advertised and high prices charged. When the heralded performance takes place one is fortunate if one escapes "I Hear You Calling Me" and "The End of a Perfect Day" rendered by artists obviously designed for nobler ends. At the last Quinan Concert, on the 3rd inst., M. Vladimir Rosing was—by an unforeseen and fortunate accident—heard in Dublin for the first time. He was happily not induced to make any of these delightful concessions to what is doubtless considered the sort of thing poor provincials like.

THE NEW STRASBOURG UNIVERSITY

Strasbourg has had a fine record in the past with regard to higher education, and now that the city has once more come under French control, a serious attempt is to be made to restore its University to its former pride of place as second only to that of Paris. A State grant of about a million sterling will be made, subject to Parliamentary sanction. As for accommodation, this was provided in 1884 by new buildings erected for the German University, which has been replaced by the new scheme of faculties. Since the pick of French teachers, have already been established, and a school of pharmacy has now been added.

With a view to extending the usefulness of the University as reconstituted, it is proposed to organize, with the help of professors, several of whom have had teaching experience at Lausanne, Geneva, Zurich, Liverpool, Amsterdam or New York, a series of lectures for foreign students. Other possible developments include serious attention to German subjects, and a kind of non-collegiate life for students from this country, America, Switzerland, Jugo-Slavia, etc., with clubs where the different nationalities may forget and find common interests. This last proposal is of particular importance as suggesting an attempt to give to the University a reorganized something of the international character which was so marked a feature of the great Universities when Latin was the common language of educated men throughout Christendom.

Strasbourg as a focus of learning owes a great debt to Sturm, who was a resident in the city for many years until he was finally driven out by his fierce opponents, the Lutherans. He was the first Rector of the Gymnasium (1538), and founded in 1684 an Academy with which was connected the provision of boarding-houses for poor students. The University, based on Sturm's Academy, opened its doors in 1621 with a full number of faculties, and became specially famous in the realms of medicine and philosophy. The French Revolution put an end to its activities, but in 1803 a Protestant Academy was founded, and in 1808 Napoleon set up an Imperial Academy in Strasbourg. The two schemes were amalgamated in 1819, and work was continued until the war of 1870. When Strasbourg fell, the Academy was transferred to Nancy, and in 1872 the conquerors established a new University on an ambitious scale, devoted largely, according to the views of certain French writers, to the spread of the noxious cult of Pan-Germanism.

If the University in its new form manages to free itself from purely national prejudices, and revert to the wider literary education, the hopes of its supporters with regard to the future may be realized, and Strasbourg may become world-famous.

We have received from the Clarendon Press a copy of the Oxford Almanack for 1920. It maintains its old tradition of discreet elegance with a beautiful reproduction of a drawing of the Sheldonian made in 1815 by J. Buckler. Details of the changes among the Heads of Houses and officers of the University, which are duly marked on the Almanack, will be found in our Easter Number.

The McGill University of Montreal proposes to establish a new Chair of Medicine as a memorial to the late Sir William Osler, who was not only partly educated at McGill, but was Professor of the Institutes of Medicine from 1874 to 1884.
plant dies and its nitrogenous matter breaks down, some of it may pass again into the tissue of useful vegetables. Similarly, the dissolved nitrogen compounds in the sea may be assimilated by marine plants, which may be consumed by marine animals, and part of the nitrogen may then return to us in the flesh of edible fish. But there will always be waste at each stage, and the chances are all against any large proportion of this lost nitrogen returning as food-material to man.

Much more is the case with the remaining nitrogen of decay. For this returns simply as gaseous nitrogen to the atmosphere, along with water vapour from the hydrogen and carbon dioxide from the carbon of the decaying tissue. Since this is the fate of at any rate part of all the protein-nitrogen of all living tissue, there must theoretically come a time when all the nitrogen in the world will have passed into the atmosphere as gas, and when life must cease. Is there some channel of return for the nitrogen of the atmosphere?

The electric discharge of lightning causes small quantities of atmospheric oxygen and nitrogen to combine; the resulting oxides of nitrogen pass into solution in rain-water as nitric and nitrous acids. The amount of nitrogen returned to the soil in this way is, however, negligible in amount. Besides this, there is only one counterbalancing process of any importance. Certain bacteria of the soil have, alone among living organisms, the power of changing gaseous nitrogen into water-soluble compounds; certain other bacteria can transform the ammonia of the soil—ammonia which is itself the result of tissue decay, as indicated above—into the salts of nitrous and nitric acids, the form in which nitrogen is of most use to plant life. Apart from the activities of these micro-organisms, which can in fact touch only a very small fraction of the wasted-nitrogen, there is no extra-human process at work to combat the perpetual diminution in quantity of assimilable nitrogen.

When, therefore, the natural deposits of nitrates in Chili and elsewhere are worked out, as they may well be in the not very distant future, where will man turn for his nitrogenous fertilizers, so that the plant-kingdom on which he depends may have a new lease of life? There can be no fundamental solution which does not go to the final ultimate resting-place of decay-nitrogen; man must recover nitrogen from the air, as nitric acid, as ammonia, or in some other utilizable form. It is that process of recovery which is called the "fixation of nitrogen."

If we look at man's highest manifestations of technical skill and ingenuity, we find all the industrial arts dependent at some point or other on synthetic substances whose preparation involves the use of nitric acid. If we look at man's most degraded forms of bestiality, we find that every high-explosive contains nitrogen, laboriously built into the molecule of the explosive by the use of nitric acid, only to be blown away into the air as gaseous nitrogen. For both these supplies of combined nitrogen the plant-kingdom must ultimately be robbed of an essential element in an irrereplaceable form. Whether we are making for "increased production" or for Armageddon, we must somehow or other solve this problem. The war has merely increased its urgency. Few chemists but realized its importance prior to 1914: many were actively engaged in its elucidation. If not actually completely solved as yet, much is known both of the theory and the practice of the matter as to make solution only a matter of time and of public realization of the need for solution.

It may be, indeed it is, true that the search for abstract truth and the creation of Art are of greater spiritual importance than the practical application of scientific knowledge. It is little less certain that without the latter the former cannot continue indefinitely.

A. L. B.
Fine Arts

PREVAILING DESIGN

IV. THE BULLDOG EYE'S DEPRADATIONS

It requires as much skill and resource to keep design and significance in a picture on the Nature side as it does to keep vitality and objective truth on the side of Design. It is this effort on either side that produces perfect work.

When a painter chooses to portray an angel, the word "imagination" is used to describe his talent. When, on the other hand, it is his breakfast table or his landlady that he paints, "observation" is bestowed on him. The result is approved. Most writers on painting do not possess enough "imagination" themselves to see, in considering many Cubist or Expressionist pictures, that the breakfast table has become as fantastic as anything could be. It is still for them "a breakfast table." And with this label they will struggle with it, abuse the eccentricity of the artist, praise the significance of his planes, refuse him power, or deprecate his "violence"; but never realize that it is, in fact, no longer a "breakfast table."

All the stock-in-trade of the Fanciful artist (Moreau, Blake, Beardsley, or decadently, in our day, Odell, for instance) is likewise as much the matter of Nature as the coffee-cups and bread and plates that still must be half animal and half man. The latter is usually composed of a portion of earth horse, and the upper part of a Poli (selected especially with a view to a massive effect). Blake's "Morning Stars Singing Together" are pretty English country girls or boys. You have seen faces very like theirs behind the counters of shops. As to their dress, it is like the costume adopted by students at the ever more numerous schools of choreography and physical culture. A gnome is simply a short (usually Mediterranean) type of man; a witch a very catty and very old woman, such as you can see anywhere. As to the Moreauesque landscape, again, or the grotto scenes of Leonardo, it is simply a question of scale. In small you see such a landscape (and it is not such a very difficult task to enlarge it; just like enlarging a photograph, in fact) in any deposit of magnesia. Remember a few stalactite caves you have visited or photographs of such oddities, or the more romantic gorges of almost any mountain range, and you have your equivalent in nature for the most absurdly encrusted, cathedralized, bejewelled affair that has ever been painted.

The Cubist movement, or the movement of which Braque's paintings are the key, is a very intense reaction towards the Constructive and Inventive in painting, breaking out in the midst of the solid dogma of French Impressionism. The dogma was too young to be swept aside, and giving to the unusually rapid evolution of ideas the stormy character rather than it should to act logically on the minds that it attacked. In raging on the objects saturated with scientific nineteenth-century dogma, instead of overwhelming them, or sweeping the dogma away, it twisted the objects into unreal shapes, and contorted the dogmas themselves into the strangest-looking theories. With the Futurists, for instance, this intellectual tempest took all the appearance of the most ruinous cyclone. It threatened every monument of art, it lashed the waves of Canaletto's canals, and whistled through the hair of Renaissance statuary. And one of the modern Milanese tenets was: No nude figure for one hundred years! (You do not see the naked body habitually, so do not paint it!) But the Futurist then proceeded to paint the phenomena of the world around him in an idiom visually so abstruse that, little as our contemporaries have an opportunity of seeing the human form, it would yet appear as the most everyday object beside a painting by Boccioni.

Let us now, and finally, deal more specifically with Subject-matter, and its bearing on the questions that we are discussing. If your subject-matter is your breakfast table, then, whatever you do to it, your picture should still remain structurally true to—be in some intimate and direct manner the pictorial equivalent of—that. The cups and coffee-pot, bread and plates, should not plastically usurp the character of the objects of a cobbler's shop, a scene in the Sierras, or a garden fête. In many cases in the pictures of Picasso, Gris, or Bracque, this transformation has happened, and a man's side becomes a group of buildings, and so forth.

Somewhere within the realistic practice of the Impressionists is the best method for rendering a breakfast table. There are undoubtedly a multitude of ways of doing it; but as regards extracting its objective pictorial truth from it, Cézanne or Renoir reached, it appears to me, the limits of that truth. The same thing applies to a portrait of a man sitting at that table.

On the other hand, you can proceed to paint a picture of all you know about that simple scene: the dribbling of the parotids, of the sub-maxillary and sub-lingual glands, the involuntary activities of the pancreas and central restlessness of the stomach; the conversion of the coffee and bread into absorbable matter, the villi and capillaries passing on the nutrient, with all the plant-like and imposing forms that our bodies contain; possibly introducing an interference on the part of a people of Pfeifer bacilli with the process of digestion, their gradual ascendency in the blood since their initial landing the night before. Or you can use the notions that illuminate this act of usual alimentation for the individual; a dark chagrin about the quality of the coffee, a glee at the heavy supply of fats. Or it may be that a consciousness of the active machinery of the animal seated at the table gives to your vision of him a grandeur resembling, in its effects, Gainsborough's consciousness of the delicate lives of his sitters, the high orthodoxy of their blood and habits.

But it will no longer be an enterprise of the senses, deriving directly and wholly from the sensual impression as commonly realized by other men. In the same way, only less obviously, if you always give far more weight and majesty to the tinklings of the mandolinist than his presence, occupation, and the character of his instrument warrant, you should escape from that mandolinist, forsake him for some very ponderous grandee of Spain or monstrously dignified Moor.

When the fancy is released and goes on its travels, it very soon leaves behind the coffee-cup and the studio window. The fancy is as proud of its talents as is the eye of its bulldog quality of ferocious grip and hold. And when the eye is lent to it for an adventitious spell, it chooses the most deeply hidden and most distant game. It regards the eye as a prosaic monster; the eye fixing on it, in return, a glance of great distrust. But the eye is frequently used by the fancy in hunting more immediate game. This is perhaps the uncanniest combination of all.

What we have seen in European painting for the most part during the experimentation of the last ten years is a battle of wiles between the eye and the fancy. The fancy, subjected to the legislation of the Impressionist movement, was forbidden to use the eye in the rounding up of any game except such as could be found within a radius of five miles of the painter's studio. But, on the other hand, it had the instincts of its time on its side, and was given carte blanche to do its worst within that area. The eye at its disposal (the bulldog of our simile)

* Mr. Wyndham Lewis's previous articles appeared in The Athenæum for November 21, December 12 and 26, 1919.
Meanwhile, it must be remembered, had been trained by, and had acquired all the habits of, such exacting masters as Cézanne, Renoir or Manet. The confusion caused in the neighbourhood is not to be wondered at; nor that, at the end of this terrible period, everything should be sens deus sous dessous.

The inventive faculty in painting (sometimes as fancy, sometimes in a more powerful imaginative form) has been revenging itself for the restrictions imposed on it by the absurd taboos of the "scientific" age into which it had once more forced its way. It made havoc, even, of the domain of the eye. It has masqueraded as a "pure visual" when it was nothing of the sort. It has in many cases used the properties of the drams of the eye as magic carpets to transport us to its customary haunts.

A certain amount of "abstract painting" has evolved from this confusion; similarly a certain amount of "representative painting." They really neither of them, qua "abstract" or "representative," have anything to do with it. Really "abstract painting" is a province of the creative fancy. And there are very few paintings of your breakfast table, which do not resemble your breakfast table, that are not that as well. They are generally masquerading as an Impressionist's "truth" or a pure visual truth.

Wyndham Lewis.

ARTIFICIAL DAYLIGHT

At one end of the Leicester Galleries the directors have installed Mr. George Sheringham's "Artificial Daylight," and an opportunity is thus afforded of comparing pictures illuminated in this manner with others exhibited in ordinary electric light. The result is something of a triumph for Mr. Sheringham's apparatus, which enables us to see gradations of colour in the blues, greens and yellows hitherto lost in artificial light. From the point of view of judging pictures the trouble with electric light is, of course, that the proportion of warm rays is much greater than in daylight. The new light is thrown back from a coloured reflector made of blue, green and purple patches so combined that the reflector absorbs the warm and reinforces the cold rays. It looks as if the problem were solved at last and we had come to the end of the present unsatisfactory condition of affairs, where pictures painted in cold daylight are only seen for the most part in artificial light by the light of the Bulb. The new light artists will be able to paint by artificial light without the fear of finding a yellow or blue passage in the wrong place next morning. But the real future of Mr. Sheringham's light doubtless lies in the dye industry, where the hours of work could be considerably extended by its use; and it will perhaps be found that most of our textiles, carpets and so on are exposed for sale. The special knowledge of the artist—which was proved so valuable in devising Camouflage and Dazzle—is thus once again proved itself of practical service to the State; indeed, Mr. Sheringham's "Daylight" may develop into a national asset.

NOTES ON ART SALES

Guardi's "Piazza di S. Marco," 12 in. by 16 in., made £470 (Colnaghi), and his "Dogana, Venice," 26 in. by 42 in., £1,155 (Wells). A tavern interior by Jan Steen 17 in. by 14 in., reached £2,100 (Lewis & Simmons); Peter de hoop's "Merry Company," 28 in. by 24 in., £978 (F. Sabine); Frank Hals' "Rembrandt," from the Minshez Collection, £524 (Campbell); and a tavern interior on a panel, 11 in. by 12 in., by A. Van Ostade, £714 (M. M. Clark).
Music

PURCELL ON THE STAGE II.

ONLY one of Purcell's dramatic works is in the strict sense of the word an opera—"Dido and Aeneas," and "Dido and Aeneas" was composed not for public performance but for private performance at a girls' school. Mr. Barclay Square has established clearly the fact that it must be assigned to 1689, so that although it is not a work of Purcell's early youth it still remains the earliest of his important compositions for the stage. Evidently it was quite impossible to give the general public an opera in which the music was continuous from beginning to end. Its model, so far as it had a direct English model, was Blow's "Venus and Adonis." Blow's work is generally called a masque, but it has nothing to do with the Elizabethan type of masque and is simply a chamber opera, composed like "Dido and Aeneas" for private performance, though in this case for the more excited environment of the Court of Charles II. The school in question was kept by Josias Priest, the most celebrated theatrical ballet-master of the day in London. It was no doubt owing to the impression made by "Dido and Aeneas" that Purcell was engaged by Betterton to compose music for "Dioclesian" in 1690, and it is worth noting that Purcell printed the music to "Dioclesian" in exactly the same format as Grub's unfortunate "Albion and Albanius," as if to show that he could do as well as the Frenchman if not better. "Dioclesian" evidently converted Dryden to a proper appreciation of Purcell, and "King Arthur," the fruit of their collaboration, came out in the following year.

"Dioclesian" is a hash-up of an old play with a quantity of choral music inserted wherever possible, and a masque to finish it off. The masque is one of Purcell's happiest efforts, but it must be admitted that a good deal of the earlier incidental music is much too long-drawn to be in any sense dramatic. "Dido and Aeneas" is never long-drawn: the most marvellous thing about it is its tense concentration. "King Arthur" had the advantage of being planned as an opera from the beginning—an opera, that is, according to English taste. As in "The Tempest," the principal characters do not sing at all unless they are supernatural beings. The spirits sing, the mortals speak; but, as in "Dioclesian," there are a number of choruses set to music, and the whole concludes similarly with a masque. "King Arthur" certainly achieves what few of these so-called operas did, unity of style, both in words and music. The result was that "King Arthur" survived longer than any other opera of Purcell, and was acted even in the nineteenth century. "Dido and Aeneas" has been several times put on the stage in recent years, but its revival was directly due to the celebration of the bicentenary of the composer's death in 1885.

The English preference for romantic plays with incidental music was the ruin of Purcell's chances. Had it been possible to produce a complete opera in England on the scale of the operas of Lulli or Scarlatti, there can be no doubt that Purcell possessed the complete ability to carry out this part of his work. His Dido and Aeneas was the result of both his depth of poignant expression and his technical skill in portraying musically the vivid and dramatic interaction of personalities. In his other operas, such as "The Indian Queen," we can see his masterly handling of large masses, and, especially in "King Arthur," of building up musical forms with a colossal sense of design. It was his tragedy that he never had the opportunity of exercising all his powers simultaneously in one single work.

In "The Fairy Queen" (1692 and 1693), which is to be put on the stage at Cambridge on February 10, it is Purcell's sense of the picturesque and his feeling for ballet and stage effect that are most conspicuously in evidence. This entertainment—to call it an opera is absurd—is a much mutilated version of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" into each act of which a choral ballet divertissement is inserted. Not a single word of Shakespeare is set to music, and the musical episodes not only have nothing to do with the play, but are in themselves ludicrously inconsequent. Those who go to see it must make up their minds at the outset to lay aside all superstitious reverence for our immortal bard and accept the work almost in the spirit of a revue. The play itself is considerably curtailed, and on this occasion has had to be still further shortened in order to bring the performance within a reasonable length. The first entry of Titania is made an excuse for an amusing choral scene in which a drunken poet is blindfolded and pinched by the fairies. This episode is one of the additions made to the opera at the revival in 1693. The poet's stammering utterances afforded Purcell scope for that humorous realism in which he so clearly delighted, and there is another spirited comedy scene in the third act in the shape of a pastoral dialogue between Coridon and Mopsa. The five intermezzi are from a musical point of view admirably planned and contrasted. That in the second act, to the place of "Ye Spotted Snakes," is amplified into a procession of Night, Mystery, Secrecy and Sleep, each wonderfully characterized both vocally and instrumentally. At the last comes Sleep, and the chorus take up the words of his song "Hush, no more, be silent all," with short chords and long rests between that vividly suggest their movements as they "softly, softly steal from hence" and leave the stage to the mysterious "followers of Night," who weave a fantastic dance to an elaborate and ingenious "canon four in two."

Pastoral gaiety is the characteristic of the third ballet, commanded by Titania for the amusement of Bottom. The author of the words is not known, but some of the songs in this scene are almost worthy of Dryden himself. In addition to the dialogue between Coridon and Mopsa the worthy weaver is entertained by dances of swans, of savages and of mayflies. The reconciliation of Oberon and Titania is celebrated in Act IV, by a pageant of Peace and the four seasons, the chorus bailing the "great parent of us all" in a very noble and massive strain of homage. The last masque, with which the nuptials of Theseus and Hippolyta are honoured, by special command of Oberon, is very properly introduced by Juno, and concluded by the invocation and appearance of Hymen, after which the singers and dancers, who have now been changed miraculously from fairies to "Chinesees," join in the inevitable chaconne.

Mr. Pepys saw "A Midsummer Night's Dream" in 1662 and found it "the most insipid, ridiculous play that ever I saw in my life." If he had had the chance of witnessing it with Purcell's music he would probably have reconsidered his judgment.

EDWARD J. DENT.

The Syndics of the Cambridge University Press have undertaken to publish a new work entitled "The Cambridge Ancient History." This work, of which the general plan will be similar to that of the "Cambridge Modern History" and "Medieval Histories," will consist of eight volumes, and, beginning with an account of archaeological discovery, will trace the history of Egypt and Babylonia, Assyria and Persia, Greece and Rome, to 324 A.D. The whole work will be under the editorship of Professor J. B. Bury, Fellow of King's College, Mr. S. A. Cook, of Gonville and Caius College, and Mr. F. E. Adecock, Fellow of King's College.
CONCERTS

The Symphony Concert of the New Queen’s Hall Orchestra on January 10 was conducted by Mr. Frank Bridge, who had apparently been called in at the last moment on account of the indisposition of Sir Henry Wood, and in the circumstances it is not unfair to expect that the performance of such a work as Schubert’s Symphony in C would be completely satisfactory. It was remarkable that it went as well as it did. Mr. Bridge succeeded best in the Scherzo; but the changes of tempo introduced into the Andante rather confused it, and the horn theme in the adagio was taken with such slackness of rhythm that it lost a great deal of its power and effect. The chief pitfall of the Symphony in C is in the trombones, and on Saturday they were allowed to come through far too prominently. The concert opened with George Butterworth’s “Shropshire Lad” Rhapsody—soggy and rather dull a thing as any modern English orchestral work. Miss Felice Jana sang the “Mad Scene” from Ambroise Thomas’s “Hamlet”; Mr. Arthur de Greef gave a fine performance of Saint-Saëns’s Pianoforte Concerto in F, a work which was well chosen to exhibit his technical abilities. The programme ended with Ravel’s “Valse Espagnole”—a witty description of Spanish music, expressive with a certain hardness and incisiveness of French epigram. The ito of the Malaguena (played on a muted trumpet) is a delicious example of Ravel’s humour.

A large and appreciative audience was present at the Wigmore Hall on January 7 for the first concert of Modern Music. Messrs. Melzak and Krish (violin and pianoforte) rather gave the impression that they were playing showy passages for their own benefit, instead of realizing that they were part of a whole and subordinating themselves to it. They succeeded better in Mr. Frank Bridge’s eclectically “Phantasia in C minor”; and in Brahms’s Trio in the same key they achieved a really balanced performance. Mr. Mannucci (cello) is apparently the best musician of the three; he certainly has a better understanding of chamber music.

Mr. Edward Mitchell, who is giving a series of pianoforte recitals on Saturday afternoons at the Westminster Central Hall under the auspices of The Music Student, has the makings of a fine technique and a notable power of interpretation. His programmes are unconventional and are devoted exclusively to modern music. Mr. Mitchell’s taste runs from Scriabin and other composers of a violently emotional type, such as MacDowell, whose “Celtic Sonata” has all the hysteria of Liszt without any of his nobility, but his playing of them was marked by commendable restraint and dignity. His choice of pieces hardly gave him scope for much variation; of Mr. Goossens’s amusing ingenuity and De Falla’s “Cubana” afforded a momentary and refreshing contrast. Mr. Mitchell’s last recital (January 17) is to consist entirely of works of Scriabin, including the Tenth Sonata (Op. 70) and the later Preludes (Op. 74).

Dr. W. W. Seton and Dr. R. W. Chambers have undertaken for the Scottish Text Society an edition of Bellenden’s translation of Hector Boece’s History of Scotland. The edition is based upon the manuscript in the library of the University College, London, formerly belonging to James Boswell. Five other manuscripts are known: one in the library of the Marquis of Bute, at Longleat; a second in the Advocates’ Library, Edinburgh; a third in the library of Trinity College, Cambridge; and two others, probably copies of the printed text, in the possession of Dr. E. Neilson and Mr. Brown, of Glasgow. The editors are anxious to ascertain whether any other manuscripts of Bellenden exist. Information should be addressed to Dr. Seton, at University College, London.

Three courses each of seven public lectures on Scandinavian literature will be given shortly at University College, Mr. Björkhaugen will lecture on Thursdays on “August Strindberg,” beginning February 12; Mr. Grøndahl on Wednesdays on “Wergeland, Welhaven and Collett,” beginning February 11; and Mr. Helwage on Tuesdays on “The Golden Age in Danish Literature,” beginning February 19.

MUSICAL NOTES FROM PARIS

Boñor’s “Mefistofele” was performed for the first time in Paris on Christmas Day at the new Théâtre Lyrique (formerly the Vaudeville). It has been a distinct success. M. Vanni-Marcony as Mefistofele (an American) and Edith Mason (an American) as Marguerite, and the conductor, Signor Polacco, were no doubt chiefly responsible for this success. Mme. Mason, who is appearing for the first time in Paris, has a clear, strong voice of rich quality which she uses with skill, and has under perfect control. Above all she is a straightforward singer, who can embody the text as well as the music, and is immeasurably better than Gounod’s “Faust.” Musically it is stronger and shows more grasp of character, and in its general conception it certainly has more affinity to Goethe’s poem. At the same time “Mefistofele” is essentially conventional grand opera, and in no way an epoch-making work, although it is imbued with the beautiful spirit of the age. It is a work in which the smallest thing is magnified, and at all events is free from the absurd sentimentality and superficiality of Gounod’s “Faust.” There is dramatic power in the character of Mefistophiles, and one can understand why this rôle is one in which Chaliapine excels.

A fresh strike on the part of the orchestra and “petit personnel” of the Opéra has temporarily interrupted all performances, including those of the Russian Ballet.

The strikers demand increased salaries—a demand which at first was met with incredulity by the management in the presence of the Minister of Fine Arts in October last—and are only striking now because this agreement has not been carried out.

The management, on the other hand, declare that they can do nothing in the matter unless the State intervention is increased. As the cost of production has increased out of all proportion and has resulted in a nightly deficit of 5,000 fr. during the last six months.

The first of these concerts took place at the end of December; during the present month and those to come they will take place at weekly or fortnightly intervals. A novel feature of the concerts is that the audience are invited to vote for the works which they prefer and which they consider worthy of publication. There were 148 ballots at the first concert. The following is an example of how the vote was distributed: in the vote for the “Cello Sonata” by Joseph Bonnhois, 132 persons expressed their preference, 138 wished to hear it again, and 124 desired to see it published.

In so far as the “Œuvre Inédite” provides opportunities for composers who are not well known to become better known, if they have merit, by overthrowing the usual barriers which stand between them and the public, it is clearly fulfilling an excellent function and supplying a long-felt need, common, we suppose, to most countries, since the production of new native music is almost always attended by a host of practical and financial difficulties. One would like to see the creation of a similar “Œuvre” in England.

R. H. M.

The centenary of the birth of Molière, which will occur in January, 1922, is to be fitly celebrated at the Comédie Française, where M. Emile Fabre proposes to produce twenty-three of Molière’s works, with the decorations and vocal parts, within the month.
Drama

"JULIUS CAESAR" AT THE
ST. JAMES'S

THE grand but reposeful nobility, which (as the last few years have shown us) is a happy characteristic of the English mind, is perfectly reflected by our English actors, and never more perfectly than in their performances of Shakespeare's plays. And of Shakespeare's plays the Roman tragedies are perhaps the best adapted for this particular kind of exhibition. The noble Roman reaches, in fact, the ne plus ultra of grand but reposeful nobility. Honest, loyal, patriotic, raised high above all possibility of humour or intelligence, moved only by the purest and loftiest feelings, the noble Roman is an ideal to which we should all long ago have attained if there had not been the old difficulty over our profiles. This difficulty can only be surmounted by actors, so that it is an envious audience that gazes each evening at the noble Romans pacing in their togas over the boards of the St. James's Theatre. Neither in quantity nor quality has such a display of nobility been seen for years, and if its preparation has required one or two little alterations in Shakespeare's arrangements, who will grudge them? Certainly not Mr. Henry Ainley, whose remarkable reconstruction of one of Count Tolstoy's pieces has recently excited so much notice.

In the present instance there has been less actual creative work to be done (at all events with the pen)—though a word of praise is due for Antony's beautiful "Vale, Caesar!" (as he kneels a last time beside his dead friend) which gives so much more touching an end to the foreign scene than the sordid affair of Cinna the poet. But as regards tactful elimination the calls upon the producer's ingenuity have been severe. The fact is that the ordinary version of the text, either owing to printer's mistakes (as most commentators suppose) or owing to the author's carelessness, contains several passages which tend to throw doubts upon the nobility of two or three of the characters. Indeed in the case of one of them—of Julius Caesar himself—the reviser's task is almost hopeless. What with his conceit, his ill-disguised nervousness, and his eccentric remarks and notions, Julius Caesar's nobility is past preserving for. The most that can be done is to acquiesce in what we must deplore and to induce him to make up for his earlier failings by improving his appearance as a corpse and as a ghost. There was more prospect of success in applying the straightening process to Mark Antony. The highly compromising prostration scene must of course be abolished, as well as the tit with Octavius at the beginning of the fifth act, but the actor-manager might be compensated for this by being given the last four lines of Octavius' speech at the end of the play. The rest of the job was safely left to the actor's skill. Mr. Ainley succeeded in making Antony as respectable and straightforward and simple-minded as could be desired. Arrived—Aeques? Not a trace. Didn't he explain it all himself? A plain blunt man, that loved his friend, with neither wit nor words nor utterance, who only spoke right on. And if what he said made the public so frightfully excited and enthusiastic, nobody was more completely surprised than himself, and (in his naive way) gratified and even elated. Oh! nobility incarnate. As to Brutus, finally, there was no difficulty whatever. In fact, if anything he was a little too noble; his reception of the news of Portia's death was so stoical that it had to be cut. But otherwise, except that his dignity forbade him to mention the whizzing exhalations and prevented the anonymous poet from entering his tent at Sardis, nothing was required except to allow him to commit suicide by himself on an empty stage instead of persuading Strato to let him run upon his sword.

This ennobling process, however ethically desirable and however enjoyable for the actors, produces, must be allowed, a depressing sense of uniformity upon the audience, especially as it involves the omission of many of the livelier parts of the play. But apart from these drawbacks there is a good deal to be said for the production. Almost every word is audible; hardly any of the verbal emphases are misplaced; there is no extraordinary over-acting—nothing comparable to the barking King in the Covent Garden "Hamlet"; the scenery and dresses are inoffensive except in so far as they prolong the intervals, and force us to listen to the futilities of the incidental music. On the other hand the crowd is feeble in spite of its noiseiness, and the difficulties of the battles at the end are met, as usual in this production, by cutting them. But with all his cuts and without all his StatusBarque, the producer has quite failed to give the play any kind of formal unity; he leaves us with only one general impression—that Shakespeare is a better dramatist than Mr. Ainley.

J. S.

A TISSUE-PAPER COMEDY.

NEW THEATRE.—"Mr. Pim Passes By." By A. A. Milne.

FEARFUL is the lure of the theatre, not only to stagestruck young ladies and gentlemen, but also to literary men. Only the theatre, they believe, will enable them to express the best that is in them, and no first-class novelist is happy till he has written a second-class play. They carry their best ideas in half their theatre, no matter whether the theatre can use them or not. Here, for instance, is Mr. A. A. Milne, who gets a capital notion for a short story. An absent-minded old gentleman calls on some formal errand at a country mansion, and in the course of a few minutes' chat with the lady of the house induces her to believe that her proud husband, a son of whom she thought long buried in Australia, is alive and has lately been seen by him on a liner. The lady's second husband, a county magnate much swayed by Mrs. Grundy, is of course precipitated into paroxysms of terror, which last till, after a wearing afternoon, Mr. Pim comes ambling by again at sunset, to confess that, by a natural confusion in his mind between the names "Telworthy" and "Polwhittle," he has created a huge alarm about nothing at all.

Now, if Mr. Milne had kept to the key of fantasy throughout and not troubled about marriage-law propaganda, there was matter, as we say, for a good short story. Why must he take it into the theatre? At the most such a slender plot would provide a curtain raiser, and yet he has tried to extract three whole acts from it. Seldom can a dramatist have been put to such shifts. Mr. Pim returns not once but three times to unravel his little error; a pair of light-comedy lovers are rushed in as stopgaps. Still there is not an evening's entertainment. Happy thought! Music is said to have charms. Let Miss Georgette Cohan give an impression of her talented mother in a coon-song; let Mr. Ben Webster make comic sounds at the piano. Still three-quarters of an hour to fill? Give aid, all ye spirits of harmony! Piano entertainers, violin soloists, selection-twingling orchestra, save us! If that will not do, dare we bring Mr. Pim back a fifth time? If we are not really numbered by all the house we will ask Mr. Bosciault has provided compensations. For the wife he gives us Miss Irene Vanbrugh, and who is there to-day but Miss Vanbrugh to play drawing-room comedy with a proper sparkle? Best of all, he consents (too rare treat!) to give us himself. Mr. Pim with his peering spectacles and soft, sly voice is perfect. He is solid; you could venture to walk all round him. Without any help from the text you know his whole history—that he was at Eton, for instance, that he has made money (Heaven knows how!) in business, and that he is President of a Metaphysical Society. When we think of him we find our complaints unfounded. We wish, after all, Mr. Pim had come back for the fifth time.

An exhibition of about twenty paintings by the late Auguste Renoir will be held at the Chelsea Book Club, beginning on January 31.
CHRISTMAS IN THE THEATRES

II.—PANTOMIMES.

A MODERN pantomime is like Islington High Street, which, beneath its coating of fish-bars and cinema palaces, still follows the straggling line of an old-world village. So, at the pantomime, when the topical songs are all sung, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, the profliteers and the brontosaurus all gibbetted, the latest (or what London takes for the latest) effects of stage-mechanism and lighting all displayed, the ancient skeleton shows through the fleshy, and we recognize the commedia dell'arte. The principal boy and girl, stately and vacuous, are just the first lovers, Leonidro and Isabella; between the songs and ballets buffoons interpolate their lazzi, which are just as much, and just as little, extempore as the improvised comedy of the Italian Masks; and though Harlequin glitters to-day in symmetrical lozenges, we meet the true scion of the Bergomask varlet in the low comedian with a snudge on his nose, with patched-up trousers and socks that are not a pair.

The origin of these types remains a mystery. They appear among men (for they never had a birthday) somewhere in Latium or Etruria. In the light of the flames that envelope the sack of Rome, their strange silhouettes flit across the crumbling aqueducts, and escape with a bound into the Middle Age. This part has been told by Vernon Lee and others. But how the Masks crossed the Channel and learned to be English is a story that no one will dare to tell in detail till Mr. W. J. Lawrence unlocks his treasures. Yet what an evolution began that night at Covent Garden, when Rich first chipped his egg as the sun-hatched Harlequin, and (knowing he could not speak three words without solecisms) reverted to the subtle art of the mime! The brawling buffoon becomes a silent enchanter, while Columbine, once the merry serving-wench, is volatilized into a fay in bewilling muslins. The star-crossed lovers who vented their griefs in the prologue would be changed by some spell to Harlequin and Columbine, and pursued through a world of trick-groves and toppling castles by the old curmudgeon transformed to Pantaloon, and his loutish servant translated into the Clown, the "griming, filching, irresistible clown" of Grimaldi, with his mouth red-smeared, like a schoolboy's, from stolen tarts. Later on, when Planche and Beverley invented modern scenery, and could show by the falling of the leaves of a palm-tree "six fairies supporting a coronet of Jews," the opening fable encroached on the harlequinade, which gradually shrunk to the shadow it is to-day. Yet not long since, in the last scene at Drury Lane, while electric rains in torrents and the chorus revolved in dazzling magnificence of colour, we caught the whisk of Columbine's white skirt, and observed her watching the spectacle from the wings. So the Sphinx watches cavalcades of affluent globe-trotters, . . .

We have not strayed far from our subject in these reflections, for you will find the traditional pantomime at the Lyceum, preserved, so to say, in amber and other times. "Dick Whittington" this year is flawless in structure. It begins in a cowwebby belfry with Demon Rats, who defy the Fairy Queen in her halo of moonbeams, and ends with a son of ghost of a harlequinade. "En route" we are shown old London, on with gables and windmills; Fitzwarren's Stores, the wreck off the coast of Morocco, and attain, through disintegrating bowers of bloated margolids, to a paradise of fairies in rose-shaped skirts, whose revels are led by a sylph of such classical contours that she might have been snipped from the plates of Pollock's toy-theatres. Miss Mabel Lait, the hero, is as fair as a disguised Virgilian goddess, and happily more a Diana than a Juno; Mr. George Bass as Idle Jack and Mr. Daley Cooper as Fitzwarren's cook say, sing and tumble over everything they ought; and Whittington's cat, with its joyous scamperings, is made very lovable by Mr. Foy. In short, a pantomime comme il faut.

The type is faithfully preserved on the whole in the suburbs. The Hammersmith version of "Cinderella" has a noble Prince Charming in Miss Lillie Ansell, and a regular spring-headed Jack of a dancing Baron. "Red Riding Hood" at Wimbledon is most pleasing. Besides the indispensable Boy Blue and the Wolf, we have a manly Robin Hood and a sweet Maid Marian, not forgetting Friar Tuck and Richard Coeur-de-Lion. For once the romance is not altogether evaporated, and the old-fashioned style of the costumes and scenery suggests at times a Cruikshank illustration. At Kennington, in "Aladdin," on the contrary, all is topical, aptitude, and malicious. Mr. Fred A. Leslie's Abanazar is perhaps the best that has been seen since the witlessness of pantomime librettists made a comic person of that tiresome sorcerer, and Miss Jennie Benson's Aladdin is quite in the picture, chock-full of spirits and cheek, and revealing, by occasional tremors of sentiment, that if Miss Benson thought we were worth the bother, she could play the part as a serious character-study. There is a certain sardonic Lion well worth a mention, but the real attraction is Mr. "Wee" George Wood. We will not inquire his age (Poll Sweedlepine came to grief over that in the case of Bailey, Jr.), but, the moment he steps on the stage as Aladdin's small brother, he brings the breath of the steets along with him. It is the London boy at last without caricature, that aloof and icy cynic we all of us know, if we have ever encountered a Scout or an office boy. Perhaps nobody on the stage but Mr. Wood combines the physique and the knowledge required for this feat.

We have kept for Drury Lane the place of honour at the tail of our defile. Compare the present spectacle of "Cinderella" with the style of pantomime received by Mr. Arthur Collins from his old chief as a legacy, and you will realize what a reformer he has been. Historic names—Evans, Conquest, Lupino—are still to be found upon the programme, but everything else has changed. In most cases for the good. We are only too glad that Mr. Will Evans should have a red toupet, and not a red nose, as the Baroness, and suggest Mayfair instead of the local pawning shop. We are equally glad that Mr. Lupino, as Pipkin the page, should be innocent enough in his fun for any nursery. And, though Mr. Cornell's ballets do not in design reach much above a prettiness painted fan, they are infinitely preferable to glare and spangles. We may add that the fête galante in the Prince's gardens, with its flavour of the age of the Macaronis, is a happy and fantastic evocation. If Miss Smithson's Cinderella is lackadaisical (we have not met the Cinderella we wanted this year), Miss Marie Blanche's Prince Charming quite makes amends. He is really original, this Hoffmannesque gallant, who strolls through the woods with a fettle under his arm, and appears in a magic mirror to his beloved. There is a dash of Charles Surface about him, too, when the punchbowl is on, and a number of little warning touches of dignity, which never let you forget his royal blood. It is the best thing that has been done in this line for years, and perhaps out of all our Christmas peregrinations Miss Marie Blanche has left us the brightest memory.

The Incorporated Stage Society announce that the programme for their next production will consist of two plays by M. Wilson Diseur: "There Remains a Ge-ter," a fantasy in one act, and a three-act comedy, "Isles of Memories." The performances will be given on the 8th and 9th inst., Sunday evening and Monday afternoon.
Correspondence

ENCLOSURES IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Dear Sir,—I should like to ask one or two questions of your reviewer E. M. G., who, in the review of "Working Life of Women in the Seventeenth Century," by Miss Alice Clark, makes the statement that "the years of enclosure had hardly begun" (Athenæum, January 2, p. 9). This seems to me to require some explanation.

If this statement is correct, I should like to have E. M. G. explain the Statute against enclosing, 1489 (4 Henry VII.), the pamphlets against enclosing in the middle of the seventeenth century, the reports of the Royal Commissioners on enclosures 1517-19, 1548, 1566, 1607, 1652, and 1656. It would appear that between 1485 and 1517 about one-half per cent. of the counties investigated was enclosed, and 6,931 persons displaced; and for the period 1578-1607, 69,758 acres enclosed with 2,232 evictions. In Northamptonshire in the above two periods 2.21 and 4.30 of the county was returned as enclosed, the numbers displaced being 1,405 and 1,444. Mr. R. H. Tawney estimates that 2.76 of the whole area of the twenty-four counties was affected by agrarian changes (enclosure), displacing between 30,000 and 50,000 persons.

May I suggest that these figures give a different view from that of E. M. G., and affect seriously the criticism of Miss Alice Clark's book? Is it not well to remember that the dispossessed peasants did not write pamphlets showing the evil of enclosure? Their action was of a different order.

Would E. M. G. kindly explain why in 1569 an armed band pulled down enclosures near Chelney, in Derbyshire? The Leveller movement, too, seems to require some attention. The movement which Mr. Tawney says "set half the counties of England in a blaze between 1530-1569" was an attempt to resist enclosure, as is shown by the clauses in the programmes of agrarian reform drawn up in 1536 and 1549, quoted by Mr. Tawney.

Your reviewer may be right, and the years of enclosure may not have begun in the seventeenth century; but it seems to me that the view of these rebels as to enclosure requires some explanation. Were they mistaken? Have the Royal Commissioners made their reports out for the wrong year? Is Mr. Tawney a sure guide in these matters? E. M. G. further says the latter part of the period (i.e., seventeenth century) shows a marked rise in real wages. Well, what about the years 1693-9, spoken of as the "Seven Years of Famine"? The price of corn in 1698 is given as 6s. 9d. per quarter, the average for seven years 57s. per quarter; while for the previous seven years the average price was 31s. 9d. per quarter. If people were so much better off, why did the women at Oxford riot in the market and pull down the price of corn from 9s. to 6s. 2d., and why riots throughout the country, with the breaking of gaols, etc.? Perhaps E. M. G. has a satisfactory explanation.

Yours, etc.,

C. R. S.

EINSTEIN'S THEORY OF GRAVITATION

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Dear Sir,—One does not "explain" gravitation by looking at the top crust of Nature! And may I suggest that the whole thinking of Einstein goes astray? The supposition that space is Euclidean in one quarter and non-Euclidean in another—just to explain observations otherwise inexplicable—rests on the assumption that space is a kind of putty. It is an order, not a separate thing.

All these useful fictions of science—"matter," "energy," "spaces," Newtonian evenly-flowing "time," "electrons," "forces," and so forth—are useful inventions of "simplifying" generalizers. Mathematical spaces are Euclidean and non-Euclidean just as your conceptual inventions run—just as you define them. Riemann, Lobatschevsky and Euclid are all right. There are as many special spaces as you can invent consistently, since you make them. Co-existing positions of colours, etc., are all we perceive.

The whole development of physics from the seventeenth century in Europe rests on what Professor Mach calls a "mechanical" mythology accepted because useful for scientific prediction. All right. But don't try and make philosophy out of their 'washy but "useful" stuff—it won't stand it.

Outside the ranks of a few metaphysicians we sup posed enlightened Europeans live in superstition. Science to-day has been called an "expurgated mythology." But the expurgation is very incomplete. So long as there remains any belief in fictions like energy, gravity, space, time, etc., viewed as entities, so long popular thinking remains in the mire. It is a pity specialists don't receive a more liberal training before they start on their narrowing work. But this takes time.

Spectator.

"SCOTS"

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—When your reviewer spoke of Gavin Douglas as one who "wrote in Scots," he was more pedantically accurate than possibly he realized. His critic (December 19) insists that "Douglas did not write in Scots," and that "in Douglas's day . . . Scots and Gaelic were the same thing." Of both propositions Gavin Douglas himself is a witness to the contrary. In the "Prologue" to "Eneid," "I am allied to himself as Writing in the language of Scottis nation;"

Kèmg na Sudroum [Southern] but our ain langauge.

-----

So me behuvtit to sae.

Sam bastard Lytne, Frensch, or Inelis ois [use]:

Ouhr saur war Scottis I had na uther choos.

For all that, Douglas is distinguished among Scottish writers by his use of what we may even call "Southern" mannerisms. But the point is that his usage directly traverses both statements of your correspondent. His departure from the earlier course of identifying "Scots" with Gaelic was no doubt warranted by the growing contemporary practice; his language does not suggest that it was a startling novelty. Less than forty years later the author of "The Complaynt of Scottlande" pleads: "I hel usit domestic Scottis langage."

Yours truly,

Scottish Arts Club,

W. Mackay Mackenzie.

Edinburgh.

WREN'S EPITAPH

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—I write to point out a slip in Mr. Frederic Harrison's interesting letter in your last issue. Mr. Harrison quotes the celebrated epitaph of Wren in St. Paul's Cathedral as being "si monumentum quaeris, circumspice." Surely, if my memory serves me right, this should be "si monumentum requiris circumspice." The difference may appear trifling, but, slight as it is, the correct version is immeasurably grander for expression, rhythm, and volume of sound. It has the additional advantage of leading further emphasis to the point so admirably made by Mr. Harrison—that Latin owes its undeniable superiority to English for epigraphic purposes partly to the greater gravity and rotundity of the words employed.

I am, Sir,

Yours faithfully,

N. H. Romanes.

The King has approved of the following awards by the President and Council of the Royal Society: A Royal Medal to Prof. John Brettland Farmer, F.R.S., for his notable work on plant and animal cytology. A Royal Medal to Mr. James Hopwood Jeans, F.R.S., for his researches in applied mathematics.

Other awards have also been made by the President and Council: The Copley Medal to Prof. Williamaddock Bayliss, F.R.S., for his contributions to general physiology and to bio-chemistry. The Davy Medal to Prof. Percy Faraday Frankland, F.R.S., for his distinguished work in chemistry. The Sylvester Medal to Major Percy Alexander MacMahon for his researches in pure mathematics. The Hughes Medal to Dr. Charles Chree, F.R.S., for his researches on ter restrial magnetism.
Foreign Literature

CHARLES NODIER

SOME persons who do not take things lightly have been wont to say that they would much rather have no biographies, the exceptional satisfactions, in such cases as Boswell and Lockhart, being far outweighed by libraries of insignificance and shelves of things more or less disappointing or disgusting. M. Pinguad’s life of Nodier—for it is almost that, though the later years are passed over more rapidly than the earlier—may not completely vindicate these pessimists, but it certainly does not very signally confute them. There is one delightful story in it, and another which might have been delightful. The first is that Nodier (who had the not disagreeable weakness of imaginary autobiography, so closely allied to the other gift of “story-telling”) once began “Quand j’étais corsaire”—But the young idiot to whom he was speaking, instead of waiting in breathless joy for the revelation, interjected, “Vous avez été corsaire?” whereat, of course, Nodier turned away in a huff. The other anecdote, as observed, promises, but does not quite pay. His sister-in-law (one likes her for it) asked him once how he had managed to persuade so many women that he loved them. Now the proper answer, of course, would have been, “Because I did.” But the recorded one, “Because I thought I did,” is very feeble.

There are other things to reward the reader; but on the whole we don’t learn very much more of the author of “La Fée aux Miettes” than we could have guessed, and something of the circumstances in which he could have done without. There is nothing surprising in the information that he shared that peculiar weakness of men of letters as to money matters which was so common in the interval between frank dependence on patronage and at least profession of entire independence. First we begged and took without shame, then we borrowed without much thought about repayment. Let us thank Apollo, and be rather surprised at Mercury, that our prose God has allowed us to leave the completion of the triad—stealing—to other classes of workers.

Another failing of Nodier’s—an aptitude for shifting political opinions with extreme versatility, and occasionally mistaking the dates of his previous sentiments—may have been partly due, as M. Pinguad thinks, to his having no very definite opinions at all. But this indefiniteness itself must have been aggravated by the extraordinary early experiences of which we have here the fullest account. When a boy of ten or twelve is made to pronounce orations in a Jacobin club about supposed Republican martyrs, and when he is shortly afterwards revolting by seeing examples of Republican savagery, it is pretty certain that he will become either an ardent Royalist (as Nodier sometimes thought he was) or an anythingarian (which he really was). We hear much about “Les Philadelphes,” a real society of young men at Besançon, concerning whom Nodier romanced somewhat afterwards. There is later a good deal (not unexpected, nor indeed due up to then beforehand) about the relations between him and Hugo; and one is bound to say that the poet comes out on the whole rather the better of the two, though there was no very serious misbehaviour on either side. Perhaps M. Pinguad gives himself unnecessary trouble to prove Nodier’s untrustworthiness as a historian (did anybody ever take him seriously as such?), and makes a little mistake in comparing him to Froude. Both were, it may be, “congenitally” (M. Pinguad quotes “constitutionally,” and may perhaps be going to a different source) inaccurate, but the Englishman did not bring art to assist nature; the Frenchman, one fancies, did.

The point, however, is that we do not go to Nodier for history or for accuracy of any kind, or for consistent walking in politics or morals. We go to him as to one of the amanuenses of the Fairy Queen; and we thank his grace and his pains for what he transmits to us from her.

GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

AN ITALIAN ON ITALIANS

ITALIA NUOVA ED ANTICA. Da Emilio Bodrero. (Bologna, Zanichelli, 6.50 lire.)

TO Signor Bodrero the Castel S. Angelo is the epitome of the history of Rome. Built originally as the mausoleum of the Emperor Hadrian, it was used as a fortress both by the Romans and the barbarians, and then as a storehouse for the Papal archives and treasures and a place of refuge for the Popes. During the Middle Ages it was the symbol of the possession of supreme power in Rome. Later it became a barracks for the troops of Napoleon, a military prison, a home for Italian soldiers, and finally a museum. And it is in this history that Signor Bodrero finds the explanation of the extraordinary fact that King and Pope can now live in harmonious hostility in the Eternal City.

But if a sense of balance is among the most valuable characteristics of the race, it brings with it a corresponding weakness in a tendency to scepticism, which, however, only assumes dangerous proportions when there is no great inspiring movement to counteract it. One remembers Mr. Norman Douglas’s remark that in mundane matters, where the personal equation dominates, the judgment of the Italian is apt to be turbid and partial. But in the other arts and intellectual departments it becomes serenely clear and impartial. The reverse is the case among ourselves. We cannot as a rule argue impartially about our beliefs and convictions. Scepticism is not a national danger. But on the other hand Pragmatism could never have found a home in Italy; nor will Modernism.

Another important point in this volume is the emphasis laid on the interest taken in municipal government in Italy. Many readers will probably be reminded of those inimitably humorous pages in Foscarino’s “Piccolo Mondo Moderno.” But under the vigorous mayoralty of Signor Nathan before the war the Roman municipality undoubtedly played a very important part, not merely in Rome, but in the country as a whole. The Italian, says our author, may be a nationalist in his relations with other peoples, “but in all other relations—and it is as well to recognize the fact—he is by tradition and constitution, regional, and more especially ‘campegiolista.’” Long years of foreign rule have bred in him a deep-rooted suspicion of the State. It is the enemy, and must be fought and may be cheated.

Signor Bodrero would gladly see the Government take advantage of this local feeling in tackling the problem of how to keep the remaining art treasures in the country, where the great families, under the Napoleonic system of division of property, are finding it more and more difficult not to part with those they still possess. He would give the local authorities control of local art treasures, which could be collected in museums, the entrance fees being used to pay a fair interest on their property to the owners, who would be far more willing to hand it over to these authorities than to the State.

These interesting essays, which date from before the war, cover a variety of subjects. Unfortunately, they are written in a florid rhetorical style that is now, we are glad to say, becoming rare in Italian.

I. C.-M.
CRISPI'S FOREIGN POLICY

La Politeca Estera di Francesco Crispi. Da Gaetano Salvemini. “Quaderi della Voce.” (Rome, La Voce. 3 lire)

Those who remember something of the dominating political position Crispi still held in the imagination of his countrymen even during the first years of the present century, of the magnetic influence of this fiery impulsive Sicilian, this Futurist among politicians who, when asked to what party he belonged, replied that he belonged to the party of Francesco Crispi—“Io mi chiamo domani”—will realize, after reading this little book on his foreign policy, how times have changed. The present writer recollects a small Italian boy, who had been told that a new-comer at the hotel was a distinguished stranger, going up to him and addressing him “Bon giorno, Signor Crispi.” Crispi, however, shared the defects of the men of 1848 who made the new Italy. They had spent their best years in overthrowing existing institutions and they were naturally failures as constructive statesmen.

In any case a fire-eater like Crispi was ill suited to the post of Foreign Minister. It is impossible not to contrast his handling of the difficult question of the Triple Alliance with the skill displayed by his aristocratic predecessor, De Robilant, even when pitted against such a master as Bismarck. Crispi had none of the tact of a man of the world like De Robilant. About the year 1888 there was reason to believe that France might attack Italy, or at least hold over her the eternal bugbear of those years, the Roman question; and for this very reason De Robilant, anxious not to provoke France unnecessarily, had refused to meet Bismarck. Crispi, however, hastened to Fried- richshruhl, whence he brought away in triumph the great coat which the Chancellor had placed upon his shoulders with his own hands, and very little else. Bismarck accomplished his purpose. He irritated France, and obtained a military convention whereby Italy promised to send troops to Germany in case of an attack by France. But Crispi had apparently not even thought of demanding a guarantee of naval support in case of an attack upon the Italian coast by the French fleet. And the chief result of the meeting for Italy was a refusal on the part of France to continue the negotiations for the renewal of the commercial treaty, which had serious financial results for Italy for some years to come.

Fear of France on the one hand and of Vatican intrigues on the other were the motives underlying all Crispi’s foreign policy, and he considered that an alliance with Germany and Austria would alone provide a safeguard. Hence we find him turning to Berlin as early as 1877. But from the first he failed to obtain any support there for Italy’s ambitions. When he spoke to Bismarck about a rectification of her Alpine frontier as a compensation for Austrian occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, he was told that the way to Berlin lay through Vienna and that Italy had better seize Albania; and he received a similar answer in London. It was the same story when France began to extend her influence in Tunis, and when he found himself in dire straits in Abyssinia. No wonder he was completely disillusioned at last.

But he was always loyal to the agreement with England which was to prevent any change in the balance of power in the Mediterranean, arranging for the Italian squadron that went to the opening of the Kiel Canal to visit Portsmouth on its way back, though here again he was disappointed at the absence of tangible results.

Signor Salvemini obviously considers that Crispi was altogether mistaken in his foreign policy, as he himself appears to have realized at last. His book is based on a thorough documentary study of the subject.

THE NEWS of the death of D. Benito Pérez Galdós, which took place on the 4th of January, reminds one not only how fresh the greater part of his work still is, but at the same time how true was his view of Spain. In Spanish literature, music and painting there is a “literary fiction” which Englishmen have to penetrate before they can get at the essential Spain behind it. The excellence and reasonableness of most of Ford’s “Gaudri” have been forgotten in the romantic charm of Gautier; and his interpretation—a poetic but distorted vision—has been taken by all French writers and most English ones to represent Spain as it actually is. The consequence is that nearly all modern ideas about Spain are secondary emotions. They are not ideas of Spain, but of the Spain invented by Gautier and Mérimée; they are notions obtained at second hand. The fiction of “Carmen” dies hard. No one will believe that the employees of the tobacco factory at Seville are the least attractive people in the place. It is still difficult to make some Englishmen believe that in Spain the women neither smoke nor carry daggers about their person—just as difficult, in fact, as it is to convince a Spaniard that in London you may see women wearing uniform and walking five abreast on the pavement. Even Mr. Conrad fails when he tries to describe a Spanish type; the heroine of his new book is a strange, remote, interesting character, but there is nothing Spanish about her except the background of the Carlist wars.

Pérez Galdós is important for English readers, because the Spain and the Spaniards he described were reasonable and natural. His emotions of Spain were all primary emotions. He grew up in times which were almost too romantic to be true. The history of Spain in the nineteenth century is practically the history of various generals. Yet the “Episodios Nacionales” are great in the same way that “Vittoria” is great. Meredith is almost the only English writer who put natural, unexaggerated Italians into a book; and Pérez Galdós made living things of his “Episodios Nacionales” and his “Novelas Españolas Contemporáneas,” because he never overdid the Spanish character. His power of making people and situations convincing sprang from the same causes which make “Don Quixote” and the “Exemplary Novels” convincing. Like Cervantes, Pérez Galdós went about and saw things, and talked with men and women. He knew those queer, inhospitable wonders, he travelled third class; he passed the time of day with ladies and gentlemen, and strange streets, and poor students. He explored the back streets of Madrid, and even had some knowledge of the devious ways of Spanish politics.

Pérez Galdós was, of course, essentially a man of the nineteenth century; but there, again, it was the real nineteenth century, not the fiction of it. When, a few weeks ago, I saw the dramatized version of “Marianela” at Madrid, it was impossible not to realize that the distinctive, invaluable contributions of the last hundred and fifty years or so were all reflected in it. The humanity of Rousseau, the wistful fancy of Hans Andersen, the strength and constructive logic of Thomas Hardy, all were there; it was like Mr. Hardy writing (only quite naturally) in a mediating of Hans Andersen. “Marianela” is as charged with the remembered emotions of childhood as the poem of “The Oxen.” Yet the fact that Pérez Galdós is not of the twentieth century should not stand in the way of his being read to-day. Deaths and centenaries are good opportunities for reading books which one had not bothered about before, and this is the moment when people in England are beginning to work for the essential Spain, and not for the literary fiction of it on which they have been brought up. We are beginning to want Falla’s “La Vida Breve” instead of “Carmen,” and it is becoming clear that France is not a channel leading us to Spain, but a Chinese Wall preventing us from ever really getting to know or to understand it. The novels of Benito Pérez Galdós can be read in the original by anyone with the rudiments of the language and a little application, and they enable one to get to Spain without crossing France.

J. B. T.
1920 THE ATHENÆUM

List of New Books
Prepared in co-operation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding with the Dewey Decimal System, the sub-classes being indicated, for the most part, in their main titles with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. The first numeral in these represents the main class, the second one of the subdivisions, and so on.

Those works in the List which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

100 PHILOSOPHY.

Mr. Kershaw’s case against spiritualism is the effect it produces on its devotees. This he regards as degrading, and his book is written as a warning. The description of his experience at a séance is certainly interesting, but, as usual in such narratives, too vague in its details.

Dr. Schofield adopts the somewhat unusual point of view that while most spiritualist phenomena may be explained by what we may call “naturalistic” causes, there is a residuum which must be referred to supernatural powers. These supernatural powers, however, he considers both dangerous and evil, and, on this account, spiritualism should be avoided. The author writes as one who accepts the Biblical revelations.

200 RELIGION.

See review, p. 78.

An attack on the political and moral tendencies of the Church of Rome. The author is convinced that the Roman Church was pro-German during the war, and that it is a moral and political plague in every country in which it has power. Some of his points are sound enough, but in others his patriotic assumptions make his arguments ineffectual. His claim that the Roman Church is still fpelled to the casualty of Liguori is interesting, but questionable.

Both author and introducer of this sketch seem to be enthusiastic Freemasons, and support the Eleusinian mysteries originated in some hoary call now represented by Freemasonry. The introduction criticizes the opinion that “it is not improbable that they [the Eleusinian mysteries were practised among the Atlanteans]. This is enough to show that the book is more suggestive and popular than scientific. It is readable and picturesque; so far as it goes, but contains some bad slips, such as “Pisistratus” “Pisistratus.” “Chthonian” “Chthonian.” “Callinhoe” “Callinohoe,” “hierocarya” “Hierocarya,” and “Conon on the” “Conon on the.” The bibliography is a perfunctory affair.

300 SOCIOLOGY.

Cleveland (Frederick A.) and Schafer (Joseph), ed. Democracy in Reconstruction. Boston, Mass., Houghton Mifflin (Constable), 1919. 8½ in. 510 pp. index, 12½ n.

Professor Schafer heads off with an introductory essay on “The Historical Background of Reconstruction in America,” after which some twenty of the most pressing problems of to-day under the following heads: “Ideals of Democracy,” “Institutions of Democracy,” “After-war Social Problems,” “After-war Labour Troubles,” “After-war Transportation Problems,” and “After-war Political Problems.” “A new social consciousness has come into existence, partly in consequence of the war,” which is a rapidly multiplying the demand for a sane, evolutionary and unequivocally liberal solution of the economic and social problems of American life.” From this point of view the writers survey the whole field of political and social welfare. Their attitude in general is that of individualism, Liberalism; they have certain principles in common with the Socialist, but part company on the question of public and private ownership, and direct their criticism against both Socialist and Bolshevik schemes for reform. There are admirable chapters on health conditions, housing, social betterment, and the educational lessons of the war; but the book is very much spun out, and many parts overlap, owing to the method of collaboration.

With the full arrival of the Education Act of 1918, the results of enterprises such as this of Miss Margaret McMillan’s will no longer be large. The teachers away. The teachers away. The little children from the East End slums in the Nursery School at the age of seven, after which they go into the ordinary Council schools; and education comes entirely to an end, with most of them, before the plastic age opens and there is any real hope of implanting habits and tastes that will last all their lives. In presenting the book of this he described the instruction is made as practical and realistic as possible: the children are taken out of doors for teaching, sports, and summer camping, and every effort is made to instil habits of cleanliness, tidiness, and savoir faire, which they would never acquire in their squallid homes.

*Villiers (Brougham) and Chesson (W. H.). Anglo-American Relations, 1861-5. Fisher Unwin [1919]. 9 in. 221 pp. 7/6 n.

In order to further the continuance and extension of the good feeling between the two great English-speaking peoples the authors discuss in a conciliatory way the “Trent” affair, the “Alabama” episode, and the other misunderstandings that chequered our relations during the Civil War epoch. Specially interesting is Mr. Chesson’s “Voices of the Sixties.” Mr. Chesson’s father kept a diary which is full of racy and illuminating references to contemporary statesmen of both nations and remarkable events. The whole book is instructive and very timely. It was worth an index.

“Whitaker’s” may perhaps claim to be the most frequently consulted of books of reference, and the fifty-second issue will keep up its reputation. It contains summaries of the Treaty of Versailles and the League of Nations Covenant; articles on Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia; and other new States; and a fresh section treating of “Questions of the Day.” The article on “Places of Interest and Amusement in London” has been extended from six pages to sixteen, and the improvement was welcomed by anyone who compares the 1919 edition. “The Wireless” is a new feature with the table in the present volume. The prefacing mentions that this issue marks the centenary of the birth of the projector of the Almanack. It may therefore be suggested that it is desirable to alter the wording on the title-page, “by J. B. J. Whitaker, F.R.S.” to “by J. B. J. Whitaker, F.R.S.” A handbook celebrated for its trustworthy-
400 PHILOLOGY.

The Second Year of the Junior French Course by the Senior French Master at Bradford Grammar School has much in common with the First Year’s Course. The book is entirely in French; grammar is systematically taught, mainly by the inductive process; and there are reading lessons, simple free compositions, illustrative pictures, various types of exercises, questionnaires, and a vocabulary.

This book, by the Assistant Professor of English in the University of Wisconsin, is accurately described on the title-page as “a compendium of rules regarding good English, grammar, sentence structure, paragraphing, manuscript arrangement, punctuation, spelling, essay writing, and letter writing. It should be acceptable not only to young writers and ‘apprentices in composition,’ but also, for occasional reference, to persons with some journalistic experience. The text is preceded by a detailed synopsis of the numbered rules.

Among the subjects dealt with in this companion volume to Professor Woolley’s ‘Handbook of Composition’ are sentence structure, abbreviations, spelling, the compounding of words, the representation of numbers, italicizing, and the use of capitals. The treatment of punctuation and paragraphing is considerably more extended than in the “Handbook of Composition.

300 NATURAL SCIENCE.

This manual is intended not as a botanical text-book, but as a general introduction to practical science; and such subjects as the uses of the soil, the need for oxygen, the influence of heat, sources of nitrogen, and reproduction are so treated as to give opportunities for a variety of illustrative experimental methods.

M. Houngicq’s handbook is a sort of “Apollo” on a small scale; he does for France what M. Renach has done for the world. He has given a great deal of information in this little volume, which is illustrated by nearly 200 engravings or photographs of works of art from the time of the Romans up to the time of Degas. Some of the illustrations are excellently clear; but in other cases the difficulty of printing in half-tone on lightly glazed paper has made the reproductions tantalizingly obscure.

780 MUSIC.

Dr. Watt has written a really fine analysis of the psychological data of music. His study is based on the observed reactions to musical sounds; he endeavours to ascertain the psychological and physical equivalents to aesthetic rules—to show the meaning and justification, in this scientific sense, of such rules. The current confusion about such matters makes such an analysis very welcome, and Dr. Watt is to be congratulated on the clear, patient and thorough manner in which he has performed his task. A review will appear.

800 LITERATURE.

Atien (Michael), pseud. THE LONDON VENTURE. Heinemann, 1910. 7 in. 176 pp. 4/ n. 824.9.

A series of essays and sketches, cynical, ruminative and on the whole well-written, in which a young man discourses at large on life and love. The chief merit of the book is that the author has taken great pains with his style, which is considerably more attractive than the substance of the book. Somewhat surprisingly, the first essay contains a generous and discriminating appreciation of Mr. D. H. Lawrence.

Professor of French Literature at Harvard, the author carries on the scheme of investigation into what might be described as the philosophy of literary history which he began in “Literature and the American College” (1908), “The New Laocoön” (1910), and “The Masters of Modern French Criticism” (1912). He is anxious to demonstrate the unsoundness of a “Rousseanistic” philosophy of life, to dissuade us from “the attempt to erect on naturalistic foundations a complete philosophy of life,” and to warn us that “the total tendency of the Occident at present is away from rather than towards civilization.” In pursuance of this, the book applies what is aptly described (as he would like to call it, “experiential”) to the study of literary history since Rousseau, and exposes the insidious falsehood and disintegrating emotionalism, not only in the arch-sinners, Rousseau, Byron, Chateaubriand, and their like, but even in Wordsworth.

Casler (Jules). RATHER LIKE. Jenkins, 1920. 7 in. 292 pp., 7/8 n. 847.9.

These parodies, the work of a young French poet who amused himself in this way while a prisoner in Germany are highly creditable as the work of a foreigner, but they are not really effective. A large number of English writers, including many still alive, are treated by the author, and many of them give, in an introduction, their opinions of the performance. One can recognize the subjects of the parodies, but the author adopts the long-nose method in exaggerating none but the obvious features.

See review, p. 74.

This delightful edition of one of the masterpieces of sonorous and elevated English prose is printed on handmade paper of fine quality. The notes are unobtrusive and the introduction workmanlike, though Mr. Clegg goes too far when he says that “its faults are obvious enough—it is long drawn out and wordy.” When one can write prose like Drummond one need not be afraid to tarry in matters of production we think the publisher would be well advised to use a softer-surfaced paper. Damping and a hand-press alone can give a satisfactorily black impression on Whatman.

POETRY.

Neat translations, in the metrical form of the original, some in modern dress. This amusing version of “Persicos Odi” shows Mr. Hiley at his freest:

Your exotics I count as damnation;
Your still immortelles—none of those!
Don’t hunt up and down all creation
For a late-flowered rose.
Plain myrtle—don’t twist it or toswle,
I prate—it’s all too simple;
’Neath the thick-knitted vine my cereal,
Or you as you wait.

Mr. Seymour is to be congratulated on having brought together a book that is on the whole a very interesting collection of verse. The list of contributors on the cover is itself reassuring, and when we read the book we find that almost all of them are worthily represented. Mr. Binyon’s studious reflectiveness is seen at its best in “Commercial”; in “The Ballad of St. Barbara” Mr. Chesterton is all one expects him to be; three out of the five pieces by which Mr. Davies is represented are admirable examples of his art. Mr. Sturge
Moore contributes a long poem, "Aforetime"—a queer, rather obscure piece of work, but one which leaves a profound impression on the reader's mind. In "On Seeing a Portrait of Blake" Mr. Nichols again gives proof of that fine gift of free-flowing music which is his greatest poetical asset. Miss Sitwell switches on her galvanic battery and the world begins to twitch and dance, with a life that is not its own, to the tune of "Solo for Ear-trumpet." Among these and the other poems every reader should find something to his taste.

Warren (E. P.), ALCMEON, HYPERMESTRA, CAENEUS. Oxford, Blackwell, 1919. 7 ½ in. 109 pp. boards, 4/6 n. 821.9

Mr. Warren knows how to handle a story, and these three legends are retold with a skill that makes them very readable.

FICTION.

*Delarue-Mardrus (Lucie). L'AME AUX TROIS VISAGES. Paris, Charpentier, 1919. 7 in. 294 pp. paper, Str. 50. 843.9

Very touching and very charming is this idyllic characterization of the high-spirited child of an aristocratic mother and her bourgeois husband (whom she married out of pique). The story verges on tragedy. After the divorce of her parents, the child lives in humble circumstances with her grandmother. Descendant of a great musician, she herself has genius, and finds courage in the resolve to be a great artist. Even for the grandmother dies, leaving her to jealous relations, who hate the little aristocrat. Poverty kills ambition. She earns her living as a player in a cinema orchestra, consoling only by the resolution to devote her life to making her little cousin a real artist.

*Draycot M. and Wynne (May), pseud. The "VEILED LADY." ("Jarrolds' Popular Novels"). Jarrolds [1919]. 6½ in. 246 pp. n. 9

A story of the French Revolution, the "Veiled Lady" being a euphemism for the guillotine.

James (Montague Rhodes). A THIN GHOST; AND OTHERS. Arnold, 1919. 7¾ in. 158 pp., 4½ n.

See review last week, p. 45.

Esther Ellerton and David Monteith had been close companions, but he went to South Africa to pursue his medical researches, and died there. Later she marries Sir Ralph Harrington, who had long loved her; but their son develops Monteith characteristics, and Esther recognizes that this dual heritage is the result of her thoughts constantly recurring to David before her child was born. The interest of the story is largely psychological.

The sentimental history of two incompatibles. The husband nearly goes off with Phyllis; Phyllis nearly succeeds in ousting Louise. But accident or providence brings the incompatibles together again, and they establish friendly relations by adopting the "white flat system"—under the beneficence of "the great architect." It is all very, very serious.

Seymour (Beatrice Kean). INVISIBLE THINGS. Chapman & Hall, 1919. 8 in. 374 pp., 7 n.

See review, p. 79.

Tcheshov (Anton). THE CHORUS GIRL; and other stories. Chatto & Windus, 1920. 6½ in. 312 pp., 3½ n. 891.7

The longest tale in this, the eighth and (we believe) the final volume of this attractive edition of Tcheshov's stories, is "My Life."

910 GEOGRAPHY, TOPOGRAPHY, ANTIQUITIES, &c.

See review, p. 91.

Cyrilx (Tony), pseud. AMONG ITALIAN PEASANTS. Introduction by Muirhead Bone. Collins [1919]. 9 in. 255 pp. il., 12 6 n. 914.5

According to her introducer, Miss Cyrilx, though she tells us nothing about Italy that we did not know, tells us "for the first time that these things can be expressed in art," and creates "the real Italy which we in our pictures are always, somehow or other, leaving out." He calls attention to what anyone can see—her hardness, her naivety; and adds, on his own account, that her "noble democracy and sympathy" entitle her to be considered "a new personality in art." The sketches are extremely simple, whether they are in colour or in black and white; but the hardness of the majority will not be to the taste of the majority of readers. The text describes how she lived among the peasants, entered into their daily concerns, their crafts, husbandry, troubles of the seasons, amusements, &c., as an intimate friend, not as a disinterested observer.

920 BIOGRAPHY.

See review, p. 76.

Nodier (Charles). FINGAUD (Léonce). LA JEUNESSE DE CHARLES NODIER. LES PHILADEPHES. Paris, Champion, 1919. 9 in. 280 pp. paper, Str. 25. 920

See review, p. 91.

Rivington (Septimus). The Publishing Family of RIVINGTON. Rivington, 1919. 8 in. 182 pp. il. index, boards, 10/ n. 920

See review, p. 76.

930-990 HISTORY.

Not only his personal wrongs at the hands of the War Office, the loss of his seat for Woolwich, the abrupt termination of his Stadl work, and his eventual exit from the Army for having brought his case up in the House of Commons, but also evils of more far-reaching moment that, according to him, tended to paralyse our military machinery and render us unprepared for the contest with Germany, are set forth with much cogency, and in not excessive detail, by Major Adam, whose statements are carefully documented. The book, as Major Adam has framed it, is undoubtedly an absorbing fragment of human history, and its publication may lead to a reopening of the case apparently settled just before the war.

Salvemini (Gaetano). LA POLITICA ESTERA DI FRANCESCO CRISPI ("Studi sulla Politica Estera dell'Italia"). Roma, "La Voce," Trinità Monti, 18 [1919]. 8 in. 90 pp. paper, 3 lire. 945.09

See review, p. 92.

940.9 THE GREAT EUROPEAN WAR.

Harris (H. Wilson). The PEACE IN THE MAKING. Swarthmore Press [1919]. 8 in. 246 pp. il. pors. maps. apps., 6/ n. 940.9

The special correspondent of the Daily News to the Peace Conference gives a broad and comprehensive account of the seven months following the Armistice, and of what the Conference did—after their long and scarcely excusable procrastination. One reads with a qualified amusement how the small nations were fobbed off with plenary sessions at which nothing important was done, the real business having been settled by the "Big Four" (actually three after Orlando's exit) in private councils, and how "President Wilson and Mr. Clemenceau and Mr. Lloyd George were usually busy retailing to each other anecdotes or jokes which the privileged officials within earshot of their chairs passed on later, with discretion, to a wider audience, on one occasion Sir Robert Borden stopping in the middle of his speech to complain that the small talk of the bugwys made it impossible for him to go on. Comedy and tragedy are blended, perhaps more deeply than anyone living now can realize, in this unvarnished account of the proceedings by which the destinies of the world—for how many generations?—were moulded, ostensibly by the whole body of Allies, actually by the "Big Four."
Learn it the Simplified way!

You know how valuable a more extensive, more varied knowledge would be to your life—you know the vital necessity of education as a force in the shaping of one's future. You realise that even in your private studies there arises a frequent call for specialised understanding. Success in any sphere of life, business or mental recreation comes only to those who are ever watchful for an opportunity to learn.

But the learning, especially with the more advanced subjects, is usually so complicated as to kill the strongest enthusiasm. Time may not admit of the close study demanded—interest in the subject may be so sadly lacking as to force the most willing student to abandon his work. The "dry-as-dust" tiresome lessons are opposed to the nature of the average individual, and with no sign of rapid progress the task is gladly relinquished.

That is the reason for the enormous success of the School of Simplified Study. That is why each of its courses are so eagerly taken up by increasing numbers of students who desire thorough instruction with plus enjoyment and progress.

You can master the most difficult subject with ease and efficiency if you will learn the SIMPLIFIED way. The lessons are so easy to understand—so remarkably well-arranged and graded—so perfect in their system of mental development that the study becomes not a burden but a source of immense interest and pleasure. The Simplified Courses are different. They are clear—they lead you up from the very beginning in a strikingly thorough manner. If you will write for specimen lesson papers you will see exactly why they are so much in demand.

You can learn any of the following valuable subjects in the comfort of your own home:—

FRENCH
will open up a vast field of new literature to you. It is the language rapidly becoming more and more necessary in business and private life.

ENGLISH
will give you the power of accurate expression—the ability to correctly interpret the works you read. A thorough mastery of the English language is the hall-mark of a good education.

PSYCHOLOGY
teaches the science of mind—a study of enormous value in these complex days.

LOGIC
The science of reasoning is of inestimable value as an aid to success in life.

N. T. GREEK
Provides the knowledge so necessary to all who would study the New Testament in its original form.

LATIN
The key language.

HEBREW, ARABIC and SPANISH
All are treated by the new Simplified method of this School.

There is no task in the learning. There is pleasure and interest and PROGRESS right from the moment you begin on the lessons. You should send for a prospectus of the Course or Courses you require and lesson papers will be sent you quite free, so that you may judge the merits of this remarkable system. It is specialised knowledge made easy. Send your card NOW. There is no obligation, but certainly you should see these valuable papers. If you write the card now it will not escape your memory.
Appointments Vacant

UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH.
LECTURESHIP IN ITALIAN.

THE UNIVERSITY COURT will shortly proceed to appoint a LECTURER on ITALIAN LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE, and they invite applications.

The tenure of the Lectureship will be for a period of five years, with eligibility for re-appointment or for such shorter period as may be arranged.

The salary is £400 per annum, rising by annual increments of £10 to £450 per annum.

The appointment will run from the commencement of the next academic year on October 1, 1920.

Applicants are requested to send fourteen copies of their letter of application, with any testimonials they may desire to submit, to the Secretary to the University, before the end of February.

WILLIAM WILSON,
Secretary to the University.

UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH.
CHAIR OF GERMAN.

THE UNIVERSITY COURT will shortly proceed to appoint a PROFESSOR in the newly-instituted CHAIR OF GERMAN at a salary of £900 per annum, and they invite applications.

The appointment will run from the commencement of next academic year on October 1, 1920.

Applicants are requested to send fourteen copies of their letter of application, with any testimonials they may desire to submit, to the Secretary to the University, before the end of March.

WILLIAM WILSON,
Secretary to the University.

LEEDS SCHOOL OF ART.
DEPARTMENT OF ARCHITECTURE.

APPLICATIONS are invited for the post of FULL-TIME ASSISTANT INSTRUCTOR in the Department of Architecture at the Leeds School of Art. Salary according to qualifications and experience. Further particulars can be had from the Headmaster. Forms of application, which should be returned not later than February 5, may be obtained from the undersigned:

JAMES GRAHAM.
Director of Education.

KINGSWOOD COLLEGE.

GRAHAMSTOWN, CAPE COLONY.—WANTED, a MASTER to teach English subjects and if possible a little science. Salary £200 to £250, according to experience, with annual increments of £10 for five years. Free second-class passage.—Applications, with copies of testimonials, to be sent to the Headmaster, Kingswood School, Bath.

Appointments Vacant

SOUTH AFRICAN NATIVE COLLEGE.

FORT HARE, ALICE, CAPE PROVINCE, S. AFRICA.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN NATIVE COLLEGE was established in 1916 for the higher education of the native and coloured races of South Africa. The Governing Council will proceed shortly to make the following appointments to its staff:

1.—LECTURER in MATHEMATICS.

Salary in each case £372 per annum, rising by annual increments to £510. If the Lecturer should later be appointed professor in his subject the salary would rise by annual increment of £15 to a maximum of £550. The engagement in the first instance will be for three years and outward passage will be provided. The successful candidates will be required to begin duty about the middle of February, 1920.

Six copies of letter of application, with particulars of age, qualifications and experience, and accompanied by six copies of five recent testimonials, should be lodged with Principal Henderson, 121, George Street, Edinburgh.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

THE Council invites applications for the appointment of two TECHNICAL ASSISTANTS to act under the supervision of the head of the technology branch in the Education Officer’s Department. The work of the Technology Branch embraces Technical and Commercial Institutes, Schools of Art and Continuation Schools (day and evening). The salary will be £600 a year, rising by annual increments of £25 to a maximum of £800 a year. This salary is based on existing economic conditions. The persons appointed will be required to give their whole time to the duties of their office.

Applications must be made on the official form to be obtained from the Education Officer, London County Council, Education House, Victoria Embankment, Victoria Embankment, W.C. 2, to whom they must be returned not later than 11 a.m. on Saturday, January 31, 1920. Preference will be given to those persons who have served or attempted to serve with H.M. Forces.

All communications on the subject must be endorsed “G.P. 87” and a stamped addressed envelope must be enclosed. Candidates who desire the receipt of their applications to be acknowledged should enclose a stamped addressed postcard, bearing the necessary postmark.

JAMES BIRD,
Clerk of the London County Council.

THE COMMITTEE OF EDGE HILL TRAINING COLLEGE will proceed to elect a PRINCIPAL in the Spring Term, 1920. The selected candidate will be expected to enter on her duties September 1, 1920.

Applications from candidates for this office should be addressed later than February 14, 1920, to—

F. STANLEY MORRIS,
Secretary, Edge Hill Training College, 41, North John Street, Liverpool.

From whom information as to the duties and emoluments of the Principal may be obtained.
Appointments Vacant

ROYAL AIR FORCE.
BOY'S TRAINING CENTRE, CRANWELL, NEAR SLEAFORD, LINCOLNSHIRE.

APPOINTMENT OF CIVILIAN EDUCATIONAL STAFF.

THE following APPOINTMENTS are to be made in the immediate future in connection with the education of the boys who are under training as skilled craftsmen for the Royal Air Force.

One SECOND MASTER (temporarily in charge). Salary £50 (inclusive).

Seven ASSISTANT MASTERS at salaries £275 to £325 (inclusive) according to experience and qualifications.

The appointments will be held under the usual conditions of the teaching profession subject to three months' notice in writing on either side.

These rates of pay are temporary, and inclusive of bonus pending the introduction of a permanent scheme of salaries which will be fixed on an incremental scale with provision for gratuities—in lieu of pension—on vacating appointment subject to a minimum of three years' service. When the new scales for the master in charge and second and assistant master are fixed, those who hold appointments will be brought on to the scale at a salary not less than that which with war bonus, if any, will equal their present inclusive rate of pay.

Bachelor living quarters will be provided for the present, if desired, within the limits of accommodation available. No charge will be made for this accommodation, and no compensation will be payable if at any time it is not available.

Applications should be forwarded without delay, addressed to THE SECRETARY, Air Ministry (T. 2), Kingsway, London, W.C. 2.

No special form of application is needed but candidates should give full particulars of (i) School and University Education; (ii) Subsequent career; (iii) Teaching experience; (iv) Part taken in sports; and (v) War Service record, and should state whether married or single.

The names of three persons to whom reference may be made, should be stated, and copies of three recent testimonials sent.

COUNTY BOROUGH OF DARLINGTON.
PUBLIC LIBRARY.

THE SERVICES of a QUALIFIED SUB-LIBRARIAN are required in the above-named Library. Candidates must have had practical experience in a Public Library, and hold at least two Library Association Professional Certificates.

Commencing salary £150 per annum, inclusive of Bonus.

Applicants endorsed "Sub-Librarian," and accompanied by not more than three recent testimonials, to be delivered at my office not later than February 5, 1920.

Canvassing will disqualify.

H. G. STEAVENSON,
Town Clerk.

HOWELL'S GLAMORGAN COUNTY SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.
LLANDAFF, CARDIFF.

HEADMISTRESS REQUIRED, owing to the resignation through ill-health of the candidate recently appointed.

Applicants must hold a degree or its equivalent from a British University. Salary not under £500 per annum. The Governors also provide board, residence and laundry. Age not to exceed 45.

Application forms to be obtained from the undersigned on receipt of stamped addressed foolscap envelope and must be returned to me not later than February 21.

The School is a day and boarding school recognised by the Board of Education.

ARTHUR WALDRON,
Clerk to the Governors.

17, Church Street, Cardiff.

Appointments Wanted

LECTURE ILLUSTRATION by optical lantern undertaken and slides made.—LEVETT, 46, Beechcroft Road, London, S.W.17.

R.A.

IMPERIAL WAR MUSEUM

"Everyone should visit Burlington House before the end of January."

THE NATION'S WAR PAINTINGS

at the ROYAL ACADEMY.

Week Days, 10-6. 1s. 3d. Tea Room.

RENOIR, MONET, MANET, DEGAS, GAUGUIN, Etc. Etc.

Exhibition of select paintings and drawings by modern French masters.

ELDAR GALLERY, 40, Great Marlborough St., W.

Open 10.30 to 6. Admission 1s. including Catalogue.

GRAFTON GALLERIES.
Paintings and Sculpture by representative artists:—also works by PAUL SARRUT and FRANK CALDERON.

10 — 6. LAST WEEK. 1s. 3d. inc.

NEW ENGLISH ART CLUB

61st Exhibition, January 1-90.
R.W.S. Galleries, 8a, Pall Mall East. (Nt. National Gallery.)

Daily 10-1.30.

THE CHINESE GALLERY

20, James Street, Oxford Street, W.1

CHINESE WORKS OF ART

Porcelains, Jade, Embroideries, Lace, etc.

Frequent direct consignments.

Booksellers & Catalogues

Special Offer—

LIFE OF JOHN DOWNMAN, A.R.A.

By Dr. WILLIAMSON

With 96 beautiful illustrations of his charming portraits, many tinted like the original drawings.

4to A GREAT BARGAIN 5s. POST FREE

L. CHAUDROY OF OXFORD LTD.
2 ALBEMARLE STREET, LONDON, W.1

EGYPT, PALESTINE, and the FAR EAST; Travel; Arabian Nights; and Napoleon Era. New Catalogue post free on application.—J. A. ALLEN & Co., 16, Grenville Street, London, W.C.1.

W. & G. FOYLE, LTD., 121-125, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.2

FOREIGN BOOKS, SECOND-HAND AND NEW.
Plenty in Stock. Orders for Rare Books carefully attended to.

The London Foreign Book Co., 2, Langham Place, W.1

Typewriting &c.

TYPEWRITING OF EVERY DESCRIPTION carefully and promptly executed at home, 1s. per 1,000 words; carbon copy, 3d. per 1,000 words. Duplicating. Cambridge Local.—Miss NANCY MCFARLANE, 11, Palmeira Avenue, Westcliffe, Essex.

Typist, with own machine, requires work at home.—Miss W. 10, Hendrick Avenue, Nightingale Lane, S.W.12.
The second and final volume of Mr. Wilfrid Blunt's memoirs "My Diaries: 1888-1914" is now ready. Part Two covers the period 1900-1914, and is of special interest at the moment in view of the approaching settlement of Near Eastern affairs. The Athenæum has already described the work as "a social document of the first importance." Only a few copies of the second impression of Part One now remain.

Each volume 21s. net.

Martin Secker INVESTMENT RISKS

AND

HOW TO AVOID THEM

BY

SIR JOHN ROLLESTON.

The call of to-day is for the highest rate of interest with safety of capital.

The general contents of the book are of intense practical interest.

It is short in length—a distinct advantage in the rush and tear of modern life.

Yet it is comprehensive, adequate and correct.

It presents the subject of investment in popular form, and shows the advantages of certain securities over others.

It defines clearly the dangers to be avoided.

A Complimentary Copy will be sent, post free, to all applicants mentioning The Athenæum.

INVESTMENT REGISTRY, LIMITED,

(ESTABLISHED 1880).

6, GRAFTON STREET, NEW BOND STREET, LONDON, W. 1.

DIRECTORS.

The Right Hon. LORD MORRIS, K.C., P.C., D.C.L. (Chairman).

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL.

The Right Hon. VICOUNT HILL.

The Right Hon. VICOUNT KNOLLYS, G.C.B.

FREDERICK LAST.

Lieut.-Col. W. SELBY LOWNDES.
LITERATURE AND MORALS

IT will be remembered that that sage observer, Mr. Henry Gowan in "Little Dorrit," thought there was very little difference between one man and another. He found the most worthless of men to be the dearest old fellow too, and that there was much less difference than is commonly supposed between an honest man and a scoundrel. We are tolerably sure that Mr. Gowan's creator, if he were alive now, would find the number of people who think in this way very considerably increased. The clear-cut distinction between good and bad, and, with it, the unrestrained indulgence of moral indignation, are now more difficult to discover. We are not so completely sure, now, that we know a good man when we see him, and our indignation with a rascal is mitigated by doubts concerning our own moral excellences. It is not that we are morally inferior to the men of the Victorian age—it is probable, indeed, that we are more honest—but merely that we question their assumptions just as those who have not undergone a special training question the moral assumptions of the Greek drama. The Victorian world was altogether too much an affair of black and white; we have learned to recognize the universal prevalence of greys. Perhaps the first questioning of the Victorian assumptions which made its way into literature was the work of Ibsen, and since then we have travelled far and fast. The psychological novelists, whether or not they were great artists, did at least free us from contemplating the world in terms of the Victorian diagram by showing us how cloudy at the edges this diagram was, and how inadequate were its hard, inflexible lines to the subtle gradations of the real world. But all such purely literary analysis, sound and thorough as it sometimes was, is seen now to have been little more than a preparation for the far more rigorous and profound investigations of science. No sooner were the moral assumptions which had provided a background for the literature of centuries put to the question than they began to disintegrate.

The daring speculations of some philosophers, only half in earnest, that man is an automaton, have now become almost commonplace. The psycho-analysts have replaced the psychological novelists, and have traced the springs of human conduct to sources that the latter might have been troubled to contemplate. Of what interest is it, for instance, to read a novelist's dissection of parental jealousy when we can study its minutiae in some text-book of animal psychology? How can we recapture the naïve thrill at some patriotic action after reading about the instincts of the herd? And of what kind is our interest in the spectacle of good and evil warring in a man's breast when we know we are observing the clicking of a mechanism?

It might be replied that such questions indicate a misunderstanding of the function of literature—that a work of art is independent of its moral assumptions—that, qua work of art, it has no moral assumptions. There is an element of truth in this reply; the morality of a literature may be regarded as part of its conventions, and the result as a game played according to certain rules. But the reason why literature is not regarded merely as a delightful game is precisely because these rules are not supposed to be arbitrary. In reading Greek drama, for instance, we may make the necessary effort of imagination and accept the apparatus of fate and furies because we may grant that they symbolize something in our experience. It is possible, however, for a symbol to become too inadequate and remote, as has happened with the pre-Copernican astronomy which so excited the imagination of Dante. A work of art which rests on assumptions which are not merely untrue, but which can no longer be transmuted into something we believe, has no life for us. For most of the literature with which we are acquainted the necessary transmutation is possible, though less completely in some cases than in others. Beneath, however, the various local forms there is a substance which endures.

Can it be possible that this very substance is in process of being dissolved away? It certainly seems to be true that the tendency of modern psychology is towards such a view of man as renders equally untenable all the moral assumptions on which literature has hitherto been based. If we apply the experimental test, however—if we turn, for example, to the minor Elizabethan drama—we find that the absurdity of the moral conventions does not, in fact, incommode us. The reason lies in the fact that while we cannot accept the conventions we can accept the passions supposed to be founded on them. Love, hate, jealousy, revenge—these are real, although we may no longer hold exaggerated estimates of the importance of female chastity. Where the emotion appears real to us we can overlook the inadequacy of its object, although it would be false to say that we can wholly ignore the discrepancy. The appeal of modern work, as modern, is due to the adequacy of both emotion and object. As we say, the modern problems are our problems.

Now no analysis whatever can alter the fact that we do experience emotions. For most practical purposes the analysis of material objects into their constituent molecules is irrelevant. Our preference of some colours to others, of a soft chair to a hard one, subsists in entire independence of any theories of atoms or ether. When we have learned to agree with the philosopher that a good deed and a bad one are only different motions of a mechanism we shall still love the one and hate the other. If, as seems possible, we go further and reduces all nobility to subtle self-deception, shows that the spring of every conceivable action lies in primitive, selfish impulse, we shall still prefer some manifestations of selfishness to others. All that can be changed is the particular object of our emotions, and, with increasing difficulty, we shall always be able to transform our symbols from one system to another. It is partially true, therefore, that a literature is independent of its moral assumptions, for although the lapse of ages may metamorphose a noble patriot into a bloodthirsty savage, we shall retain the idea of nobility and continue to sympathize with the poet's ideal purpose. Driven in turn from the stern patriot, the romantic swashbuckler and the Victorian parent as fitting representations of our ideal, we shall none the less never lack an object to embody it.

PLATO

Here on Ecbatana's midland plain lie we,
Far from the old Ægean's thundering strand:
Farewell, Eretria, famous fatherland;
Neighbour Athens, farewell; farewell, dear sea.

Palatine Anthology, vii. 256.

Once among the living, Star of mine,
Star of Morn you shone;
Now that you are gone,
Star of Eve among the dead you shine.

Palatine Anthology, vii. 670.

R. A. FURNESS.

"GRANDJERS"

We are indebted to Miss Ethel Smyth for an admirable phrase to describe the business of "dressing up" which is so delicious in childhood. She tells us in her recently published " Impressions" that she and her sisters adopted the word "grandjers" for this absorbing occupation, explaining that it was a corruption from "grandeurs," the word affixed to the label on the package of old robes de cérémonie which were the wardrobe for the family's mimetic enterprises. The phrase is perfect, for what is dressing up but a corruption of the grandeurs of reality, and not only a corruption, but a kind of ironic comment on the substantiality of their claim to any essential grandeur? Also it expresses the uplifting emotion, the pride, of imitating in play what is practically beyond one's reach, an emotion graphically expressed by some small children of my acquaintance, who, stung by the splendour of their father's appearance in evening dress, would at bedtime stretch apart the fastenings of their vests and proudly strut the floor, exhibiting an expanse of bare chest and exclaiming with solemnity "Evening shirts, 'lavour!' The passion for dressing up is almost universal: it has the freest play in childhood, but it extends well into mature years: there are few of us in whom the memories of juvenile histrionic triumphs are not warm and vivid. The enchanting odour of mystery which was wafted from that old portmanteau full of faded and spangled gowns, those tattered petticoats, those ancient tights, those wigs and most inadhesive false moustaches, lives for us yet: we remember with affection the wonderful combinations of which these simple fineries were capable, and wish, perhaps, that we were but half as ingenious now in making the best of our slender and none too brilliant stock-in-trade. We remember, too, those moments of furtive joy when we tried on some actual attribute of a grown-up personage, a father's top hat, a mother's veil and bonnet or a cook's cap and apron, and ran shouting deliriously, "Look at me!" to posture in ecstasy before the nearest mirror. These august properties, which, by their authentic daily figuring in the world at large, transcended even the "grandjers" themselves, gratified to the full that secret passion which is at the heart of all dressing up.

That secret passion is curiosity, curiosity about ourselves: it is a far deeper and more compelling motive than the instinctive desire to imitate or to be admired by others. Intrigued incessantly by the problem of our elusive selves, we sought at least by a process of comparison to catch a glimpse of its peculiar unity which might lurk behind any number of appearances. The clothes chosen for us by parents were not sufficiently indicative of our wonderful possibilities; how should we appear in the proper garb of other personalities? That was the absorbing question, which often led to disaster when we put it to forbidden tests. We had no idea of the transmigration of souls, but with a top hat or a bonnet and the spell of a child's imagination we could practise the transmigration of body with the most gratifying success.

The shocks, the thrills, the surprises and disappointments of the mirror—what a theme for
M. Marcel Proust! It would require a too sedulous honesty in most of us to tell the truth about our looking-glass experiences. How our image beams at us in some new and fantastical guise, giving us a sense of having escaped from old bondages and of being on the brink of new experiences! It is almost ridiculous to reflect how fresh and full of unexpected bravery our old self appears when its image, clad in some new "grandjer," stolen or legitimate, first ravishes our eyes.

When I first put this uniform on,
I said, as I looked in the glass,
"It's one to a million that any civilian
My figure and form will surpass!"

The same thing has occurred to us too, when we have flattered ourselves with the spectacle of ourselves in some novel guise. As children we are content to get this treat by furtive borrowings, but in later years, when we may control our habiliments, or, by some exertion, win new colours, we make no bones about tricking ourselves out completely regardless of expense.

Few races can be so absorbed in the passion of dressing up as the English. We revel in every form of sartorial survival. The academic dress of the great universities, the little niceties of some public schools, the wigs and gowns of the Bar, the multitude of Court uniforms, all scream vanity to the world. But not only do we preserve our ceremonial costumes with an infatuated persistence: we invent a get-up for almost every activity. There are those who laugh at the conventional green hat and cock’s feather of the German Hochtourist who slowly ascends a slight incline to drink beer at an Aussichtspunkt well placed at an hour’s walk from the starting-point, or at the Frenchman’s idea of the perfect garb in which to discharge a gun at small birds; but do they reflect upon the multitudinous variations of the Englishman’s wardrobe? If he hunt, must he not have his white cords and his pink coat? If he play tennis, his white flannels spotless and accurately creased? If he play golf, his tweed jacket and his deeply valanced knickerbockers, which descend further towards his ankles as his handicap recedes towards zero? If he play cricket, his blazer; if he cure souls, his clerical collar; and if he cure bodies, his frock coat? He will wear a bowler with a morning coat or let brown boots protrude adventurously from black trousers? Not for a moment. He is the world’s model in dress, for he alone takes dressing with seriousness, not as a decorative diversion, but as an investiture of self with the attributes of a settled character. It would be a pity for humanity if the Englishman gave up his "grandjers": he carries them off so beautifully.

This dressing up with visible and material garments is at its best an art, albeit not exalted, and at its worst a harmless folly; but there is another more seductive and more dangerous manner of dressing up which usually calls for an ethical judgment. Mental "grandjers" are irresistible to some people and almost inevitably deleterious. As a nation we are too little self-conscious to indulge commonly in these histrionics which depend wholly on the imitative faculty and not at all on accessories: nevertheless, there are, even in England, imaginative beings who indulge with delight in "grandjers" of the mind. They are usually folk with no very decided characters, and few ambitions except to enjoy themselves or to please other people. They do not so much posture to themselves in assumed character, for the mental eye is less ecstatic than the physical in the contemplation of a dressed-up self, but they cannot resist the temptation to act before their fellows, asking not admiration of their mimetic powers, but a complete surrender to the illusion. I have a friend called Jenkinson whose mental property room is complete. Put him among politicians, and he will gravely discuss the state of the country, yet proceed therefrom to tea with a pious and High Church aunt whose muffins he will eat with the air of a thurifer. The club smoking-room before dinner finds him the man about town, all cocktails and rollicking anecdotes, while at dinner he will play the foxhunting squire—he never rides—with his right profile, and the sparkling retailer of literary tittle-tattle with his left. He can tune himself to the flannel collars and bobbed heads of Chelsea as easily as to the tiaras of Berkeley Square: clergymen find him earnest, gay dogs call him a good sort: he can be rapt with poets, and jovially Philistine with stockbrokers. He knows his cue in every scene of the social comedy, or he thinks he knows it, but I sometimes wonder if he is not as obvious in every guise as the most unmistakable chorister in an operatic company. If he flatters himself upon his power of swift make-up, may he not mistake his amenability to external influence for dexterity in self-transformation? Men like Jenkinson are moulded by the society in which they find themselves: they have all the actor’s yearning to please, but it is their audience who gives them their part and writes their lines. Jenkinson plays no part for me, because I am in a way behind the scenes and I remember the original Jenkinson, a youth of simple tastes and respectable ambitions, who has disappeared into this pliable nonentity as the bloom of living flesh vanishes from the grey surface of an actor’s cheek. In his old age he will be pathetic, for his imitations will no longer charm and their palpable unreality will make them ludicrous. The range of his parts will gradually diminish as his skin tightens over his temples, and his "grandjers" will hang ever more raggedly from his bony shoulders. If he must act to the last, it will be over a wretched pantaloon that death rings down the curtain.

Orlo Williams.

A SUNSET

A beam of light was shaken out of the sky
On to the brimming tide, and there it lay
Palely tossing like a creature condemned to die
Who has loved the bright day.

Ah, who are these that wing through the shadowy air?
She cries, in agony. Are they coming for me?
The big waves crouch to her: Hush now! There, now, there!
There is nothing to see.

But her white arms lift to cover her shining head,
And she presses close to the waves to make herself small.
On their listless knees the beam of light lies dead,
And the birds of shadow fall.

Elizabeth Stanley.
REVIEW

THE NOSTALGIA OF
MR. MASEFIELD

REYNARD THE FOX. By John Masefield. (Heinemann. Ss. net.)

Mr. MASEFIELD is gradually finding his way to his self-appointed end, which is the glorification of England in narrative verse. "Reynard the Fox" marks, we believe, the end of a stage in his progress thither. He has reached a point at which his mannerisms have been so subdued that they no longer sensibly impede the movement of his verse, a point at which we may begin to speak (though not too loud) of mastery. We feel that he now approaches what he desires to do with some certainty of doing it, so that we in our turn can approach some other questions with some hope of answering them. The questions are various; but they radiate from and enter again into the old question whether what he is doing, and beginning to do well, is worth while doing, or rather whether it will have been worth while doing fifty years hence. For we have no doubt at all in our mind that, in comparison with the bulk of contemporary poetry, such work as "Reynard the Fox" is valuable. We may use the old rough distinction and ask first whether "Reynard the Fox" is durable in virtue of its substance, and second whether it is durable in virtue of its form.

The glorification of England! There are some who would give their souls to be able to glorify her as she has been glorified, by Shakespeare, by Milton, by Wordsworth and Hardy. For an Englishman there is no richer inspiration, no finer theme; to have one's speech and thought saturated by the fragrance of this lovely and pleasant land was once the birthright of English poets and novelists. But something has crept between us and it, dividing. Instead of an instinctive love, there is a conscious desire of England; instead of slow saturation, a desperate plunge into its mystery. The fragrance does not come at its own sweet will; we clutch at it. It does not enfold and pervade our most arduous speculations; no involuntary sweetness comes flooding in upon our confrontation of human destinies. Hardy is the last of that great line. If we long for sweetness—as we do long for it, and with how poignant a pain!—we must seek it in the sky, in the sea, and in the irritability of the babble and fever of the town. The rhythm of the earth never enters into their gait; they are like spies among the birds and flowers, like collectors of antique furniture. The Georgians snatch at nature; they are never part of it. And there is some element of this desperation in Mr. Masefield. We feel in him an anxiety to load every rift with ore of this particular kind, a deliberate intention to isolate that which is most English in the English countryside.

How shall we say it? It is not that he makes a parade of arcane knowledge. The word "parade" does injustice to his indubitable integrity. We seem to detect behind his superficiality of technical, and at times archaic phrase, a desire to convince himself that he is saturated in essential Englishness, and we incline to think that even his choice of an actual subject was less inevitable than self-imposed. He would isolate the quality he would capture, have it more wholly within his grasp; yet, in some subtle way, it finally eludes him. The intention is in excess, and in the manner of its execution everything is (though often very subtly) in excess also. The music of English place-names, for instance, is too insistent; no one into whom they had entered with the English air itself would use them with so manifest an admiration.

Perhaps a comparison may bring definition nearer. The first part of Mr. Masefield's poem, which describes the meet and the assembled persons one by one, recalls, not merely by the general cast of the subject, but by many actual turns of phrase, Chaucer's "Prologue." Mr. Masefield's person has more than one point of resemblance to Chaucer's Monk:

An out-ryder, that loved venerie;
A manly man to ben an abbot able. . . .

But it would take too long to quote both pictures. We may choose for our juxtaposition the Prioress and one of Mr. Masefield's young ladies:

Behind them rode her daughter Belle,
A strange, shy, lovely girl, whose face
Was sweet with thought and proud with race,
And bright with joy at riding there.
She was as good as blowing air,
But shy and difficult to know.
The kittens in the barley-mow,
The setter's toothless pappies sprawling,
The blackbird in the apple calling,
All knew her spirit more than we.
So delicate these maidens be
In loving lovely helpless things.

And here is the Prioress:

But for to spoken of her conscience,
She was so charitable and so pitous,
She wolde wepe if that she saw a mous
Caught in a trappe, if it were ded or blede.
Of smalle thande had she, that she fed
With rystled flesh, or milk, or wastel bread.
But sore wepte she if oon of hem were ded
Or if men smote it with a yerde smerte;
And all the conscience and medeere herte.
Ful semely hir wympel pynched was;
Hir nose tretys; hir eyn geythe as glas;
Hir mouth full small, and therto soft and red,
But sikerly she hadde a fair forbed.

There is in the Chaucer a naturalness, a lack of emphasis, a confidence that the object will not fail to make its own impression, beside which Mr. Masefield's demonstration and underlining seem almost malsain. How far outside the true picture now appears that "blackbird in the apple calling," and how tinted by the desperate bergerie of the Georgian era!

It is, we admit, a portentous experiment to make, to set Mr. Masefield's prologue beside Chaucer's. But not only is it a tribute to Mr. Masefield that he brought us to reading Chaucer over again, but the comparison is at bottom just. Chaucer is not what we understand by a great poet; he has none of the imaginative comprehension and little of the music that belong to one; but he has perdurable qualities. He is at home with his speech and at home with his world; by his side Mr. Masefield seems nervous and uncertain—about both. He belongs, in fact, to a race (or a generation) of poets who have learned the necessity of loading every rift with ore. The question is whether such a man can hope to express the glory and the fragrance of the English countryside.

Can there be an element of permanence in a poem of which the ultimate impulse is a nostalgie de la bonté that betrays itself in line after line, a nostalgie so conscious of separation that it cannot trust that any associations will be evoked by an unemphasized appeal? Mr. Masefield, in his fervour to grasp at that which for all his love is still alien to him, seems almost to shovel English mud into his pages; he cannot (and rightly cannot) persuade himself that the scent of the mud will be there otherwise. For the same reason he must make his heroes like himself. Here, for example, is the first whip, Tom Dansey:

His pleasure lay in hounds and horses;
He loved the Seven Springs water-courses,
Those flashing brooks (in good sound grass,
Where scent would hang like breath on glass).
He loved the English countryside:
The wine-leaved bramble in the ride,
The rash of exacerbation is not to be mistaken. It comes, we believe, from a consciousness of anemia, a frenetic reaction towards what used, some years ago, to be called "blood and guts."

And here, perhaps, we have the secret of Mr. Masefield and of our sympathy with him. His work, for all its surface robustness and right-thinking (which has at least the advantage that it will secure for this "epic of fox-hunting" a place in the Library of every country house), is as deeply debilitated by retraction as any of our time. Its colour is hectic; its tempo feverish. He has sought the healing virtue where he believed it undefiled, in that miraculous English country whose magic (as Mr. Masefield so well knows) is in Shakespeare, and whose strong rhythm is in Hardy. But the virtue eludes all conscious inquisition. The man who seeks it feverishly sees riot where there is peace. And may it not be, in the long run, that Mr. Masefield would have done better not to delude himself into an identification he cannot feel, but rather to face his own disquiet where alone the artist can master it, in his consciousness? We will not presume to answer, mindful that Mr. Masefield may not recognize himself in our mirror, but we are not bound to conceal our conviction that in spite of the almost heroic effort that has gone to its composition "Reynard the Fox" lacks all the qualities essential to durability.

J. M. M.

On Tuesday next, at 3 o'clock, Professor G. Elliot Smith begins a course of three lectures at the Royal Institution on "The Evolution of Man, and the Early History of Civilization." On Saturday, the 31st, Sir Frank Watson Dyson, the Astronomer Royal, delivers the first of three lectures on the astronomical evidence bearing on Einstein's theory of gravitation; and on Thursday, February 5, Professor A. E. Conradi commences a course of two lectures on "Recent Progress in Applied Optics." The Friday evening discourse on January 30 will be delivered by Mr. S. G. Brown on "The Gyrostatic Compass." and on February 6, by Sir Walter Raleigh, on "Landor and the Classic Manner."

"PACEM APPELLANT"

THE ECONOMIC CONSEQUENCES OF THE PEACE. By John Maynard Keynes, C.B. (Macmillan, 8s. od., in two volumes.)

THIS book comes like a douche of bracing cold water after years of hysterical talk about making democracy safe, the war to end war, and the vindication of the principles of freedom and self-determination. It deals with facts, not with words and phantoms. Instead of concentrating themselves on rebuilding our broken civilization by giving serious attention to questions of coal, currency and credits, the Council of Four were preoccupied at Paris with unreal or with positively pernicious issues—

Clemenceau to crush the economic life of his enemy, Lloyd George to do a deal and bring home something which would pass muster for a week, the President to do nothing that was just and right. Reparation was their main excursion into the economic field, and they settled it as a problem of theology, of politics, of electoral chicanery, from every point of view except that of the economic future of the states whose destiny they were handling.

Mr. Keynes, a hard-headed but benevolent realist in a world run by an intolerable combination of hypocrisy and insincerity, explains at the "extraordinary fact that the fundamental economic problem of a Europe starving and disintegrating before their eyes was the one question in which it was impossible to arouse the interest of the Four."

For him nothing matters in comparison with the facts that Europe's internal productivity has enormously fallen off, that the system of transport and exchange by means of which its products could be conveyed where they were most wanted has broken down, and that Europe is unable to purchase its usual supplies from overseas. Unless this situation is remedied, our civilization is doomed, and the terms of peace, so far from remedying, perpetuate it. The treaty therefore must be drastically revised (there is hope here) by the League of Nations, and the indemnity must be fixed which Germany can be justly required to pay, the currencies of the world must be restored by an international loan, and communication must be reopened between Russia and Central Europe. In this remedial programme the most impressive, and to the general public the most novel, point is the explanation of the way in which inter-ally indebtedness and the indemnity question hang together. The two exacerbate each other, and form the centre of the vicious circle which makes a return to sane international relations impossible. Why did not the British Government last January publicly press cancellation of debts upon the American Government? The appeal, properly put, would have been difficult to resist. Mr. Keynes does not answer that question.

In the emotional pitch of his argument he has wisely chosen a middle course. He has resisted, if ever felt it, the temptation to boom which usually besets the expression of righteous indignation; he knows that severe judgments are all the secrer for being rapped out with tight lips, not thundered. Possibly they are even more effective when the indignation is left to be imagined; there is much virtue in understatement, and in letting facts, artfully arranged, speak for themselves, especially in affairs that excite high passions. As it is, by drawing attention to the quality of the question which colours the almost mathematical exigency of his demonstration, Mr. Keynes will probably make many readers, who would not dispute his estimate either of the relative importance of the economic issues or of the disasters handling they received at the Peace Conference, uneasy and perhaps not unreasonably aware of a certain inadequacy in his general outlook. They will pronounce upon an absence of atmosphere and background, which otherwise they might not have noticed. True, he is careful to fill in a background; but it is merely economic. Chapter 11, "On Europe before the War," is devoted to bringing out the peculiar and exceptional character of the European economic system which had grown up between 1870 and 1914, and which, in spite of its inherent instability, we had come to take for granted as part of the order of nature. The analysis of this instability is one of the most brilliant things in the book; it contains deep strokes of observation on the psychology of the capitalist structure. But, if the highest significance was to be found in the alliances in which Mr. Keynes has clothed the argument, much more than this was required. In the ardour of his desire to bring the world back to hard facts, he speaks as if the tragedy had been prepared by the play of economic factors alone. Yet surely it is not so. It is at least equally a question of the blind movements of generations building up passionate illusions of nationality and Domination. We can, for example, conceive a mind which, with the same intellectual equipment, but with its sensibility to historical and political experience otherwise organized, would have laid more emphasis on the reasons why it is so difficult to make the nations, whose average intelligence and morality is dimly reflected in the acts of statesmen, understand the paramount importance of such refractory topics as coal and currency and credits. Such a mind, pondering the slow biological development which has left these things in the realm of cold abstraction, stirring no depths in any heart, while it has made burning realities of frontiers and flags, would have pictured the statesmen as puppets moved for the most part subconsciously by centuries of tradition. Why is it that human society has failed to grow the necessary organs for understanding, with the kind of instinctive understanding from which action springs, that its treasure is laid up in the blessings of international exchange? Even a sketchy answer to this question might have brought the psychology of the drama more into accord with modern developments of psychology, both when the encounter of personalities in the council chamber is depicted (though Mr. Keynes' acuteness is here at its best, for all that he does not dig below the threshold of consciousness), and in the whole conception of the determining influence exercised by the politicians. As it is, Mr. Keynes, in diagnosing the disease which daily is making Europe more decrepit, produces at times the impression of an extremely clever but rather conservative doctor trying to explain the condition of a neurotic patient without any attempt to disentangle, except in one respect, his antenatal or even his infantile complexes.

We do not think that this line of criticism is altogether rebutted by pointing out that the book is concerned solely with the economic problem. If that were really so, Mr. Keynes would not have felt it necessary to give, not merely so much space, but so peculiar a weight to the inquiry how, in the first six months of 1919, the relative importance of the economic as opposed to the political issues came tragically to be reversed. That is not an economic inquiry at all, and he seems to us to embark on it because, being a man, a philosopher, and even an artist, he cannot but feel the need of a moral background. His device for getting this background, in so far as he does get it, is to relate our plight, not to the general trend of history, which we have just suggested as a possible alternative, but to one definite act of dishonour. It was never easy to approach the problems of the peace from the economic point of view, which yet was the only sane one; but any such approach was made impossible when the Prime Minister, to serve his private ambitions, decreed the general election of 1918, and in the course of the campaign committed the British delegation on the subject of indemnities. That commitment, dishonourable because it violated the undertaking on which the Germans had laid down their arms, rendered naught the President's good intentions, played into the hands of Clemenceau (by position and tradition the least fitted among the representatives of the Great Powers to take a broad view of the European situation) and inevitably produced that entanglement of economic follies which is strangling Europe. This is the dramatic theme which artistically is the backbone of the book. Its key-words are unreality and insincerity, much as blood and darkness are the co-ordinating threads running through 'Macbeth.' The dominant note is struck at the beginning:

A sense of impending catastrophe overhung the frivolous scene; the futility and smallness of man before the great events confronting him; the mingled significance and unreality of the decisions; levity, blindness, insolence, confused cries from without—all the elements of ancient tragedy were there.

The plot unfolds from a single act of infatuate sin committed by one man between November 24 and 29, 1918—unless the act was too large to be humanly possible. It is precisely here that the excessive simplification of this method is most apparent, for all its truth. The result is that the problems and characters stand out, with a quality that amuses rather than devastates us, like silhouettes on white paper, instead of emerging as solid creations against the muddled background of history. Still, as a method, this conception has immense advantages. It gives life and humanity to intricate technical discussions, it does away with false sentiment, and it avoids that vague droning about tendencies and forces to which the rhetoricians who will not call a spade a spade have too long accustomed us.

The reservations we have suggested are not of a kind, even if they are well-founded, to detract from the importance of the book. It is a perfectly-ordained arsenal of facts and arguments, to which everyone will resort for years to come who wishes to strike a blow against the forces of prejudice, delusion and stupidity. It is not easy to make large numbers of men reasonable by a book, yet there are no limits to which, without undue extravagance, we may not hope that the influence of this book may extend. Coming at a moment of deadly need, it will be carried over the world by the reputation of its author as an economist of unquestioned competence, who advised the British Treasury throughout the war, was its official representative at the Peace Conference, and represented the Chancellor of the Exchequer at Paris on the Supreme Economic Council. That a writer thus qualified by first-hand practical experience of the inner councils of the governments should have publicly thrown his weight on the side of reason is an event of the highest promise and moment. And never was the case for reasonableness more powerfully put. It is enforced with extraordinary art. What might easily have been a difficult treatise, semi-official or academic, proves to be as fascinating as a good novel: it has all the merits—the accuracy, the method, the well-considered arrangement—of the best kind of State Paper, with none of the shortcomings. We have tried to indicate its literary quality, but we have no space to do justice to its wit, which, it may be observed, has no tinge of the bitterness of the disappointed man of affairs, the affectation of the don, or the frigidity of the superior person.

The third of a series of lectures arranged by the Egypt Exploration Society will be given by Professor T. Eric Peet on Friday in this week at 8.30 p.m., in the rooms of the Royal Society, Burlington House. The subject of the lecture will be "El Amarna, the City of Egypt's Heretic King." Tickets may be obtained gratis by application to the Secretary, Egypt Exploration Society, 13, Tavistock Square, W.C.1.

The next lecture will be given by Mr. H. Idris Bell on February 20 on "The Historical Value of Greek Papryi."

A number of important pieces of furniture lent by the Duke of Abercorn have recently been placed on exhibition in the Loan Court of the Victoria and Albert Museum. These include a commode signed "Riesener" with elaborate ormolu mounts, amid which is the monogram of Marie Antoinette; and a sideboard also inlaid with her monogram.
THE FINAL DILLUSSION

Second Edition. (Fisher Unwin. 8s. 6d. net.)

When the first edition of Mr. Trotter's book was published, in 1916, it was considered by many of us to be one of those remarkable works which unify and illuminate a number of apparently disparate phenomena, and establish generalizations of the first importance. Subsequent experience and reflection have left us the judgment intact; we are more conscious, however, of the need for detailed studies along the lines suggested by Mr. Trotter, while we have also witnessed, in the psychological character of Germany's collapse, an experimental verification, on a gigantic scale, of some of Mr. Trotter's contentions. These contentions, during the last three years, have achieved a kind of subterranean popularity, although usually in a distorted and truncated form. It is also apparent that they have met with considerable opposition, most of it being of the pressure that Mr. Trotter's theory predicts. This opposition is, in essence, of precisely the same kind as that which greeted Copernicus and Darwin, for Mr. Trotter's fundamental sin is the same as theirs: he attacks the anthropocentric outlook. The theory of the Herd, as developed by Mr. Trotter, does not present the facts, or those of view, carry on the work of the astronomer and the biologist. Mr. Trotter's purpose, in his own words, is to show that—

The endowment of instinct that man possesses is in every detail cognate with that of other animals, provides no element that is not fully represented elsewhere, and above all—however little the individual man may be inclined to admit it—is in no degree less vigorous and intense or less important in relation to feelings and activity than it is in related animals.

The implications of this statement are very far-reaching. A successful description of man's activities, including his moral code and his aspirations, in terms of instinctive processes allied to those of the other animals, must profoundly affect our views of man's probable destiny. We see human progress in a new light; the position of the goal is altered, and with it the direction of approach.

The attempt to describe man as an instinctive animal is not new, and, impressed by the failure of previous attempts, there are many who maintain that sociology is, and cannot be, a science; that man is subject to true variety, and that psychology can furnish no generalizations which can be applied. The attempts of the older psychologists to account for man's behaviour in terms of the instincts of sex, self-preservation and nutrition involved, as Mr. Trotter says, such an amount of pulling and pushing of the facts that the later attempts reminded one of the ingenuity of the propagandist rather than of the insight of the man of science. Must one conclude, therefore, that man escapes scientific generalization, that his conduct cannot be assimilated to that of other animals? It is here that the original element in Mr. Trotter's theory emerges. He points out that the "solitary" man of the old psychologists is a pure fiction, that except as "asociated" man we know nothing whatever about man. In other words, we must remember that man, considered biologically, is a gregarious animal, and it is the business of the psychologist to trace the psychological corollaries of gregariousness. Having given reason to suppose that gregariousness is, in fact, an instinct quite comparable with the three "primary" instincts in intensity, Mr. Trotter in the rest of his book is concerned with the psychological consequences of this fact. The general characteristics of the gregarious animal are analysed, and their mental counterparts deduced. Suggestibility, as a normal and constant condition, is shown to be a necessary consequence or accomplishment of gregariousness. The individual must be extremely susceptible to the voice of the herd and resolutely deaf to voices from any other source. Mr. Trotter has no difficulty in showing that the great bulk of man's beliefs originate in this way. Most of his opinion is strictly non-rational opinion, but such opinion invariably has a strong herd backing. This is particularly noticeable in all opinions where passion is strongly engaged. On all matters that man takes seriously it is more important for him to be certain than to know. The unanimous decree of the herd confers the greatest degree of certitude. His suggestibility to the voice of the herd is so strong that he can, for a very long time, ignore experience where experience conflicts with herd suggestion. This suggestibility permeates every department of his mental and emotional life. Of course, that great mass of opinion which is the product of herd suggestion does not reveal itself as such. The individual invariably rationalizes his beliefs and firmly believes that he accepts them on their rational grounds. Thus beliefs in morality, religion, politics and what not, which are products merely of herd suggestion, are always supported by arguments which appear conclusive to the individual himself, but appear more ridiculous to those who have been subjected to a different series of herd suggestions. The important thing is to notice that there are no marks attaching to truly rational opinions which distinguish them, to introspection, from opinions produced by herd suggestion. Several examples of the mechanism of rationalization are given by Mr. Trotter. What he calls the "pseudo-sciences of political economy and ethics" are examples of the process on a large scale:

Both of these are occupied in deriving from eternal principles or justifications for masses of non-rational beliefs which are supposed to be permanent merely because they exist. Hence the notoriety, the acrobatic feats of both in the face of any considerable variation in herd belief.

But, as he points out, herd suggestion does not always act in a direction opposed to verifiable truths. The present student of biology, for instance, finds that the class he most respects, and which has therefore acquired "suggestionizing" power with him, accepts the principles, say, of Darwinism. These principles therefore acquire the force of herd suggestion with him and induce belief. Mr. Trotter considers that in every case a proposition, true or false, is accepted by suggestion. The part played by the gregarious instinct in the region of intellect is matched by the part it plays in feeling. Altruism is a direct outcome of gregariousness, as are conscience and religion. The application of these considerations to the problems of actual conduct is a very valuable feature of the book. The present state of our society, its advantages and disadvantages, the origin and function of the different types of individuals who constitute it, are all illuminated in a remarkable way. Very interesting conclusions, also, are drawn as to the probable future of man. It must be admitted that these conclusions are not very optimistic, but it is difficult to say they are not warranted. It is impossible, within the limits of our space, to give an account of these and other matters dealt with by Mr. Trotter. The most extraordinary feature of the book is the manner in which it unifies the mental and emotional life of man. We are placed, as it were, in a centre from which it is possible to view and comprehend the whole. The method is frankly speculative. Mr. Trotter points out the directions in which further evidence is to be sought. It is, of course, possible that such evidence may necessitate modifications in the general theory. We are persuaded that much of it, however, will stand—sufficient to justify us in describing the book as the most remarkable exposition of man's place in nature which has appeared for many years.

J. W. N. S.
PRINCE TALLEYRAND AT THE BALLPLATZ

NOW that the long-awaited moment has come when the diplomats are beginning like cinema kings to "release" each as many feet of secret history as he judges his reputation will bear, these extracts from Count Czernin's diaries and notebooks will doubtless be poured upon by hopefu learners who are seeking to solve the riddles of the war. We doubt if they will learn very much that they did not (if they were intelligent onlookers) guess for themselves long before, but if they are interested at all in psychology they have here a first-class document humanum.

Few dramatists, we believe, could have given such a finished portrait of the diplomat of the ancient régime as emerges from the pages of these memoirs. A polished and amused observer, Count Czernin strolls through the scenes of the great catastrophe with scarcely a trace of emotion, hope or conviction. There is neither happiness nor unhappiness in mortal life," he remarks, "but only a difference in the strength to endure one's fate." His philosophy is this aristocratic stoicism; political ideals and enthusiasms carry no meaning to him.

The Monarchists who derive benefit from their attachment to the reigning monarch deceive themselves as to their true feelings. They are Monarchists because they consider that form of government the most satisfactory one. The Republicans, who apparently glorify the majority of the people, really mean themselves. So he sums up the issues, and it does not seem to be his personal ambition that fills the void thus made by political scepticism. After analysing, in a letter to a friend, the various elements that intrigue against him at his sovereign's Court, he concludes: "In any case then my days are numbered. Heaven be thanked!"

It is to this entire detachment that we owe the little portrait-medallions of his colleagues and contemporaries, each one a gem of satire, with which the book is so plentifully adorned. The German Emperor, "had he been an ordinary mortal, would certainly have become a very competent officer, architect, engineer, or politician," but his intelligence and good intentions were swamped in the torrent of flattery that poured— not from the Court, but from the professors. It was the same on the whole with the Emperor Charles. "I saw the people on their knees with uplifted hands as though worshipping a divinity." Yet how did Charles leave the country a few months later? Of the German Crown Prince, whom he met after a couple of years' campaigning, he records that "in a long conversation that I had with him he showed me very clearly that he—if he had ever been of a warlike nature—was then a pronounced pacifist." When Ludendorff declines to take part in the Brest negotiations on the ground that "he would only spoil things if he did," the entry in the diary runs: "Heaven send the man such gleams of insight again and often!" "The only difference between Foch and Ludendorff," we read in another place, "is that the one is a Frenchman, the other a German. As men they are as alike as two peas." Here is the whole of Tisza's intellect in a sentence: "He would rather have let the whole world be ruined than give up Transylvania; but he took no interest whatever in the Tyrol." Sometimes the shafts transfix a whole people. In Roumania since the abolition of titles "it is safer to adopt the plan of addressing everyone as 'Mon Prince.'" Or we get a page from the diplomatist's manual of ethics: "To be for ever dallying with the idea of treachery and adopting the pose without carrying it out in reality—this I cannot regard as prudent policy."

The following trait of militarism on the Western front is imperturbably set down: "Poincaré's villa is visible on the horizon in the green landscape. A gun has been brought to bear on the house—they mean to destroy it before leaving—they call this the extremeunction." Czernin was called by his party dilettante. This was not fair. He served his Government with steady loyalty, as a traveller serves his firm, or a journalist his paper. But his conviction that the firm was bankrupt he did not seek to disguise, at least from himself. He was not of those ministers who promise to do the impossible. The pupil and protégé of Franz Ferdinand, he saw that the last hope of maintaining the Monarchy was to offer its Slavs satisfaction—if they would take it. But he thought it doubtful if they would. The decline of the Empire where he was employed had begun long ago (the fifth century of our era would not be a bad date to choose for its beginning), and the nineteenth century, with the "principle of nationalities" became self-conscious, had quickened the disease to a galloping pace. "Austria-Hungary's watch had run down" for Czernin's verdict, and we do not feel that a tear has blotted his manuscript.

As Foreign Minister he showed the same chilly lucidity. He owed his elevation largely to the accuracy with which in his dispatches from Bucharst he foretold the secession of Roumania to the enemy, and, once placed in control at Vienna, he began to seek means whereby the triumphing Central Powers might purchase a not too dishonourable peace. He had been horrified at the breakout of the war—so clumsily prepared, and he saw through the U-boat delusion with perspicacity. He also knew that he would not get the peace he wanted, and why. There were four factors he could not hope to neutralise: the resolve of England to have her way; the presence, the resolve of Italy not to let her allies repent at leisure of the hasty London Pact, the resolve of the Magyars to yield no inch of their vantage ground, and the resolve of the German generals to play at diplomacy. As for the idea of leaving Germany to her doom and joining the Entente, it was beneath discussion; besides, it could not be brought off successfully. So there was nothing for it but a shrug of the shoulders. When the Brest-Litovsk conference revealed the prostration of Russia, even the prudent Kuhlmann allowed himself to be carried away. "Il n'ont que le choix à quelle sauce ils se feront manger," he cried. "Tout comme chez nous," said his Austrian colleagues, Kuhlmann.

Sometimes, strange as it may seem, this most clear-sighted of diplomatists has glimpses of a different order of facts. Faint and few they are, but unmistakable. On Roumania's declaration of war, he was detained in Bucharest during a Zeppelin raid. He enjoys it no more than any other man, and as, in the relief of the dawn, he hears a child crying, the queerest of fancies takes possession of him. Does not a war like this cause a good deal of suffering? Again, wandering through the streets of Brest on an unoccupied afternoon, he finds an old Jew weeping in the gutter. He asks what is wrong, and hears an extraordinary story. The old man has had his house burnt, and has been robbed and flogged, first by the Cossacks, then by those who came for the "German soldier." These then, the statesman reflects, are the tragedies that go on beneath the surface of civilization—in the twentieth century, in our Europe, in the middle, too, of the greatest war that human annals can show! Appalled, he empties the contents of his pockets into the hand of this victim of chance, gives him his card, and promises to do everything in his power to make him as happy as his fellows again. Then, glancing at his watch, he hurries away. It is time to get on with the peace, the peace that will free the German forces for the West. It sounds incredible, but it is in the book.
THE ROMANCE OF THE REAL MRS. JARLEY.

I

N 1766 Dr. Christopher Curtius, established in Paris as a modeler in wax, paid a visit to his family home in Berne, and returned bringing with him his six-year-old niece, Marie Grosholtz. He had done so well himself in the French capital that he meant to train the child in his own profession. His benevolent thought was singularly rewarded, for the girl proved a pupil who swiftly excelled her master. There was witchery in the tips of her supple fingers: they could coax the wax to form its cadaverous tinge and bloom more daintily than living flesh. Each figure she made was instinct with fairy-like life, and haunted undeniably by a soul. The spirit of the old court-painters seemed to have touched her, the grace of Lancret, the pensive mind of Watteau. On the rouged and powdered beauties of her epoch she conferred just the immortality they sighed for, an eternal youth of delusively tempting charms. Thus she grew to womanhood in her uncle’s studio, the rendezvous of all the great Liberal thinkers, where Benjamin Franklin sat stolidly for his effigy; where Lafayette and Mirabeau spouted their politics, and Voltaire purloined the ideas of Rousseau as he uttered them. She did not share in their debates, but they took good notice of the handsome girl, with her royal head and proudly-curved, dominant nose, and prophesied that she had a destiny. One day it knocked at the door, and proved—the King’s sister!

Madame Elizabeth, who thus entered her life, was a strenuous Princess and a woman of varied accomplishments. As soon as she saw the work of Marie Grosholtz she was convinced that she ought to learn modelling herself, and take her pretty professor to live with her. Dr. Curtius would not oppose his niece’s promotion, but, when she had gone, he altered his arrangements. He resolved to keep his Palais Royal Museum for scenes depicting court-life and fashionable events, while he opened a second show in a Temple of Fame, where he ranged the busts of the coming men in politics, and tentatively made a plan for a Chamber of Horrors. The details, he felt, he might leave for time to fill in. His niece, meanwhile, was extremely happy at Court. She taught the great ladies to model flowers and fruit, and made group after group to be shown at her uncle’s establishment. This life went on till 1789, when a peremptory recall arrived from Curtius. There was nothing for it but a tearful leavetaking, of the gracious Queen and beloved Madame Elizabeth, of Mesdames de Polignac, and the Princess de Lamballe. She reassured those she was forced to disappoint. But certainly she would keep her promises to them! But, of course, she would model the heads one day! Travelling back to the Boulevard du Temple, she learned that the Palais Royal Exhibition was closed. She wondered, and then her eyes were rudely opened. On July 12 a mob fomented up to the doors, and demanded from Curtius the busts of two popular favourites: “Egalité,” d’Orléans and the banished Minister Necker. These they carried aloft by torchlight, swathed in rags, till the Princes de Lambesc’s dragoons charged down upon them, when the figure of M. Necker was slashed in two, and that of d’Orléans splashed with the blood of its bearer. But this charge did not stop the march of the Revolution, nor even the march of these restless waxen figures, which knew they had still a long journey to perform.

But Curtius was soon absorbed in national service, so that what modelling had to be done was left to his niece. The leading men of the Revolutionary Government (who had dined so often at the Doctor’s house) had imbued a faith in propaganda by waxwork. So Marie now found herself forced to keep old promises: she modelled the heads of her aristocratic patrons, as they were brought to her fresh from the knife of the guillotine. It was not always her own friends who passed in this nightmare delirium; sometimes, when the cloth was removed from the oozing relic, it was... one of those diners at her uncle’s table. But, whatever the pressure put on her by authority, she would never prostitute her art to mere horror.

Thought and affliction, passion, Hell itself, She turns to favour, and to prettiness;—and sometimes she served her employers best this way. When they brought her to view Charlotte Corday’s horrid butcherywork, she protested (royal little White) that she was that “the cadaverous aspect of the femal” made her ill. But the spirit that guided those fingers had no politics, and her Jean Paul Marat, lying in his bath, is the sleeping martyr of the Revolution. It is the fit companion of her other masterpiece, the pale, lovely mask of Marie Antoinette, with the crimson drop where the patch of beauty once rested. To those who still say there is no art in waxwork a study of these two busts may be recommended.

Between 1789 and 1802 Marie Grosholtz lost her uncle and a husband, and acquired her historic name of Madame Tussaud. She also had her share of internment as “suspect.” At last, when the Peace of Amiens was signed, she was free of entanglements and ready to fly. Once again her restless wanders were rewarded, as her Madame Tussauds opened to the two thousand Englishmen who had seen the Dauphin concealed in her cases! She was now a shrewd, buxom woman of 42, sufficiently hardened against all blows of destiny. For many years her show travelled up and down England, and from the pompous language of her bills and announcements we see where Dickens (libeller that he was!) derived his inspiration for Mrs. Jarley. At Bristol, one Sunday in 1831, she found that ces Anglais were having their own Revolution; but how should a Reform Bill not unnervie this woman, who had lived at the very heart of the Reign of Terror? She posted her negro servant with a blunderbuss to guard the building against incendiaries, then gave them the familiar order for transportation to the patient companions of her pilgrimage, who suffered themselves to be borne out into the square, where, in the ranks of the panic-struck inhabitants, they surveyed with their changeless smile the blazing city. At length these wanderers came to rest in London, in the house with the squat, yellow columns in Baker Street. But Madame Tussaud would still be at her witchery: as though drawn by the magnet of her invisible magic, all the objects with which she had been ever so faintly associated in the days when she lived amid the historical turmoil began to collect in her exhibition rooms. Hitler came, among many relics of minor importance, the knife and the busts of the Revolutionary guillotine, and the travelling-coach of the Emperor Napoleon, who had shown her some slight kindness during his Consulate, remembering she had shared a prison with Josephine. In these tranquil days, as she drew on into longevity, while her waxen progeny increased and multiplied, she presented the figure by which she is known to millions, the little old lady in the black poke bonnet, with great spectacles garnishing the gaunt, domineering nose. At night, when the last sight-seer had long departed, she would traverse the silent halls with her wavering candle, in the wondrous material cologne with their denizens, and linger beside the “Sleeping Beauty,” St. Amaranthe, the fairest of all her cut flowers from Samson’s basket, whose muslin bosom stirs with tremulous breath. One night she did not come to bed at all, and in the morning they found her at the head of this figure. They could not move her, so she stands there still... At least, it is very hard to believe she does not!
She left "Two Swords" a great British institution, which visited Westminster Abbey and the Tower, and put St. Paul's Cathedral out of the running. Its later history, as her great-grandson tells it, is a comedy with a pure Victorian flavour. The long procession of excited royalty is diversified by visitors scarcely credible—the colour-sergeant of the U.S.A. Army who thought that by carrying the Stars and Stripes through England he would bring about an Anglo-Saxon entente, and a luckless bastard of Napoleon, who had inherited nothing but his father's features, and must have sighed for a job as a waxwork himself. There is also the rich political burlesque of Beaconfield and the Turnerelli gold-wreath, a worthy subject for Mr. Lytton Strachey. But, of course, what normally constituted readers will ask for is some erie talk about the Chamber of Horrors. M. Tussaud obliges them. He was passing along its corridors one night, when . . . he rubbed his eyes, but the fact could not be denied! . . . he saw the figure of a gigantic criminal begin to heave, as with birth-throes at la Franklinien. Then slowly it turned on its master, and crouched for a spring! What happened next M. Tussaud does not tell us, but this is his way of accounting for the business:

The vibration caused by a heavy goods train on the Metropolitan Railway, which runs under the Exhibition premises, had shaken the figure of its balance, and the iron which fastened it to the floor permitted it to move and lean forward in the uncanny manner I have described.

It's great sport to see the engine hoist with his own petard, and, for ourselves, we believe M. Tussaud is only resented. As regards his singularly lame "explanation," we invite him to carry that to the Marines. D. L. M.

X = ?

Letters to X from H. J. Massingham. (Constable. 6s. net.)

It is evident that Mr. Massingham is at home among books; it is not so clear that he is at home anywhere else. One of these letters (XXXI., "Arcadia") deals chiefly with what befell him on an occasion when he ventured away from them. He would have us terrified; but he is more terrifying than he means to be. He portrays a landscape with the evident intention of conveying to us his admiration for it; the effect is extremely depressing in its conventionality. And when from the countryside he passes to its inhabitants, whom he describes as greedy, dishonest, sottish or lecherous, we feel that, though they may have been all these things—which are not peculiar to rustics—there is perhaps nothing in them so dangerous as the frightened incomprehension with which he regards them. It is not till he is once more among his books that he takes heart, and looks round him for a remedy. Need it be said that this remedy is—not a more sympathetic attitude towards human distress, vice, and folly, but—more books for Hodge? Well, more books for him by all means; but as a cordial draught rather than an improving purge. This adventure and its implications point a moral for the reader of the "Letters to X"; he will expect to find Mr. Massingham happiest where books are thickest. " . . . My books, ranged round the room like the wall of the enclosed garden of the Roman de la Rose, are a shield against a pitchy, clamorous outside." . . . (Letter XVIII., "More Old Books").

We may pause here to look for the value of "X." Mr. Massingham refuses to waste his time defining and expounding it, but acknowledges it to be "an excuse for discharging" "a series of undress reflections about English literature old and new." An excuse may be good or bad, however, and to relegate it, as Mr. Massingham does, to the coast of Coromandel, is to leave its character in this respect unaltered. Without visiting the coast of Coromandel, we may obtain some information about "X" from references in the letters. It (for it does not appear that "X" has a valid claim to definite gender) is not subject to the laws of gravity (Letter XXII.), does not read novels, travel in Tubes, nor eat grape-nuts (Letter XXVI.); on the other hand, it "peers over the rim" of the coast of Coromandel, to "let down the subtle hook" of its "curiosity into our so enigmatic vortex" (Letter VI.). A suspicion that "X" is no more a positive quantity to Mr. Massingham than it is to the reader grows more inveterate with every reference.

It may appear absurd to stress the point. "X" is a fiction, Mr. Massingham acknowledges it to be so from the first; why trouble then to inquire further? In answering, we should like to ask whether Mr. Massingham would agree that a fiction belongs to a world as absolutely ruled by law as the physical universe; that he who acquires power there, though he cause the sun to stand still and the moon to float down upon its mountain-tops, does so through his control, not in defiance, of its laws. If this be admitted, the relevance of our preliminary investigation becomes evident, and it will be worth while inquiring further what happens when a writer who has a good deal to say addresses his remarks to something in which he does not believe.

When writing to our friend the classical don, we may find it convenient to verify our little quotation from Terence; such metaphors as overones or symphony flow less glibly from our pen if our correspondent is a musician; and should it ever fall to our lot to write a letter to Mr. Massingham, we should not feel safe unless all the volumes of the "Cambridge History of English Literature" were within easy reach. And more generally, the personality and critical faculty of our correspondent exercise a rest:ining influence of some force on our style. But "X," we feel, can have such chastening effect, being incapable of self-assertion; and anyhow, Coromandel is a long way off. So Mr. Massingham, who has scholarship, who has ideas, discrimination, strong opinions, strong feelings even, but little effective power of self-criticism, has removed a necessary safeguard by placing the tenacious but non-conductive "X" between himself and his public. The result imposes one as a waste of good material. The thoughts come down in spate and are lost in the sands, and one wonders how so promising a volume of matter and sound should produce so little refreshment.

Despite the defects implied in these general considerations, the book contains many excellences of detail, and reaches at times and maintains for a while a level notably above its average. Perspective is perhaps Mr. Massingham's outstanding quality. He is at his best when placing his subject in its historical setting, especially when his theme is one which, like journalism, or modem novels, or the recrudescence of mysticism in literature arouses in him strong sympathy or strong antipathy. His judgment on modern literature outside of himself is mainly with our own that it might appear immodest to tell how strikingly sound they appear to us to be. But skirting this delicate ground, one may point to his characterization of James Elroy Flecker (Letter XXXIII., "A Pilgrim who stopped Half-way") as a real help to the literary-historical understanding of a poet whom one is in danger of under estimating, or of overestimating by reaction. Another reinterpretation that appears fresh and illuminating is that of Addison (Letters VIII.-IX.). One is grateful for many of the quotations in the book,—from Vaughan, for instance; and from John Banister Tabb, an American poet whose work one wishes rather urgently to know better, after reading the extracts here given (Letter XXXV., "An Image-Maker").

F. W. S.
TRAGEDY AND THE MELODRAMATIST

THE BOLSHEVIST ADVENTURE. By John Pollock. (Constable, 78. 6s. 6d. net.)

A GREAT number of books written in English on the Russian revolution are very emotional, but devoid of political science, ideas, insight, common sense, and chiefly of simple, clear facts. In order that those who desire to read a narrative of facts or an unbiased explanation of the events in Russia should know which book to read and how far its author is reliable, we would suggest that writers of books on the revolution should insert a few autobiographical notes answering the following questions: (1) By what means, and through what influences, did the author manage to get into Russia? (2) In what capacity did he go there—as one eager to study and see for himself what was going on in Russia, or as a journalist, or as an expert eyewitness, or as a saviour of Russia? (The last species is the most prolific.) (3) What were his means of subsistence when there—he live on his income, or had he to earn his living (say, by writing for the English press), or was he wholly or partly engaged in some kind of propaganda work? (4) With what class or group of Russian society he is connected, and with whom are his sympathies?

Thus the reader would know beforehand whether a book on the Russian revolution is at all worth reading, and if read, whether it can be relied upon, and to what extent the partiality, prejudices, or sympathies of the author should be ignored. Unfortunately, hitherto we have had books on the Russian revolution not by chroniclers of events, nor by journalists, nor even by disinterested eyewitnesses: they have been the books of self-appointed ambassadors, of savours of Russia and the world.

Yet those who have written and are writing on the Russian revolution are tremendously important. To us who were hungry for authentic and definite news, anxious about the complicated events in Russia, living from morning papers to afternoon papers, and from afternoon papers to late editions, it seemed that the destinies of Russia rested in the hands of those who supplied the European press with communications from Russia. From the very beginning of the revolution we witnessed the danse macabre of the English reactionary press, reducing the whole Russian revolution to a German plot, and calling Russian revolutionaries murderers, thieves, swindlers, agents-provocateurs. And when then, in front of his victim, he heard with bewilderment, on the other side, a part of the Radical press celebrating the profound statecraft of the Bolsheviks, and rejoicing in the disappearance of prostitutes from the streets of Moscow. And the more we gasped for news, real, true, actual news, the more important became those who supplied it from Russia to the English press. But instead of news and facts we had manifestoes and prophecies. While tragedy was being enacted in Russia, here we heard only the jarring music of political organ-grinders.

Let us see what is Mr. John Pollock's attitude towards Russia. According to him the Bolsheviks are all paid German agents, ruining Russia merely in the interests of Germany. Besides his own enlightened authority for that categorical statement, he cites also that of Mr. Sisson's "The German-Bolshevik Conspiracy." But the Bolsheviks are not the sole agents of Germany. Of Kerensky, "that ill-starred juggler," Mr. Pollock says:

"Towards Russia and her allies his attitude, in relation to the Bolsheviks, was that of a decoy who whistles in front of his victim for the actual assassin to come behind and deal the deadly stroke, and further:

For this estimate of Kerensky there is one fact that is not taken into account. It has been remarked that when Lenin was under sentence of arrest, all the efforts of Kerensky did not succeed in finding him: now that Kerensky is under sentence of arrest by Lenin, not all the latter's millions of words can unearthe the vanished Premier. There are not found wanting those who draw the inference that their joint bond unites the two leaders than either would publicly admit, and that, serving the same masters, neither could afford to hand over the other to justice.

Thus Mr. Pollock writes history.

With American policy towards Russia Mr. Pollock has a violent quarrel. He quotes a Russian official saying of the American Red Cross: "So far as we know, with the exception of distributing condensed milk, they [the Americans] have done absolutely nothing here but political intrigue." And again:

The American public can hardly have grasped the fact that the war was going on all the time in Russia, and that the Bolshevik regime was nothing but a German bargain: had they done so, they could not have calmly accepted a policy that has cost them the sympathy of the entire upper class in Russia.

Yes, "the entire upper class" is Mr. Pollock's chief concern throughout his book. Everything else in Russia is anathema, to be damned in eternity. At the beginning of his book he even has a prayer or incantation: . . . every now and then should every British citizen and every honest thinking man begin and end every important piece of business, with the words, Down with the Bolsheviks! Everybody in Russia (outside the "the entire upper class")—the Bolsheviks, the peasants, the workmen, the Jews—is to be damned. Especially the Jews. The Jews! The book is full of them, all sorts and kinds of Jews, beginning with the "Neo-Israelish government" of Russia, and finishing with "our Hebrew acquaintances searching one another's heads for lice." There are so many Jews in the "Bolshevik Adventure" that in reading the book one has the impression that Mr. Pollock uses Russia as a misnomer for Jewry.

Mr. Pollock proves to be a terrible scandal-monger. Of Marie Andreeva Gorky he writes:

Marie Andreeva, the Petrograd commissar of theatres, made two millions out of the transport of some trucks of fish from Saratov to Moscow, who was a second-rate actress at the Art Theatre in Moscow, is Maxim Gorky's "civil" wife [sic]. She now has her exclusive motor-car, dresses exquisitely in days when the simplest costume costs a thousand roubles, and travels in a special coach, taking her own cook with her for the journey.

Mr. Pollock manages to get so much into a few sentences Of Gorky himself Mr. Pollock writes thus:

His special pet is the Publication Commission . . . at the head of the list Gorky inscribed thirty of his own works. The Publication Commission is in reality to a large extent an engine for distributing huge money to literary persons who might on the quittance opinion against the Bolsheviks.

Thus, according to the insinuation of Mr. Pollock, the "friend" of Russia, not only is Gorky a venal person, but all Russian "literary persons" can be bought. No, Mr. Pollock may tell his scandalous tales about others; but he must leave Maxim Gorky alone. An ocean of venomous ink could not stain his name.

It is said that diplomats must peregrinate the subtle art of not exactly telling the truth. We understand this, we excuse it, we even justify it—on grounds of State necessity. But why should self-proclaimed diplomats, self-appointed ambassadors, self-anointed "saviours" of Russia use that subtle art? Where is the need for it now? Moreover, we fear that the subtle art that has been so intensely and extensively exercised in the production of English books on the Russian revolution will have a very unpleasant reaction. When disinterested and sincere books come to be written by disinterested and sincere men, they will find no publisher: no market can endure a "boom" in perfidious.
BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTES

The Allen collection of manuscripts and early printed books, which is to be sold with some others by Messrs. Sotheby, is one of a series of unusual character. It was formed with the idea of getting together classical manuscripts and early editions at a time when every library of any size prided itself on a complete collection of the Greek and Latin authors. The greater part of the manuscripts collected by Mr. Allen consist of copies made in Italy by professional scribes during the early part of the fifteenth century, just before the invention of printing, under conditions which have been pictured to modern readers by Charles Reade in "The Cloister and the Hearth." The value of any of these manuscripts, apart from the question as to whether they are illuminated or not, depends on a number of considerations. There were always fine examples of calligraphy in Greek or Latin, so that the purchaser has a good model for imitation, and indeed many of our best types derive mediately or immediately from manuscripts of this age; though the Greek sometimes suffers greatly from an enormous number of corrections. They are as valuable always for textual criticism as printed first editions of the classics, which were set up from copies such as these. In many cases, depending on the fortune of the copyist, these fifteenth-century codices may preserve for us the tradition of manuscript copies now lost; and, indeed, some of our received texts have no earlier authority. Thus, in glancing through the list we observe two places of the Nubians in a late fourteenth-century hand, which must be contemporary with the earliest text we have, and which may be useful for the criticism of the "Plutus" and the "Nubes." A 1443 Cesar, complete, is an early authority for the African and Spanish wars. A Cornelius Nepos might also be of value, though his text presents little difficulty; but an early tenth-century codex of Ibsen and some other poems, may quite conceivably be of great importance. A Sextus Julius Frontinus is another author whose text depends on few and late manuscripts, while a fifteenth-century Martial is also attractive. A Plautus MS. claims, if the catalogue is read aright, to be of a very early tradition; and there is a thirteenth-century Priscian from the hand of Lorenzo de' Medici, as also a fine Sallust manuscript and a Seneca. Of course these are only possibilities, but the chance of obtaining a good new text should be a temptation to some of our patrons of learning. The collection contains many books in their original binding and a fine illuminated Livy, which should fetch a high price. As showing the difference of tastes, there are no fewer than thirty-eight Cicero manuscripts in a collection of 115 books and manuscripts together. The other properties in the sale include a fourteenth-century "Prick of Conscience," by Richard Rolle; a fourteenth-century Valerius Maximus, with interesting illuminations and borders; some Bibles and Hours, several of the fine examples of the best French work; a thirteenth-century Vegetis, old enough to be important textually; and a fine manuscript on the Teison d'Or, of great historic interest, with portraits of Charles the Bold, Maximilian, and Philip, which was exhibited at Bruges in 1807. The illustrated catalogue (3s. 6d. net) contains a reproduction of the Charles portrait, which is admittedly the best in existence.

"DISCOVERY"

The first number of Discovery (Murray, 6d. net) is attractively printed and produced, the articles are informative and well-written, and yet it does not wholly fail in our expectations. We may be singular in this respect, but we trace the source of our discontent to the fact that three out of the seven articles in this number are concerned with special questions arising out of the war. It is not that these questions are not important, but they are not of that extent general importance. We should like to see treated more particularly these special problems which have long and deep ramifications, where we can get the broadest outlook for our money, as it were. We have nothing but praise for the articles in themselves; we suggest, however, that the "topical" interest has been given a little too much weight in making up the number. We mention this because we think that Discovery has a unique opportunity of providing what so many people want to-day: a general survey of leading ideas in each department of knowledge.

Science

PSYCHOLOGICAL PARLOUR-GAMES

In the tendency of its speculations, no less than in its current artistic values, the Twentieth Century more and more reveals itself as an age of passionate introspection. That shifting of the focus of curiosity from the outer mystery of reality to the inner mystery of consciousness, which began perhaps with Kant, and has continued steadily for some 150 years; seems now almost complete. For our generation, experimental psychology in many forms challenges the traditional primacy of metaphysics among the playgrounds of speculation. A few of us may still marshal ghostly embattled systems against the obstinate reticence of things; but recent metaphysicians have somehow lacked the large arrogance, the richness and amplitude of conception, which distinguished the great system-builders. In their place we have the growing band of psychologists and psychological researchers, hypnotists, psycho-analysts and what not, who, in despair of forcing the front gates of Truth, are tampering with the locks of the back entrances, peering through chinks in the shutters of certain disused cellars or lumber-rooms, and even (if they are good Freemasons) enthusiastically investigating the possibility of ingress by way of the sewers.

The new game has its advantages over the old. It may—and does, if it is to be properly played—tax no less severely the intelligence, the imaginative resource, the patience of the player; but it does not demand the same long specialized training. Its subject-matter is individual and concrete; its methods are the methods made familiar by the natural sciences; its vocabulary is not as yet too involved or invested with technicalisms. It does not start at the top of the pyramid from a limited number of general notions, but at the bottom from a mass of gradually accumulating observations. There is an enormous amount of simple experimental work to be done—much of it work to which anybody who is possessed of leisure and patience can contribute without stirring from his arm-chair. This last consideration induces the writer to suggest a few parlour experiments of an innocuous nature and requiring little or no apparatus, which at the worst will serve to pass a winter's evening for the experimenter, and may in certain cases open up valuable sources of information for the psychologist.

(1) Some knowledge of the singular group of mental phenomena which we class as hypnotic has now filtered through from the psychological laboratories and psychiatric clinics to the general public. But many people whose curiosity has been aroused are deterred from attempting a first-hand acquaintance with the condition in question, either by the lack of a skilled operator or by a very natural reluctance to subject their personalities to what seems the unchecked dictation of another's will. To such, the following little experiment is recommended. Sit in a room by yourself, in an easy and relaxed pose, and fix your eyes on any small, bright object—a silver pencil will serve—in such a position as to induce a slight upward and inward squint. At the same time repeat to yourself rapidly and unceasingly, in a rhythmic sing-song, some unvarying verbal formula, it matters not what. When the eyes are tired let them close; but continue the monotonous repetition of your phrase, allowing the sound to dominate consciousness to the exclusion of all other material. When you have kept this up for twenty minutes or more, try suggesting to yourself that your eyelids are pressed down by heavy weights, or that you cannot lift your hand from your knee. If the suggestion takes effect, you can obliterate it by subsequent vigorous counter-suggestion. The verification and gradual extension of trivial-seeming experiments of this type—the actual form may be varied indefinitely—and a close introspective study of the mental processes involved are at present badly needed, as they may have an important bearing on the still unsolved problem of the nature of hypnotic states in general. A good many years ago Dr. Hugh Wingfield, a Demonstrator in Physiology at Cambridge, discovered that some 80 per cent. of a class of Cambridge undergraduates could throw themselves by self-suggestion into a condition of cataleptic rigidity and out of it again: and the experiments recorded by Fahnestock and one or two others indicate that in general most, if not all, of the phenomena of hypnosis may be obtained without an hypnotist. But in that case what becomes of the widely accepted view which finds the characteristic differentiae of hypnosis in a special "rapport" established between operator and subject, and the complete loss of volition on the part of the latter? It would seem that neither the practical possibilities nor the theoretical significance of self-hypnosis have yet received the attention they merit—a circumstance which one is tempted to attribute to the subconsciously biased of the professional hypnotist (who writes all the text-books) against any infringement of his patent.

(2) Somewhat akin to self-hypnosis is the remarkable mental state which Tennyson used to produce in himself by concentration on his own name. He has left a description of it in some well-known lines of "The Ancient Sage." Elsewhere he speaks of it as "a kind of waking trance," in which "all at once, as it were, out of the intensity of the consciousness of individuality, the individuality itself seemed to dissolve and fade away into boundless being, and this not a confused state, but the clearest of the clearest, the surest of the surest, the weicrest of the weicrest, utterly beyond words, where death was an almost laughable impossibility, the loss of personality (if such it were) seeming no extinction but the only True Life." Is this the "ecstasy" of Plotinus and Porphyry, or merely an extension of suggestion d’érangenté which, as the Polish psychologist Abramowski has recently shown, is induced in many people by monotonous repetition of a name? The words of "The Ancient Sage:

I touched my limbs, the limbs were strange, not mine, rather suggest the latter explanation. But it would be interesting to know whether there are others who can procure themselves such a state of consciousness as this of Tennyson’s by the use of the same simple means.

(3) We want a much more extended study than has yet been undertaken of the ordinary functioning of the subconscious in ordinary people. The provoking ambiguity of the evidence for survival obtained by the Society for Psychical Research in recent years through various automatists is largely due to our ignorance of the machinery, the sources and the limitations of subliminal production. To distinguish with certainty residual phenomena, if such there be, from the mass of normal automatic products, we must know much more about the normal than we do at present. Therefore it is to be desired that as many people as possible should interrogate their subliminals by means of one or other of the various "autosopes"—table-tilting, automatic writing with or without planchette, the ouija board and the crystal—and should keep a full record of the results. Provided they are approached with ordinary common sense and in a detached temper, these investigations need involve not the slightest danger to bodily or mental health. Only in the case of automatic writing is a special caution necessary. Any attempt on the part of the subliminal to gain the upper hand by creating a craving to write should be at once resisted, and the practice abandoned. There is no instance, so far as the writer knows, of the development of such a craving in connection with any of the other autosopes; and they are to be preferred on this account. For most people the ouija-board seems to be the easiest to operate. All that is needed for its construction is an alphabet cut out in cardboard and spread on a table, a sheet of glass laid on top of the alphabet, and a thin light piece of polished wood as indicator. The finger-tips are rested lightly on the indicator, which slides under the unconscious muscular pressure across the surface of the glass, and will in many cases spell out intelligible if not intelligent "messages" after a very few trials. By the use of a cranial or other speculum (in modern practice can be a common glass ball) a certain number of persons (about 5 per cent. of us according to one estimate) will with patience develop the amusing and harmless faculty of "scrying" or automatic vision. The speculum must rest against a dark background, in such a position that it may return as few reflections as possible, and the observer should gaze steadily, but without undue mental concentration, for ten minutes or more at a time. The content of the vision will usually be found to be of the same dreamlike character as the products of motor automatism.

(4) Most people have on some occasion seen or taken part in experiments in thought-transference. Unfortunately, amateur mentalists seem to be persuaded to make contemporary records of the precise circumstances in which the trials take place, as well as of all results obtained, whether positive or negative; and in the absence of such records their experiences can be significant only for themselves. The bare fact that thought-transference does occasionally occur is, in the writer’s judgment, established almost beyond reasonable doubt by existing evidence; but the implications of this fact remain obscure until we can determine what physical media, if any, are involved in the transmission; and that knowledge in turn can only be reached through patient empirical study of the physical and mental conditions favorable to success. Such a study of the relation to every detail of experience, and a necessity of wide co-operation. It is to be hoped that the dust of controversy excited by Sir Oliver Lodge and the other evangelists of spiritualism will not completely obscure this more modest, but possible, for that very reason, more fruitful field of psychological research.

E. R. Dodds.

"SCIENCE PROGRESS"

The January number of Science Progress (Murray, 6s. net) is exceptionally attractive. As was to be expected, the Astronomical Section devotes a good deal of space to Einstein’s Generalized Theory of Relativity. There is a possible ambiguity, however, in the statement that the principle of equivalence is essential to the theory of relativity. The Riemann-Christoffel tensor, which vanishes for a Galilean space-time system and for every system derivable therefrom by a maximum of physical transformation, need not vanish in a permanent gravitational field. The principle of equivalence is extremely useful as it enables us to pass from an artificial to a permanent gravitational field, but it is not essential to relativity. We think, however, that Mr. James is correct in asserting that Einstein’s theory is not a theory of gravitation, but a theory of space and time. Einstein is concerned with the measured properties of space and time in the neighbourhood of matter, but gives no reason why matter should produce the space-time distortion he discusses.

It would be impossible within the limits of our space to discuss the various interesting articles in this number. We must, however, direct attention to Dr. Lotka’s suggestive remarks on “Evolution and Irreversibility.” We see here a characteristic combination of imagination and analysis which is very attractive. The Correspondence, too, is exceptionally interesting; there seems little to choose between the spiritualists and the anti-spirituals, so far as frequency of merely dogmatic descriptions is concerned. It is a pity that the section on Pure Mathematics should consist of nothing but the barest outlines of published papers. Is there nothing in recent mathematical writings which could be made intelligible to readers who, after all, are supposed to understand Dr. Lotus’a paper?

SOCIETIES

GEOLOGICAL.—January 7.—Mr. G. W. Lamplugh, President, in the chair. —The following communications were read:

1. "On Syringothyris Winchell, and certain Carboniferous Brachiopods referred to Syringothyris Koppe," by Mr. E. J. North. He was of opinion that Syringothyris and Spiriferina are in no way related, either morphologically or phylogenetically. Dr. F. A. Rother and Professor T. F. Sibly offered some observations on the paper.

PHILOLOGICAL.—January 9.—Dr. Wilfrid Perrett read an important paper on "The Perception of Sound, in which he maintained that it is the philologist who can and must settle the controversy as to the mechanism of the internal ear, whether we have in the cochlea a set of resonant fibres (Helmholtz) or a mechanism which is sound-boat in its characteristics (Hebebrand). The shock sensation of the "consontant" ending the first syllable in stop, please: not to ...", book-keeping: or in the Glasgow pronunciation (so common in London streets) of bottle as "boll," would be impossible if resonant fibres were the ear continued to be the shock sensation that these voiceless occlusives is the effect of the sudden transition from sound to silence, and it is only on account of the complete absence of resonance in the internal ear that these "sounds" of everyday speech exist. If in the phrase "the kling-klang of resonance" we employ the natural magic of our matchless language, and substitute "click-clack" for the first term, then, as far as the ear is concerned, the second term must also be changed, and the phrase become the click-clack of a percussion and or percussion. Reference to his published work ("Questions of Phonetic Theory," 1916-19; Cambridge, Heffer) for the proof of his assertions, Dr. Perrett said that Helmholz table of vowel-pitches shows errors amounting in the extreme case of the vowel in octaves, and that the compass of the mouth shaped for the vowels of English, instead of being nearly four octaves, is less than two (about d 4 to 10); and he held out the hope that we might shortly see the realization of Robert Willis's idea (1829)—generally ascribed to Helmholz, who adopted it without acknowledgment—that the accurate determination of these inherent vowel-pitches would eventually furnish phonologists with a correct measure of the second difference in the pronunciation of the vowels by different nations.

INSTITUTION OF CIVIL ENGINEERS.—January 13.—Four papers relating to harbours and wave-action were read, viz. "Whitby Harbour Improvement," by Mr. James Mitchell; "The Design of Harbours and Breakwaters with Reference to the Reduction of Wave-Action within their Area," by Mr. Ralph F. Hindmarsh; "Wave-Action in Harbour Areas, with Special Reference to Works for reducing it at Whitby and Whitby Harbours," by Mr. J. Watt Sandeman; and "The Improvement of the Entrance to Sunderland Harbour, with reference to the Reduction of Wave-Action," by Mr. W. Simpson.

ROYAL NUMISMATIC.—January 15.—Professor C. Oman, President, in the chair.—Mr. W. H. Woodward was elected a Fellow. The Rev. E. A. Sydenham exhibited two rare coins, one of the types, head of Herakles and Zeus Aetophoros and the same symbols (anchor and feeding horse) and monograms; one of Alexander the Great, the other of Seleucus I., both of Eastern fabric. He also showed two Seleucid tetradrachms bearing the same symbols and Apollo stater had been previously known and attributed by Dr. Macdonald to Antiochus II., the other stater with Zeus reverse, apparently unique, now confirms this attribution. A unique silver tetradrachm with the same portraiture was also shown.

The Rev. E. A. Sydenham read a paper on the "Coinages of Augustus." The reader began by giving a chronological summary of the various series and groups of coins under Augustus. After brief notes on the Seleucid mint (B.C. 190) and the military coinage of Octavius in Gaul and Italy (41-39 B.C.), incidentally attributing the S.C. coins to camp mints of Northern Italy, Mr. Sydenham proceeded to discuss the Asiatic coinages (B.C. 20-14) and the "Imperial" mint (B.C. 21-15). Besides coins newly attributed to Asiatic mints, he proposed to give the undated silver and gold with legend Caesar vivf to Asia rather than Rome, and criticized Lafranchi’s attribution of certain coins to Phrygia and Gabriel’s to Athens. The coins attributed to the "Imperial" mint are very distinctive in style, and were probably issued under the direct control of Augustus. These coins had been attributed by Grueber to Rome, and by Lafranchi to Spain. Mr. Sydenham gave cogent arguments against these views, and added reasons for considering them a distinct "Imperial" issue. The theory on which a good deal of the argument turns is Robert’s Augustus made a formal surrender of his Triumviral office and the extraordinary powers pertaining to it. Included in these powers was probably the right of coinage. The surrender of this right was merely an act of policy with Augustus and sufficiently binding. But he held to it to this extent that for five or six years he issued no coins of any sort on his own authority, and even down to the end of his reign he issued no coins in Rome. After an experiment in coinage through P. Cæsaris in Spain (B.C. 22-21) he inaugurated his "Imperial" mint, but confined its operations to the provinces. Finally he fixed the Imperial mint at Lugdunum (B.C. 14).

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL.—January 19.—Sir F. G. Kenyon, Vice-Pres., in the chair. A resolution was passed regarding the Society’s keen sense of the loss it had sustained by the death of its President, the late Sir William Oster. Mr. Falconer Madan was thereupon unanimously elected President.

After the conclusion of official business Mr. Falconer Madan read a short paper, illustrated with lantern slides, on the press of the late Dr. Charles Daniel, Provost of Worcester College, Oxford, who worked as an amateur printer, first in his boyhood at Frome, and afterwards at Oxford, producing among other matter various volumes of verse by Robert Bridges.

FORTHCOMING MEETINGS

Fri. 23. King’s College, 4.—"Ecclesiastical Art," Lecture II., Professor W. D. Farnham.

University College, 5.—"Italian Society in the Renaissance," Lecture I., Dr. E. G. Gardner.

King’s College, 5.30.—"La Dynastie de Magodone," Dr. L. Economos.

University College, 5.30.—"The Geography of Italy," Professor H. E. Butler.

Institution of Mechanical Engineers, 6.—Recent Advances in the Utilization of Water Power," Mr. Eric M. Bergstrom.

Egypt Exploration Society (Lecture Room of the Royal Society), 8.—"El Amarna, the City of the Papyri," Hon. Sir Charles Parsons.

Dr. W. S. Lawrence Library (41, Gordon Square, W.C.), 6.—"The Analysis of Mind," Lecture XI., Mr. Bertrand Russell.

Society of Arts, 8.—"Aircraft Photography in War and Peace," Lecture II., Capt. H. Hamshaw Thomas. (Cantor Lecture.)

Tues. 27. Royal Institution, 3.—"Man’s Origin," Professor G. Elliot Smith.

Institution of Civil Engineers, 5.30.—Resumed Discussion on Harbours and Wave-Action.

King’s College, 5.30.—"The Philosophy of Kant," Lecture II., Professor H. Winkler.

King’s College, 5.30.—"Contemporary Russia: II. Structure of the Community in Russia," Sir Bernard Parès.

Wed. 28. University College, 3.—"History and Drama in the Divina Commedia," 4.—"ecture I., Dr. E. G. Gardner. (Barlow Lectures.)

Society of Arts, 4.30.—"The Ruin and Restoration of Seaboard States, with Special Reference to the British Empire," Mr. Basil Worsfold.

Thurs. 29. Royal Institution, 3.—"Renaissance Music in Italy and England," Dr. R. R. Terry.

Royal Society, 4.30.—"University College, 5.30.—"Italian Literature," Lecture II., Professor Antonio Cipriano. (In Italian.)

Fri. 30. King’s College, 4.—"Classical Greek Art," Lecture I., Professor P. Dearden.

University College, 5.—"Italian Society in the Renaissance," Lecture I., Dr. E. G. Gardner.

King’s College, 5.30.—"La Dynastie de Magodone," Dr. L. Economos.

University College, 5.30.—"Greek and Roman Agriculture," Mr. M. Cary.

Royal Institution, 9.—"The Grosticant Compass," Mr. S. G. Brown.
Fine Arts

AUGUSTE RENOIR

The newspapers and reviews of the whole world have bemoaned the death of Renoir and have paid their homage to that admirable life consecrated, with an obstinacy that never weakened, wholly to his work, despite the paralysis whose deadliness is known to all.

But, in their haste, too many writers have celebrated only the "maître impressionniste" who propagated an error by which the public were only too pleased to be deluded. For, in the eyes of the public, there is no radical difference between Monet and Renoir; they are just two "maîtres impressionnistes." Now if there is any legend which it seems to us a work of piety to destroy, it is this one that makes of these two figures a couple of brothers. Renoir, like Cézanne, was an anti-impressionist painter. He may not have been one at the outset of his career, but he knew how to become one at the age when it was necessary for the conversion to be achieved, and it is from this time forth that he became the great artist we know him to have been, the heir of Rubens and Watteau. It is amusing to observe the fate of this impressionism school, which made itself illustrious only by the defections which it provoked from the circle of its own adepts.

Born of a reaction against the utterly worn-out convention of official academism, the impressionist school aroused a praiseworthy desire for realism. But this desire was as badly directed as it was possible for it to be; it confounded the real with the visible, imagined that sensation alone could suffice for recognition, and that the registration of all the accidents without determining their cohesion or rhythm was the sufficient artistic exercise. The pure impressionist ideal—let us have the courage to say it—is quite disconcertingly silly. One can only explain the embarrassment it provoked in the hearts of the most talented artists of the period by considering it as an instinctive manifestation of that superior necessity of overcoming pictorial values of which it was, in some sort, a first avowal.

In effect, Delacroix, burning to discover the secret of "great painting," had exhausted all the resources offered by the museums to the inexperience of the modern artist. His works, in other respects often admirable, were none the less more than paler repetitions of traditional works which only a new dramatic sense—a sense which belongs only to the great romantic painter—could sometimes succeed in modernizing. But what had been done remained unsurpassable, despite his efforts to extend the Old Masters. Accordingly, to the inheritors of Delacroix the classical methods appeared obsolete, incapable of expressing their childish intoxication, the excitement of schoolboys let loose in a garden, which "the wonders of science" made them believe boundless. To forget all, to learn all things anew—this was the line followed by those who had kept their sensibility intact: a childlike solution that would have imperilled the fate of painting if it had not been for the appearance of certain heroic deserts who, tired of questioning Nature with the eyes, thought at last of questioning her with the mind. Heretics in the heart of the heresy, they deserted the lower region of the senses, where the purists of the new school were wont to take their pleasure, in order to climb, step by step, towards the higher planes of intelligence. Each in his own way, Cézanne and Renoir understood that the scientific or spontaneous reproduction of a few material facts does not constitute a language worthy of art, and that if it is necessary to turn for support to the earth, one should not wallow on its surface; one should approach it in order to rebound.

"In my opinion the principal cause of the decay of the craft lies in the absence of an ideal. The most skilful hand is never more than the servant of thought."

This is an authentic saying of Renoir, a phrase that throws more light on the painter of the "Bathers" than the childish sayings which people take such pains to quote. It is important to point out that most of the critics have perversely taken pains to acclaim in Renoir only the instinctive painter, a rebel against all processes of reasoning, art, who exercised no control over himself.

These writers genuinely believe that they are in this way ennobling the painter, and it is with a snigger in the direction of the young "intellectuals" that they preach the perfect unconsciousness, the complete irresponsibility of the old man. Neglecting the sayings that Renoir put his name to, they dwell lovingly on his casual conversational remarks, holding up for admiration this little sally:

"I have no rules nor methods," a remark that was meant by the man who uttered it to be carried away by the wind, since he afterwards wrote, "Painting is a craft like carpentry or iron-working; it is subject to the same rules."

The truth is that Renoir, with his subtle, delicate mind, felt the ridiculousness of these after-dinner theories, in which metaphysics oftentimes more space than painting; and he was above everything, regardless of all interpretations that the literary men generally put on the painter's remarks. Hiding his preoccupations under an attitude of witty detachment, he silently perfected for himself what must have been a remarkably precise discipline, if one may judge by the continuity of his effort and the unity of his work, exempt from those oscillations that denote in certain painters, sometimes of the highest talent, an absence of interior direction. Renoir's intelligence consisted in this: he understood that a discipline is made up only of words, and that a theory is nothing at all if it does not immediately lead to practice in which it is the subject of the artist. The word must become flesh. To give direction to one's ideas, to incorporate them in one's own substance, to render organic what was only a cerebral—such is the operation of genius. It is a difficult and painful task, a "long patience" for which the recompense is liberty of execution, fecundity and serenity.

Just as the impressionists' reality was only an appearance, too their technique was only an appearance of technique, a renunciation of the rational craft. The moment Renoir began to interest himself in what was permanent, his formula became different: aiming at the eternal, it naturally returns to its sources, which are immutable. It was by adopting an attitude equivalent to that of the Masters of the Renaissance—though not, like Delacroix, making use of their technique—that Renoir rediscovered their beautiful certitudes and created durable forms.

For the pure impressionists, such as Monet, Sisley, Berthe Morisot, &c., the sunshine, the challenge play of prismatic lights over the surface of things, localized the attention of the painter. The effect becomes the theme; it absorbs material objects, which vanish as soon as they cease to be of use in supporting the terrible "lighting." Coloured perspective; the creed of the painters of the new school, tends to the disintegration of objects, drives them to a total effacement in the bosom of the Moloch-like sun. Impressionism is the temptation of nothingness.

Renoir, who is interested in light only in so far as it reveals the profound qualities of the matter under examination, in his love for all things considers no object unworthy of receiving it. Light, for him, has ceased to be the unique queen whose smallest sign is an order; it is his ally; he holds it like a tool in his hand, and without projecting it more on one form than on another, he distributes it over every point in his picture; it brings out the value of the culminating part of objects, which now,
EXHIBITIONS OF THE WEEK

FINE ART SOCIETY.—Cartoons, "Victory and After," by Louis Raemaekers.
MACKAE GALLERY, 95, REGENT STREET.—Water-COLOUR Drawings of Etaples by T. A. Austen Brown, A.R.S.A.

When the real history of the great war is written it will contain a long chapter headed "Propaganda," in which the name of Louis Raemaekers will frequently occur. He has played a more direct and obvious part in the war than any other artist, and his reputation is quite out of proportion to the intrinsic merits of his cartoons. We have published his first war cartoons in a Dutch newspaper they were acclaimed by a world paralysed with horror at the practical application of Frightfulness in Belgium. In the strained atmosphere of the time the world believed that this Dutch cartoonist was capable of expressing the universal detestation of these orgies of organized cruelty; it believed him capable, too, of a broader thing—capable of expressing the world's horror of War. But such a function was beyond his powers. The world soon realized that he was not made of the stuff of a Goya or Callot; that it was not so much Militarism he hated as German Militarism, and not so much Kaiserism as the Kaiser. In the Allied countries he was welcomed, if somewhat with open arms, and the world soon began to regard him as an avowed Allied propagandist. As such his national neutrality could not fail to make an impression, and his cartoons were undoubtedly of great service to the Allied cause.

As a draughtsman Raemaekers is unimportant. A technical method browned him and the end leaves his drawings an appearance of power, but they have none of the fine observation of typical forms which constitutes the element of greatness in the work of the French masters. He is, in fact, not primarily an artist at all. He uses a drawing merely to illustrate the legend placed beneath it. As a satirist he hits hard, but his outlook is not personal or emotional; he contributes no ideas to the world, he only exploits existing well-recognized angles of thought. We know just what he will say on any subject, and why and in what way—we know it will be much the same as the comments in Punch.

Nevertheless there is one theme which stimulates him to greater achievement. He rises to a certain height in his drawings of the Kaiser. His hatred of this figure is clearly genuine, and his Kaiser-drawings ring true on the strength of this real emotion. He hates the Kaiser as thousands of men and women hate him to-day, with a deep contempt and no pity. He hates him far more than the average Englishman does for the German Kaiser, the English Kaiser, and he really prefers Mr. Haselden's "Big and Little Willie" conception of the Hohenzollerns. But Raemaekers hates the Kaiser so much that he acquires intuition when he draws him and becomes for the time an artist.

The present collection of his cartoons at the Fine Art Society's Galleries is notable for the artist's comments on the last stage of the war, from the entrance of America to the signing of peace, and incidentally his views on English Labour unrest and Bolshevism. As usual, the Kaiser-drawings are in a class by themselves. Here we have no need to consult the legends; the drawings tell their own story. But the drawings where there is no Kaiser have very little raison d'etre. We can find out all Raemaekers has to say by turning the pages of the catalogue, where we see such titles as "Lerin goes a-Hunting: Murder, Frost and Starvation, the inevitable companions of Bolshevik rule," or "Japan to the Rescue of Russia," and so on. Raemaekers' view of Bolshevism is perfectly expressed in these titles without the aid of the drawings. The same is true of the cartoons devoted to English Labour problems, where the title tells us that the artist thinks all strikes the work of German agents and Extremist Agitators.

It is curious to turn from these drawings by a neutral who plunged voluntarily into the war, and commented on so many phases of it, to a set of pictures of Etaples painted by an English artist in the heat of the struggle, a set of pictures which in spite of the struggle happening within earshot Mr. Austen Brown had made Etaples his home in the years before the war, and he continued his water-colour sketches of the picturesque fishing-port regardless of the presence of the great base camp and the tramping of British troops all round. The Etaples which he pictures is the Etaples which persisted in spite of the war, and which conveyed its fascination to those who lingered there far from retreating towards destruction, flow forward towards the eye and take on an even modelling. The impressionists' visual space is abolished, and the spiritual space of the true painters is recaptured. Renoir's beautiful rounded masses are not ranged in measurable depth; they roll one over the other, like luminous worlds, counter-balancing one another. He has asked of Nature the secret of her stability; causes, taking the place of effects, have become, for him, the unique theme. Like Cézanne, he discovered the divine laws of equilibrium, and he makes use of them to govern the economy of this miniature universe—the picture which he creates in imitation of Him who smiles upon his geniuses, while Monet, the true impressionist type, pushing his speculations to absurdity, renounces not only the representation of man, but also the representation of everything in a landscape that might be articulated like human members. The phenomena that bring about the apparent dissolution of objects alone solicit his attention—smoke, fog, wind and water, fluidity and mobility, of which the "Thameses" and "Water-lilies" are the exhausted poems.

There is, one essentially French virtue of which we shall not, for a long time it may be, have occasion to speak. That is good humour—sister of candour and mother of fantasy—a quality which Renoir possessed in greater measure than any other painter of his generation. It was this delightful gift which led the great man to mystify, by many little jokes, the literary men of his acquaintance; it has given us that legend of the nightingale-painter, whose formation, though always with his tongue in his cheek, he benevolently favoured, considering that his works were weighty enough to allow him to bequeath to posterity only a light and as it were diminished image of himself. Cézanne too (and the fact gave rise to a number of regrettable anecdotic fantasies) possessed this scampish side (so unpleasant in the failures and second-rates, but delightful in men of superior talent), which incites certain artists, in the presence of a too abject audience, to give utterance to paradoxes, which taken literally, published and commented on, serve to create the false portraits of great men.

The letter which Renoir wrote to Henry Mottex as a preface to Cennino Cennini's "Livre d'Art" proves not only that he could think and write well, as every genuine artist can, but also that he had great store by those innumerable everyday constatations which constitute, when accumulated together, the technical and intellectual armoury of the creator. Out of all the errors written about him let us retain only one thing: Renoir was not an austere professor, a pedantic esthete, an ideologist; he was an artisan. For a painter, no more glorious title exists. From as far back as one can trace the origins of French sculptors or painters, one can only think of them as humble before their work, smiling, simple, armed with a few essential truths, light-heartedly accomplishing their quotidiem task, without fatigue or nervous tension, without romantic spasms, without the exclamation of the South or the rêverie of the North.

In ordinary life Renoir was an amusing companion, but in the studio he became a silent reasoner. He appears to us in the guise of an old image-painter intent on faithfully and naively describing the beauties which the supreme Workmaster unrolled before his eyes. If this conclusion is acceptable to the art critics, whose glosses we have found it impossible to accept, we ask no better than to combine with them in raising the figure of a Renoir, devoid of all arrogance, unpretentiously learned, meditative without ideology and modestly masking the feelings of his heart under a veil of frivolous conversation.

André Liote.
Music

A REPERTORY OF ENGLISH OPERA

NEXT month is to bring forth yet another operatic enterprise, the appearance of the Fairbairn Opera Company at the Surrey Theatre, under the joint management of Mr. Fairbairn and Mr. Min. The Surrey is a little theatre known to most opera-goers. It is an old house of very noble proportions, with an exceptionally large stage. It has recently been completely renovated, and the seating rearranged so as to give a very good view of the stage from every part of the house. If Mr. Fairbairn can once get his audiences to cross the river and become as familiar with St. George's Circus as they are with the neighbourhood of Bow Street, he ought to have every chance of success.

He has announced in the papers that his wish is to perform not merely opera in English, but genuine English opera. Like a wise man, he intends to go slow at first. There is no fear of his presenting a new opera by a native composer every week, and those who want to see such old friends as "Faust" and "Trovatore" will probably not be disappointed. Even supposing that a manager could afford to try the experiment of mounting a season of exclusively British opera, it would not be a plan to deserve encouragement. In France, in Germany and in Italy the operatic repertory is mainly national, but has never been rigidly so, and no sensible musician would ever desire such a narrow-minded policy.

English opera make their appearance in England from time to time, some successfully, others not; but we never seem to have collected the best of them into a regular stock repertory. The causes of this are perhaps largely just indifference and force of habit, perhaps also difficulties with performing rights. There is also this reason, that all our operatic companies live from hand to mouth, performing for short seasons in a number of places, so that none of them can afford to keep up a large repertory after the fashion of a German permanent opera-house. If an impresario could manage to establish a permanent opera company in London without depending upon provincial gains to balance metropolitan losses, it would be quite easy to build up a repertory of British operas which, if we set aside the three great names of Verdi and Wagner, would compare quite favourably with that of any other country.

To begin with, Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas" ought to be as familiar to English audiences as the operas of Gluck are on the Continent. It is, as a matter of fact, a much better opera than any of Gluck's. It is very short, but it is intensely dramatic, and at the same time attractive as music to anyone who has a feeling for pure melody. In spite of its antique conventions it is beautifully constructed, whereas there is no opera of Gluck which does not require considerable remodelling and "faking" before it can be put on the stage at all. And its shortness is in itself an advantage, for it would always have to be coupled with another short opera, so that each might derive advantage from the other. Another quasi-opera of the seventeenth century might also be included: "Cupid and Death" (Matthew Locke and Christopher Gibbons), which at Glastonbury last year obtained a thoroughly popular success.

Of eighteenth-century operas "The Beggar's Opera" is probably the only one that could take a permanent place. Provincial audiences might perhaps insist on its being considerably bowdlerized; what it really requires is not expurgation, but an exceptionally distinguished style of acting. Without this, the whole point of its humour is lost. The present day is just the right moment for its revival, for the coincidence of the folk-song movement with a considerable interest in the art of the eighteenth century ought to have prepared modern audiences to appreciate its wit and mirth.

A century later we come to an opera of European fame, which is tempting to include in the English repertory, though the composer was not an Englishman. John Gay's "Oberon" was composed for London, and furthermore, composed to an English libretto designed on lines so peculiarly English that the opera has never been quite satisfactory in any of its German versions. A good deal of the music is still familiar to English people in a vague sort of way, although it must be a great many years since the opera was seen in its original form. But it will certainly offer a problem of singular difficulty to any modern producer who has the courage to undertake it. The next obvious operas are our old friends "Maritana" and "The Bohemian Girl." There are probably many readers of the Athenaeum who have never seen either of them. They will do well to take the earliest opportunity of going to hear them. Even superior persons will find it instructive to listen to these operas and set themselves to consider carefully why it is that they have attained what may very reasonably be called classical immortality. And having heard them, let them further consider whether it would not be well worth while to "wash their faces," as an Oxford musician used to say—that is, to forget all the traditions that have encrusted themselves upon them and produce them from the original text as if they were entirely new works. Another opera of the same class is "The Lily of Killarney," which is still insisted on by the "Old Vic" patrons to celebrate St. Patrick's Day, although its composer was no more an Irishman than his beloved master, the composer of "Oberon."

But there is another Irish opera, written by an undoubtedly Irishman, which ought to be in our regular British repertory—Stanford's "Shamus O'Brien," a work sufficiently inspired by the spirit of rebellion to deserve the affection of the most progressive opera-goer. And if Irish people love to see their own country glorified, English people certainly love to see theirs made ridiculous; so "Shamus O'Brien" should surely have a double claim to popularity. Scotland would be well represented by Hamish MacCunn's "Jeanie Deans." It is an unpretentious but thoroughly effective and well-written opera, with just the right kind of attractiveness. Within the last twenty years or so a number of operas by British composers have been produced which certainly deserved production and possibly deserve revival; but there are not many which have the elements of real popularity. It may seem scandalous to insist upon this quality, but a standard repertory can only be developed on this basis—it being always presupposed that the works in question are not merely popular, but also reach a self-respecting standard of excellence. Among these Mr. Nicholas Grey's "Duke of Duvil," and Mr. G. H. Cutham's "A Summer Night," ought not to be forgotten; I should like to include in this list S. Boal's "The Wreckers," and there can be no doubt that "The Pleasant Muses" should certainly find a place in our standard repertory. Another opera which has proved its popularity, and ought most certainly to be included, is Rutland Boughton's "The Immortal Hour."

My list, it will be seen, is not a very large one; but it is better that those who are dissatisfied should suggest additions rather than accuse me of setting the standard too low.

Edward J. Dent,
A NEW GOYESQUE OPERA

EL AVAPIÉS: DRAMA LÍRICO EN TRES ACTOS. By Tomás Borrás. Music by Conrado Del Campo and Angel Barrios. (Madrid, Editorial Pueyo. 3.50 pps.)

At the very end of the last opera season at Madrid a new Spanish opera was produced. It met with a mixed reception from the critics and from the public; but a series of lucky accidents enabled it to be put on again at the opening of the present season. "El Avapiés" takes its name from the densely populated district of Madrid surrounding the Calle de Lavapiés. It may be less interesting to Spaniards, than it is to people who do not know Madrid; for the Calle de Lavapiés is quite an ordinary-looking street, and Madridinos can go to the Prado twice a week and see all the Goyas for nothing. A London audience, however, would find "El Avapiés" ravishing.

Sr. Borrás, the author of the book, has taken certain episodes in the life of Madrid as it was about 1800—something between that reflected in the comedies of Ramón de la Cruz (a contemporary of Goldoni) and in the volume of the "Episodios Nacionales" of Pérez Galdós which describes the Court of Charles IV. The beautifully printed "book of the words" is surely the most attractive libretto there ever was, with its clear type, its wide margins, its glossary of "madrileñismos," and its reproductions from paintings and drawings by Goya. The music has not been published; and unfortunately there seems to be no immediate chance of its being printed.

Sr. Del Campo and Sr. Barrios have set about their work with an inexhaustible flow of melody. They have taken the various forms of Madrid popular song as types, and raised them to the level of opera. The procedure has one excellent effect, namely, that you can never hear anyone singing in the street—the old-clothes woman in the Calle Mayor, for instance—without thinking how much better they would do that sort of thing in "El Avapiés." With a single exception, none of the tunes in the opera are real popular songs; yet the supply of melody seems to be unfailing. It might be urged that it is not always expressive or relevant. It does not always seem to belong to the situation or help the listener to understand the personalities of the characters. Occasionally it appears to be outside the action altogether. A good opera, it has been said, should have a drama in the music going on at the same time as the drama on the stage, reflecting and illustrating it. In "El Avapiés" this is made difficult by the fact that for more than half the time a large crowd is on the stage. Whenever there are only two or three people, the drama going on in the music is not only perceptible but unmistakable. The music which accompanies the crowds attacks the problem by a heap of lively tunes and dances; and by this means the composers definitely express the confusion and turbulence of a street. They have not aimed at letting their music fix your attention on the personalities and thoughts, actions and passions, of the chief characters; and even visually the principals only stand out from the rest when the opera is seen not from the stalls, but from the gallery. Whenever a few people are left alone they become entirely intelligible and reasonable.

The weak points of "El Avapiés" are probably not so obvious to an Englishman as they are to a cultivated Spanish musician. For a listener to whom the various types of Spanish melody are not yet so familiar as to be uninteresting, music like that of Del Campo and Barrios is not only delightful in itself, but serves the purpose of making other forms of Spanish musical thought intelligible. It is a step, though not a very long one in the direction of Sr. De Falla, whose music London has approached from the wrong end. If we had had the chance of hearing "El Avapiés" and then De Falla's opera "La Vida Breve," no one would have found the music to the "Three-Cornered Hat" cold or difficult to understand. Falla is the central figure in the group of modern Spanish composers, and anything that helps one to understand him is of value for that alone.

"El Avapiés" is interesting for other reasons. It seems to take an English hearer deeper into Spanish musical thought than before; and this is noticeable in the course of the work itself. What might be objected to as a mixture of styles, arising from the maturity and sense of mastery in the third act compared with the other two, might turn out to be a logical development. The confusion, noise and endless strings of tunes which seem almost, but not quite folk-songs are gradually simplified and gathered together as the drama shapes itself and the issue becomes clear. The method of the composers is then seen to be not a haphazard jumble of styles at all, but a perfectly logical process. At the beginning they fling you into a hurly-burly of people, singing, shouting, dancing and running about—as if all the figures in Goya's tapestry cartoons had escaped from the Prado and come to do their tricks at the Royal Opera; and in the festival procession at the end of Act II., with pasos, giants, the Turasca (a kind of "Riesenwurm") and the little figure of the peleón tossed in a blanket, it seemed as if all the queer things in the history of the Spain (aided and dragged in to confuse one. In the third act, however, music and drama emerge on a higher, clearer level, on which the course of the opera can be clearly followed until the end. Let us hope that London will one day be given an opportunity of hearing "El Avapiés." It is a work which should be known by everybody who is interested in Spain and Spanish things.

J. B. T.

A RAPPROCHEMENT?

Are the poet and the composer going to shake each other by the hand again after an estrangement of some three hundred years? The December number of the Monthly Chapbook (Poetry Bookshop) suggests that they are, for it consists of four songs by Armstrong Gibbs, Malcolm Davidson, Clive Carey, and the late Denis Browne, the words being taken in three cases from Walter de la Mare, and in the other from George Townsend Warner. Three of these songs were sung recently by Mr. Steuart Wilson, and are probably known to many readers; the fourth—Denis Browne's setting of "Arabia"—has not been sung many times, at any rate. "Arabia" may well be the despair of a composer; if Denis Browne has failed—as I think he has—it is not through want of skill or imperceptiveness of style, it is simply that "Arabia" carries itself in verbal melodies and verbal rhythms of such exquisite delicacy that music can do nothing for it. It is a song in itself. "Nod," on the other hand, is a perfect vindication of music: at the first sound of the strings you begin to droop your head and blink your eyes; music has been able to take matters up just at the point where poetry left off.

The little volume is attractively produced and the price of 1s. 6d. for the four songs is a soothing comment on current publishers' charges. But there are one or two misprints in addition to those corrected by hand. On p. 14 there should surely be a tie between the 8th and 9th bars; in the 1st bar on p. 13 the G in the left-hand part should apparently be G sharp, and in the 1st bar on p. 15 the bass requires F natural, not F sharp. Mr. Davidson will no doubt correct me if I am wrong; total contradiction has become a commonplace in these days. But the diatonic nature of his general style makes it difficult to believe that these instances are anything more than an oversight.

R. O. M.
CONCERTS

Mr. Felix Salmond and Mrs. Alfred Horsley introduced an unfamiliar 'Cello and Piano Sonata by Gub Kapritz at their joint recital on January 17. It is in the romantic style in which the few good episodes do not compensate for the long stretches that are merely dull and rhetorical. There are some places one likes in the slow movement, and the finale opens very well, but after a few moments the inspiration breaks down rather abruptly, and the composer never gets his force realistically on hand again. Brahms' F major Sonata is not one of the composer's most inspired works, but it showed up the want of mental concentration in the French work rather badly. Mr. Salmond was playing at times with great brilliance, but was not always as steady as he should have been to retire into the background when it was the piano's turn to predominate.

Miss Valerie Valenson and Miss Marie Joliet also gave a joint piano and 'cello recital on the previous day. We doubt if either of the individual performers realized how largely the recital was made up by the 6 songs of Schubert. Miss Valenson's playing was velvety, but she did not, alas! sound quite so much as in her earlier recitals. Miss Joliet's playing was generally good, but she was not always as steady as she might have been. The joint recital by these two does not compare with the recital by Mr. Salmond and Mrs. Horsley, but they were both excellent performances.

Now that peace has been signed, German songs can be admitted to programmes again, but for those who, like Major Petteroff, have declared peace, but not friendly relations, they must be sung in English. From this point of view, the Schubert recital is more of a test of the composer's power to write for voice and piano than of the pianist's. Both performers can be said to have done well in this programme, but they were not always as steady as one would like. Miss Joliet's playing was generally good, but she was not always as steady as she might have been. The joint recital by these two does not compare with the recital by Mr. Salmond and Mrs. Horsley, but they were both excellent performances.

NEW MUSIC

Messrs. Novello send us two interesting volumes by Mr. Cecil Sharp. One is a selection of the Southern Appalachian folk-songs (5s.) collected by Mr. Sharp in the course of his travels in this region. Mr. Sharp's lecture on the folklore and folk-music of Southern Appalachia will not have been forgotten by those who heard it, and this volume is a welcome reminder. The other is a collection of twelve well-known English country dances, "Black Nag," "Rufly-Tutty," and so on (4s. 6d.), containing not only the tunes arranged for piano but a full set of instructions as to the manner of performing the dances, and an explanation of technical terms and symbols in common use.

Together with these the same firm sends us some less edifying matter. The spring-time and the ring-time are not quite so pretty when Mr. Gernand has finished them with as they were before. Although the ring-time was written in a purely English style by the composer, it sounds as if the words were written in his own language and not translated into English. The "St. Patrick's Day" dance is a definite idea, however awkwardly expressed; but much of German romantic lyric verse is simply slush, and can only be translated into English without a sense of the original meaning. The "Valentine's Eve" dance, on the other hand, is a peculiarly difficult composer to present in English, for his poems are either too good to translate adequately, or too hopelessly bad. One can make something of a poem that has a definite idea, however awkwardly expressed; but much of German romantic lyric verse is simply slush, and can only be translated into English without a sense of the original meaning. The "Valentine's Eve" dance, on the other hand, is a peculiarly difficult composer to present in English, for his poems are either too good to translate adequately, or too hopelessly bad. One can make something of a poem that has a definite idea, however awkwardly expressed; but much of German romantic lyric verse is simply slush, and can only be translated into English without a sense of the original meaning. The "Valentine's Eve" dance, on the other hand, is a peculiarly difficult composer to present in English, for his poems are either too good to translate adequately, or too hopelessly bad. One can make something of a poem that has a definite idea, however awkwardly expressed; but much of German romantic lyric verse is simply slush, and can only be translated into English without a sense of the original meaning. The "Valentine's Eve" dance, on the other hand, is a peculiarly difficult composer to present in English, for his poems are either too good to translate adequately, or too hopelessly bad.

and we can only say that the imbecility of the words is faithfully reproduced in the music. Mr. Percy Fletcher's "Valuable Lyric" is not so bad as the others; one could hear it in a restaurant without feeling that the enjoyment of good food had been appreciably impaired.

R. O. M.

Mr. C. Grant Robertson, Fellow of All Souls College, Oxford, has been appointed Principal of the University of Birmingham, in place of Sir Oliver Lodge, who recently resigned. Mr. Robertson is a distinguished Oxford historian. Among his works the best known are "England under the Hanoverians" (1911), "The Evolution of Prussia" (in collaboration with Mr. J. A. F. Marriott, 1915), and "Bismarck" (1918).

Mr. Alfred Parsons, R.A., President of the Old Water-Colour Society, died at his house at Broadway on January 16. Mr. Parsons gained his name as a careful painter of brightly coloured gardens. He was born in 1847, and forty years later his picture bearing the characteristic title "When Nature painted all Things Gay" was bought by the Chantrey Bequest.

Drama

WHY?

THE Stage Society's last production at the Shaftesbury raises in an acute form the old question of how it is that certain works get played at all. We are surprised, and rightly, when the commercial manager, after forty years' opulent success in his trade, produces at great financial loss a piece which he ought to have dismissed after three whiffs of his cigar at his first reading of it. Surely, we think, he ought to know by now. We are even more surprised, and with far more justification, when the Stage Society selects for performance a manuscript which plainly will not do. The function of this society is, no doubt, to give a chance to works which are likely, for no good reason, to be banned by the commercial theatre, but this cannot mean that it is their duty to mount plays which the commercial manager would reject in his saner moments, or ever, as in the present case, to encourage an author who has obviously parted with him by producing his immature efforts to his confusion. But what is the use of talking, and ought we not rather to blush ourselves? For this author, Mr. Willson Disher, is, it appears, by profession a dramatic critic! He spends his days, that is, in discriminating between plays that will, and plays that won't, go, he is far too intelligent (his dialogue goes bail for that) to share the common delusion that a writer cannot criticize his own work justly, and yet he persists, nay, probably urges, the performance of this comedy of his. He must know he ought to have put it away in his drawer.

However, as Mr. Disher will challenge judgment on "Joan of Memories," we are bound to admit that there is something in it. There is a permanent possibility of witty dialogue, for instance, and a vein of fancy, that struggles to disclose itself; yet somehow the whole thing rests inconchoate, shadowy, confused. It is hard to grasp even how the plot is developing, though you have, all the time, a tantalizing feeling that you might well be interested in this group of Regency figures—the dandified county magnate and J.P., who loses the world and his bride for the sake of an epigram; his young poet brother, in the full tide of Romanticism, who takes love so seriously that it always escapes from him; the gay Corinthian, who is so much too practical that he can never get free from the throng in which he lives, the schoolmaster, who daintily fools the whole set of them, and (best of all) the pompous Mr. Parker, who, starting life as the steward of Joan's estates, has self-elected himself as her guardian. You perceive there is stuff for capital comedy here, and quite in the key of the crazy period depicted. The players, too, have given all the help they can. Mr. William Armstrong as Timothy Tirrell the J.P., Mr. Nicholas Hannen as the Buck, Geoffrey Sheaf, Miss Lilian Rees as the elusive Joan, and Miss Helen Millais as the savage inn beauty are all of them exactly as they should be. If the result is not at all a success—and it isn't—it is because the play needed rewriting from start to finish.

"Joan of Memories" was preceded by a one-act fantasy of the Watteau period by the same author, called "There Remains a Gesture." On the whole the same criticisms apply to this. We feel, however, that Mr. Disher has here hit on a new dramatic form, which is capable of pleasing developments. "There Remains a Gesture" may be described as a pantomime with words. It is a blend of dialogue and speech by gesture. But any play with an element of mime requires a special training in its executants. There is no greater falsity than to suppose that gesture and attitude are things which an intelligent actor picks up as a matter of course in his career. With the exception (and a qualified exception) of Mlle. Rambert as the heroine, and Mr. J. L. Frith as the cut-throat Harlequin, there was not a single person in the cast with the smallest conception of grace or expressive action. The accompanying music was by Mr. Alfred C. Reynolds, and, with no wish to usurp the rights of a musical critic, we must be allowed to say that it sounded most agreeable.

On the whole, then, a disappointing afternoon, and yet, when Mr. Disher's script is given, we shall turn up with a sense of expectation. When he finds himself, it may prove quite a treasure trove.

D. L. M.

Correspondence

COMPULSORY GREEK AT OXFORD

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—Your Oxford correspondent has, of course, the amnest right to hold and express his own opinions on the Greek question; but I venture to take exception to his description of those who hold the opposite view. They are not quite always obturants from "country parsonages and seats" who "do not understand the matter, who want to perpetrate the bondage of the University," and whose interference with "the teachers" is therefore "utterly intolerable." May I put before your readers a few simple facts to show this?

On the last occasion but one when I myself went up to Oxford to attend the correspondent's lectures, I travelled in a train with two persons, previously quite unknown to me, who were seated on the same end. One of them certainly was a clergyman, but as he had been for a long time, first a member of School Boards, and then of County Educational Committees, etc., he may be perhaps allowed to have had some locus standi. The other was a lay schoolmaster, who had been engaged in actual teaching for some twenty years since he left Balliol. When I got to Oxford I met, sat beside in the Theatre, and voted with, a friend with whom I myself then was a Professor of English, but a much better scholar in half a dozen other modern languages than I can pretend to be in one of two. On leaving the Theatre I met another friend who had also come up to vote for Greek, an ex-official of the very highest class in a Government Department of general education. Last year, on that day in June when we once more smote the enemy beside the Isis river, the two non-resident Philhellenists of whom I saw most (except my before-mentioned friend, the Professor of English) were, the one an ex-schoolmaster who, while in his profession, had brought up a famous school from a very low to a very high condition in all departments, and had since made himself a reputation in mediaeval archaeology and other subjects: the other a "modern" historian whose competence I don't think Mr. Barker himself would dispute.

I venture to think that these half-dozen instances, drawn from part only of the accidental and personal experience of a single individual, make your correspondent's description of our party look rather queer. We were "supporting teachers" too; and, independently of that fact, the vote of each of the persons I have mentioned was surely as well qualified as that of some resident who might for a term or two have been teaching History or Natural Science, and have thought that his pupils were unduly bothered by a subject in which he himself felt no interest.

But, Sir, may I have the boldness (and perhaps the bad taste) to defend my own title (even though I did once rent a disused vicarage in the country for forty pounds a year) to oppose the disestablishment of Greek? I have been learning all sorts of subjects, not merely classics, for some seventy years; and I have been teaching (first as schoolmaster, later as a professor), examining in, and (as an unmuzzled journalist, author, etc.) discussing many of these subjects for about fifty. I know no subject that even approaches Greek in its possession of that disciplinary and influential character without which all education is impossible, and if anyone says, "But the amount of Greek required is so small, and there is still no obstacle to anyone studying the subject as much as he pleases," I answer that everything must have a beginning and a basis, and that, from the certain testimony of experience in other cases, obsolescence will follow disestablishment. For these reasons I do not think it "intolerable" that I should have the opportunity of exercising the franchise in my own University. And this Mr. Tawney makes this point several times with some emphasis:

"Our knowledge of the real extent of enclosure during the sixteenth century is too scanty to permit of our following with any confidence the line of argument worked out by Miss Leonard" (p. 383).

"We cannot pretend to answer these questions [of enclosure]. On p. 382 and in other places Mr. Tawney returns to the difficulty of ascertaining what effect legislation had upon enclosure. His table on p. 393 shows the amount of arable land as 29 per cent. greater in 1608 than in 1589!"

Enclosure was not, at all events, proceeding in the sixteenth century rapidly and without hindrance; the amount of land enclosed, whatever it may have been, was small compared with that affected by the enclosures of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, which were made for the purpose of increasing the area of arable land, and, since they tended to the reduction of the price of corn and the employment of more hired labour, were, therefore, opposed.

Other authorities (including Sir Robert Hunter in a paper read before the Statistical Society in June, 1897) consider that the effective and permanent enclosures made during the sixteenth century were of comparatively small extent, and it seems to be commonly agreed that but little progress was made in this direction in the seventeenth century.

In the 150 years that passed between the Agrarian Revolution of the Tudors and the commencement of the modern system of enclosure, the changes in the agriculture of the country were probably slight. That some enclosures took place from time to time was not unlikely.

It is, I think, fair to regard the time between the decline of the feudal system and the eighteenth-century enclosures as a period during which enclosure was intermittent, often subject to restoration, and to an important extent consisting of enclosure by peasants of the "lord's waste," by peasants of their own fields and woodland, or, even, as Mr. Tawney points out, by villages themselves of their community land. It was not one, may be one factor which counted for much in social changes of the seventeenth century, though of extreme importance as preparing the way for the large enclosures of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Researches even more recent than Mr. Tawney's would seem to indicate that the local government of the sixteenth century was strong enough to oppose effective resistance to Lords of the Manor and other magnates, especially when the policy of the central government was in harmony with the wishes of peasantry and yeomanry.

Yours, etc.,

E. M. G.

"SCOTS"

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

SIR,—Your correspondent, Mr. W. Mackay-Mackenzie (Athenæum, January 16, p. 90), has mistaken the purpose of my letter. I doubted not, and do not doubt, for a moment your critic's accuracy; and I am well aware that Douglas thought he wrote Scots. My contention was, and is, that the vernacular of the Scottish lowlands has no just right to the title of Scots. The original Scots was Gaelic, and the claim of Gaelic to that title is not to be regarded as invalidated by reasons of the pretensions indulged by a dialect of English which, whether or not it deserves the censure passed upon it by Digald Stewart, is certainly not Scots. The writings of Douglas, as those of Burns and others who used English as spoken in Scotland, belong to English literature. How, therefore, are they Scots?

Your servant to command,

R. ERSKINE of Murr.

THE TRANSLATION OF TCHEOV'S TALES

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

SIR,—In your issue of the 10th inst. you remark (p. 95) that vol. 7 of "The St. Martin's Library" edition of Tchekhov's tales. We are glad to be able to inform you that Mrs. Garnett is proceeding with her translation, and that the edition will be a complete one, comprising at least 12 volumes. Would you be so kind as to give this fact publicity in your columns?

Yours truly,

CHATTO & WINDUS.
Of the two volumes just added to the trustworthy, comely and cheap collection of "Medieval French Classics," one, and that the more important, will require further notice when its second part appears, but may be well recommended now. The "Chanson d'Aspremont" is neither one of the earliest nor one of the most famous of the chansons de geste. But it seems now to be put by the dates of such things earlier (twelfth century) than it used to be, and though its text, which is not yet been regularly edited, it has always been known to deal with an interesting part of the story—no less a one than the "dubbing" of Roland for saving his sovereign's life. The most interesting thing in the early part of the poem is the episode of Gerars d'Eufrate, the aged and "very stark," Lord of Burgundy, Auvergne, the Gévaudan, etc., and his wife Emmeline. Gerars is an exceedingly refractory vassal, if vassal he can be called, to "the son of the dwarf," as he designates Charlemagne; and he stoutly resists the invitation of Archbishop Turpin (his own relation) that he shall come to the Emperor's aid against the overwhelming hosts of the Saracen Agolant. But a little afterwards, as the old man, "full orgulous and proud," sits in his palace of the ancient days, Emmeline, sa soeur (sister), takes him to task. The ladies of the chansons, if they are not so prominent as those of the romances, fully justify the boast of their modern descendants that "la femme française est une personne." As girls they are sometimes slightly "coming" to their lovers (for instance, Bellicent, Charlemagne's own daughter, in "Amis et Amiles"), and sometimes rather fractious to others, as when Floripas (who, to be sure, was not a French princess, but a Saracen) in "Fierabras" calls her father "an old devil" because he will not be converted, and so stops her marriage. But in each case there is nothing "missish" about them. And when they are married, though they can be pattern wives in certain ways (as Bellicent herself to Amiles, and Orabile to Guillau d'Aupais), they keep their freedom of speech and behaviour. So Emmeline "of the proud visage" (the poet knew that and that "cortoise" were no contradiction) takes her formidable husband roundly and soundly to task. They have been married a hundred years, she says, and he has never ceased evading all the time. It is wonderful that God can put up with him. Here is all Christendom in jeopardy, and he will not do his duty. So he first confesses to her that he is longing to go, but will not help Charlemagne; and then capitulates altogether, gathers his men, joins the Emperor, and becomes the old hero, as Roland is the young one, of the great fight at Aspremont, south of Rome, having previously kissed Emmeline, beguiled her pardon if he has angered her, and sworn by sa grand barbe mélée (grizzled) that the Saracens have made a bad day for themselves. And so they had though it was a very tough business before it was settled, and looked very ugly for Christendom sometimes.

The fighting in the chansons was always charmingly delightful, but it has acquired new charms recently. One wonders, for instance, whether "Gerard of the Euphrates" (controversy on this point declined) would have enjoyed himself most at Le Cateau or at Esdraelon. With Allenby he would have been more at home in dealing with his old friends the Saracens; but with Smith-Dorrien he would have had the engine and quite Aspamendish joy of fighting against apparently hopeless odds. Also, if some of the persons who converse with shades nowadays would obtain his views on the League of Nations, it might be amusing. Meanwhile it may please some readers worth pleasing to finish with his observation when somebody comes and tells him that the Saracens are many enough "to eat the Christians up at one meal, if their flesh were cooked and salted":

Et dist Gerars: Ne l'ai pas redoro,
Francochevalier, ves la cose aprestee.
De Paradis est overtre l'entree;
Dex nos aplee en sa ioie honoree;
Or son venu a la sainte Hornone.
Cui Dex avara ici la mort donee
De tant bonne eure fu sa cars engenee.

(So Gerard said: "I have no fear about it. Fair knights, the matter is all ready. The entry of Paradise is open: God calls us to his honour and joy. Now we have come to the holy day; and if to any God shall have assigned death here, in a right good hour was his flesh engendered! ")

To which he adds, as a practical man, that if anybody does not thus attain bliss, but survives, there will be endless loot, and he himself, when they get home, will divide his treasure among them; give them the noblest girls in marriage, and everything else they can wish. Thereupon the men, being Burgundians, and practical likewise, merely bow, and observe laconically that "his people are quite ready to defend him at edge of sword. And then they go and do it.""Gautier d'Aupais" is more milk-and-water. It used to be called a fabliau, and belongs to the general class of romans d'aventures, but is now designated a roman courtois. Certainly the "adventure" is very mild, and the commentators seem chiefly to have confined themselves to discussing where "Aupais" is or was. The story simply tells how a young gentleman lost his property at play, how his father beat him, how he ran away, saw a young lady and fell in love with her; how he took service with her father, made love to her in rhyme, and gained her affection. She (most properly) tells her mother, who tells the father, who rather unexpectedly approves. So they are married, and the other father comes to the wedding, and they cry a good deal. But people in general eat "maint chapon a saise destrempee," and the last stanza of all is agreeably outspoken, requesting (with a Paternoster) that God and St. Vaas will grant to all lovers the same enjoyments as to Gautier and his love. The chief noteworthy thing about this piece is that if, contrary to the wont of its kind, it is in monothymed alexandrine lisses of irregular length, like a chanson.

GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

L'EXPERIENCE DU BONHEUR
MACAO ET COSMAGE. Par ed. Legrand. (Paris, Nouvelle Revue Francaise. 20fr.)

O BEAUTIFUL book! What would the art critics, whose rightful property you are, say about you? They would not say "O beautiful book! for they have the gift of words and can state with precision which of your pages are Illustrations and which Significant Forms. O fifty pages, each lovelier than its brother, so gorgeous in your colours, so moving in your theme that the beholder falls a-doting, and phrases of music come into his ear, and quotations from poetry to his lips! Your scene is an island—a kingless continent sinless as Eden, and no one lives upon it but Adam and Eve.

Qui pourrait dire comment Macao et Cosmage vinrent dans cette ile, comment la destinee put les unir? Personne! Ni toi, ni moi, nous ne les saurons jamais.

They have lived there as long as they can remember amongst birds and flowers; they have ridden giraffes and turtles, and danced in the shades and lights of the forest; they have played by the cataract at sunset; and at night, when all the island except its stars became azure, they have slept beneath plumed trees, while their innocence enclosed them in a shell of white light, in a magical fruit that gleamed in the highways of the darkness. New joys in the morning. By listening to the song of the birds Cosmages learned how to sing, and by watching their nests Macao learned how to build a house. They made a path through the wood, and found at the end of it the sea, and the sea opened her treasures to them—great fish that slithered, and scuttling crabs. Macao and Cosmage were not dignified, they had not the faked simplicity of Genesis or Greece, but he was chaste, like all truly good men, and she goggle-eyed and black. They neither toiled nor posed, nor did they give thanks.

And during a morning of that eternal spring they saw "une apparition inexpliquable" upon the blue and white of the sea. It was the Commandant Létambot and his jolly tars, who had been chasing the Boche. He landed on the island, exclaimed, "Quelle trouvaille!" and hoisted the tricolor upon a lofty palm. After many days he returned. The whole horizon was black with smoke this time. An immense fleet arrived, full of soldiers, colonists, officials, photographers, commercial travellers, botanists, electricians, policemen; and the Commandant made a speech in which he told the two inhabitants that their island's name was "L'Ile du Comte du Monde," and that he was bringing to it "le bonheur," happiness. Before long the giraffes were exterminated and the waterfalls diverted for industrial purposes; the trees were cut down, and a public garden installed where they had grown; the birds were chased by gallant airmen out of the sky; and the mountains were scorched with funiculars, and crowned with hotels for ladies and their dogs. Macao and Cosmage grew old. They could not find the happiness that they had been promised, they had lost the solitude that they loved, and they went upon the matter before the Governor, weeping. The Governor was a young and energetic man. He removed his cigar for a moment, and spoke over his shoulder to Macao and Cosmage as follows:

"I don't understand what you mean by work," replied Macao, "and I am too old to learn." However, he obtained permission to depart, together with Cosmage, and to seek out some corner which civilization had not yet blessed. They set out, followed by their faithful animals, and, having walked for many, many days, came to a place where the sky was not covered with smoke. It was a poor place compared to the home of their youth, but the trees, though scanty, were beautiful; the birds, though rare, still sang; and there was a little stream. Here they built a small house, and sitting on its doorstep, in extreme old age, they had the experience of happiness . . . .

O beautiful book! O wisest of books! What help do you bring after all? You only underline the inevitable. As the author remarks, "Enfant, Macao était un sage, mais le gouverneur avait raison." But your scarlet birds, your purple precipices and white ponds, are part of a dream from which humanity will never awake. In the heart of each man there is contrived, by desperate devices, a magical island such as yours. We place it in the past or the future for safety, for we dare not locate it in the present, because of the Commandant Létambot, who soars upon every sea. We call it a memory or a vision to lend a seductive solidly, but it is neither real, it is the outcome of our sadness, and of our disgust with the world that we have made.

E. M. F.

"MUOIONO GLI ALTRI DEI . . ."

H. OEVER great the debt an Englishman may owe to the Latin classics, they can never appeal to him with the intimacy they awaken in a cultivated Italian. One has only to live in a villa where the fountain spurs up from a Roman basin, or where the lower portions of a wall of a neighbour's cottage are of "opus reticulatum," which has stood in its place for nearly twenty centuries, to become acutely aware of the difference. It is evening on the farm on which G. Giacomo has settled, and together with the Hymn to the Virgin, those beautiful lines of Virgil rose spontaneously to the mind of this humble man—rose with the strength of the swell that rises on the sea as it heaves under the influence of the tide:

. . . jam summa procul villarum culmina fumant, maioresque cadunt alitis de montibus umbrae.

It is true that, if we are to understand the feeling that welded under and followed his whole life, we must add that it was not memory that called up these verses, but the very divinity of these Latin fields of ours, the silent, mystical majesty of the night that was drawing nigh which took possession of his mind and guided it to remember them.

Near the farm are two bushes of rosemary, once sacred to the Lares, now only used to season the fat capons of the household as they roast on the spit.

G. Giacomo has been brought up by the priests on the old lines when Romagna belonged to the States of the Church, and not far from the farm runs the Via Flaminia which traverses Rimini, where he was born and grew up with his father, the notary. The road keeps alive his interest in Livy to the day when our author resuscitates him from the grave where he has lain for three years to tell us his story.

G. Giacomo lived in the transition period. He witnessed the overthrow of Papal rule, the establishment of the Kingdom of Italy, the alarming increase in taxation, and the disappearance of all that he had been taught to hold sacred. The doctor, once a political exile in London, is all for the new world, sending his son to be educated away from home in the hope of seeing him a leader in it, whereas G. Giacomo has his boy brought up in the old way by the priests; and a fortunate legacy enables him to carry out his purpose of continuing the old life on the farm, with his open-handed hospitality and charity.

Signor Panzini tells us he had misgivings about reprinting this his first book, and it is not always easy to realize that it comes from the pen of one of the most polished stylists of modern Italy. Only occasionally do we find a trace of the delicate irony that has played through so many volumes of sketches and short stories. And in other ways a good deal of water has passed under the old Roman bridge outside Rimini since this book was written. Signor Panzini would be the first to smile at the rather crude debates between the doctor, the priest, and G. Giacomo on the changes of the day. Even more surprising is the sympathy with the simple, religious life of the village in a writer who has since learned to resign himself to most of what modern progress has brought with it to Italy. The last chapters bring us nearest to the Panzini we have learned to know. Yet even in his most modern work he never altogether forgets that . . .

Moisone gli altri dei; di Grecia i numi
Non sanno occaso.

This original MS. of Charles Lamb's "Disertation on Roast Pig," was sold in Philadelphia January 16 for $12,600 (nominally $2,820).
ANTON TCHEHOV
BIographers NOTE (1860-1887)

ANTON PAVLOVITCH TCHEHOV was born on Jan. 17, 1860, in Taganrog. His grandfather was a serf of Tchertkov’s, the father of that very same Tchertkov who, as a disciple of Tolstoy, is so well known abroad. In 1841, twenty years before the abolition of serfdom in Russia, Tchehov’s grandfather bought out his family of eight for 589, that is 56 per soul, with the eighth member, his daughter Aleksandra, thrown in gratis. At that time the family lived in the Voronezh government, but with the purchase of their freedom they moved to the Caucasus, where Tchehov’s grandfather became steward on the estates of Count Platov, a hero of 1812.

Tchehov’s father, Pavel Yegorovitch, was a gifted man. From early childhood he had a passion for music and singing. According to the family chronicles, a certain sexton taught him to sing from sight, and he also played the fiddle. At the age of sixteen, while he was apprentice at a sugar refinery, the owner, who considered him a very honest boy, sent him with a large sum of money to Moscow. He made the journey together with a large drove of cattle to be sold. In 1844 Tchehov’s father moved to Taganrog, where he became a clerk in an office. There he worked until 1857, when he opened a business of his own as a general merchant, giving it up in 1876, when he migrated to Moscow. As a merchant of the Second Guild of Taganrog he took an active part in the affairs of the city, and, to the detriment of his own business, gave himself to church singing, conducted the church choir, played the harpsichord, and even wrote a sonata. The son of John Chrysostomus painted by him is still in existence, and is in Anton Tchehov’s study in his house in Yalta.

Yevguenya Morozov, Anton’s mother, was the daughter of a very intelligent cloth merchant who travelled all over Russia with his goods, and settled finally in Taganrog. There she married in 1854. Her father was received in the best society, and Taganrog was famous for its music. The mother used to tell her children stories about the journeys she had made as a child all over Russia with her father. All her children, Anton especially, loved to listen to these stories. She had a quiet, gentle manner, which he was considered to have inherited from her.

Through the insistence of his wife, Anton’s father wished his children to have a good education and made inquiries abroad. The eldest boys, the step-sons of the Greeks personified with him, send Anton to the Greek school, but it turned out to be unsatisfactory and he was transferred to the local gymnasium. As was the case with many families of that day, the life of the Tchehovs was quite patriarchal. The father was strict and exacting, but this did not prevent them from all living in the greatest friendship. The day began and ended with work. All got up early. The boys (Anton had four brothers and one sister) went to school, came home, learned their lessons, and in spare moments each occupied himself with some hobby. The eldest brother, Alexander, made electric batteries, Nicolay drew, Ivan bound books, and Anton made up stories. In the evenings, when the father was home, they all sang together, and he and Nicolay played the violin.

The mother, tender and loving, was for ever looking after them all. Even as a young woman her life was devoted to her children. Hating serfdom, she insisted in them a hatred of its injustice and wretchedness; and she taught them to love and respect not only all who were their inferiors, but birds and animals and all defenceless creatures. Tchehov used to say to his friends in later years: “We inherited our talent from father, but mother gave us a soul.”

A Frenchman taught the children languages, a music teacher taught them to play the piano. And their life, unusual at that time, passed like the life of any middle-class Russian family of to-day. The peculiar trait was singing and household prayers. Every Saturday evening the whole family went together, and he and Nicolay played church, singing at home. Returning from Sunday evening service, the family again sang in chorus. The father arranged a regular choir with his children, and sang with them in the church of the local castle (in which Alexander I. lived, and died in 1825). Service here was held only in Passion Week, on the first day of Easter, Ascension Day, and Whit Sunday. There Tchehov got to know all the church services and to sing with his brothers.

In the middle of the seventies of last century the economic life of Taganrog began to decline, owing to a new railway line connecting Rostov with Moscow. Tchehov’s family fortunes declined with it. This was attributed partly to the father’s interest in public affairs, his frequenting churches and his being away from business a great deal. At times he would send his children to his shop to keep a master’s eye on them. When this happened the children enjoyed undreamed of pleasures. They spent whole days at the sea, fishing; played all sorts of games, went to their grandfather’s village, walked in the park, arranged theatricals. In spite of the comparative strictness of the family régime all the Tchehov boys, outside the sphere of their immediate duties, enjoyed the greatest freedom.

Anton was a healthy, large-browed, lively, agile boy, with an inexhaustible fund of tricks and pranks. He was the most gifted of the brothers in providing amusements for the family, and would mimic and imitate their friends in the form of a scene from a play. In home theatricals he was the leading spirit. One of his favourite improvisations was a scene in which the Chief of Police arrives at a parade in the cathedral, and stands in the middle of the church on a carpet surrounded by foreign ambassadors. And has declared the governor. In his school uniform, with an old-fashioned sabre strapped across his shoulder, he gave a clever imitation of the behaviour of the governor and held a military review of the Cossacks. The eldest brother, Alexander, played no more in theatricals by that time, and in 1875 he left Taganrog for Moscow and never returned back to his family. He took with him Nicolay, the next oldest brother. So there remained only Ivan, Marie, Michael, and Anton, who was now considered the eldest. They lived together thus until almost the middle of the nineties.

After the two elder brothers left for Moscow, the father’s business collapsed quickly. He no longer took part in municipal elections, his choir came to an end. The family now knew poverty; but in the evenings Anton would still amuse them with his improvisations, or the mother would tell of her early years in the caravan, or of how the allies bombarded Taganrog, or of the hardships of the peasants under serfdom.

In 1876 the father gave up business. His house was sold at auction by his creditors, and the furniture removed by one of them. The father went to Moscow to look for work, leaving the family penniless. The two youngest boys were sent off temporarily to their grandfather, and Anton, as the eldest of the family, had to help them all. In a few months his mother and sister Marie left Taganrog for Moscow, where were the father, Alexander (at the University) and Nicolay (at the Academy of Painting and Sculpture). In the spring of 1876 Anton was left in Taganrog alone. He had to earn his living by giving lessons, and thus he continued for nearly three years until he finished the gymnasium at the age of nineteen.

Very little is known of these three years of Tchehov’s life. He passed them in the house of the man who had bought their old home, and tutored the man’s cousin. He used to visit his pupil’s country house, drive across the steppe, hunt and frequent the mines. It was during that time that Anton grew to know the steppe and its life. When a boy of eighteen and nineteen he thoroughly enjoyed flirting with schoolgirl friends, with his legal affairs, as he related them to his brother Michael, were always full of gaiety. He went to the theatre a great deal; he enjoyed farces and French melodramas and “Hamlet.” And the novels and stories of Victor Hugo, Spieglatori, and Georg Born greatly impressed him. At eighteen he wrote a play “Fatherless” and a very funny farce about people who went to Moscow. In Moscow, Michael relates that when Anton came to Moscow he tore the play up, but kept the one-act piece. While at the Taganrog gymnasium he edited a journal, The Stammerer, especially written for his elder brothers and sent to them at Moscow.

(To be continued.)
List of New Books
Prepared in co-operation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding with the Dewey Decimal System, the sub-classes being indicated for the benefit of librarians and others familiar with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. The first numeral in these represents the main class, the second one of the subdivisions, and so on.

Those works in the List which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

GENERAL WORKS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY, ENCYCLOPEDIAS, MAGAZINES, &c.
Dr. Rendel Harris deals with metrical fragments in 3 Macadam, and Professor Tout with medieval forgeries. A characteristic paper by Dr. W. H. R. Rivers is on "Mind and Medicine." Dr. Bruton's centenary paper on the Peterloo affair we have noticed already. Professor Elliot Smith pursues his special branch of mythology and folk-lore in a long paper on "Dragons and Rain Gods." There are the usual notes and shorter articles.

100 PHILOSOPHY.

The psychology of the future, as here described, is remarkably like the animal magnetism and Odic force of the early part of last century.

In this little book the author confines herself for the most part to statements so incontrovertible that they bear a dangerous resemblance to commonplace. She progresses from the ether to life after death, taking in the stars, man and religion on the way. She seems to have a liking for vague quotations. Her book provides what should be the irreducible minimum of information on which to base an outlook on life.

A little book inciting young men to train their mind and will in order to attain success in life. Such necessary preliminaries to success as attention, concentration, observation, are elucidated in a pleasant, talkative style. Christianity is described as the coping-stone of true training.

For two years and a half a prisoner of war in Turkey, the author devoted nearly half of that period to the writing of this work. If, perhaps, somewhat premature as a presentment of philosophy, the book is at all events an essay at the expression of a young man's "positive assurance in the value of man as a real creator." Beginning with negations, the author advances by degrees to the conclusions that there is "more in life than mechanism, and more in reason than intellect"; that intellect is "so formed as to grasp mechanism wholly"; and that reason is formed to reflect life wholly and to find for life a purpose which is not yet palpable, though psychologically evident."

200 RELIGION.

These sermons and addresses, like most published utterances over the signature "A. F. London," are very readable; they include several specially striking and thoughtful pronouncements. The sermon "A New Earth," preached on Ash Wednesday, 1919, and "Help in the Last Days" for Confidence in the Future," preached in St. Paul's on Easter Day last, are fine deliverances, in which the bishop shows a keenly sympathetic realization of some of the crying needs of the time.

The Rev. C. A. Skinner's book, which has a foreword by the Regius Professor of Hebrew at Cambridge, is an endeavour to interpret, in theory, the "personal experience of many souls, that the more one knows God, the less does he want to ask for things." Prayer, says the author, is dominated and determined by the conception of the divine Fatherhood. The fourth section of the book is devoted to suggestions "with respect to certain apparent obstacles" to the author's theory.

300 SOCIOLOGY.

*Keynes (John Maynard). THE ECONOMIC CONSEQUENCES OF THE PEACE. Macmillan, 1919. 9 in. 287 pp. 8,6 n. 390.4
See review, p. 105.

Rather mild applications of Freudian theories, which may perhaps be of some use.

*The Round Table: a quarterly review of the politics of the British Commonwealth. Macmillan, December, 1919. 9 in. 219 pp. paper, 2/6 n. 305

"The price of liberty is eternal vigilance." Under this text from Mr. Lloyd George, the first article in the present number reviews the conditions under which responsible government is to be secured at home and external to the countries now lying at the mercy of the Powers. Slavery played its part in the progress of civilization by providing a motive for saving the defeated from wholesale slaughter. Absolute government laid the foundations of the national States, without which freedom on the large scale could never have been achieved. In like manner the industrial regeneration of society under the capitalist system has made possible a free and altruistic economic organization. Devolution, Indian reform, self-government for the liberated countries in the Middle East—these are the problems now calling for earnest and unselfish consideration. In the second article, one of the common reconstructions, the mistake of a year ago in losing control of the economic machinery of Europe is pointed out. The urgent needs now are to provide food supplies for Central Europe and the Near East, to set the Reparation Committee to work and furnish credit to Germany and Austria, and to regulate currency. A long article on the Railway Strike deals with the history of the situation during the last thirteen years. A threefold study of the "Outlook in the Middle East" is marked "Communicated." There follow an appreciation of General Botha, and reviews of affairs in the United Kingdom, India, Canada, Australia, South Africa and New Zealand.

500 NATURAL SCIENCE.

The author pleasantly discourses upon the characters, life-histories, and customs of a considerable number of insects, including the Coleoptera, of which the stag-beetle is the first example given; the Orthoptera, not omitting the much maligned earwig; the Neuroptera, a representative of which is the dragon-fly; and other winged insects. The wingless insects, or Aptera, comprise a group of organisms, most of which, though of scientific interest, from the ordinary human social point of view "never would be missed." The book is well illustrated.
600 USEFUL ARTS.

*Stevens (Thomas George). Diseases of Women. Univ. of London Press, 1919. 9 in. 489 pp. il., index, 20/ n. 618.1

The second edition of this useful work, thoroughly revised and entirely reset.

Winn (Wren). Timbers and Their Uses: a handbook for woodworkers, merchants, and all interested in the conversion and use of timber. Routledge, 1919. 9 in. 355 pp. bibliog. index, 10/6 n. 774.7

As a compendium of information this will be of value to timber merchants, though the matter is fairly old, except as regards new timbers recently imported. Chapter VI., dealing with available sources of supply, is good, and also Chapter VII., on the formation of wood, though it is rather elementary in comparison with recent papers on the subject.

700 FINE ARTS.

See review, p. 122.

An architectural history of Belgian churches arouses mixed feelings to-day, and it is to be wished that Mr. Randolph had given more definite information as to which of the buildings or parts of buildings described here stand intact. His book is technical, but not too much so for the general reader; he deals with the history of the churches and their historical associations only, as a rule, so far as light is thrown thereby on the history of the fabric or the development of the art. The book would have been before the war an invaluable guide; parts are now, alas! ancient history; but it is still useful to have this outline conception of the whole subject. Many of the illustrations are satisfactory, though the reproduction is coarse and muddy.

780 MUSIC.

See review, p. 118. 782.6

800 LITERATURE.

 Cotterill (Erica). An Account through Letters: 5. Chelsea, printed by J. B. Shears, 64, Sydney Street, S.W.3 [1919]. 9 in. 147 pp. 824.9

These papers, in which are to be found numerous ideas strikingly presented, a large measure of introspective psychology, and much by way of protest against taboos and conventions, deserve careful reading; but close study is necessary to make clear the author’s meanings, and the main orientation of the thoughts presented in the essays.

Dunsany (Lord). Unhappy Far-Off Things. Elkin Mathews, 1919. 8 in. 95 pp., 5/ n. 824.9

Word-pictures of devastated France. To the reader, and perhaps to the writer also, the cleverness of these descriptions is much more vivid than the scenes described—which is another way of saying that the descriptions are not quite clever enough. There are certain subjects which, for the professional man of letters, to touch is to invite a fall. We fear this book will appeal less to the lovers of France than to the lovers of literary technique.

Massingham (H. J.). Letters to X. Constable, 1919. 8 in. 306 pp., 6/ n. 824.9

See review, p. 110.

In her introduction to this edition of the "Menenchi" Miss Knight has included a useful summary of Latin metres. The notes are fairly full, and are intended for the use of boys in the upper forms of schools or for undergraduates.

Ritchie (Anne, Lady). From Friend to Friend. Murray, 1919. 8 in. 169 pp., 6/ n. 824.9

This collection of essays, containing recollections of Browning, the Kemble family, etc., travel sketches from France and the Rome of 1853, and letters of W. M. Thackeray, is the last work from the pen of Thackeray’s daughter.

"Conversations," as the author rightly thinks, would describe these pieces better than the word "Essays." In almost every case the subject taken is a book or something suggested by a book. Particularly interesting is the paper on "The Passing of a Great Publishing House," i.e., Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co.

POETRY.

See review, p. 122.

Mr. Earp is so highly accomplished and his taste is so faultless that it is often difficult at first reading to be quite sure whether a poem is the expression of an urgent emotion or whether it has been produced by some sort of literary conjuring trick—a fine rabbit, all alive, materialized out of the empty hat. The genuine emotion would seem to be a melancholy quietism, which expresses itself here and there in line and moving lines. But for the most part his poems strike one as the apotheosis of vers de société.

See review, p. 122.

Lea (Donald H.). Dioné: A Spring Medley. Birmingham, Cornish Brothers, 1919. 7½ in. 35 pp., 3/6 n. 821.9

Mr. Lea's verses come out with a pleasant gush of sound and imagery, liquid and swift flowing, but not too facile, not empty of significance. "Dioné"—the poem is a kind of philosophy of beauty—contains many interesting passages. We quote a specimen:

If ought there be around us here that's real, Most real our dreams that come, all unawares, Of mind or memory, waked by single notes— An apt word, a wandering scent—the tang Of brine, wood-smoke and bracken in the sun; Or gorge her pale, dilute, unwonted scent.

Lea (Donald H.). A Number of Things in Verse. Birmingham, Cornish Brothers, 1919. 7½ in. 93 pp., 4/6 n. 821.9

In this volume Mr. Lea's facility is sometimes his undoing. He is apt to " rhyme and rattle " for the mere reason that rhyning and rattling come easy to him. "One Day in March," a poem inspired by the sight of a rabbit in a trap, is perhaps the best thing in the book.

Bishop White writes with the vigorous energy of one who has no time to dwell on the problems of exquisite expression. Nevertheless, every now and then he lights on things that are simply felicities. Of the three sections into which the book is divided—" Nature," "Man" and "God"—the first is, perhaps, poetically the best. "Man" contains a number of poems on Australia written during and before the war.
FICTION.

Gould (Nat.). RACING RIVALS. Long [1920]. 6½ in. 252 pp., 1/6 n.

The rivals are half-brothers, both having inherited from their father a love of racing. The story is told in the author's usual breezy style.

A collection of pleasant, leisurely, quaint stories about old worthies of Cambridge University. The stories are well told and the supernatural atmosphere, while it does not produce a frisson, nevertheless heightens the charm of the stories. The volume is beautifully printed.

Hornung (E. W.). FATHERS OF MEN. Murray, 1919. 7 in. 306 pp., 2/ n.

Merritt (A). THE MOON POOL. Putnam, 1919. 8 in. 443 pp. front., 7/n. 813.5

Discoveries upon ruin-covered islets in the Pacific Ocean lead the chief personages in this story into a series of super-normal experiences and adventures, many of which are represented as capable of scientific explanation. Radio-activity is brought into play. The author's descriptions of the underground world and its inhabitants show considerable imaginative power. Though admittedly fictitious, the narrative is much more convincing than are most of the so-called "messages in spiritist literature professing to describe what is on the other side." Mr. Merritt's novel is very well worth reading.

Panzini (Alfredo). IL LIBRO DEI MORTI; ROMANZO. Roma, "La Voce," Trinità Monti, 18 [1919]. 8 in. 165 pp. paper, 4 lire. 853.9

See review, p. 123.

Sharp (Evelyn). SOMEWHERE IN CHRISTENDOM. Allen & Unwin [1919]. 7½ in. 256 pp. paper 5/n., cl. 6/6 n.

There is a revolution in the neutral state of Ethiopia, and a prophetess arises who predicts the birth of a child destined to found the new religion of universal brotherhood. The prophetess gains over the King and Queen of Ethiopia to her views, and they resign their powers and privileges. The people are taught to start by setting up an Idea; and events gradually come about as the seer has foretold. The attempts of two neighbouring powers to go to war, at the instigation of a newspaper proprietor professing immense influence, are frustrated; and the story embodies a good deal of the humour characteristic of much of the author's work.

Malaria, elephantiasis, and other ills of the flesh are very prominent in this picture of the life led by Europeans in a particularly unhealthy region of tropical Africa. One of the principal characters, a brave doctor, succumbs to sleeping sickness; and from beginning to end of the book there is a somewhat depressing insistence upon the gloomier aspects of a sojourn in a tsetse-infested river valley.

Tight (Harry). DAY DAWN. Westall [1919]. 7½ in. 309 pp., 6/n.

A story dealing with reincarnation and the like. Denis O'Farrel becomes acquainted with Lucy Moore, who gives him a letter from her dead mother, stating that Denis's father and herself loved a "previous life," and married, that Denis is their child, and that he is to help Lucy—in whom there is no blood of Denis's family. Lucy needs help, for she is under the influence of a mysterious Egyptian.

Iris Iraiovna, a beautiful Russian who has been divorced from her husband after nearly killing him in a fit of temper, comes to London and settles down in suburbia shortly before the war breaks out. Mr. Turner has a clever pen, and the fluttering of the dovecotes caused by Iris's unconventionality gives him scope for a number of incisive character-sketces. One of the best of these is the large-minded vicar, who may fairly be described as the hero of the piece. Mr. Turner is to be congratulated on the keenness of his observation as well as the liveliness of his style.

910 GEOGRAPHY, TOPOGRAPHY, ANTIQUITIES, &c.

Lloyd (Ll.) and others. CHINESE PIE: STORIES AND ARTICLES BY PEOPLE WHO HAVE LIVED IN CHINA. Church Missionary Society [1919]. 7½ in. 62 pp. ill. paper, 1/n. 915.1

The authors and artists responsible for the production of this little book have managed to convey a great deal of picturesque information about Chinese life and habits. The C.M.S. is to be congratulated on making its propaganda so readable.

Quennell (Marjorie and C. H. B.). A HISTORY OF EVERYDAY THINGS IN ENGLAND. Done in two parts, of which this is the second, 1500-1799. Written and illustrated by Marjorie and C. H. B. Quennell. Batsford [1919]. 9½ in. 208 pp. il. bibliog. gloss. index, 8/6 n. 913.42

The second part of the authors' carefully thought-out scheme to provide "a background for school history lessons." A knowledge of the architecture, costume and the costumes of the different periods is exceedingly helpful to young students, who will find in the book much information about the churches, houses, furniture, libraries, dress, armour, weapons, games, sports, etc., of our ancestors during each of the centuries under consideration. The first part was favourably noticed in The Athenæum for December, 1918, p. 525.

920 BIOGRAPHY.

Ellicombe (Henry Nicholson).

A pleasing account of a vigorous and charming personality. Canon Ellicombe was an enthusiastic gardener. To the end he maintained close relations with Kew, and a regular exchange of plants took place for years. Bitton undoubtedly became one of the most famous smaller gardens in the West of England, and its lovable owner was never tired of showing its beauties to friends or strangers.

See review p. 109.

930-990 HISTORY.

Allen (W. E. D.). THE TURKS IN EUROPE: a sketch-study. Murray, 1919. 9 in. 268 pp. maps, index, 10/6 n. 949.6

See review last week, p. 73.

An impartial study of the political and economic situation of Germany and her resources and prospects. The author follows closely the internal events since the Armistice, and has had interviews with representatives of the different classes and parties, which bring out their various views and intentions, and throw light on a very complex problem.

940.9 THE GREAT EUROPEAN WAR.

Adam (H. Pearl). PARIS SEES IT THROUGH: A DIARY. 1914-1919. Hodder & Stoughton, 1919. 9 in. 347 pp. il. por. app., 15/n. 946.9

Many of the diaries, and some of the sayings, of the Parisian "Mr. Britling" are presented in a spirited and readable fashion by the author of this diary of life in the French capital from August, 1914, to the period when the Peace Treaty was signed at Versailles. Included in the book are descriptions of the demeans of the Parisians at the time of the air raids and long-range bombardments.

Reynolds (Henry Birch). MESOPOTAMIA, 1914-15: extracts from a regimental officer's diary. Methrose, 1918. 9 in. 284 pp. il. maps, 9/n. 940.9

The modest sub-title gives an inadequate idea of the scope of Captain Reynolds's book. He not only describes the successive steps which led to General Townshend's capture of Kut in September, 1915, and his part in the battle of Ctesiphon, but also provides a series of sketches and plans of the various battles. There is much to interest the purely civilian reader, for Captain Reynolds has a good deal to say about the early history of Mesopotamia, gives many photographs of present-day conditions, and cites some noteworthy instances of the confidence shown by the natives in British rule.
CONSTABLE
Have recently published Two Important

BIOGRAPHIES:

SIR VICTOR HORSLEY

PASTEUR
A new edition of the famous Life, by Rene Vallery Radot, translated by Mrs. R. L. Devonshire, and with an introduction by the late Sir William Osler, Bart., M.D., F.R.S. 10s. 6d. net.

Also an extraordinary record of war prophecy in

AUTOMATIC WRITING:

THE HILL OF VISION
By F. Bligh Bond. 7s. 6d. net.

Also some books that record incidents of

THE WORLD WAR:

HOW JERUSALEM WAS WON
The record of Allenby's campaign in Palestine. By W. T. Massey, Official Correspondent of the London newspapers with the Egyptian Expeditionary Force. Illustrated. 21s. net.

THE ROMANCE OF THE BATTLE-LINE IN FRANCE
By J. E. C. Bodley, who is described by the "Morning Post" as "our greatest living authority on French history." 7s. 6d. net.

THE NAVY EVERYWHERE
By Conrad Catro, Author of "The Navy in Mesopotamia." Maps. 10s. 6d. net.

Also NEW FICTION thus:

THE FOUR HORSEMAN (4th Imp.) By V. B. Ibanez
THE BRANDING IRON. By Katharine Newlin Burt
HEARTS HAVEN. By Clara Louise Burnham
THE OUTLAW By Maurice Hewlett
THE LAIRD OF GLENFERNIE. By Mary Johnston
THE STRONG HOURS. By Maud Diver

10-12, ORANGE STREET, LONDON, W.C. 2

Traffic congestion

THE congestion of traffic in our large towns and cities is becoming a very serious matter. Thousands of business and professional people, whose time is money, are daily forced to spend valuable hours waiting for the vehicle in front to move on.

To save this gross waste of valuable time the traffic must be speeded up and slow-moving vehicles will have to go.

The most cumbersome traffic-obstructing contrivance of to-day is the coal-waggon which carries the coal from the railway siding to the house of the consumer.

The burning of crude coal in our houses is entirely unnecessary; its essence—gas—can be conveyed direct by means of underground pipes.

It is a cleaner, more efficient and in every way more desirable form of fuel, therefore—

USE GAS

For information as to the best means of utilising gas fuel, write to the Secretary,

THE BRITISH COMMERCIAL GAS ASSOCIATION

47 Victoria Street, Westminster, S.W.1.
"The Romance of Madame Tussaud’s"

BY JOHN THEODORE TUSSAUD.

"The Most Fascinating Book for 50 Years."

This is a book that everyone will read and treasure, and for which every bookshelf will be the richer. It is full of interest and strange fascination, of unexpected sidelights on history and of flashes of wit and humour.

The Press is unanimous in praise of this remarkable work which is everywhere hailed as one of the most striking achievements in publishing history.

32 full page Original Illustrations. 2s. net. Handsomely bound in cloth gilt.

Odhams' A.B.C. of the Great War

Compiled and Edited by E. M. COLEBROOK. 6s. net.

A wonderful book of War Records: names of People and Places; Warships, Regiments and Battles; Air Raid Casualties, etc. A lasting work of reference. Educational and of absorbing interest.

ODHAMS, LTD., 39, King Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.2.

"THE AUCTION OF SOULS"

The Book from which the Albert Hall Film Has Been Taken.

The amazing true story of Aurora Mardiganian, the Christian girl who survived the terrible Armenian massacres. This is the book, first published in America as "Ravished Armenia," from which the much-discussed film, now being shown at the Albert Hall, has been taken under the auspices of the League of Nations Union. It is an undying historical document which exposes for all time the ferocious sufferings inflicted on the peace-loving Armenians.

Strongly bound Cloth. 2s. net. Portrait wrapper.

NOVELS BY FAMOUS AUTHORS.

IN THE PRESS. READY SHORTLY.

THE MARBECK INN. HAROLD BRIDGEMODE. 7s. 6d. net.

THE INNER CIRCLE. PERCY FENTALL. 7s. 6d. net.

THE WARD OF NAVARRE. MORICE GERARD. 7s. 6d. net.

THE STAR OF DESTINY. H. M. F. CAMPBELL. 7s. 6d. net.

THE BOND THAT HELD. KATE EVEREST. 7s. 6d. net.

FLAMES ON THE BOSPORUS. LEO MOFFA. 7s. 6d. net.

THE Furnace. "P.A.T." 7s. 6d. net.

THE DWELLER IN THE HALF-LIGHT. ROGER Wray. 7s. 6d. net.

JUST OPEN. W. PITT RUDGE. 7s. 6d. net.

POLLYDOOLYDANCES. EDGAR JEPSON. 7s. 6d. net.

NOW READY.

THE LOUDWATER MYSTERY. EDGAR JEPSON. 7s. 6d. net.

THE CROWNING OF ESTHER. MORICE GERARD. 7s. 6d. net.

THE WIFE WHOSE GOD FORGOT. THEODORE M. W. 7s. 6d. net.

GLORY OF LOVE. "P.A.T." 7s. 6d. net.

THE FORBIDDEN WORD. WILLIAM LE ORTELL. 7s. 6d. net.

BLUE PETER. PAUL TRENT. 3s. 6d. net.
Appointments Vacant

UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH.
LECTURESHIP IN ITALIAN.

THE UNIVERSITY COURT will shortly proceed to appoint a LECTURER on ITALIAN LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE, and they invite applications.

The tenure of the Lectureship will be for a period of five years, with eligibility for re-appointment or for such shorter period as may be arranged.

The salary is £400 per annum, rising by annual increments of £10 to £50 per annum.

The appointment will run from the commencement of the next academic year on October 1, 1920.

Applicants are requested to send fourteen copies of their letter of application, with any testimonials they may desire to submit, to the Secretary to the University, before the end of March. - WILLIAM WILSON, Secretary to the University.

UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH.
CHAIR OF FORESTRY.

THE UNIVERSITY COURT will shortly proceed to appoint a PROFESSOR to the newly-instituted CHAIR OF FORESTRY at a salary of £1,200 per annum, and they invite applications.

The appointment will run from the commencement of next academic year on October 1, 1920.

Applicants are requested to send fourteen copies of their letter of application, with any testimonials they may desire to submit, to the Secretary to the University, before the end of March. - WILLIAM WILSON, Secretary to the University.

THE COMMITTEE OF EDGE HILL TRAINING COLLEGE will proceed to elect a PRINCIPAL in the Spring Term, 1920. The selected candidate will be expected to enter on her duties September 1, 1920.

Applications from candidates for this office should be addressed not later than February 14, 1920, to—

F. STANLEY MORRIS,
Secretary,
Edge Hill Training College,
41, North John Street,
Liverpool.
From whom information as to the duties and emoluments of the Principal may be obtained.

HULL MUNICIPAL TRAINING COLLEGE.

WANTED after Easter, a WOMAN LECTURER in GEOGRAPHY. Particulars may be obtained from the PRINCIPAL, to whom applications should be sent not later than February 21, 1920.

COUNTY BOROUGH OF STOKE-ON-TRENT EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

HANLEY SECONDARY SCHOOL.

WANTED.

1. ASSISTANT MISTRESS with good qualifications in Geography, ability to assist in some other subject will be a recommendation. Salary £160—£300, according to scale. Teaching experience essential.

2. ASSISTANT MISTRESS to teach Latin and some Elementary Mathematics to the Girls. Teaching experience and qualifications will be taken into consideration in fixing the initial salary £160—£300.

Forms of application (which should be returned duly filled up as soon as possible) may be obtained on receipt of stamped addressed foolscap envelope from

DR. W. LUDFORD FREEMAN,
Director of Education,
Town Hall,
Hanley.

January 13, 1920.

Appointments Vacant

DENBIGHSHIRE EDUCATION AUTHORITY.
RUABON COUNTY INTERMEDIATE BOYS' SCHOOL.

APPLICATIONS are hereby invited for the POST of HEADMASTER of the above School.

The Headmaster will receive a fixed stipend of £180 per annum, and a Capitation payment for each Scholar in the School calculated on such a scale, uniform or graduated, as may be fixed from time to time by the School Governors, at the rate of not less than £1 10s. nor more than £3 a year, but in no case shall the salary be less than £500 per annum.

The Headmaster will also be provided with a house free of rent, rates, and taxes.

Candidates must be Graduates in Honours of a British University, and a knowledge of Welsh is desirable.

The person appointed will be required to carry out, and be subject to, the provisions of the Denbighshire Intermediate and Technical Education Scheme No. 11 and any amendment thereof which may be hereafter made so far as the same relates to the Ruabon County Intermediate School.

Candidates who desire the receipt of their application to be acknowledged should enclose a stamped addressed post card.

Canvassing disqualifies.

Applications endorsed "Headmaster Ruabon County School," accompanied by copies of three recent testimonials must reach the undersigned on or before March 13, 1920—10 copies of the form of application and of the testimonials to be sent by each Candidate.

J. C. DAVIES, M.A.,
Secretary and Director of Education.
Education Offices, Ruthin.

DENBIGHSHIRE EDUCATION AUTHORITY.
COLWYN BAY COUNTY SCHOOL.

APPLICATIONS are hereby invited for the POST of HEADMASTER of the above School, the duties to commence in September, 1920.

Commencing salary £550 per annum.

Candidates must be Graduates in Honours of a British University, and a knowledge of Welsh is desirable.

Candidates who desire the receipt of their application to be acknowledged should enclose a stamped addressed post card.

Canvassing disqualifies.

Applications endorsed "Headmaster Colwyn Bay County School," accompanied by copies of three recent testimonials must reach the undersigned on or before March 13, 1920—10 copies of the form of application and of the testimonials to be sent by each Candidate.

J. C. DAVIES, M.A.,
Secretary and Director of Education.
Education Offices, Ruthin.

DERBY TECHNICAL COLLEGE.

APPLICATIONS are invited for the POSITION of

(1) LECTURER IN PURE AND APPLIED MATHEMATICS. Commencing salary £350 to £400.

(2) ASSISTANT LECTURER IN MATHEMATICS. Commencing salary £250 to £300.

(3) ASSISTANT LECTURER IN CHEMISTRY. Commencing salary £250 to £300.

Forms of application may be obtained from the Principal.

FRANK C. SMITHARD,
Secretary to the Derby Education Committee.

January 21, 1920.

LIVERPOOL EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

CITY SCHOOL OF ART.

AN ASSISTANT MASTER is wanted in the Life Department of the above School. Salary £250 per annum, together with war bonus according to the scale of the City Council, which at present amounts to £400 per annum plus 30 per cent. of the salary. Particulars and forms may be obtained from the Director of Education, Education Offices, Sir Thomas Street, Liverpool, to whom application must be sent not later than February 4th.

E. R. PICKMORE
Town Clerk

ENTHUSIAST wanted as ORGANISING SECRETARY to a Society with limited funds seeking to establish a higher standard of quality and design in articles of everyday use.

For Appointments Wanted and Miscellaneous Ads. see page 159.
THE ALPHABET OF INVESTMENT

BY

C. R. STILES, F.S.S., F.R.G.S.

With an Introductory Note

BY

ELLIS T. POWELL, LL.B., D.Sc.,

Author of "The Evolution of the Money Market."

Price 3/- Nett.

Demy Octavo.

PRESS OPINIONS.

"Mr. C. R. Stiles has dealt very thoroughly with the question of wealth, capital and investment... Some really valuable advice and instruction to investors is given." — Liverpool Courier.

"It enables the reader to assimilate the maximum of information in the minimum of time—which is no small recommendation nowadays." — The Financial News.

"Mr. Stiles has successfully accomplished the task of elucidating the methods of investment so as to make them comprehensible to the man in the street." — Aberdeen Daily Journal.

"Mr. Stiles’ work is useful, not to warn the public of rotten stocks; nothing will do that—but providing safe rules of how to invest and what to expect in reason." — Syren and Shipping.

MR. ARNOLD WRIGHT, reviewing the book, says:

"In the years which lie ahead this book will have a special value... The investor need not greatly fear anything that is coming, provided he keeps his head and follows implicitly Mr. Stiles injunctions. Mr. Stiles will not have written in vain if he is able by his timely contribution to financial literature to keep the attention of investors on things that really matter, and induce them to follow sound principles in the anxious time that lies ahead."

CONTENTS.

Chapter I.—On Wealth, Capital and Investment.
II.—The Investment of Capital.
III.—On Investment Securities.
IV.— (continued).
V.—Dealings in Stocks and Shares.
VI.—The Simple Arithmetic of Investment.
VII.—Book-keeping for Investors.
VIII.—The Precepts of Successful Investment.

THE FINANCIAL REVIEW OF REVIEWS

6, GRAFTON STREET, NEW BOND STREET, LONDON, W.1.
The Athenæum
January 30, 1920

Oxford University Press

The Oxford Prose Library.
Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.
The following volumes are now obtainable in this series—Andersen's Fairy Tales; A Turkish Night's Entertainments; Mme. de Staël's Corinne; Zoffany's Johnson (2 vols.); Byron's Pilgrims' Progress; Caxton's John Hallifax, Gentilman; Crosse's Fifty Descendent Battles of the World; Debor's Robinson Crusoe; Keats's La Belle Hebe and other Essays; Plays; and Vicar of Wakefield; Gramm's Popular Stories; Harte's Stories and Poems; Hawthorne's Wonder Book, etc.; Kingsley: Hereward and Other Tales; Wake, Hyppia, Westward Ho.; Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare; Lockhart's History of Napoleon Bonaparte, Lyttelton: The Last of the Romans; Norman and Kingdom; Apologia, and Pamphlets; Sheridan's Dramatic Works; Southey's Life of Nelson; Stebbing's Five Centuries of English Verse (Essays) (2 vols.); Scott; Thackeray. Other works in preparation.

The Direction of Desire.
Suggestions for the application of Psychology to Everyday Life. By STANLEY M. BILGHE. Fourth Impression. Pott 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

Immediate Experience and Mediation.
By ANTHONY LAMBTON. Medium 8vo. 15s. 6d. net.

The Oxford History of India.
From the Earliest Times to the end of 1811. By VINCENT A. SMITH, M.A., with 127 Illustrations and 21 Maps. Crown 8vo. 12s. 6d. net; Englishman, Calculus. "Never before have so many carefully-sifted historical and other facts in relation to India been brought together in a single volume at once so readable, and, with the help of Index and long type 'pointers,' so readily referred to. The History really does fulfil a long-felt want." 1

A History of the Sikhs.
From the Origins of the Race to the Battle of the Seduj. By J. D. C. RAMSDEN, L. A. FR. G. RAMSDEN, History of the Sikhs, and Captain in the Army of India. Edited by H. L. O. GARRETT, M.A., J.E.S. New and Revised edition, with 2 maps. Crown 8vo. 8s. 6d. net. Also an edition on Oxford India paper, 10s. 6d. net.

Local Government in Ancient India.
By RADHAKUMUD MOOKERJI. With a foreword by the MARQUES OF CREWE. (Oxbridge University Studies, Historical Series, No. 1.) 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

Modern China, a Political Study.
By SHIWUNG CHENG. Crown 8vo. Cloth 6s. 6d. net. (Histories of the Nations.)

Glasgow Herald.—"Mr. Cheng's book is very timely . . . he has done a notable service to his country, in whose case, as elsewhere, her real enemies are the ignorance and indifference of other nations."

Nationality and Race.
By an Anthropologist's Point of View. By A. KEITH. (The twenty-first Robert Boyle Lecture delivered before the Oxford University Junior Scientific Club, on November 17, 1919.) 8vo. Paper cover. 2s. 6d.

The Gold Coast and the War.
By SIR C. LUCAS. Extra Crown 8vo. Paper cover. 2s. 6d.

Moslem Architecture.
Its Origins and Development.
By G. T. RIVORA. Translated from the Italian by G. McN. RUSHTON. With 180 Plates in half-tone, a Frontispiece in colour, and other Figures and Diagrams. Crown 4to, 42s. net.

Times.—"A strong and masterly work, admirably rendered into English by an eminent archaeologist and sympathetic friend. The mark of the book is its completeness. Really we desire a fuller exposition of the steps of the author’s argument; we hardly ever wish for further pictorial illustration. It would be difficult to overpraise the translations."

Edward Norgate’s Miniature:
The Art of Lining, 1690.
Edited from the Manuscript in the Bodleian Library, and collated with other Manuscripts by MARTIN HARDIE. (Tudor and Stuart Library.) Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d.

Elementary Harmony.
Part I. By C. H. KITSON. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

With a Concert-Goer’s guide by PERCY A. SCHILES. With an Introduction by Sir W. H. HADLOW. Paper boards, 3s. 6d.; cloth, 4s. 6d.

A popular and absolutely non-technical guide for ordinary people, enabling them to enjoy a concert as they can a book.

The Oxford Sheet Almanack for 1920.
The 246th of the series that began in 1774. The Almanack is printed primarily for the official purposes of the University, but copies can be purchased on application to Mr. MILFORD, Imperial Bookstall, with a reservation in chrome-colotype of the Sheldonian Theatre drawn by J. BUCKLER, 1818.

London: HUMPHREY MILFORD, Oxford University Press, Amen Corner, F.C.
INTIMATIONS OF MORTALITY

Once a year, at the time when we should be making pious resolutions, the editor of the Publishers' Circular makes our flesh creep. In a dry, matter-of-fact, businesslike way he puts before us the number of books that have been published during the previous year. A more awful intimation of mortality it would be hard for the man of letters to conceive; it could be surpassed only by an entry into those caverns where the messengers of the British Museum reading-room descend to gratify our strange appetites of exhumation. But no one, unless he has abandoned hope, descends thither; those caverns are haunted by the pallid ghosts of Grub Street. Stories are told.

The editor of the Publishers' Circular wields a daylight terror; he needs no apparatus of iron-grated dungeons to assist him. He merely "records a total of 8,622 books as having been published in the United Kingdom during the year 1919." The response is instant: we ask ourselves immediately, How many of the books published during 1819 are remembered to-day? There is "The Cenci," but is there anything else, save perhaps Wordsworth's "The Waggoner"? Lamb's "Works" and "Endymion" both belong to 1818. When we consider how prolific was that period in work of the highest excellence, and that we can discover only two books that remain from 1819, some optimism is needed to prophesy the survival of more than a half-dozen of the eight thousand six hundred volumes put forth by the publishers during the last year of grace.

We can rub salt in the wound of our vanity by being statistical. First we may remove 1,295 from the terrifying total of 8,622, as being new editions. We are left with 7,327 new-born creatures of the brain and the printing press. There are six possible centenarians among them at the outside, or rather five among 7,326 volumes, for one has appeared with a visible predestination to immortality, Mr. Hardy's "Collected Poems." Only one survivor in every fifteen hundred volumes, and even he may gain no more than a shadowy half-existence as having been written by a friend of the writer of one of the others; or he may be exhumed from those caverns which we fear by some conscientious American professor who desires to make a comprehensive and documented thesis on the "intellectual renascence" of the Georgian era. Still, it may be better to be the object of the moral reprobation of 2019 than to be utterly forgotten by it. 2019! The very figures have an ominous look; a little Einsteinish.

There is a diagrammatic, mathematical, scientific austerity about that sudden leap from the homeliness of the 19-’s to the coldness of the 20-’s. One has the feeling that six was a very optimistic estimate indeed, and a queer suspicion that Herr Einstein himself may come in for what we cannot but regard as more than his fair share of the immortality allotted to 1919. And for this year the prospects are even worse. 2020! The poet who survives through that Arctic atmosphere will need to be a tough one.

With a side-glance at these inauspicious signs, we think one centenarian in two thousand a generous estimate. What a very poor opening for a literary life-assurance company! The only thing possible is an immortality sweepstake, with the practical certainty that none of the present favourites are worth drawing. How many of those who took tickets in the sweepstakes of 1819 would have torn up the ticket with the legend, "The Cenci, A Tragedy In Five Acts. By Percy B. Shelley. Italy. Printed for C. & J. Ollier, Vere Street, Bond Street, London. 1819!"

And we, the critics, are the ticket-holders for 1919. Are we likely to do better, and take the zest from last year or this for the bibliophile of 2019 or 2020? On the whole we think that he will still have the excitement of hunting for some villainously printed pamphlet bound in a scrap of ugly paper, while its cloth-bound contemporaries moulder in decorous decrepitude in the penny-box.

It is a depressing prospect, from which we had better turn to the consolation of our original authority.
"This," he writes, "is an increase of 906 compared with the total for 1918. Although the figure is considerably below the pre-war level, it is a big move upwards and is a satisfactory indication of revival in production." A salutary reminder that it cannot conceivably interest any publisher on earth whether he has among his flock one of the immortals of 2019. After all, one of the most subsidiary functions of a 1919 book is to interest a 2019 reader. And it probably will not seem grievous to ninety-nine per cent. of the novelists of last year that they should vanish as the snows. Out of the 1,217 new books of fiction how many were deliberately designed to last a hundred years? A hundred? Fifty? There may not be more than forty-nine broken hearts, after all. The rest of the twelve hundred may be left with the comfort of having done what they could to provide a saleable commodity. Still, those broken hearts are a depressing subject for contemplation, and we had better run to more general issues. Religion is down and Sociology up. Religion, which held the second place after fiction in 1914, has sunk to the third, for Sociology has leaped up from the fourth place to the second, passing Science on the way. But other things besides have passed Science—Technology (whom we suspect to have stolen a good deal from Science when they met), Juvenile (how detestable he sounds! like the lady of forty as Prince Charming at the pantomime), and Poetry and Drama (which stays in the sixth place, which it occupied in 1914). But though still in the sixth place, Poetry and Drama is not the giant he was in 1918; he has dropped from 642 to 498; and, relatively, his position is even worse, for there were 906 fewer books published in 1918 than 1919. Thus the statistics corroborate what was whispered in our ear by a publisher in the summer that "the boom in poetry is going." We should like to help it on the way. It has certainly done no good; and we suspect it has done a great deal of harm.

The promised revival of religion seems to be in a bad way when we reflect on the character of the rival who has dispossessed it of the proud place second to none but fiction; for Sociology is the darling of the non-dogmatic. But Religion may be consoled by the fact that Science comes off far worse. Thank goodness, there are those (and many of them the torchbearers of Science) who hold that Sociology is not a science at all; therefore it may be that Sociology is capable of alliance. But this ground is treacherous. We need to know more of this pushing fellow Sociology. What exactly is he in the conception of the librarian? Is every book that deals specifically with society and social questions gathered under this head? If it be so, he is by no means as positivist as he sounds. And Technology, also, is a doubtful customer. We prefer to think that the editor of the Publishers' Circular is whispering a memento mori in the ear of the triumphant victors of the day, rather than supplying the historian (or is it the sociologist?) with the material for a diagnosis of the mental condition of modern society.

Among the philosophical works to be published shortly by Messrs. Macmillan is a translation of M. Bergson's "L'Energie Spirituelle" by Professor Wildon Carr, under the title "Mind-Energy."

ENGLISH PROSE

If it should be proposed to appoint Mr. Pearsall Smith Anthologist Royal to the English-speaking races, I, for one, would willingly contribute rather more than I can afford to his stipend. For three hundred years and more a dead preacher called John Donne has cumbered our shelves. The other day Mr. Pearsall Smith touched him with his wand, and behold!—the folios quake, the pages shiver, out steps the passionate preacher; the fibres of our secular hearts are bent and bowed beneath the unaccustomed tempest. But no figure could be more misleading than this of the wand and the wizard. Conceive, rather, a table piled with books; folio pages turned and turned again; collations, annotations, emendations, expurgations; voyages in omnibuses; hours of disillusionment—for who reads prose? life wasting under the rays of a green lamp; the prize of months one solitary paragraph—truly if Mr. Pearsall Smith is a wizard he has learned his craft where none but the bold and the faithful dare follow him. Therefore if I go on to say that in one respect I am his superior, it will be understood that it is not to his learning that I refer. I refer to his taste. In reading the "Treasury of English Prose" I became aware that my taste is far better than Mr. Pearsall Smith's; it is in fact impeccable. But I need scarcely hasten to add what everyone knows for himself; in matters of taste each man, woman and child in the British Isles is impeccable; so are the quadrupeds. A dog who did not rate his own taste better than his master's would be a dog not worth drowning.

This being said, let us waste no more time but proceed at once to Stevenson. I had hoped, not very confidently, to look for Stevenson in vain. I had hoped that the habit of cutting out passages from Stevenson about being good and being brave and being happy was now confined to schoolmasters and people at the head of public institutions. I had hoped that private individuals were beginning to say, "What is the point of Stevenson? Why did they call him a master of prose?" What did our fathers mean by comparing this thin-blooded mummery with Scott or Defoe?"—but I had hoped in vain. Here is Stevenson occupying one of two hundred and fifteen pages with reflections upon Happiness—reflections addressed in a private letter to a friend. It begins all right. Nobody can deny that it needs every sort of good quality to step along so briskly, with such apparent ease, such a nice imitation of talk running down the pen and flowing over the paper. Nor do I shiver when the pen steps more circumspectly. A writer's letters should be as literary as his printed works. But all my spines erect themselves, all my prejudices are confirmed when I come to this: "But I know pleasure still; pleasure with a thousand faces, and none perfect, a thousand tongues all broken, a thousand hands and all of them with scratching nails. High among these I place this delight of weeding out here alone by the garrulous water, under the silence of the high wood, broken..."

A Treasury of English Prose. Edited by Pearsall Logan Smith. (Constable & Co. £6. net.)
by incongruous sounds of birds.” Then I know why I cannot read the novels; then I know why I should never allow him within a mile of the anthologies.

Skipping (for no one reads an anthology through), we next alight upon Walter Pater—nervously, prepared for disappointment. Can he possibly be what he once seemed?—the writer who from words made blue and gold and green; marble, brick, the wax petals of flowers; warmth too and scent; all things that the hand delighted to touch and the nostrils to smell, while the mind traced subtle winding paths and surprised recondite secrets. This, and much more than this, comes back to me with renewed delight in Mr. Pearsall Smith’s quotations. The famous one still seems to me to deserve all its fame; the less famous, about a red hawthorn tree in full flower—“a plume of tender crimson fire out of the heart of the dry wood”—revives the old joys and makes the nerve of the eye vibrate again; but if one cannot praise fitly it is better to be silent and only say that there can be no doubt—from the quotations at least—about Walter Pater.

About Emerson there is I think considerable doubt; or rather there is no doubt at all that he must be altogether different from what we supposed to deserve eleven full pages where there is no room for a single line of Dryden, Cowper, Peacock, Hardy, the Brontës, Jane Austen, Meredith (to take the obvious omissions); only two scraps of Sterne and a page and a bit of Conrad. Yet one sees what Mr. Pearsall Smith means. Emerson wrote for anthologies. Passages seem to break off in one’s hands like ripe fruit without damage to the tree. The first passage reads beautifully; the second almost as well. But then—what is it? something bald and bare and glittering—something light and brittle—something which suggests that if this precious fruit were dropped it would shiver into particles of silvery dust like some of those balls that were plucked from the boughs of ancient Christmas trees, and slipped and fell—is Emerson’s fruit that kind of fruit? Of course the lustre is admirable—the dust, the dust of the stars.

But if Mr. Pearsall Smith puts in and leaves out according to a rule of his own, that is an indispensable merit in an anthologist. He puts in, for example, Jeremy Taylor, and so reveals a great English writer who, to my shame, had been no more than an obscure clerical shade among the folios. For that I could forgive him—I was going to say the neglect of Mr. Hardy; but Mr. Pearsall Smith can hardly have neglected all, or almost all, the great English novelists. He has rejected them, and that is another matter, that leads one to consider what may be his reasons. I suppose there are at least twenty of them, and all so profound and lying at the roots of things that to lay bare a single one would need more columns than I have words. Lightly then will I run over a few suggestions and leave them to wither or perhaps fall on fertile soil. To begin with, every novelist would, I suppose, suspect a critic who complimented him on the beauty of his writing. “But that’s not what I’m after,” he would say, and add, a moment later, with the susceptibility of his kind, “You mean, I’m dull.” And as a matter of fact the great novelists very seldom stop in the middle or in the beginning of their great scenes to write anything that one could cut out with a pair of scissors or loop round with a line of red ink. The greatest of novelists—Dostoevsky—always, so Russian scholars say, writes badly, Turgenev, the least great of the Russian trinity, always, they say, writes exquisitely. That Dostoevsky would have been a greater novelist had he written beautifully into the bargain no one will deny. But the novelist’s task lays such a load upon every nerve, muscle, and fibre that to demand beautiful prose in addition is, in view of human limitations, to demand what can only be given at the cost of a sacrifice. Let us choose two instances from among the writers of our own tongue. There is no novel by Mr. Conrad which has not passages of such beauty that one hangs over them like a humming-bird moth at the mouth of a flower. Yet I believe that one pays for such beauty in a novel. To achieve it the writer has had to shut off his energy in other directions. Hence, I think, so many pages of Mr. Conrad’s novels are slack and slumberous, monotonous like the summer sea. Mr. Hardy, on the other hand, has not in the course of some twenty volumes written a single passage fit to be included in a treasury of English prose. Impossible! Yet I could not, at a moment’s notice, lay my hand on one. The greater number of our novelists are in the same boat with him. But what, then, can we be talking about? What is this "beautiful English prose"?

Surely the most beautiful of all things! the reader of Mr. Pearsall Smith’s selection will exclaim—the most subtle, the most profound, the most moving and imaginative. And who are the people who keep it alive, extend its powers, and increase its triumphs? The novelists. Only we must not go to them for perfect passages, descriptions, perorations, reflections so highly wrought that they can stand alone without their context. We must go to them for chapters, not for sentences; for beauty, not tranquil and contained, but wild and fleeting like the light on rough waters. We must seek it particularly where the narrative breaks and gives way to dialogue. But it must be conceded that the novelists put their English to the most menial tasks. She has to do all the work of the house; to make the beds, dust the china, boil the kettle, sweep the floors. In return she has the priceless privilege of living with human beings. When she has warmed to her task, when the fire is burning, the cat here, the dog there, the smoke rising from the chimney, the men and women feasting or love-making, dreaming or speculating, the trees blowing, the moon rising, the autumn sun gold upon the corn—then read Mr. Hardy and see whether the common prose of English fiction does not carry herself like the Queen she is—the old Queen, wise in the secrets of our hearts; the young Queen with all her life before her. For though English poetry was a fine old potentate—but no, I dare not breathe a word against English poetry. All I will venture is a sigh of wonder and amazement that when there is a prose before us with its capacities and possibilities, its power to say new things, make new shapes, express new passions, young people should still be dancing to a barrel organ and choosing words because they rhyme.

Virginia Woolf
THE FAR-OFF DAY

Spring will come again;
Hot anxious wind
Shake the window-pane—
Pierce my dead mind—
Wake up the blind—
Tear the roots of trees—
Warm those ponds that freeze—
Bring anemones
To the naked glade,
Crocus to fill
All the empty shade,
Blow the daffodil,
Call the sheep and fill
The graveyard with ghosts,
Pale and quaking hosts,
Till the living thrill.

FREDENGD SHOVE.

JANUARY

In sorrow, joy; in winter, spring.
Seek not impatiently, nor strive
To hasten their awakening;
But let them be, and they will thrive,

There is a breeze astral among
The hedges stark by field and way;
Whispering grief, it flies along
The grasses cold of pastures grey.

Save for the birds there is no cheer;
The unchanged hours wheel slowly by
As sun or moon or stars appear,
The land lies naked to the sky.

Lo, Night encamped among the trees,
A host at noontide dark and grim;
Soon shall the flying distances
Belaguered be and lost in him.

With stillness winter holds the earth,
With silence motionless and deep,
And bodes no wakening to mirth
From melancholy spells of sleep.

F. W. STOKOE.

MEANTIME

Far away, far away,
Far away from here . . .
There is no worry after joy
Or away from fear
Far away from here.

Her lips were not very red,
Nor her hair quite gold.
Her hands played with rings.
She did not let me hold
Her hands playing with gold.

She is somewhere past,
Far away from pain.
Joy can touch her not, nor hope
Enter her domain,
Neither love in vain.

Perhaps at some day beyond
Shadows and light
She will think of me and make
All me a delight,
All away from sight.

FERNANDO PESSOA.

REVIEWS

THE LOST LEGIONS

THE LETTERS OF CHARLES SORLEY. (Cambridge, University Press, 12s. 6d. net.)

O NE day, we believe, a great book will be written, informed by the breath which moves the Spirits of Pity in Mr. Hardy's "Dynasts." It will be a delicate, yet undeviating record of the spiritual awareness of the generation that perished in the war. It will be a work of genius, for the essence that must be captured within it is volatil beyond belief, almost beyond imagination. We know of its existence by signs hardly more material than a dream-memory of beating wings or an instinctive, yet all inexplicable refusal of that which has been offered us in its stead. The autobiographer-novelists have been legion, yet we turn from them all with a slow shake of the head. "No, it was not that. Had we lost only that we could have forgotten. It was not that." And, it was the spirit that was troubled, as in dream, the waters of the pool, some influence which trembled between silence and a sound, a precurious confidence, an unavowed quest, a wisdom that came not of years or experience, a dissatisfaction, a doubt, a devotion, some strange pre-sentiment, it may have been, of the bitter years in store, in memory an ineffable, irrevocable beauty, a visible seal on the forehead of a generation.

Yet out of a thousand fragments this memory must be created anew in a form that will outlast the years, for it was precious. It was something that would vindicate an epoch against the sickening adulation of the hero-makers and against the charge of spiritual sterility; a light in whose gleam the bewildering non-achievements of the present age, the art which seems not even to desire to be art, the faith which seems not to desire to be faith, have substance and meaning. It is shot through and through by an impulse of paradox, an unconscious straining after the impossible, gathered into two or three tremulous years which passed too swiftly to achieve their own expression. Now, what remains of youth is cynical, is successful, publicly exploits itself. It was not cynical then.

Elements of the influence that was are remembered if they lasted long enough to receive a name. There was Unanimism. The name is remembered; perhaps the books are read. But it will not be found in the books. They are childish, just as the English novels which endeavoured to portray the soul of the generation were coarse and conceived. Behind all the conscious manifestations of cleverness and complexity lay a fundamental candour of which only a flickering gleam can now be recaptured. It glints on a page of M. Romains' "Europe"; the memory of it haunts Wilfrid Owen's poems; it touches Keeling's letters; it hovers over these letters of Sorley. From a hundred strange lurking-places it must be gathered by pious and sensitive fingers and withdrawn from under the very edge of the scytheblade of time, for if it wander longer without a habitation it will be lost for ever.

Charles Sorley was the youngest fringe of the strange unity that included him and men by ten years his senior. He had not, as they had, plunged with fantastic hopes and unspoken fears into the world. He had not learned the slogans of the day. But, seeing that the slogans were only a disguise for the undefined desires which inspired them he lost little and gained much thereby. The years at Oxford in which he would have taken a temporary sameness, a sameness in the long run protective and strengthening, were spared him. In his letters we have him unspoiled, as the sentimentalists would say—not yet with the distraction of protective colouring.

One who knew him better than the mere reader of his letters can pretend to know him declares that, in spite of his poems, which are among the most remarkable of those of the boy-poets killed in the war, Sorley would not have been a man of letters. The evidence of the letters them-seves is heavy against the view; they insist upon being regarded as the letters of a potential writer. But a passionate interest in literature is not the inevitable prelude to a life as a writer, and although it is impossible to consider any thread in Sorley’s letters as of importance comparable to that which joins the enthronement and detronment of his literary idols, we shall regard it as the record of a movement of soul which might as easily find expression (as did Keeling’s) in other than literary activities. It takes more than literary men to make a generation, after all.

And Sorley was typical above all in this, that passionate and penetrating as was his devotion to literature, he never looked upon it as a thing existing in and for itself. It was, to him and his kind, the satisfaction of an impulse other and more complex than the aesthetic. Art was a means and not an end to him, and it is perhaps the apprehension of this that has led one who endeavoured in vain to reconcile Sorley to Pater into rash prognostication. Sorley would never have been an artist in Pater’s way; he belonged to his own generation, to which l’art pour l’art had ceased to have meaning. There had come a pause, a throbbing silence, from which art might have emerged, may even now after the appointed time arise, with strange validities undreamed of or forgotten. Let us not prophesy; let us be content with the recognition that Sorley’s generation was too keenly, perhaps too dis astrously aware of destinies, of the beating of the wings of Love Shut out from his creation.

to seek the comfort of the ivory tower.

Sorley first appears before us radiant with the white-heat of a schoolboy enthusiasm for Masefield. Masefield is—how we remember the feeling!—the poet who has lived:
his naked reality tears through "the lace of putrid sentimentalism (educing the effeminate in man) which rotters like Tennyson and Swinburne have taught his the superficial man’s soul to love.” It tears through more than Tennyson and Swinburne. The greatest go down before him.

So you see what I think of John Masefield. When I say that he has the rapidity, simplicity, nobility of Homer, with the power of drawing character, the dramatic truth to life of Shakespeare, along with a moral and emotional strength and elevation which is all his own, and therefore I am prepared to put him above the level of these two great men—I do not expect you to agree with me.
(From a paper read at Marlborough, November, 1912.)

That was Sorley at seventeen, and that, it seems to us, is the quality of enthusiasm which should be felt by a boy of seventeen if he is to make his mark. It is infinitely more important to have felt that flaming enthusiasm for an idol who will be cast down than to have felt what we ought to feel for Shakespeare and Homer. The gates of Heaven are opened by strange keys, but they must be our own.

Within six months Masefield had given the way of all flesh. In a paper on The Shropshire Lad " (May, 1913), curious both for critical subtlety and the faint taste of disillusion, he was saying: “His [Masefield’s] return [to the earth] was purely emotional, and probably less interesting than the purely intellectual return of Meredith.”
At the beginning of 1914, having gained a Scholarship at University College, Oxford, he went to Germany. Just before going he wrote:

I am just discovering Thomas Hardy. There are two methods of discovery. One is when Columbus discovers America. The other is when someone begins to read a famous author who has already run into seventy editions, and refuses to speak about anything else, and considers every one else who reads the author’s works his own special converts. Mine is the second method. I am more or less Hardy-drunk.

The humorous exactness and detachment of the description are remarkable, and we feel that there was more than the supersession of a small by a great idol in this second phase. By April he is at Jena, “ only 15 miles from Goethe’s grave, whose inhabitant has taken the place of Thomas Hardy (successor to Masefield) as my favourite prophet.”

I hope (if nothing else) before I leave Germany to get a thorough hang of “ Faust.” . . . The worst of a piece like " Faust" is that it completely dries up any creative instincts or attempts in oneself.
There is nothing that I have ever thought or ever read that is not somewhere contained in it, and (what is worse) explained in it.

He had a sublime contempt for anyone with whom he was not drunk. He lumped together "nasty old Lyttons, Carlyles and Dickens.” And the intonation itself was swift, and fleeting. There was something in a chunk with Goethe by July; it is his “entirely intellectual” life.

If Goethe really did saying "more light": it was very silly of him: what he wanted was more warmth.

And he writes home for Richard Jeffries, the man of his own country—for through Marlborough he had made himself the adopted son of the Wiltshire Downs.

In the midst of our setting up and smashing of deities—Masefield, Hardy, Goethe—I always fall back on Richard Jefferies wandering about in the background. I have at least the tie of locality with him.

A day or two after we discover that Meredith is up (though not on Olympus) from a denunciation of Browning on the queer non- (or super-) aesthetic grounds of which we have spoken above.

There is much in B. I. like. But my feeling towards him has (we may since I read his life) been that of his to the "Lost Leader." I cannot understand him consenting to live a purely literary life in Italy, or (worse still) consenting to be licensed by fashionable London society. And then I always feel that if less people read Browning, more would read Meredith (his poetry, I mean).

While, then, he was walking in the Moselle Valley, came the war. He had loved Germany, and the force of his love kept him strangely free from illusions; he was not the stuff that Morning Post Elizabethans are made of. The keen censure of spiritual innocence is in what he wrote while training at Shorncliffe:

For the joke of seeing an obviously just cause defeated, I hope Germany will win. It would do the world good, and show that real faith is not that which says "we must win for our cause is just," but that which says "our cause is just: therefore we can disregard defeat." . . .

England—I am sick of the sound of the word. In training to fight for England, I am training to fight for that deliberate hypocrisy, that terrible middle-class shlof of outlook and appealing "imaginative indolence" that has marked us out from generation to generation . . .

And yet we have the impudence to write down Germany (who with all their vileness they are at least sensible) as "silly because they are doing what every brave man ought to do and making experiments in morality, Not that I approve of the experiment in this particular case. Indeed I think that after the war all brave men will renounce their country and confess that they are strangers an PILERES on the earth. "For they say that such things declare plainly that they seek a country.” But all these convictions are useless for me at since I have not had the privilege of being. What a man one is thrown out of cart-wheels—big clumsy, careless, lumbering cart-wheels—of public opinion. I might have been giving my mind to fight against Stupidity and Stupidity—in other I was giving my body (by a reimbursement of cowardice) to fight against the most enterprising nation in the world.

The wise armchair-patriots will shake their heads; but there is more wisdom in these words than in all the newspaper leaders written throughout the war. Sorley was fighting for more than he said; he was fighting for his Wiltshire Downs as well. But he fought in complete and utter detachment. He died too soon (in October, 1915) to suffer the cumulative torment of those who lasted into the long agony of 1917. There is little bitterness in his letters; they have to the last always the crystal clarity of vision of the unbroken.

His intellectual evolution went on to the end. No wonder that he found Rupert Brooke's sonnets overpraised:

He is far too obsessed with his own sacrifice ... It was not that "they" gave up anything of that list he gives in one sonnet; but that the essence of these things had been endangered by circumstances over which he had no control, and he must fight to recapture them. He has clothed his attitude in fine words: but he has taken the sentimental attitude.

Remember that a boy of 19 is writing, and think how final is this criticism of Brooke's war sonnets; the seeker has condemned irrevocably one who has given up the search. "There is no such thing as a just war," writes this boy. "What we are doing is casting out Satan by Satan." From this position Sorley never flinched. Never for a moment was he renegade to his generation by taking "the sentimental attitude." Neither had he in him an atom of the narrowness of the straiter sect. He was a seeker to the last, and no one can truly seek whose heart is not consumed by love.

Though space forbids, we will follow out his progress to the last. We do not receive many such gifts as this wonderful book; the authentic voice of those lost legions is seldom heard. We can afford, surely, to listen to it to the end. In November, 1914, Sorley turns back to the Hardy of the poems. After rejecting "the actual 'Satires of Circumstance'" as bad poetry, and passing an incisive criticism on "Men who March away," he continues:

I cannot help thinking that Hardy is the greatest artist of the English character since Shakespeare; and much of "The Dynasts" (except its historical fidelity) might be Shakespeare. But: value his lyrics as presenting himself (the self he does not obtrude into the comprehensiveness of his novels and "The Dynasts") as truly, and with faults as well as strength visible in it, as any character in his novels. His lyrics have not the spontaneity of Shakespeare's or Shelley's: they are rough-hewn and jagged: but I like them, and they stick.

Shortly after, "I have discovered a man called D. H. Lawrence who knows how to write." A little later, having finished "The Egoist,"

I see now that Meredith belongs to that class of novelists with whom I do not usually get on so well (e.g., Dickens), who create and people worlds of their own so that one approaches the characters with amusement, admiration or contempt, not with liking or pity, as with Hardy's people, into whom the author does not inject his own exaggerated characteristics.

The great Russians were unknown to Sorley when he died. What would he not have found in those mighty seekers, with whom Hardy alone stands equal? But whatever might have been his vicissitudes in that strange company, we feel that Hardy could never have been detrained in his heart, for other reasons than that the love of the Wessex hills had crept into his blood. He was killed on October 13, 1915, shot in the head by a sniper as he led his company at the "hair-pin" trench near Hulluch.

J. M. M.

Mr. T. R. Glover, Fellow of St. John's College, has been elected Public Orator of Cambridge University in the place of Sir John Sandys, resigned. Mr. Glover received 162 votes, and Mr. W. T. Vesey (Caunus) 144. Mr. Glover's writings on the religious movements in the Roman Empire have reached considerably beyond an academic audience.

Room XVIII. of the National Gallery has been reopened to the public. It contains a selection of pictures of the Spanish School, including a fine example of El Greco's mature style, "The Agony in the Garden," till recently in the convent of Las Salesas Nuevas, Madrid.

We have received a preliminary list of members of the Dugald Stewart Society for the publication of Memoirs of the first members of the society, which indicates that the Society is well on the road to foundation. Those interested in this admirable project are invited to communicate with Mr. F. C. Wellstood, Shakespeare's Birthplace, Stratford-on-Avon.

JOHN PAYNE

The Life of John Payne. By Thomas Wright. (Fisher Unwin, 28s. net.)

The habit of digging up one's friends' bones to make soup of them, if we may be allowed to quote a vigorous saying of the late Dr. Furnivall, seems to have established itself firmly in the case of Mr. Thomas Wright. Perhaps we ought not to have said "friends"; who could have thought of naming Pater, FitzGerald, Burton, and Payne as subjects for the pen of the author of "The Blue Firedrake" or of "a story of pertinacity and perseverance"?

John Payne, like FitzGerald, is a man of one book. He has written many others in prose and verse, but he will be remembered as the translator of the Arabian Nights. His version is a good one, cleaner than Burton's, fuller and more Eastern than Lane's, while his language is racy and idiomatic without the false archaisms which Burton was forced to adopt to differentiate his style. His Villon is accurate, but never inspired; the praises it won from De Balville and Mallarmé are discounted by their comparatively slight feeling for English poetry and their ready welcome to a foreigner. His Omar and Boccaccio are, at best, interesting as documents for the study of the authors: his Heine is a failure.

Payne was born in 1842, and lived in London all his life, dying in 1916. He was fortunate enough as a young man to make friends who brought him into the outer circle of the Pre-Raphaelite movement; and caught up, with a genuine love of fine things, the somewhat arrogant tone towards literature, art, and life which distinguishes movements in the making, and renders their acceptance by their contemporaries a little difficult. Payne wrote verse, read it to his friends, even published it with some measure of success. It was, at any rate, good enough to be treated seriously by such generous judges as Rossetti and Swinburne, whose ready sympathy was always given to any fellow-traveller on the paths they had marked out. His income from his profession as a solicitor was ample, his translations brought him in a very handsome return, and a Civil List pension, given in 1898, materially assisted him towards the end of his days.

He had, in short, the success he deserved, but not, it seems, that he desired. There is a peculiar quality about verse-writing which appears to distinguish it from its kindred arts. The novelist, the painter, cannot mislead himself beyond a certain time; the poet, who makes up of his work as at some moment he knows that he is not an artist, and then he gives it up, or kills himself like Haydon, or contentedly sets himself down to producing bad work for the market. But the versifier goes on, content with his own judgment on his work, however he may long for the praise he feels is due to him. This was the case with Payne as exhibited by his biographer. In the absence of domestic criticism—he was never married—his youthful arrogance ripened into bluster; he no longer associated with his equals or superiors, and contentedly swallowed such flattery as his inferiors afforded him.

Biographers like Mr. Thomas Wright add, to use the trite expression, a new terror to death. If posterity had been left to the couple of columns in the "Dictionary of National Biography" which were Payne's just due, it might have thought of him as a silent literary craftsman, pursuing a useful task in modest obscurity. Mr. Wright exhibits Payne as vain, selfish, and opinionated, and himself as pertinacious, ignorant, and uncritical, while his book is overloaded with unimportant detail. The obscurity in which Payne lived was entirely due to his own free choice, and we fail to see the advantage to anyone but Mr. Wright himself in dragging him out of it.
THE WAR IN THE NEAR EAST
BRITISH CAMPAIGNS IN THE NEAR EAST. By Edmund Dane. (Hodder & Stoughton. 2 vols. 7s. 6d. net each.)

How Jerusalem was Won. By W. T. Massey. (Constable. 21s. net.)

EXPERTS on the Near East are curiously fond of attributing quite natural movements to remote causes, and Mr. Edmund Dane, who opens his book with an account of German intrigues in Turkey, has acquired this peculiar habit. He apparently believes, for instance, that the Turkish revolutionary movement against Abdul Hamid—the protégé of the Kaiser—was originally promoted and encouraged by the German Government. There is very little, if any, evidence to support this theory, which is to some extent disproved by the fact that, on the outbreak of the Revolution, German influence temporarily declined and the Young Turks displayed strong Anglophil tendencies, which were only cooled by the unfriendly attitude of the British Embassy. In Egypt the Nationalist movement was not created, as Mr. Dane suggests, by the German intrigues, and it shows no sign of weakening now that Germany is in the dust. Foreign gold—and not German gold only—had a slightly stimulating effect, but there was no need, unfortunately, to teach the Egyptians to hate the British. The failure of the natives to rise in support of Turkey, on the declaration of the Protectorate, was not due to any gratitude to us for the material benefits we had conferred upon them. Those who knew Egypt well had no such illusions on that subject as are entertained by Mr. Dane. The people were almost as Anglophile then as they are to-day, and they remained passive only because they were cowed by the arrival of large numbers of terrifying Australian and other troops.

On military affairs the author is often interesting and well-informed, but his political digressions are seldom illuminating. His views are always conventional, especially with regard to the attitude of our allies, but they are not always based upon accurate information: thus it was not the case that the majority of the Greek people were opposed to King Constantine's Germanophile policy. Mr. Dane's theories about Germany are characteristic of most of our popular war literature, which holds her responsible for nearly all the misfortunes that have afflicted mankind during the last fifty years. After stating that the Balkan League attacked Turkey in 1912 (when no such League existed), he proceeds to attribute to German inspiration the murder of King George of Greece. That disastrous event did, indeed, make the second Balkan war almost inevitable, but no evidence of German complicity has been produced. There is reason to believe that the murder was arranged by the Young Turks, not out of any consideration for German interests, but because they foresaw that King George's successor would pursue, in conjunction with Serbia, an imperialist policy in Macedonia, and that the Balkan League would consequently be broken up.

The greater part of the book, however, is a useful if uninspiring recital of military events. The first volume describes the early Turkish offensives in the Caucasus and against Egypt, the Gallipoli campaign, the British advance up the Tigris and the siege and fall of Kut. The second volume deals mainly with General Mande's advance to Baghdad and beyond, General Allenby's conquest of Palestine and Syria, and the Balkan and Italian campaigns. There are excellent maps to illustrate the principal battles. Mistakes in the text are numerous, especially in the spelling of Arabic names; on one page we find "Murunmah" and "Barbin" instead of Muhammadah and Bahrein, and the Sherif of Mecca (whose revolt is post-dated by one year) is described as the "Sheerif." Mr. Dane makes the curious statement that Gaffer Pasha, the Arab general who upheld the Turkish cause in Tripoli early in the war, was a German turned Moslem, and he does not mention the fact that Gaffer subsequently led the Hejaz army against the Turks. The author's knowledge of Arabia may be judged from his statement that "notwithstanding the completion of the strategical railway from Damascus to Mecca, the Turkish hold on the Yemen was jeopardized," there was, of course, no railway within two hundred miles of Mecca, and, even if such a line had existed, it could have had no effect on the position of the Turks in distant Yemen.

"How Jerusalem was Won" is a much shorter book and deals only with the Palestine campaign, but Mr. Massey is a writer of a different calibre. His delight in his subject, which he has thoroughly mastered, is infectious, and he knows how to make military history interesting to the layman. He has an eye for the picturesque and for the glamour of historical associations, but his enthusiasm for General Allenby's "soldier missionaries"—for their chivalry and high principles as well as their skill and valour—is so ecstatic that it hardly permits him to appreciate the humour which is inseparable from almost every situation in the East. His intense admiration of our military administration in Palestine would perhaps be regarded by foreigners as an example of Anglo-Saxon smugness. It is justified, nevertheless, by the facts, and while it would be too much to say that none of the Imperial troops ever fell short of the moral standards of Sir Galahad, it may fairly be claimed that no conquered country was ever treated with greater consideration by a victorious army.

General Allenby's achievements were so remarkable that there is every excuse for Mr. Massey's obviously sincere hero-worship. The Commander-in-Chief was not only a brilliant strategist and administrator, but he had the priceless gift of inspiring confidence, and those who were in Egypt at the time will remember the remarkable improvement in the moral of our troops which took place after his arrival. Equally happy were his relations with the Arab leaders and with the various communities in Palestine. Sir Reginald Wingate and the Hejaz Operations Staff had the long experience needed for dealing successfully with native magnates, and General Allenby showed his wisdom by listening to the advice of those who had greater knowledge than himself of the Arabic world.

The army which conquered Palestine was almost exclusively British, but it contained contingents from all parts of the Empire, and Mr. Massey mentions at least a dozen different races who played a part in the campaign. Of the coloured troops, few distinguished themselves more than the Cape boys, whose splendid record in the war should do something to modify the colour-prejudice of British South Africans. The Londonders, as usual, covered themselves with glory, and once again exploded the theory that countrymen make better soldiers than townsfolk.

Jerusalem, in theory the city of the great religions of the world, but it is doubtful whether the British army appreciated the significance of its capture as keenly as Mr. Massey would have us believe. Despite the efforts of the Palestine News to awaken an interest in Biblical history, the average British soldier was as tired of the war in Egypt and Palestine as he was elsewhere, and was only faintly amused by the holy associations of the land he was delivering from the Turk. One young soldier wrote to his mother: "I am now in the beautiful city of Bethlehem, where Christ was born. I wish I was in the beautiful city of Bradford, where I was born." A small minority may have shared the thrills of the Official Correspondent of the London newspapers, but that letter was typical of the sentiments of most of our modern Crusaders.

L. B.
MR. TREVELYAN'S "AJAX"

THESAURUS OF SOPHOCLES. Translated by R. C. Trevelyan. (Allen & Unwin. 2s. net paper, 3s. 6d. net cloth.)

GREEK tragic writers had a way of ending their plays with some quite obvious moral tag which often seems to us inadequate, and even priggish. Euripides, for example, loves to make his chorus, after the catastrophe, exclaim, "The unexpected happens; the expected does not happen; and the issue of the present matter illustrates the fact." When Euripides talks like this, it is easy to make out that he is poking fun at the gods. But what are we to think when pious Sophocles concludes the tragedy of "Ajax" with another version of the same old saw?

Unto him who has seen many manifold knowledge
Come; but before he sees, no man
May divine what destiny awaits him.

For an Athenian audience these proverbs were impressive. They are not the poet's personal reflections, but truths which every reasonable man does well to remember. If novelty is sought, it is in the application or the precise expression. The truisms have at least the merit that they are true. They are not deductions from the story of the play, nor even lessons which the poet wants his audience to learn from the event. They are chosen for their lack of originality. When we are moved by the tragedy of an Ajax or an Oedipus, a brilliant speculative guess at truth would jar on us. Tenceur's conjectures on the meaning of his brother's fate raise too many questions to be tolerable as the last note of the play—

Was it not some Erinus forged this sword,
And Hades the grim craftsman wrought that girdle?
I at least would maintain that the gods plan
These things and all things even for mankind.
But whoever's judgment likes not this,
Let him uphold his judgment as I mine.

That is a fitting prelude to the passionate dispute about the hero's burial: it would not serve, because it is too controversial, to soften and release and generalize our accumulated feelings at the end. Still less could we tolerate, as the conclusion of the matter, Athena's little sermon on the text of human misfortune—

Warned therefore by his fate, never do thou... What we want is something hallowed by tradition, yet so obviously true that our assent is more emotional than intellectual. The poet's object is neither to improve our morals nor to convince us that his views of life are true. His object is to give us the peculiar pleasure and the sense of an increased vitality which come from realizing, through our pity and our admiration of the hero, at once how splendid and how futile is the destiny of every one of us. For or against the ruthless goddess Sophocles, as a tragedian, holds no brief. Simply he treats her as a fact. Thus, he implies, will circumstances treat a man who thinks himself exempt from ordinary accident. His purpose is dramatic, not didactic, when he sets the story of his hero's passion between the tableau of Athena, Ajax and Odysseus, and the companion picture of the Atridæ Tenceur and Odysseus. When Athena triumphs over her mortal victim, Odysseus, his old enemy, feels his nobility and pities him, "since he is yoked fast to an evil doom:"

My own lot I regard no less than his.
For I see well, nought else are we but mere Phantoms, all we that live, mere fleeting shadows.

It is because we are all of us in the same boat that the Atridæ, when they emulate Athena's heavenly vindictiveness, appear not merely repulsive, but ridiculous. It is to heighten this perception of the pettiness and the nobility of human life that Sophocles has made his chorus dwell on the contrast between the Ilium on whose shores they fight and toil and grumble and the calm beauty of their home in Salamis—

Son of Telamon, lord of Salamis' isle,
On its wave-washed throne mid the breaking sea...

And, again, when all but the last act of the drama is over,
Oh once more to stand, where on the wooded headland
The ocean is breaking, under
The shadow of Sunnion's height; thence could I greet from far
The divine city of Athens.

It is of life, not death, that Ajax thinks in the moment of his suicide—

O, Death, Death, come now and look upon me.
No, 'tis there I shall meet and speak to thee.
Put thee, bright daylighth which I now behold,
And Helios in his chariot I accost,
For this last time of all, and then no more.
O sunlight! O thou hallowed soil, my own
Salamis, stabled seat of my sire's hearth,
And famous Athens, with thy kindred race,
And you, ye springs and streams, and Trojan plains,
Farewell, all ye who have sustained my life.
This is the last word Ajax speaks to you.
All else in Hades to the dead will I say.

Mr. Trevelyan's translation seemed to us at the first reading, like the moral tags of the chorus, somewhat cold. But after reading it with care at least three times, and many parts of it more often, we find it comes to life. It would, we think, stand the test of acting better than some more romantic versions. Its literal accuracy would probably at the beginning disconcert a hearer who was not acquainted with the original: but the impression of strangeness would wear off, and the audience, we think, would feel the dignity and strength of Sophocles. The workmanship is never slovenly. Whether old-fashioned ears, accustomed to the cadences of English poetry, will ever find Greek choral metres beautiful and natural when the words are English, time will show. The aim of the translator has been "to reproduce as closely as possible the metrical pattern of the original," so that one musical setting would fit both Greek and English. The experiment is obviously interesting, and, in spite of prejudice and scepticism, a reader who will take the trouble to declaim the lines aloud will find that gradually his bewilderment gives place to admiration of the skill with which the author has contrived his pattern. We hope that Mr. Trevelyan will continue his experiments, and we rank his translation high among the more serious attempts of honest scholarship to interpret Greek for English readers.

J. T. SHEPPARD.

RUFINUS

Loving you all, yet love not I
Your indiscriminating eye,
Since I saw it cast, of late,
Loving looks on men I hate.

Palatine Anthology, v. 284

Beauty-proud is Rhodope
If e'er "Good-day"
To her I say,
A haughty eyebrow greeteth me.

If e'er above her door I set
A flowery crown,
Wreath tears it down,
And haughty footsteps trample it.

O wrinkles, come apace; O hasten,
Age without ruth;
Since none, in sooth,
But you this Rhodope can chasten.

Palatine Anthology, v. 92.

R. A. FURNESS.
THE ELEMENTS OF ANTHROPOLOGY

AN INTRODUCTION TO ANTHROPOLOGY. By E. O. James. (Macmillan, 7s. 6d. net.)

"It is well to begin at the beginning," says the French proverb; and since, chronologically regarded, Anthropology begins with the prehistoric, Mr. James, planning an introduction to anthropology, begins, and ends, with primeval man. Some might think, therefore, that his title is too ambitious, and would have had him call his book an introduction to prehistoric archaeology. But the author might justly argue in his own defence that throughout he is interpreting the part in the light of the whole, and consequently is using the part to illustrate the whole and to pave the way for an appreciation of its many-sided character. For in days gone by prehistoric research was in the hands of special students who paid little or no regard to the many side-lights thrown on the life of the distant past by the manners and customs of the modern savage. Such narrowness of interest, however, is out of date. Professor Sollas led the way in this country by bringing the ancient hunters of the Quaternary Period into line with existing or recently existing peoples of rudimentary culture whom he ventured to term their "modern representatives." Besides, our leading Universities have now their schools of anthropology in which prehistoric archaeology forms but one branch of a comprehensive study of primitive, in the sense of uncivilized, man, such as seeks to take account of every aspect of his nature and development, whether physical or mental. Mr. James himself has graduated in one of these schools, and would be false to the faith in which he has been reared were he to relegate Pleistocene man to a world of his own, as if he were some alien Martian, and not "bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh"—in fact, that veritable old Adam who lives on subconsciously in us all.

The comparative method, however, like the gun, is a dangerous weapon in the hands of inexperienced persons. Mr. James, realizing this, handles it with due caution, and cannot be accused of abusing the principle of analogy. True, he makes many suggestions of possible practices, institutions and beliefs which are to be attributed to ancient man on the sole ground that these are to be found among savages with a condition of life similar in general much to that of the earlier races. But he is not dogmatic in his assertions, but reviews the probabilities in a spirit of moderation. For the rest, who would be for tying down the student of prehistorics to the bare task of recording the given? His business is to recreate the living out of the dead. Most of us have enough imagination to be susceptible to the glamour of the far past, and after our own fashion try to picture the life of the cave-dweller or the mound-builder whose meagre relics we light upon in a museum, or, better still, in some haunted site remote from civilization. Meanwhile, a little science will enable us to do this critically; nor is fuller knowledge likely to begot a weaker sympathy. On the contrary, the further we get beyond the mere externals of prehistoric culture and penetrate to its spiritual inwardness, so much the more will our sense of the continuity of human effort and aspiration be heightened and sustained. Mr. James, we note, finds Mr. Worthington Smith's account of "man, the primeval savage," altogether too dreary. Nor can he shake in the "gloomy view" of the modern savage taken by Sir James Frazer in "The Golden Bough." Both writers, in his view, overdo the brutality of the man of the Stone Age, who, despite his indubitable shortcomings in the way of material comforts and aids to existence, need not have been correspondingly wanting in the makings of a soul. Mr. James, having already composed a work on the religion of modern savages, is convinced that the material culture of primitive folk affords no sure criteria of the moral—in short, that plain living and high thinking may go together at any stage of human evolution. Holding, then, to this kindly doctrine—so opposed as it is to the "civilizing" influence of some political philosophers of our day—Mr. James manages to impart an original flavour to what, in virtue of its scope, must otherwise tend to be a mere epitome of well-known facts. These facts, of course, must have justice done to them; and so in his opening chapters he summarizes the latest information concerning the skeletal remains of early man, and the products of his industry. Not much need be said about this part of the treatment. A few minor slips are to be noted that suggest a certain hastiness of revision. Our only serious objection, however, relates to his classification of the somatic types characteristic of the Late-Palaeolithic period. These are distinguished as the Cro-Magnon, Grimaldi, and Aurignacian races. It is no doubt arguable that the Choukoutial race, usually recognized as a distinct variety, may legitimately be excluded on the ground that a single specimen provides too narrow a basis for the determination of a class. But what good can come of speaking of an Aurignacian race? Presumably Mr. James is referring to the Combe-Capelle specimen, a variety of that "River-bed type," as Huxley termed it, which apparently survives in the narrow-headed element in our present population. Klaatsch, indeed, dubbed him the Aurignacian man, but of the merits of Klaatsch as an authority the less said the better. Surely in the present state of our knowledge it is better to keep rigidly apart the terminologies severally applied to the various forms of culture and bodily conformation. Aurignacian, Solutrian, Magdalenian stand for successive cultures as indicated by different forms of flint industry and so on. To correlate these with successive waves of population marked by somatic peculiarities may or may not be possible in the future. It certainly cannot be done yet, and to mix up terms belonging to the two series can but help to confuse the issue.

Let us pass on to Mr. James' attempt to reconstruct the manners and customs, and in particular the religion, of these "children of the morning." Little can be made from this point of view of the Early Palaeolithic, not to speak of the more doubtful Proto-palaeolithic, in which Mr. James, after hearing Mr. Reid Morison's arguments, is most persuaded to believe. But as soon as cave-life begins, or at any rate can be studied by us, some idea can be formed of the corresponding social and moral conditions. Thus the burials of the Middle Palaeolithic are extraordinarily interesting as showing that the belief in an after-life was not confined to Homo sapiens. But of the later cave-men we can learn far more, more especially if we include among them the Spanish cave-artists who at Cogul or Alaper have left us gene pictures of themselves in all their bravery. Indeed, that the men of the Late Palaeolithic resembled modern savages in their mental outlook by this time an old story, even if only for the most part conveyed in scattered hints. In 1876 Bernardin de Saint-Pierre said to them with totemism on the strength of the designs engraved on the so-called bâtons-de-commandement. In 1882 Andrew Lang suggested that a magical or pictographic—in any case a practical—object was subserved by the cave-drawings, which thus were no outcome of the cult of art for art's sake. Then, from about 1900 onwards, MM. Sablonniére, Chauvet, Capitan, Mr. A. B. Cook, Professor Sollas and others have dealt with the fast-accumulating evidence from the European caves in terms of totems, charivaris, rataples, and so on, borrowed from the savages and more especially from the Australian aborigines of to-day. In the same spirit, then, Mr. James seeks to enter into the soul of these long-vanished peoples, so that the reader approaching the subject for the first time may come into living touch with his distant forefathers. Then let such a reader, if he can, visit Niaux or Tuc d’Audoubert or Castillo. Let him gaze at the very footprint of the painter or dancer, the very throne of the medicine-man; and there will be revealed to him, by telepathy as it were, the idealism that is bound up with the age-long vitality of mankind.

R. R. M.

POLITICIANS IN PEACE AND WAR

Mr. Lloyd George and the War. By Walter Roch. (Chatto & Windus. 16s. net.)

HAD it not been for the war one of the most puzzling phenomena which could have been presented to the men of this generation would have been the prestige of the politician. During a prolonged period of peace the amount of printed matter and conversation that is devoted to the doings of politicians becomes more and more fantastic the more one thinks about it. So far as can be seen, their sole direct reaction upon the actual life of the community is expressed by slight variations in taxation. It is perfectly obvious that science, pure and applied, all branches of learning and of the arts, including those that are of practical utility, invention and novel commercial enterprises, are all developed either in complete independence of the world of politics or, as sometimes happens, in spite of obstacles created by the stupidity and indifference of politicians. Modern civilization—in fact, almost every desirable and undesirable element in modern life—owes practically nothing, for good or for evil, to politicians.

Why, then, do these singularly ineffectual people excite so much public attention? The reasons are obviously manifold, but we think that part of the attraction springs from the fact that the world of politics is finite, clear and simple. A few elementary maxims, a few stereotyped issues, and behold, all things are made plain! The thousand intricate inquiries which, in the real world, must be examined for the right understanding of, say, the commercial relations of one nation to another become, in the world of politics, Free Trade or Tariff Reform. No solution which cannot be obtained by counting on one’s fingers is valid in the world of politics. This simplified world bears hardly any relation, of course, to the real world, but it gives sufficiently simple-minded people the illusion that they understand and control affairs. Such people are, in any country, in the majority, and hence politics is popular and politicians are supported. Some of the politicians are themselves simple-minded enough to take their occupation seriously; they look back over a life which has seen the introduction of the telephone, the telegraph, electric traction, antiseptic surgery and flying, and sum up their personal achievement by saying they have consistently advocated the disestablishment of the Church of England.

If this were all that could be said for him, however, we do not think the politician would so long have survived his patent uselessness. We think that, apart from his value as a figure in the dream-world of the ordinary person, the fact that the politician can make war is always present, perhaps not consciously, in the minds of the community. This is the point where the politician touches reality, and it is an unescapable illustration of the overwhelmingly irrational nature of human communities that this most pregnant and dreadful of actual things should be in the hands of this fantastic figure, this creature of popular ignorance and Cup-Tie emotions. During the last four years we have scrutinized our politicians more closely. We have observed them during a war they did not foresee, that they were unable to control and that they cannot finish. The fault has not been theirs. A man who obtains a job in a circus for his ability to jump through paper hoops should not suddenly be required to run an electric power station. The system is wrong. It is useless for him, however, to stand in the midst of the wrecked dynamos and to shout that he has been a complete success. It does not matter much one way or the other, since the facts will go on working themselves out. But for those who are irritated by absurdities of this kind Mr. Roch’s book will prove interesting. It is a discussion of the part played by diplomats—quite unintentionally, for the most part—in causing the war, so far as they did cause it, and in particular of Mr. Lloyd George’s performances before and during the war. Readers with a robust sense of reality will find the whole thing, in its application merely to Mr. Lloyd George, something of a storm in a tea-cup. A cool and documented analysis of the activities of the whole race of politicians and of the system which produces them might be of real value—but that would take us into quite different questions. Mr. Roch’s book is written throughout, however, in the extraordinary language used by authorities on politics.

This language may be described as that of naive personification, and it produces on the unsophisticated reader an effect of complete unreality. Thus France, England, Germany, are said to be desiring or not to be desiring to “expand,” or to be in a state of “tension” about something, these statements meaning that a few gentlemen, for some reason or perhaps for no reason, are on the verge of quarrelling with one another. If the quarrel became really serious these gentlemen would threaten war, i.e., they would arrange for millions of people to fight one another. The finding of reasons justifying the fight to the people who do the fighting is recognized, of course, as being necessary and is never a difficult matter. In reading Mr. Roch’s account of the Moroccan crises, for instance, we discover that Europe was more than once on the brink of war. We quite believe it, but we cannot see what the war would really have about. The annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina produced another crisis. There was no war, and “Slavdom was humiliated, for the Tsar gave way.” What does “Slavdom” mean here? Who was humiliated? This puerile personification of nations belongs to the unreality of politics; the tragedy is that the insignificant realities denoted by such phrases do lead to wars.

Mr. Roch says but little about Mr. Lloyd George. His book is chiefly an account of the activities of a number of politicians, of whom Mr. Lloyd George is one, during the war. He has no difficulty in showing that Mr. Lloyd George’s ideas on how the war should be conducted were probably wrong, and that a number of people formed a sounder judgment on the facts. We can see that some politicians would chuckle over this and that others would squirm, but is it not a work of supererogation? Surely it is generally accepted that war is a highly technical business, and is it not probable that any amateur opinion would be wrong? The fact that Mr. Lloyd George did not get his way shows that expert opinion overruled him. Had he been possessed of despotic powers his lack of training would probably have made him a grave public danger, and, even as things are, we are inclined to agree that politicians have too much control in purely technical affairs. But the real function of the politician in war-time is, we take it, to make gestures which hearten the people. He should speak, rather frequently, about such things as determination, justice, glory and the wickedness of the enemy, because all this helps the morale of the people. Mr. Lloyd George seems to us to have done this as well as, or perhaps better than, other politicians. That he did not really win the war is a contention which hardly necessitates two hundred pages to demonstrate.

J. W. N. S.
AMUSEMENT

Sir Limpidus. By Marmaduke Pickthall. (Collins. 7s. net.)

COME hither, all who love a merry jest!" cries the small boy who discovers that Limpidus Fitzbeare has made no end of an ass of himself. His words might be taken as Mr. Marmaduke Pickthall's advice to his readers while he unfolds, with immense gusto and high spirits, the tale of one whose success in life was the result of his quite remarkable talent for doing and saying the asinine thing. And the asinine thing is, in this connection, the right thing, the sound thing, the kind of thing which stamped an Englishman as superior to the whole rest of the world, as a being whose life was divided (and rightly divided) between enjoying his vast preserve, England, and keeping the foreigner, the outsider, and the man whom one did not know, in his rightful place.

Sir Limpidus Fitzbeare was born at Clearfount Abbey in the sixties under a cloudless sky, and he might be said to have basked his life through in the same brilliant weather. He was the heir to vast estates; his income was seventy thousand pounds a year, and his excellent father, Sir Rusticus, so ordered his education that by the time he came of age he was capable of enjoying to the full these by no means paltry advantages. From a "priver" he passed to the famous old school which, in his father's words, "takes the corners off a man and forms him on the proper pattern for an Englishman of our condition who doesn't want to stare at in the streets of London."

A fellow who has not been through it is handicapped in life especially one who has been brought up by women who give too much importance to religion. You'll find out what is done by people of your sort, and learn to do it naturally. You'll learn to put religion, art, learning and literature, and all such matters in their proper place, and not attach too much importance to 'em...

It was while there that his remarkable talent for discovering the right thing first pushed into the light, and, the conditions being perfectly congenial, grew at such a rate that by the time he was ready for Cambridge, it had attained its full height. Indeed, such was its power that he became absorbed into it—part of it—and could not be seen, except for a moment or two, for its flowers and leaves and fruits. So that in spite of Cambridge, London, the diplomatic service, a seat in Parliament, fame, lovely women, and finally a place in the Cabinet, he remained the boy he was, walking in the middle of the street "with a certain swing, the chin in air, the elbows raised and managing a tightly-rolled-up umbrella in a certain way."

Had the perfect weather continued, we see no reason why Sir Limpidus should not have been one of the most successful Prime Ministers England has ever had. But alas! a year or two before the war the glass began to fall, and there was such an ugly look in the political sky, such a disagreeable sense of an impending storm, that he and his colleagues welcomed wholeheartedly the Supreme Diversion.

Mr. Marmaduke Pickthall's energy never flags. He carries his book along at a great pace, yet he misses nothing on the way that will give point to his story. But—time! Have we the time to spare for it all? Once we have given the sum—once we have added it up and found it comes to "Sir Limpidus"—have we the time to go on proving and pressing it, and finding, with a chuckle that lasts through two hundred and fifty-four pages, that the answer is always the same?"

We are the children of an ungracious and a greedy age. Perhaps it is not so much that we are difficult to amuse, but we are quickly tired. Repetition—the charm of knowing what is coming, of beating the tune and being ready with the smile and the laugh at just the right moment, no longer has the power to soothe and distasteful. It wakes in us a demon of restlessness, a fever to break out of the circle of the tune, however brilliant the tune may be.

K. M.

PORTRAIT OF A CHILD

Coggins. By Ernest Oldmeadow. (Grant Richards. 7s. net.)

W E have more than once entertained a suspicion that Mary hated her little lamb and could not bear the way it persisted in running after her, rocking along on its little grey-white legs, stopping dead for a moment, and then rocking along again. As to the time when it followed her to school, we imagine that really was the last straw, and no doubt she joined the other children laughing and sporting at sight of the silly little thing standing in the doorway with its blue bow and its mild eyes. By late years we have been called upon to play the pet lamb to so many young authors that the tables are turned—so much so that our little is become a positive gran of dismay when Mary or her little brother drags us off to school. And if that school be moreover a public school, and the child a well-fed, chubby little child fresh from the bosom of his upper middle-class family—if we are called upon to share once more the feelings of the new boy—why, then we are hard put it to not to turn into lions and devour our leaders.

But Mr. Oldmeadow makes no such demands on behalf of his little hero, Harry Coggins, aged ten years and eleven months, son of William Coggins, marine-store dealer, the Carlisle Bank, Belford Dock. It is true Harry does go to school and he is a new boy, but there his resemblance to those other children ends. This strange, extraordinarily attractive little personality is Mr. Oldmeadow's discovery, and from the moment we meet him talking to George Placker we are prepared to follow him to school or anywhere he may like to take us.

Coggins is an only child. His father calls himself a marine-store dealer, but he is in fact a rag-and-bones man, and—the time being 1851, and school inspectors unknown plagues—his son is more or less a working man in the firm. But among the rubbish there were often torn books and papers, and these attracted little Coggins—so much so that he got a man at the sawmills to teach him to read for shilling a year or two of his pocket money of one penny a week. Having learned to read, he becomes his own schoolmaster, and at the time he talks to George Placker at the canal-side he knows enough to be eligible for the Samuel Robson Scholarship which would admit him to the Belford Grammar School. Placker is the leader of the atheists, Chartists, infielders and traitors in the town, and he determines that Harry Coggins shall win that scholarship to spite the governing classes and give the rich a fright.

So the unprecedented thing happens. Harry enters for the scholarship; he is examined, in the absence of the headmaster, by the rector, and, in face of the most violent opposition on the part of the same headmaster and three-fourths of the town, the rector judges him the successful candidate. There follows a strange, deep disturbance in the town, and all caused by little Coggins, with his white face and large grey-blue eyes, his boots that are much too big, and his clothes that are too heavy. He is thrown by Placker and Company into the quiet pool, and great widening ripples flow away and away from him, and are not quenched when the book ends. But it is Coggins who matters—Coggins, meeting the rector the morning after the scholarship and explaining that he taught himself writing and Latin.

What made you skip the first decensions?—And why did you skip the cardinal numbers?...and you seem to have passed over the fourth conjugation of verbs.

In his desire to be deferential Coggins rose from his seat and stood beside the pile of planks:
NOTES FROM IRELAND

It very frequently happens that the popular estimate of an Irish writer in England is not the same as in Ireland. Authors and publishers in this country have to decide very often whether their wares are designed for the English or Irish market, for success in the one does not necessarily involve success in the other, and may actually preclude it. The fact has only the significance implied by the evident differences of taste and outlook, for in both countries there have been failures to recognize work of merit. It is sometimes asserted by critics who think imperially that most of our Irish swans are geese, but it is the habit of allowing oneself with a wink the conviction that the general feeling is a true one of many contemporary reputations elsewhere. Our experience of some of the Irish writers most popular outside their own country does not reassure us, when reputations established in Ireland are depreciated by the literary imperialists. We claim the right of self-determination even in the matter of "best-sellers." The amazing compositions of piety, patriotism and prudery which enjoy the suffrages of the anonymous mass of plenitude in Ireland would—if one could read them—compare quite favourably with their British equivalents.

The author of "Irish Books and Irish People" (The Talbot Press and Fisher Unwin, 8s. net) is one of those fortunate writers who appeals to both the English and the Irish reader. The fact is all the more remarkable because Mr. Stephen Gwynn is a critic, a race of men notoriously unpopular in small countries, where the subjects of their meditations cannot ignore them personally so easily as in a large centre of various groups and coteries. In Copenhagen, for example, I found that the mere mention of Georg Brandes was sufficient to divide Denmark into two parties: the pro- and anti-Briandites; and every one had a personal reason for his attitude. In Dublin to be critical is to live dangerously, yet Mr. Stephen Gwynn's latest book, like its predecessors, has been received with praise. People with vendettas and grievances against others (who have failed to admire their work) unite in hailing Mr. Gwynn as the one and indivisible Irish critic. They regret that he has given to politics what was meant for mankind—or that Irish section thereof which has been misunderstood by his colleagues in the gentle art.

This volume of essays will explain the mystery. It deals, for the most part, with subjects which enable the author to avoid offence to the living. The allusions to his own contemporaries are almost all brief and favourable. The intermittent attention which Mr. Gwynn has been obliged to give to literary criticism, although deprecated by some admirers, has proved his salvation. As the provocative (and recently written) foreword says, it would not have been possible for him to preserve indefinitely that air of being above the battle which renders these essays so urbane. At first one marvels at his capacity for defending a real admiration for modern literature of a very different kind, with an apparently equal appreciation of all that fox-hunting, Leveresque fiction which has been the stock-in-trade of the circulationists since Maria Edgeworth first provided them with the types they have elaborated. It was precisely the substitution of a national literature in the English language for that stereotyped convention of Anglo-Ireland, for English consumption, which gave the so-called Irish Literary Revival its significance and raison d'être. In such essays as "Novels of Irish Life in the Nineteenth Century," "A Century of Irish Humour" and "Yesterday in Ireland," Mr. Gwynn discusses with sympathy and penetration the period of Irish history and literature which most of the younger generation regard as respectively exasperating and sordid. In a few minutes he has done what so many of us have left undone, and he has done it so well that his book cannot fail to give pleasure and information to every class of reader.

If the transition from that calm literary haven to the affairs of the moment is abrupt, it is not more so than the event which has provided the real commodity. Here with their most urgent problem. It is now five weeks since a party of soldiers, in full trench equipment, raid the offices of The Freeman's Journal, the oldest of our nationalist papers. Vital parts of the printing machines were removed and the journal was suppressed. Unless a document, marked secret, is signed ready for its reissue will be given. Naturally the proprietors have refused their rights of fair comment in this way. Who all care for the liberty of the press, and those of us who are engaged in literary or journalistic work particularly, are impressed by the indifference of all but a handful of English commentators. Whatever the offence of The Freeman's Journal, it could have been dealt with adequately under existing laws. Yet there are no signs that the denial of ordinary legal privileges has stirred the imagination of the British world of letters, whose existence is governed by the mutual observance of the conventions between the State and the press. Surely it is of vital importance to all concerned for the things of the mind that armistice force shall not be employed against them. The bayonet and Lewis gun are mightier than the pen. In less enlightened and democratic ages another opinion was current, and men were not afraid to assert and defend it. Avez-vous changé tout cela? B.

[Although The Freeman's Journal has been permitted to reappear since the above was written, we have retained our correspondent's protest against the action of the Government, since we share his opinion that the affair has been unduly neglected by those whom it chiefly concerns—Ed.]

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTES

This collection of autograph letters and historical documents belonging to the late Mr. Fairfax Murray which is to be sold on Thursday and Friday next week is one which will hardly be formed again, and could only have been got together by a man with his exceptional capacity. To obtain a day's sale consists of autograph letters and manuscripts of celebrated artists arranged in 163 lots, but the whole will be offered in the first instance as a single collection, and one hopes that it will be preserved in that form for some public institution. Running through the catalogue is almost like glancing through a history of the last fifty-five years—this century and the first part of the nineteenth. The autographs selected for reproduction in the illustrated catalogue (price 2s. 6d.) include a very characteristic letter of Blake to Cumberland, written four months before his death; a specification by Michael Angelo for the tomb of Julius II. in his beautiful Italian hand; a letter from Celini to Cosimo de' Medici; another from Albrecht Dürer, written from Venice to Pirkeymer; a letter from Titian; and a fine manuscript of Leonardo's on the flight of birds, with sketches illustrating his ideas. This collection would amply furnish forth the exhibition galleries of any museum even of the first order.

The second day's sale is of more general interest. It contains original poems by Baudelaire, William Morris, and others; criticism by Ruskin, Swinburne and Browning; original letters of Lucretia Borgia, Bianco Capella, Josephine, Marguerite de Valois, Catherine de' Medici and other celebrated ladies; of half a hundred musicians, monarchs, and priests; and a wonderful letter from the French Great Council to the échevins, bourgeoisie, and inhabitants of Albi, giving them the news of the defeat and capture of the King at Poitiers, and summoning deputies to an assembly at Paris. The sale concludes with a number of documents relating to Mary, Queen of Scots—some with signatures by some of his friends in 1566; an account of Davison's expenses in Scotland as Elizabeth's agent in 1584, and four documents relating to the affairs of the Bishop of Ross in 1578.
Science

PASTEUR

THE LIFE OF PASTEUR. By Renée Valley-Radot. Translated from the French by Mrs. R. L. Devonshire, with Introduction by Sir William Osler. (Constable, 10s. 6d. net.)

It has been said that History is but the record of individual action, and in the Life of Louis Pasteur we read in truth the history of a period of time. It is a life that limitless horizons to the mind, for Pasteur was a giant among men of genius and a prophet in the world of Science. Beyond this, his life stirs every emotion by the consuming interest it creates in the man himself. His character makes its appeal to sympathy and love in the trials he experienced and in the deep affection that he felt for his family and friends. No one need fear to find in this life of a great man a mere record of grand achievement or a dry tale of scientific discovery: it is the great story of a human life that has its inspiration and its depth in the character that it portrays.

Modesty was a marked trait in Pasteur’s character. He neither courted favour nor looked for public applause, and when he achieved the recognition and success that seldom come to great men in their lifetime, he received his honours in the name of Science and accepted them as credit to his native land. He ascribed his success to perseverance in effort, a principle instilled into him by his father. His work was inspired by a love for humanity, tempered by a strong feeling of patriotism, and by a constant desire to establish the truth. He was generous in giving credit to pupils and colleagues who worked with him, and to his dying day he expressed the reverence and obligation that he felt for the men of science who had been his early masters.

It is always difficult to determine wherein genius lies, but in his work Pasteur showed an ingenuity of thought and a courage that were remarkable. He was a most acute observer, and on this depended his first chain to fame, for it led him to the recognition of asymmetrical facets on crystals of tartaric acid. His work was characterized by scrupulous care and attention to detail, yet in spite of painstaking and laborious technique he had the energy to make a careful record of his observations. Then, with a bold courage and the mind of a philosopher, he would follow wherever his observations led him. His mind reached out to ultimate causes and fundamental conceptions. His work on tartrates led him to see the world in terms of molecular dissymmetry; in lactic acid and butyric fermentation he found an answer to questions that revolve round the problem of Life and Death.

In these great flights of mind he was led into the controversy on spontaneous generation. Dumas, Biot and others attempted to dissuade him from entering so large a field, thinking he would dissipate his energies. Pasteur could not be restrained. He tackled the vast problem on the simple lines of direct experiment, and established an experimental basis of fact that remains beyond criticism to this day. Goethe once said that as soon as a man has done anything remarkable, there seems to be a general conspiracy to prevent him from doing anything remarkable again. Never was this more truly said of a man than of Pasteur. He was assailed by his opponents with the bitterness of religious zeal; he received recognition and honours that would time and again have turned a smaller man from his daily work. Nor was he left in peace to work out the problems that he set himself. The reason for this was partly in his own character. He believed that the results of scientific discovery should be put to immediate practical use, and he was thus led from his laboratory into commercial questions of the day. He loved teaching, too, and the popularization of science led him to lecture to lay audiences and expound his discoveries to all who had a real interest in them.

In addition to this the State from time to time made calls on his services and directed his energies towards the elucidation of problems of national importance. Starting his scientific career as a mineralogist, he became a chemist. In the study of fermentation he became a biologist, and a demand was made on his services by the wine industry of France. Though he had never seen a silkworm, at urgent request he undertook an examination into the cause of silkworm disease—a task that occupied five years of his life. He was claimed again for the study of anthrax, for chicken cholera and by the brewing industry—yet his thought and plan followed the ever tenor of its way. He gradually turned into the fields of medicine and surgery and thus laid a beacon light on sepsis and nitrode disease, making researches that found their application in aseptic surgery and led finally to the climax of his life—the discovery of the cure for Rabies.

It is in this last great experiment, the first human experiment that he performed, that we see Pasteur in his great humanity. It was a boy aged nine, bitten two days before by a mad dog, that was brought to him. His laboratory experiments had been done. He could cure dogs and rabbits. Could he cure a boy? Did he dare? We see him after a consultation with Vulpian giving the first injection of a 14-days’ attenuated culture, innocuous in itself. Then on successive days increasing virulent inoculations had to be given, and as he approached the lethal doses he was a prey to most acute anxiety. He passed sleepless nights, fearing for the boy’s life, and still he carried on: it was his duty. Finally, the last dose was given, and as the days elapsed, he knew the boy’s life was saved!

The balance of his greatness and his power is seen in the variety of scientific fields in which he worked, in the great effort he made to popularize science and in the practical application that he found for the fruits of scientific discovery. For Pasteur, Science was international, but, he insisted, the scientist must love his country. To establish Truth he took “the instant way”; knowing that “Honour travels in a strait so narrow, when a door doth abrise, he kept the path. In the work and energy of men of science he saw the future greatness of his beloved France.

POPULAR SCIENTIFIC PERIODICALS

The first article in the February number of Contempor (Wireless Press, Is. net) deals with theories of man’s descent from the apes. The derivation suggested by Mr. Wells in his “Outline of History” is shown to be unsatisfactory, and other theories are placed before the reader. The article is thoroughly intelligible and interesting; the point is clearly made that the shape of the foot is of great importance in tracing descent, and the author, who is the Superintendent of the Zoological Gardens, concludes that “no claim to the discovery of the so-called ‘missing link’ should be entertained until the foot has been produced as evidence.” Of the other articles, perhaps the most interesting are those on “Ghosts and the Gypsies” Professor Bragg’s Christmas Lectures on Sound at the Royal Institution are also attractively reproduced.

We found “Comment fonctionne un laboratoire de police technique” the most interesting article in the January number of La Science et la Vie (Paris, 13, Rue d’Angleterre, 21s.). The illustrations (a special feature of this periodical) are here very effective, and should prove many useful hints to writers of detective stories. The mélangé of “Inventions réalisées pour la défense nationale” is instructive, although in this case some of the pictures seem chosen for their “horrors” and not for their scientific interest. An article on “La photographie thomique” gives an excellent account of the elements of the subject. There is no point in merely enumerating the different articles; suffice it to say that the number is distinctly a good one. Comparing the two periodicals, we see that the French magazine is more specialized than its English equivalent. Conquest is rather broader and less detailed. But the French have a number of periodicals dealing with scientific ideas in a popular way, whereas in this country we have scarcely one.

SOCIETIES

ARISTOTELIAN. January 19.—Professor Wildon Carr, Vice-President, in the chair.—Professor J. A. Smith read a paper on “The Philosophy of Giovanni Gentile.” The paper began with a general characterization of the remarkable career of the leading philosopher of Graeco-Roman antiquity, Mr. H. H. Hildebrandsson, of the University, Upsala, was presented on his behalf to the Swedish Minister.

Sir Napier Shaw delivered an address on “Pioneers in the Science of the Weather.”

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES. January 15.—Sir Hercules Read, President, in the chair.

The following were elected Fellows: Messrs. F. C. Eden, H. W. Finkel, R. G. Foster, R. L. Lloyd, and J. H. Renton, Dr. S. J. M. Price and Sir William Watts. January 22.—Professor J. L. Myres and Mr. L. H. D. Buxton communicated a paper on “Excavations in Cyprus in 1913,” on behalf of the Cyprus Exploration Fund. The Field Museum of Chicago has provided a sum of $450 for antiquarian research, excavations undertaken in the summer of 1913 by Professor Myres, with the assistance of Mr. Menelaos Markides, the Keeper of the Cyprus Museum, and Mr. L. H. D. Buxton.

The first site excavated was near the village of Levkoniko in the Famagusta district, where some large statues had recently been found by the villagers. A small rural sanctuary was cleared, containing a remarkable deposit of stone sculptures, representing all periods of workmanship from the seventh century B.C. to the Graeco-Roman period, and almost unique for the brilliant preservation of its painted surfaces. At Embi, near Salamin, two tombs were opened in the necropolis whence the British Museum obtained a fine series of late Minoan antiquities. But this site is now nearly exhausted; only two tombs were found intact, and the results of the operations here were mainly topographical.

At Lampousa, near Lapeithos, on the north coast, where important Byzantine treasures had been found at various times, a small area of the site was completely cleared, and found to have been deeply quarried and quite rebuilt in the Roman period. Objects, however, of Hellenic and even of late Bronze Age styles were found in the debris. Between Lapethos and the sea an unusually rich series of tombs of early and middle Bronze Age, quite undisturbed, yielded many bronze implements, a large quantity of typical pottery, and a remarkable type of conventionalized figures. It was possible, for the first time, to determine the mode of interment and the physical characters of the population.

At Larnaca a complete section of the Bamboula Hill provided the first stratified series of Cyproite pottery, and important guidance for the topography and history of ancient Kition.

The objects found in these excavations are in the Cyprus Museum.

FORFORTHCOMING MEETINGS

Mon. 2. Institute of Actuaries, 5.— Some Further Suggestions on the Subject of Approximate Valuations, Mr. Alfred Henry: “A New Method of Valuing Policies in Groups,” Mr. H. L. Trachtenberg.

Royal Institution, 5.—General Meeting.

King’s College, 5.30.—The Apocalypse, Lecture I., Arch. Schweich Lectures.

Royal Institution, 5.30.—Outlines of Greek History: The Dark Age, 365-718, Professor A. J. Toynbee.

University College, 5.30.—The Library as a Laboratory, Professor A. F. Pollard.

Dr. Williams’ Library (41 Gordon Square, W.C.), 6.—The Analysis of Mind, Lecture XI., Mr. Bertrand Russell.

Antistotelian, 8.— Discussion on Lossky’s “Intuitive Basis of Knowledge,” to be opened by Mrs. N. A. Duddington.

Society of Arts, 8.— Aircraft Photography in War and Peace, Lecture III., Capt. H. Hamshaw Thomas. (Cantor Lecture.)

Geographical, 8.30.— Air Routes of the Empire, Sir Frederick Bridge.

Tues. 3. Royal Institution, 3.— Elephants and Ethnologists, Professor G. Elliot Smith.

Society of Arts, 4.30.— Tropical Departments of Agriculture, Special Reference to the West Indies, Sir Francis Watts. (Colonial Section.)

Wed. 4. University College, 3.— History and Drama in the Divina Commedia, Lecture II., Dr. E. Gardner. (Barlow Lectures.)

Royal Archaeological Institute, 4.30.— Some Mid-Suffolk Churches and their Woodwork, Mr. F. E. Howard.

Society of Arts, 4.30.— The English Language and International Trade, Mr. A. E. Hayes.

Geological, 5.30.— Geological Sections through the Andes of Peru and Bolivia: 1. From the Port of Mollendo to the Inamuray River, Mr. J. A. Douglas. King’s College, 5.30.—The German Revolution, Professor G. Young.

University College, 5.30.— An Outline of the Campaign in Mesopotamia, Lecture III., General Sir John Robertson. (Philip Lecture.)

University College, 5.30.— The Changes as shown by Comparative Law in the Rights and Duties attaching to Property, Lecture I., Sir John Macdonell.

Thurs. 5. Royal Institution, 3.— Recent Progress in Applied Optics, Lecture I., Professor A. E. Conrady.

Royal Society, 4.30.— Linman, S.—On the Existence of Two Fundamentally Different Types of Characters in Organisms, Dr. R. Ruggles Gates.

University College, 5.30.— Italian Literature, Lecture III., Professor E. G. Cipriani. (Italian.)

Fri. 6. King’s College, 4.— Ecclesiastical Art, Lecture IV., Professor P. Dearmer.

University College, 5.— Italian Society in the Renaissance, Lecture II., Dr. E. Gardner.

King’s College, 5.30.— Historical Theories of Space, Time, and Movement: The Antinomies—Zeno, Kant, Bradley, Professor H. Wildon Carr.
Fine Arts

THE TRIUMPH OF PHOTOGRAPHY

It is usual to underrate the influence of photography on the Fine Arts; yet it is no exaggeration to say that the whole history of modern art is the history of the struggle between art and photography. Modern art dates from the invention of photography, and is, in fact, nothing but a series of reactions set in motion by this new rival.

Artists at first attempted to ignore the existence of photography. Then German portrait painters like Lenbach and Herkomer, with practical minds, saw the possibilities of its exploitation in their hank portrait practice; they were followed by the illustrators and the so-called commercial draughtsmen, who soon began to use photographs instead of studies from nature, and who continue to do so everywhere to this day. But the conquest of these minor lights was a mere bagatelle to photography, which was all the time directing its main attack against the artists proper, entrenched in their bizarre dot-chalks. This enemy was prepared to make terms with the small fry, and to conclude treaties for mutual advantage. But between photography and the grand artists who affected to despise it there could be nothing but war to the death; and shrewd observers could see that the artists were bound to be beaten in the long run unless they were prepared to revise their standards.

To-day we can look back at a battle which has lasted over half a century and examine the various steps which photography has taken to undermine the artists' position. We shall find that it has relied primarily on the moral weapon. And if it has won through now, it is because it has succeeded in destroying the artists' nerve.

The mere fact of the existence of the camera knocked all the fun out of the representational function of painting. It killed the magician air which artists had exploited for centuries, and it immediately usurped the privilege of recording. As the camera developed into the Kodak and the Cinematograph the futility of competition with the dazzling efficiency of these machines became more and more obvious. And the realization of this by the artists was the first blow to their moral.

The second was the negative attitude which they soon found themselves adopting in their work. They began consciously to avoid photographic effects in their pictures. For the first time in the history of art, the artists set out not so much to achieve a definite thing as to avoid one. The weakness of such an attitude is obvious; the old nonchalance of the artist had now gone; for it is hard to be debonair when you are running away.

The third blow was the assimilation of the photographic vision, which established itself in a few years as the normal human vision; an artist could only retain or acquire a personal vision by an effort of will. And some such effort was imperative all the time; for the photographic vision, which sees things in terms of superficial appearance, is the antithesis of the artistic vision, which sees them in terms of real form.

And as if these harassing effects of the enemy's onslaught were not enough, the artists themselves prepared the way for another blow by encouraging the dissemination of photographs of the world's masterpieces. Their brains and eyes were thus filled with a thousand conflicting standards and points of view just when they were in greatest need of personal vision. Photography disguised as Fine Art was quick to see a further opportunity; it stepped into the breach, fostered the critical faculty in the artists, and thereby struck its final blow at their creative initiative.

All the recent movements in painting, from Manet to Picasso, are attempts on the part of the artists to react against these paralyzing effects of photography. The Impressionists made no effort to avoid the photographic vision; they accepted it, and fought in fact the basis of their creed. But each member of the group tried in his own way to avoid the dreaded photographic picture. Manet could have painted more naturalistically than he did at the height of his power; but he deliberately set out to make a painting of a head look more like paint than a head. He was the first European artist who consciously avoided naturalism. From Giotto to Ingres there is not a single artist who did not paint as naturalistically as he possibly could. But the competition of the camera drove Manet to simplify his lights and mix up his beautiful pink paste as defensive measures. Monet and the Pointillists put their faith in their scientific colour vibrations; Degas experimented in texture and Oriental composition. The Post-Impressionists on the other hand fought hard against the photographic vision, which they imagined to be the weak spot in Impressionism. They pinned their faith to synthesis, which was their attempt to regain the lost artist-vision. And once again each man tried in his own way to contribute to the new negative art—the art of avoiding the photograph. Van Gogh made each stroke of the brush or pen a definite reflex of his burning brain, and perished thereby from exhaustion. Gauguin fled in desperation to the South Sea Islands, Cézanne trudged painfully round the Louvre. In our own day Matisse and the Expressionists shelter behind incompleteness; the fear of the enemy is heavy upon them. They do not trust themselves to attempt anything more than a sketch.

Finally come the Cubists and Vorticists, who have no illusions about the forlorn position of painting behind these hastily improvised defences. They have taken counsel together and decided to abandon the present battlefield and attempt life afresh elsewhere. Their doctrine of Abstract Art marks the triumph of Photography in the field of Representation.

The fight has been waged almost exclusively in France, and the French artists have shown the greatest courage, resource and enthusiasm, and have given the world a series of pictures only comparable as evidence of the human spirit to the works of the transitional middle period of the Italian Renaissance. But they were defending a lost cause from the outset.

The present chaotic state of art, with half the artists clinging to worn-out traditions, and the other half throwing a golden heritage to the winds, must be regarded as the aftermath of the struggle of which we have outlined the phases. In subsequent articles an attempt will be made to analyse the effect of the struggle on our standards of criticism, and to set up some landmarks for the rising generation of students.

R. H. W.

The editors of the Architectural Review (27, Tothill Street, Westminster, S.W. 1) have devoted their last issue to a record of the Peace Decorations in London and the consolidation of plans for a suitable Headquarters of the League of Nations, which various writers wish to see at Geneva, Malta or Constantinople. The illustrations to an article on “The Ruins in the War Area” make us wonder if architecture may not find inspiration in the havoc wrought by the war. The Ypres buildings are much better evidence of the abuse of buildings as they stand, and the mutilation of such figures as the smiling Angel and the Queen of Sheba on the West Front of Reims Cathedral is pure loss to the world. But it Notre Dame de Bruxelles, Albert, really looks to-day as it appears in Captain Crowe’s drawing we can imagine artists making pilgrimages to study its proportions. Possibly the creation of fortuitous new forms by bombardment may leave subconscious impressions on men’s minds which will give us new forms in architecture.
The Renoir nude at the Eldar Gallery was painted in 1888, that is to say, at the end of the short period directly influenced by his Italian visit, and it is a good example of his transitional method. It lacks the fragrance of the more completely personal work of the earlier and later periods, but the modelling of the figure is very complete and makes the adjacent Bonnard nude look dark and unattractive (but this may be due to the extremely bad lighting). The early Gauguin painting on the opposite wall is extremely charming, apparently of the same period as the Gauguin picture now at the Leicester Galleries. The influence of Renoir is obvious in both; but the pointiliste method could not long satisfy Gauguin's opulent nature. Compared with Van Gogh's work, Gauguin's Tahitian pictures always appear rather soft and romantic. To appraise them at their real value they should be seen next to pictures by Renoir or next to Gauguin's own early work of the type of this Silver Stream.' "The little lighthearted sketch by M. Matisse, hung among the drawings, is agreeable in colour—the greys and pinks might have been mixed on Manet's palette—but there is a good deal of quite meaningless mess between the masts of the ship. Other paintings represented in this interesting little collection include Boudin, Pissarro (a charming and unexpected file champêtre), Degas, Monet and Signac.

At the New Art Space we have to look at pictures to the accompaniment of a Jazz band which plays in the dance club situated on the floor below the galleries. This may be conducive to the right mood for appreciating such painters as M. Kissling and M. Fergusson, whose pictures are able to hold their own against the most insistent One Step, but we found it very disturbing before the paintings of M. Lhote, an artist whose emotional intellectuality presupposes a certain degree of calm and sensibility in the spectator. At least two of his exhibits are of very fine quality, and we believe them to be the most important works in the collection, which is largely made up of pictures already recently exhibited elsewhere in London.

Mr. Ernest Collings is attracted by the lure of the recent developments of painting, but he has not, so far, digested the principles which lie behind them. His landscape sketches show that he has a delicate sense of colour; we see no reason why he should be false to it in order to be "in the movement." After all, a picture is not necessarily good because the forms are outlined in black, or necessarily bad because they are not.

EXHIBITIONS OF THE WEEK

P. & D. COLNAGHI & CO.—Drawings and Studies by Charles Shannon, A.R.A.

ELDAR GALLERY.—Paintings and Drawings by Modern French Artists.

NEW ART SALON, 180, SHAFFTUBURY AVENUE.—Paintings by Contemporary French and English Artists.

THE STUDY, 88, DAVYTON GALLERY, S.W.—Drawings and Paintings by Ernest H. R. Collins.

At Messrs. Colnaghi's Gallery we were reminded of a little scene we witnessed some time ago in a Bloomsbury drawing room. A group of enthusiastic young people were quarrelling over the theory of Imagism, the later manner of Mr. James Joyce and other contemporary literary experiments. When ever the disputants paused, a middle-aged lady in an armchair said, "That's in the air of finality," like Swinburne's "sombre coming," to which nobody paid the slightest attention, although it was repeated a number of times. Mr. Charles Shannon's position in relation to the art conflicts of the day is rather like the position of the lady in the armchair; when the noise of battle dies down for a moment he says, with an air of finality, "I like Titian"—a remark which the disputants ignore every time. On the strength of this attitude Mr. Shannon (detto il Tizianetto) occupies a definite niche in contemporary English art, flanked on one side by Mr. Ricketts (detto il Tintoretteino) and on the other by Mr. Glyn Philpot (detto il Moronino). Any intransigent young man of to-day who denies the title of "Titian" is apt to be snapped at no less than a fool. But what of il Tizianetto? This, we fear, is another story—first, because Mr. Shannon does not paint as beautifully as Titian painted, and, secondly, because even if he did, he would still be most evidently a smaller artist. Titian's painting is an exquisite craft which he invented to express his vision. Mr. Shannon tries to reproduce the texture of Titian's pictures, and sometimes comes very near it. But he cannot imitate the raison d'être of this texture. Again and again we find passages in the modern painter's work which could obviously be better expressed in another texture, and sometimes we find passages in other textures actually creeping in and giving the picture a wrong look. But even the most successfully imitated passages serve only to point the differences between Titian and Mr. Shannon. Titian's outlook was quite personal; the basis of it was a voluptuous romanticism, much the same in character as the voluptuous romanticism of Wagner. His texture expresses this outlook. When Tintoretteiio adopts the same method it is as inappropriate as when Mr. Shannon adopts it. Mr. Tintoretteiio was too grandiose, too restless, too cold for Titian's technique: Titian's mantle was too small to cover Tintoretteiio's magnificent stride; but it is far too big for Mr. Shannon: it flaps about him in such voluminous folds that it appears not be a monument, or Mr. Shannon is not a Southern voluptuous romantic like Titian or a Northern voluptuous romantic like Wagner. He is to all intents and purposes a sentimental English dilettante like Gainsborough. His early lithographs representing groups of girls with musical instruments, and rather woolly nudes hovering on the brink of swimming baths, were real expressions of his personality. They were weak in drawing, it is true but they were at least genuine, and there was something original in the pictorial aspect of the compositions. Gainsborough, we can well imagine, would have fingered them with pleasure. There was, moreover, the beginning of a delicate and beautiful artistry in the lithograph called "Caresses," drawn in 1884. Had the artist seen fit to develop along this line, we believe that his achievement might have been greater to-day than it actually is. But he preferred to turn his eyes backward and allow his own gentle art to run to seed. His drawings in this exhibition fall between two stools. Put them next to a lot of drawings by Mr. John, and they will lose as if the artist had drawn them out on the other hand, next to a set of drawings by even such a third-rate Renaissance artist as Pontormo, they would look like the work of an earnest student painfully copying an art-school model. There is not enough grip in them for great realistic drawing and not enough character for great stylistic drawing. But from the other end of the room they look very like drawings by some forgotten old master, which is doubtless what Mr. Shannon set out to accomplish.

TWO NEW ACADEMICIANS

We congratulate Mr. George Henry and Mr. D. Y. Cameron on their elevation to the rank of Royal Academician. There was a time when Mr. Cameron was regarded as a revolutionary by the Academy. The loose, rather thin painting on a dark ground affected by the school soon acquired great popularity, and the protagonists of the method can now count their followers by the hundred. But they are no longer regarded as revolutionaries. Mr. Henry's exhibits at Burlington House since his election to Associateship have been mainly portraits similar in general character to the portraits of his "Glasgow" colleague Mr. John Lavery, but the ladies who pose to Mr. Henry come out a little less fashionable than their sisters who patronize Sir John; in revenge they are anatomically a trifle more coherent and more exaggeratedly agreeable as master-etchers. His oil paintings tend nowadays to become larger and larger, a decided weakness in the case of an artist who attempts to get an emotional effect by the play of contrasted masses of light and darkness on broad sweeps of country. In such works the more the painter succeeds in flanking out the most chance he has of success; if the canvas is too large, if the size of a painted hillock or shrub begins to enter into competition with our recollections of real hillocks and real shrubs, there is danger of our concrete recollections destroying the artist's abstract intention. Mr. Cameron's picture judged by "temporary" standards, appears a little sentimental and romantic, but there is no gainsaying the sense of grandeur in his best work and the intelligent mastery of material in his technique.
Music
A GERMAN CRITIC ON MODERN MUSIC

1.

FOR five years we have been cut off from German music. There are many who will say that it is no great loss. The leadership has passed to other countries. But we have become so accustomed to regarding Germany as non-existent in an intellectual and artistic sense that it is easy to fall into the error of judging German music by what had reached England in 1914, while we have been following pretty closely the most recent developments in other countries. Even in 1914 England knew very little of German contemporary music. We heard practically everything of Richard Strauss; a little Reger, mostly in the shape of organ music, a little Schöenberg. The younger German composers were unknown names. Hardly a single work of Mahler or Pfitzner was given here. Of German music since 1914 we know nothing whatever, and not only do we know nothing of the music itself, but nothing of German opinion, enlightened or otherwise, about it.

Some weeks ago I mentioned a little essay on modern music by Paul Bekker, a Frankfurt critic, the second edition of which appeared in 1919. It is one of a series of essays on modern art and literature, by various authors whose names are all unfamiliar to me, so I venture to assume that they represent a young generation of critics in their respective subjects. Bekker’s “Neue Musik” is of very great interest as a document illustrating the present-day attitude towards music in Germany. He makes it clear from the outset that he has no respect for Richard Strauss. He finds it strange that Strauss is charging us with Romanticism, experimental, or original, nothing that points the way to the future, nothing to stimulate critical investigation, nothing that consciously or unconsciously offends against the average taste of the general public. German music, as represented by Strauss and his followers, is at a standstill and has fallen a prey to the commercial interests of publishers, agents and performers. There is no trace in music, he says, of those stormy winds that are blowing away the dead leaves and branches in all the other arts.

German music would seem to have suffered complete isolation during the war. When our author discusses abstract principles of music, as he does later on, he shows himself a very acute thinker, but he seems to have a curiously limited acquaintance with music outside Germany, Debussy, Busoni and Delius are the composers to whom he looks for guidance. Of other modern composers in England, France, Italy, Russia or Spain, he does not mention a single one, except Vincent d’Indy, who is alluded to as a distinguished teacher. The fact that he lays great stress on his admiration for composers of Latin blood or strong Latin tendencies proves that it is not mere patriotism which has thus limited his outlook.

In Germany, he tells us, Strauss is hailed as a modern, and anything more modern than Strauss is attacked on the usual charge of lack of melody. “Back to Mozart!” is the prayer. This critical attitude is not confined to Germany alone. But whereas in Germany the cry is “Back to Mozart,” in France it is “Back to Rameau,” in Spain “Back to Scarlatti,” in England “Back to Purcell,” or even further back than that. Bekker very properly points out that modern music turns upon the modernization of melody and the recognition of melody as the leading force in music. He notes in Germany, as we do in other countries, schemes for widening the range of melodic expression by the employment of intervals smaller than the semitone, of a whole-tone scale, of Oriental and other non-European scales, and of the ecclesiastical modes. But he is inclined to regard all of these devices as merely momentary colour-effects, exotic or archaistic, as the case may be. He knows that to the ordinary man of to-day melody is rooted in harmony, that it is impossible to think of even the simplest melody without imagining simultaneously a harmonic basis for it. He recognizes at the same time that harmony, however modern it may sound, does not make for progress. He realizes that melody and melody alone is “the motive force of linear expression” (Bewegungskraft des linearen Ausdrucks).

Rightly he points out that the melodic developments of Wagner and the later romantics consisted in nothing more than a closer union of musical melody with poetic expression. Its relation to harmony, its dependence upon harmony, remained unchanged as it was in the days of Mozart. He contrasts the melodic line of an inner part in a quartet of Beethoven and in a fugue of Bach. In Beethoven the melodic line, however original and interesting, is always subservient to the harmony. In Bach it has an independent life of its own. Thus he seems to arrive at a fundamental truth of the highest importance, namely, that fugue is the true motor of modern historicism and of music (that is, from Palestrina onwards) the most permanent and vital constructive principle. It is interesting to note our German writer’s limitations. They are very characteristic of his country. He is evidently a careful and conscientious student of the German classics of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, and has a remarkably penetrating insight into essential principles. But he appears to take no interest in music of any period that is not German, with the exception of Debussy, Busoni and Delius, and appears also to have no knowledge, or at any rate no scholarly and intimate understanding, of any music before Bach. We are reminded of Clara Schumann’s curiously thick-headed observations on the subject:

(Brahms) brought me Couperin and played some things of his. I have often been amazed, and was so again to-day, that he can so delight in the old masters before Bach, though a great deal of it is simply respect, for with the exception of certain isolated passages they are not interesting, musically. (Diary, September 26, 1876.)

Rightly again does he criticize the evolution of sonata form, pointing out that its basis is the purely harmonic contrast of key, not the contrast of theme, and that even in the development sections of Beethoven the thematic interest is more apparent than real, that is, that the thematic figures which play so large a part in them have no real melodic expression and are mere links in the chain of harmonic development. He might have added in support of his thesis that Mozart’s development sections frequently abandon the thematic interest altogether and become nothing but a series of modulating chords. Yet we may still find in classical music examples that point the way to the music of the future. He picks out as his three great prophetic works three fugues of Beethoven, all of them, by a strange and perhaps significant coincidence (if we remember Beethoven’s habitual employment of certain keys for certain types of emotion), in the key of B flat—the fugue in the Piano forte Sonata Op. 106, the fugue Et vitam venturi seculi from the Missa solemnis, and the posthumous fugue for string quartet. They stand, as he says, outside even Beethoven’s own third period, and outside the whole century that followed them. The generation that followed Beethoven passed them by in bewilderness; it was beyond its power to understand them, to understand the principles on which they were conceived. And we have to admit that even now, after a hundred years have passed, it is granted to few musicians to enter into their mysteries.

EDWARD J. DENT.

(To be continued.)
MOZART AT THE OLD VIC

"FIGARO" at the Old Vic was an extremely good all-round performance. The word is not used in any comparative sense; we do not mean good considering this, or good allowing for that, but good absolutely, judged by the normal operatic standard. In the first place, the production was sane; that is to say, the producer, the translator, the set-painter, and the performers had evidently put their heads together and arrived at a single consistent idea of what Mozart was driving at. The stilts absurdities of the old translation had been replaced by an entirely new version, which gave everyone the opportunity to speak and behave like the characters they were supposed to represent. Figaro's room became the squad attic it must really have been instead of the sumptuous chamber in which as a rule he is so perversely domiciled. The gardener in his Sunday clothes looked even more unmistakably a gardener than he did before. There was no attempt to bring the story up-to-date by introducing gags and topicalities, and we were thus enabled to see how very much better it is without them. The music-making in every department had the harmonious birth of common sense and mutual understanding.

In the second place, most of the singing was of a remarkable excellence. The feminine trio in particular—Miss Lawson as the Countess, Miss Gough as Susanna, Miss Turrill as Cherubino—hit all their notes, top, middle, and bottom, with an accuracy that for a time was quite disconcerting in its unexpectedness. One had to pinch oneself several times to make sure one was awake before settling down to revel in the security of it. And their singing was admirably clear and direct—never a hint of the tremolo that leaves you uncertain as to whether the singer meant to land on the A flat side of G or the F sharp side of C. Cannes, as producer (Miss Baylis, every credit is due) took the title part, and sang it extremely well; he has a nice turn of humour, too, but is inclined to over-emphasize his points. So is Mr. Stockwell Hawkins. This may often be advisable, say, at Covent Garden, where the audience is not conspicuous for nimbleness of mind, but the patrons of the Old Vic are so quick in the uptake that the more lightly you make your points the better. Mr. Johnstone Douglas as the Count was the least convincing member of the cast; his intellectual fervour and sensitive phrasing make him delightful in a chamber concert, but his voice lacks the power and resonance necessary for operatic singing. It is the one field, as far as can be seen, where his peculiar talents are least able to assert themselves over his limitations.

The minor parts were all adequately filled—more than adequately, indeed, for they all showed the same grasp of the situation as a whole, the same readiness to play into each other's hands, as their more important fellows. Mr. Harrison waited with a too visible anxiety for his cues, but was excellent once he got them. Mr. Corri conducted with the calm self-possession of one who has looked to his lines of communication and knows them all to be safe. As regards the staging, the only detail that calls for criticism is the position of the chair in the first act; it is surely better to have it turned the other way round, so that the audience gets a full view of the unveiling. What goes on at the back of it can safely be left to the imagination.

R. O. M.

CONCERTS

"FLAMMA ARTIS," the new symphonic poem introduced at the fourth L.S.O. Symphony Concert on January 19, does not call for extended notice. Comte de Zogheb's "poem" is a pretentious rigmarole about Life, Love, Birth, Desire, Flaming and such-like things; but, for all that, it appears, on close examination, to mean precisely nothing. We should recommend the author to obtain some slight acquaintance with the elements of grammar, syntax, and prosody before he tries his hand again. M. d'Orlay's music is of the stage stagey; in substance, a pitiful decocation of Wagner and Strauss; in technique, a barbarous experiment, in which, for more than half an hour, a soprano solo vainly struggles to make itself heard above the turbid outpourings of the orchestra.

The programme was completed by Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and some Wagner excerpts. Over-familiarity has weakened the appeal of this symphony for many of us. That, however, does not affect its intrinsic greatness—the greatness of the first and third movements, at any rate, is beyond question—and we must not withhold the tribute that is due, both to Mr. Coates and to the orchestra, for a superlatively good performance of it.

We went to Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Withers' last concert at Leighton House principally out of curiosity to hear what Strauss's incidental music to "Enoch Arden" sounded like. Strauss has apparently treated his poet with perfect solemnity; the music is the most respectable music ever written; the more unctuous Alfred becomes the more sedulously does Richard, and up to here, they were extremely deaf to the illustration—the patter of the sestoles, for example, that is heard as soon as children are mentioned, the stately progression of the perfect cadence that impresses on our minds the extreme coldness of the funeral. The music makes us realize, as perhaps we had never truly realized before, that absolutely no expression had been spared; the service was truly choral, no doubt, and there would be a reckless profusion of ham sandwiches and sherry wine afterwards. Mr. P. L. Eyre, who recited the poem (and recited it very well), could not bring himself to utter the final couplet, but there was no need for him to tell us. We knew.

The concert ended with a tame performance of Debussy's 'Cello Sonata. The work, doubtless, is no more than a piece of calculated eccentricity, but if Mr. and Mrs. Withers were going to play it at all they might as well have put a little more gusto into it. They seemed to be saying all the time, "Of course we don't really see any point in all this, but it is the kind of thing a modern audience likes, so here you are."

"FIGARO" was not the only Mozart celebration during the week, for "Die Zauberflöte" has also been performed—and by the pupils of the Glengall Road Elementary School in the Isle of Dogs. What is remarkable here, of course, is not that the thing should have been well done or badly done, but that it should have been done at all. That it was possible is due, beyond a doubt, to the courageous and enterprising system of musical instruction worked out by one of the masters, Mr. C. T. Smith, who manages to make his pupils imbibe music like a language, as part of their normal routine—which is precisely what we all agree should be done, though few of us know how to set about it. The Board of Education might do worse than examine the methods employed, with a view to their possible dissemination.

Four "Worcestershire Pieces" by Julius Harrison were played at the Queen's Hall on January 24. They were originally written for the pianoforte and they do not gain by transcription. Short and slight, but containing much that is nobility of character and turn of fancy, they were completely enveloped by their orchestration. The composer exhibits so many ingenuity of scoring, apart from an occasional explosion of brass and percussion, that the musical material of his work was almost obliterated. Mr. Harrison has the fatal habit, shared by César Franck and many others, of writing two-bar phrases and repeating them to maintain a long term line. The last piece, "The Ledbury Parson," was the most successful, because it had a genuine folksong as its basis; but judged even by folk-song standards, it is a poor tune.
Drama

"POMPEY THE GREAT"

The main problem to be solved in any production of Mr. Masefield's "Pompey the Great" evidently consists in synthesizing the apparent heterogeneity of the styles and feelings of different parts of the play. The author's original notion was perhaps that an interesting entertainment could be made by writing a historical play on modern lines. Instead of the stuffy attitude of those who, as we can see from a visit to the St. James's Theatre were all that Shakespeare could turn out in the way of Roman senators, Mr. Masefield determined to show us what could be done by brightening them up with a modern polish. In the first place, of course, modern psychology was required—modern (there is no need for anxiety) in the days when the play was written, ten years ago. But this being a little hard to represent clearly, it was safer to lay the emphasis on a more tangible modernity, a modernity of institutions, of opinions, of material circumstances. So Mr. Masefield does not rely upon the vaguely intellectual and humanitarian character of his hero, or upon his militarist general in the style of Mr. Shaw or his domestic sea-captain in the style of Mr. Jacobs. He concentrates upon the task of convincing us that Roman politics were after all very like our own; he makes his characters talk of "comprehensive" going down to the House", "Rome", they say, "must be settled on democratic lines"; and as for the Colonies, "they are little bad bits of Rome planted down in the wilds. They attract the idle young men who want to escape the responsibilities of modern life." In the same way, too, there is an effort to make us understand that military affairs have changed very little in two thousand years. Blockades and headquarters and corporals are scattered over the pages: "Cohort, halt; Ground arms, Attention. By the right. Quick march." And the ship scene in the last act is even more elaborately anti-classical, with its bosun and steward and "Mr. Mate," its "make eight bells, Captain," and its half-humorous chant.

But there are a number of other strands in the web, which prevent us from considering "Pompey" as a mere imitation of "Caesar and Cleopatra." In the first place there is the very individual style, of which the chief feature is the substitution of full stops for all other punctuation marks. For instance, we find: "Cneius. It is a dreadful risk. To stay." Or the better known: "I'd make Rome so sick with blood. By. She'd think no more of Caesar." In general, the absence of subordinate clauses, intended probably to add to the liveliness and reality of the dialogue, tends on the contrary either to absurdity or, in so far as it has any effect, to Maeterlinckianism. More definitely in contradiction to the superficial modernity of the play, however, are a class of moods which often take control of the author and seem even to give his work its most characteristic tinge. These moods, closely related, range from the theatrically sentimental through the pseudo-poetical to the hollowly profound. Pompey himself is usually in one or other of these conditions, and his opening remarks are a good example of the first of them: "Ah, Cornelia. [He goes to her, and looks into her eyes.] Ah, beloved. [Slowly.] There will be always peace for me. In that calm soil Turning wears."

The other two moods, the poetical and the profound, cannot be easily separated. Under which heading, for instance, are we to place the following?—"Ah! Cornelia. You make death hard. But it would be sweet to die so for you. To die. To join that Senate of the old Romans; the wise ones. To bring them news of Rome there. In the shadows." Sometimes Mr. Masefield's prose totters into blank verse.

"There are two Romes, Metellus. One built of brick by hodsman. But the Rome I serve glimmers in the uplifted heart. It is a court for the calm gods. That Rome. Let me not shame that city." Once he becomes explicitly dactylic in the manner of Professor Murray. This occurs in the dirge recited by the centurions in the second act, a poem of which the last quatrains must be quoted as an instance of the fine simplicity of Mr. Masefield's thought:

Death drives the brain with dust and soils the young limbs' glory.

Death makes women a dream and men a traveller's story.

Death comes in a lusty song to wander under the sky.

Death opens unknown doors. It is most grand to die.

The truth and insight of this last sentence can, strangely enough, be paralleled by another sentence in the third act which serves as a perfect counterpart: "Pompey: Life is very grand." One could quote such gems for ever:

The producer's difficulty, therefore, is how to proceed without a jolt from such high-flown sentiments as these to the more modest: "No. No, Cornelia. She mustn't go. You'll have to sleep here, my dear girl. The streets aren't safe to-night. Sit down. Please sit down. We're all in the same boat." Sir Frank Benson, in his production of the play at the St. Martin's Theatre, annihilates the jolt with admirable completeness. Perceiving, with his usual perception, that the poetical Mr. Masefield is the real one, Sir Frank brings the full weight of his histrionic powers to bear upon the easy task of removing every vestige of the life-like Mr. Masefield from the scene of his operations. At the sight of Sir Frank's compressed lips and lifted eyebrows every touch of Mr. Masefield's modernity vanishes; at the sound of Sir Frank's clarion tones Mr. Masefield's full-stops fly in confusion. It is commonly reported that almost all of the younger actors on our stage received their training in Sir Frank Benson's company. The exhibition which he gave in the part of Pompey makes one ready to believe even of that of him. He carries to a frantic pitch the peculiarities of behaviour which are associated with the name of acting; and it is only the fact that both Sir Frank and his audience have been indulging in similar scenes for many decades that accounts for the calmness with which these activities are taken for granted on both sides of the curtain. In other arts, academic conventions are always characterized by painstaking dullness; but in acting, academicism implies an exaggerated frenzy, a hectic disintegration, which in an impartial universe would be described and admired as Cubist and Bolshevik. By a consistent application of these methods to "Pompey the Great," Sir Frank Benson has smoothed off all Mr. Masefield's rough edges and has presented to his admirers an excellent piece of humdrum theatrical work.

J. S.

Correspondence

COMPULSORY GREEK AT OXFORD

To the Editor of THE ATHENÆUM.

Sir,—Professor Saintsbury's loyalty and devotion to Oxford are well known and very greatly appreciated there; few (if any) men, moreover, are better qualified to speak on the educational value of Greek. It would be a disinterested, therefore, which I should regret, not to send some reply to the sincere and outspoken letter which he addressed to you last week.

Professor Saintsbury's letter seems to me itself to show how undesirable it is that questions of curriculum should be decided by non-resident members of the University. Few such members have any direct approach to the claim to dictate on educational matters to the body of teachers in the University; yet even he, even now, seems scarcely to realize the real points at issue. Probably a considerable majority of the members of Congregation agree with Professor Saintsbury as to the place which the study of the Greek language and literature should hold in an ideal system of general education. But Oxford is unfortunately confronted, not with the solution of a theoretic άριστωπος, but with the very practical question of the maintenance of her own position as the foremost B洙 of British education.

I try to put shortly the three practical questions involved which, I think, mainly influence the supporters of the Statute:

1. Experience has shown that the standard of Greek attained by the majority of those who do not intend to proceed to the Final Honour School of Literae Humaniores is so ludicrously low that it certainly does not justify the very large amount of time spent at school in acquiring it. The time and energy expended are alleged to have been the result attained, and would have been much better devoted to some other subject for which the learner had more natural aptitude.

2. It is not proper or right that one faculty should undertake to impose upon other faculties as a part of their curriculum a subject or an examination of which they do not approve. Of the teachers of Natural Science and Mathematics in the University all (except one or two) object to the compulsory enforcement of Greek on those intending to read Natural Science or Mathe-matics; almost all the teachers of Modern History object to Greek being required from those reading Modern History; and a very great majority of the teachers of Law resent compulsion for those reading Law. I believe the same is true of those engaged in the teaching of English and Modern Languages and Literature. It may indeed be said that the only Faculties in which an considerable number of teachers desire Greek retained as a compulsory subject in their own course are those of Literae Humaniores and Theology. The scientists, mathematicians, historians and lawyers do not seek to force their own subjects by compulsion upon the Faculty of Literae Humaniores, eminently desirable though they no doubt think it that teachers of classics in our schools and Universities (not to speak of the future statesmen, lawyers, journalists and civil servants who read "Greats") should have some knowledge of the world in which they live, some understanding of the historical causes of the social and political questions of our own time, and should acquire some of the clarity and accuracy of thought and expression which are essential to a lawyer.

3. Cambridge has ceased to require Greek from all who take her degrees. Oxford will cease to attract her fair share of the best modern-side boys, an increasing number of the best boys, if she alone demands of them a perfunctory acquaintance with a subject in which they have no interest. It is a fact that already, owing to the action of Cambridge, teaching in the Public Schools is being so organized as to make Greek a subject for special boys, with the result that all the other boys are being directed towards our sister University.

Professor Saintsbury naturally enough met many friends, when he came to Oxford, who thought as he did. In the Notes to which he takes exception I urged that so far as possible the views of the definite but considerable minority of teachers in the University who share his views should be met as far as possible. But let him come to an ordinary Common Room in Oxford and learn what the feeling is there. Then he will see that the Heads of Houses, the examiners in Responsions, the teachers of those whose wish for the education of these men and the knowledge of the working of our present institutions in practice— are overwhelmingly against the continuance of the enforcement of the present miserable minimum of Greek in Responsions. It is significant that for the debate on Tuesday the Greek Committee have met as their one and only protestant one who has been absent from Oxford for many years.

The motto of the Greek Committee may well be: "So we but save Greek let Oxford perish." We who do not agree with them have sufficient faith in Greek to believe that it will not die; but if the choice be inevitable we would unhesitatingly proclaim that to save Oxford we would sacrifice not only the whole of compulsory Greek in Responsions but the study of Greek even as a real subject, and so great is Prof. Saintsbury's love for this University that we do not doubt that he too would be with us if he believed that that were the choice. It fortunately is not, for the study of Greek will flourish not the less because a number of men who have neither the particular ability nor the interest whereby to profit from it have ceased to " cram " up a pittance in order to enter the portals of this University.

One word on Convocation. Convocation does not, of course, consist entirely of clergy and country gentlemen; it includes, as Professor Saintsbury points out, a certain number of retired professors and representatives of every walk of life. But Convocation met on Tuesday. Consequently it is difficult for those members of the University (other than the clergy) who are still actively engaged in their professions or businesses to attend. Hence the quite disproportionate predominance of the voting strength of the clergy. It is because I believe that the non-resident members of Convocation have no representation in the function to perform in our constitution (that function not being to decide matters of curriculum) that I trust that they will not be summoned (whether clergy or industrial chemists!) to determine on a question such as that of compulsory Greek. If they are it may well be that they will have their powers entirely taken from them.

Professor Saintsbury does not like the proposed compromise; the essence of a compromise is that no one is completely satisfied. But its fate will have been settled before these lines appear, so I will not pursue the matter further.

Yours faithfully,

Your Oxford Correspondent.

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—May a humble Headmaster, who is at any rate in daily contact with the realities of school life, attempt a reply even so eminent a defender of compulsory Greek as Mr. George Saintsbury?

It is rarely safe to argue from particular cases to general conclusions, but I venture to point out that not one of the cases he quotes is that of a man intimately acquainted with the conditions in the bulk of schools at the present day. Members of Education Committees are notoriously ignorant of them, nor is there any reason to suppose that a "modern" professor, a high-class Government official or a retired Headmaster would have any Greek knowledge. The only schoolmaster he mentions would appear to be engaged in the advanced classical work of a Public School, and therefore having the best knowledge for forming judgment. Surely the opinions of half-a-dozen, or twenty dozen such men as these, if they could be found, distinguished as they doubtless are in their own sphere, can hardly be allowed much weight in the face of the emphatic resolutions of the Headmasters' Association, re-affirmed as they have been year after year, without a dissenting voice.

Mr. Saintsbury says that "obsolescence will follow disestablishment." Do not the defenders of compulsory Greek realize that Greek is already practically obsolete except in the great Public Schools, in spite of its favoured position in Responsions? Its retention will certainly not restore it to its former position in schools.

May I quote an instance which is surely the "reductio ad absurdum" of the whole matter? One of my pupils has just been rejected for the tutorial scholarship in the Natural Science at Oxford. He has therefore presumably reached a fairly high standard in that subject, he has a sound knowledge of Mathematics, is an excellent German scholar, and has a fair acquaintance with French, but—he has done no Greek. Unless, therefore, the present regulations are altered, he has now to interrupt his Science studies, in which he might have made valuable progress during the next six months, in order to get up the smattering of Greek required for Responsions.

I held a Classical Scholarship at Oxford myself, and have as high an opinion as any one of the value of a real classical education, but we have to deal with things as they are, and in the interests of Greek itself, as well as of the schools, I claim that the Headmasters are Hopkins, and that the conditions of admission to the University should be brought into line with the facts of the situation.

Yours, &c.,

Headmaster.
To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—Please let me thank my old master and friend George Saintsbury for the succinct and magnificent vindication of Greek in the last paragraph of his letter in last week's Athenæum. I am affixing it, and I wish it were in golden letters, to the Greek shelves in my library. Of course he is right in his prediction that "obsolescence will follow disestablishment." Meanwhile (and this at Oxford!) Greek is to be assimilated through translations. But if Greek is a dead language, so are the Greeks dead, and why bother about dead things or dead people at either first or second hand, when a page of The Times is worth them all?

Yours, etc.,

G. E.

The Cost of Living at Oxford and Cambridge

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Dear Sir,—May I be allowed to draw attention to a grave misstatement of fact in "Oxford University Notes" in the issue of The Athenæum for January 16? In this article the writer states that University men can live, and are living, on the Government grant of £165.

In the first place, the maximum grant is £75 for maintenance and £50 for fees per annum. I can assure your contributor that at Cambridge (and I imagine it is the same at Oxford) it is found to be absolutely impossible to maintain oneself upon the grant. 1, personally, am in receipt of a grant of £225. My college account last term came to £45 9s. 6d., and my lodging-house bill to £16 8s. 5d., making a total of £61 14s. 1d. And I am given to understand that I am only too happy to pay this with, but also to keep me in vacations, and pay for my books, clothes and other necessities. My lecture fees alone came to £20.

If the recipient of a Government grant has no friends upon whose charity he can rely, he cannot possibly remain at the University unless further assistance is forthcoming. There is a considerable amount of feeling up here about it, and it is felt that the Government should readjust the grants to meet the present scale of expenses.

Yours faithfully,

E. W. R. Peterson.

The Roman Church and Ligouri

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—In your short notice of "The Roman Mischief-Maker" (January 16, p. 93) you say that the author's claim that the Roman Church is still wedded to the casuistry of Ligouri is "questionable." But surely the evidence produced in support of the assertion is sufficient to substantiate it. In 1863 Pope Pius VII. confirmed the decree of the Sacred Congregation of Rites, which declared that all the saint's writings had been rigorously examined, and his moral system more than twenty times rigorously discussed, and all agreed unanimously that not one word had been found deserving of censure. In 1831 a Decree of the Church paid him the "unprecedented"—one might almost say the semi-divine—honour of declaring that a confessor may follow any opinion of Ligouri's without weighing any of the reasons on which it is based. In 1871 Pius IX. bestowed upon him the very high theological distinction of becoming one of the nine great Doctors of the Church. Cardinal Wiseman said that to censure the morals of the saintly bishop was to censure the decision of the Holy See. Lastly, we now learn, on the high authority of the "Catholic Encyclopedia," that "St. Alphonsus said nothing in his 'Moral Theology,' which is not the common teaching of Catholic theologians."

In face of the above facts, and of many others tending in the same direction, it seems to me difficult to escape the conclusion that Ligouri is still Rome's authorized exponent of what is right and wrong in human conduct.

Yours faithfully,

Hugh E. M. Stuttfield.

An exhibition of recent sculpture by Jacob Epstein will be opened at the Leicester Galleries, Leicester Square, on February 6.

The second production of the Phoenix Society will be "Dryden's Marriage-a-la-mode." It will be given on February 8, at 7.30 p.m., and on February 9, at 2.30 p.m.

Foreign Literature

An Olympian Novelist

L'Ascension de M. Baslevre, Par Edouard Estaméni. (Paris, Perina, 4fr. 90.)

We are afraid that if any of the characters in M. Estaméni's new book were to meet him in the Avenue des Acacias, they would run a serious risk of being "cut" by their own creator. For M. Estaméni's attitude towards his puppets is very Olympian indeed. He moves them about with a godlike remoteness, almost, we fear, at times with condescension. The truth is that M. Estaméni is something more than a novelist; he is a philosopher, and as such he looks on human frailties from another plane.

"Aux heures où la destinée s'empare d'un homme, celui-ci éprouve toujours l'Illusion d'une liberté accrue," is the text of our philosopher in "L'Ascension de M. Baslevre," and our heart goes out to his group of petits bourgeois who make such pitiful puddles of their lives and rejoice so pathetically in fancied freedoms. Each of the puppets escapes for a moment from the monotony of routine life and soars for a moment to bewilderment heights. But one by one they are caught in the web which has been spread for them; we watch them fluttering, but we know that their eventual destruction is inevitable. For what chance have they against Destiny—when Destiny is represented by M. Estaméni?

We admit nevertheless to a decided prejudice in favour of the Olympian method, especially in these days and in this country. We suffer from an abundance of autobiographical novels in England, and we turn with relief to the novelist with invention, imagination and intuition. M. Estaméni demonstrated his possession of these qualities in "Solitudes," and it is quite clear from the book before us that he can design characters and combine contrasts, and deal with fine shades of psychology and neurosis; and that he can construct a plot and arrange coincidences with an almost cynical simplicity. But in "L'Ascension de M. Baslevre" he falls short of a great Olympian like Balzac in the quality of sympathy.

We are never quite sure if M. Estaméni has any real affection for these particular puppets. We suspect that he has no native sympathy for Baslevre's years of austeritv, for his abnormally late outbreak of eroticism, or for his subsequent collapse into sentimentality. He takes no apparent interest in Gustave the gambler, whom Baslevre would have made the subject of a forty-page digression at the first introduction, and he is cold towards Claire, Gustav's wife, the instrument of Baslevre's "ascension." If he has a weak spot it is for Mlle. Fouille, who makes a desperate offering of her body and soul to Gustave; but we observe no loosening of the web in her favour.

At times we feel that our philosopher is not giving us the whole truth; that he is in fact being a little Olympian with the reader. We should like to have a heart-to-heart talk with Baslevre or Mlle. Fouille and hear their own versions of the strange final interview when they compare notes on their ruined lives, after death has robbed Baslevre of Claire, and Gustave has finally abandoned his mistress.

"Mon amour," surnappe M. Baslevre, "n'a révélé la sensation et la pitie! Tout de lui me charmait. Jusqu'au sec de la détestation je ne cause pas de bénir.

"Le meurt," repartit Mademoiselle Fouille, "c'est débattu dans le mensonge. St honte me submerge, et tel quel, si un microphone le rendit, je l'accepterais sans reproche.

"Je vous prie," conclut M. Baslevre.

We believe that Mlle. Fouille really stuck to her guns more completely, or else that M. Baslevre had become by this time less of a prig, that his ascension had in fact become more real. Possibly they were both a little afraid of M. Estauñé.

Much as we appreciate the fine quality of this book and the magnificent realization of some of the scenes, we cannot help wishing that M. Estauñé may be a little less renowned next time. The habit of stopping the narrative to point a moral is dangerous and has a tendency to grow on a novelist; and there is always the risk of stopping the orchestra for the enunciation of a platitude. The characters he creates are well worth knowing; can he not permit them a little more intimacy?

W.

WAR POEMS BY A NEUTRAL

Aus der Brandung: Zeitgedichte eines Schweizers. Von Robert Faesi. (Frauenfeld, Huber.)

Among all the enormous flood of war poems—and we may recall the fact that German writers, with much ingenious and almost childish calculation, placed the amount of their own country’s output at several scores of thousands in the first few months of the war—the number of poems of really enduring value was extraordinarily low. In this country, in France, in Germany and Austria-Hungary respectively, it appears doubtful whether the war poems of abiding artistic interest and of genuine imaginative achievement could be counted on more than the fingers of two hands. It may be true that in poetry, as in art generally, the subject does not matter, but certainly it has influence on inspiration, and very rarely did the war provide a genuine and fresh poetic inspiration to the many hundreds of writers—even the most eminent not excepted—who attempted to give poetical expression to the international struggle.

In respect to the poets of the neutral countries it may well have been expected to be at a disadvantage as compared with those of the belligerents. They lacked the fervour of patriotic emotion, they had no evident and immediate impulse. As against this there was the fact that, remote from the passions and absorbing demands in obedience to which the poets of the nations at war were brought to write, fewer neutral poets took up the pen, and thus in the neutral countries there were far fewer poems of an unadulterated purely ‘occasional’ character. It is certainly the case with this volume of M. Robert Faesi, one of the most distinguished of contemporary German-Swiss poets and critics. After reading his poems and comparing them with the principal British, French and German war poems, one can fairly say that M. Faesi has produced one of the most successful collections issued during the war, a collection which is destined to be given a prominent place by the historian of contemporary European literature.

That love for one’s country can be strong and impelling even when that country is not face to face with imminent danger is proved by the eloquent poem in Vers Libre with which M. Faesi’s volume opens. The idea of Switzerland’s mountains as a bulwark of peace is shown to be capable of arousing a true imaginative emotion:

Brandung blättert Flut schlängt rings uns entgegen,

Ueber den Wassern der Not ist Sturm ausgespannt;
Bollwerk, biete Trotz um mein Inselfeld, Steine, haltet Stand den Wellenschlägen.

And M. Faesi is not content to see his country assume a defensive, a merely negative attitude. The same poem continues:

Aber hoch. In den Wellenschlägen
Pocht der Menschheit Herz hoch in Fieberbrand;
Pulst und pocht und schreit an unsre Wande.

Sei nicht taub, sei nicht starr, sei nicht Stein! Lasst euch bewegen!

The appeal to Switzerland to open her ears, to be “not deaf, not stiff and unyielding, not like stone;” is repeated in a later poem entitled “Sendung,” dealing with the “mission” of Switzerland:

A yawning abyss has opened in the world.
But thou must be the bridge between the nations (Völkerbrücke).

A whole school of contemporary Swiss literature, it may be noted, has adopted as the principal item in its program the endeavour to express imaginatively the idea of Switzerland as a link between the opposing national forces, a reconciler; here, although M. Faesi can be identified with no school or fashion, we see the influence of the same ideal. It is significant that these poems close with a lofty appeal to Europe, named by the poet mein weiles Vaterhaus. The poem, as indeed the whole volume, is animated by what one may call the idealistic, supernatural Swiss spirit in international relations. Without showing in any way an “above the battle” detachment from the sufferings of war-tortured humanity, M. Faesi’s poems are among the best imaginative expressions of international ideals—ideals which are by no means easy to advocate in true poetry—which have appeared for many years.

LETTERS FROM SPAIN

IV. THE CATALAN MOVEMENT REFLECTED IN THE ARTS*

Resuelo began life as a painter, and Apeles Mestre, another dramatist, was originally a black-and-white artist. But art has moved on since then. At the first glance—“cop d’ull,” as a Catalan would say—round one of his exhibitions, it is difficult to discover any common factor among the pictures or any collective spirit among the painters. They all seem very French; but to be “ben afancesat,” they say, is to have learned in a good school. And as to a “collective spirit”—are not Ingres and Renoir, Puvis de Chavannes and Cézanne, equally French, though each gives expression to an entirely different temperament? Pre-eminent among modern Catalan painters is Joaquim Sunyer. He is obviously influenced by Matisse; but he might be said to interpret the spirit of French art through a temperament essentially Spanish and Catalan; his vigorous Balearic landscapes, for instance, are in a thoroughly French style, though they are felt in a true Catalan spirit. He has worked hard at the human figure, and has a way of uniting it in a wavy ornamental line with the landscape. His work is the product of a strong, balanced mind which has freed itself from the seduction of facile ornament. J. Torres Garcia began by a close study of the Italian primitives, and produced much good mural decoration in which the nude or lightly draped figure was the principal motive. He realized then that the “Noze Aldobrandini” pointed to the only way in which such scenes should be treated. Latterly he has gone in almost entirely for street-life; the far-off dream of ancient art seems to have vanished. Yet his work retains something of the spirit of those immortal shapes, and his endeavour is to make them live again in the figures and surroundings of modern Catalonia. Ricart Canals is a sumptuous colourist; there is an elegance about his portraits which is not merely superficial. He is of the school of Renoir, and has remained faithful to the tradition in which he was brought up. Domènec Carles, on the contrary, is an innovator who has sought new forms of expression particularly in the representation of the human figure. He is more sensitive to colour than to form, and shows in still-life and landscape a feeling for balance and construction which he has not yet achieved in other subjects. Joan Colom, an engraver as well as painter, is chiefly interested in the effects of light on landscape. The human figure, when it is introduced, has a purely decorative function. Richness of colour is one of the most attractive things about his pictures.

* The previous letters appeared in The Athenæum for October 24, November 14, and December 19, 1919.
Other names which might be mentioned are Vayreda, Nonell (who died a year or so ago), the painter of gypsies, and Aragay, one of the most interesting young artists. Aragay has spent much time in Italy, and his strong, sometimes violent drawing points to a painstaking and sympathetic study of Michael Angelo. He has published a book of interesting poems; and these in their rough-hewn language, and the intense passion which is shadowed rather than conveyed by it, suggest once more the influence of Buonarroti.

Among the Valencian painters, a prominent figure is José Benlliure Gil. He enjoys studying “hortalíones” (workers on the plantations) and popular types from the orange groves by which Valencia is surrounded. He renders them with a breadth and certainty which few of his compatriots attain, and understands Catalan life and habits of design to larger compositions. His garden scenes show that he can do interesting modern work in the style of Risshol, the Valencians are almost all colourists, and the summer exhibition in the Court of the University glowed with colour and light. It was not a superficial fancy, but the relish of passionate temperaments accustomed to delight in pure colour for its own sake; it was equally noticeable in the studies of Valencian landscape by Pedro Sánchez and Antonio Esteve, Luis Sans Martínez and Remigio Soler, the sea-pieces of Alfredo Gill and the “Segoviana” and other studies by Gallego Gill. Interesting portraits are produced by José Balaguer, while Enrique Fantés Giró brings out the most erotic fancy, inspired by memories of “Salome” and “Primavera,” with faint reminiscences of Mortez von Schwind.

Both Barcelona and Valencia are fortunate in the possession of a school of able caricaturists. One of the best is the Valencian, Francisco Gamboriño, whose sureness of touch and subtle malice are worthy of Signélessis. Standing before his Triptych, which groups the figures of Senyor Esteve’s former pupils, Maura and Count Romanones, one could almost imagine oneself back in Munich, with Theodor Heine explaining in his grave, dignified manner that they were all the same people really, but with different clothes.

Many of the ruling Spanish sculptors are either Catalans or Valencians. They come of that Mediterranean stock and tradition which has produced the human body in its most perfect form and the greatest sculptors of all times to represent it. Venancio Vallmitjana, the veteran sculptor of Barcelona, died in the beginning of last September. Most distinguished among the living is Enric Casanovas, Joan Borrell Nicolau, who designed the monument to the poet Verdaguer. These artists, though employing the Hellenic criterion, are less academic. Manuel Huguet is obviously “in” with the Cubists, and represents the most advanced—and most “primitivistic”—tendencies. Exquisite goldsmith’s work is done by Pablo Gargallo.

Ceramic art in Catalonia is derived from that of Valencia with influences from every factory in Europe. It had, however, a definite and thoroughly own character in the eighteenth century, though it used to be said, with much naivety but little truth, that the Catalans could turn out capital examples of the best china of any of the great factories. In the last few years Aragay has tried it with success, and Xavier Nogues has succeeded in making it the expression of the “imagine popolares catalanes” that is in the conventional and unconventional episodes of his daily life. Nogues has a great sense of humour combined with a feeling for decorative effect; his ware is rich in quality and magnificent in colour. He makes charming plates and mugs, and his theories are worthy of being put beside those of the eighteenth century.

The introduction to the catalogue of the Valencian summer exhibition put the aims of the Valencian artists in a very clear and logical form. Artistic expansion, says the writer, is the object which must be kept constantly in view. The first step towards a policy of anti-regionalism; the success of Valencian pictures in the exhibitions outside Spain shows that they must be introduced into all the Iberian provinces. The second phase of expansion must be international; and internationalism is the ultimate goal to which artists should direct their collective energies.

Those peoples which are economically independent will now have to set about realizing the nationality in art and intellectual activity—the only forms under which they may legitimately take pride in it. Poland, the Ukraine, Finland, Bohemia, must fertilize their art with the liberty they have gained, if they are to become really great peoples. These are noble sentiments, worthy of the city and the country which expressed them.

They bring out the point, which is apt to be forgotten in Barcelona, that political liberty is a means to happiness and not an end in itself. For Valencia is confronted by the same problems which agitate Barcelona, though it feels them in a less acute form. The points at issue are two—the social problem and the problem of autonomy. The federal solution is what most people really want; the question is whether federal autonomy is a solution for the social crisis. The Catalanists perhaps make too much of autonomy as a universal remedy; but martial law is not likely to solve the problem, because martial law has never solved any problem.

The “Catalan question” is, finally, if not entirely a question of economics. Sovereignty is, it is true, a point which touches the pride of both parties to the quick; but the crux of the whole matter is the economic relationship between Catalonia and the central provinces. The possibile breaking-up of Austria, and its appalling consequences on the welfare of a very large number of people, are fresh in the memory of Spaniards, and have furnished them with a convincing historical example of the misery which is involved when delicate economic arrangements are interfered with by States. We are accustomed to seeing Spanish art, with its vivid realism, of the engravings of Zuloaga, in Munich, with a great interest. They observe attentively how Austro-Hungarian affairs have been mismanaged, and do not intend to let ignorant sentimentalists from abroad imagine that they have discovered a new “oppressed nationality.”

J. B. T.

A POPULAR MELANGE

LA PETITE CHANOINESSE, Par M. Dely. (Paris, Plon-Nourrit, 5fr.)

In Republican France, as in Royalist England, success is doubtless assured to a novel which throws side-lights on the habits of the aristocracy. We know that the handful of Mrs. Glyn is written in such a style that the initiate in English-speaking countries, and such books are “La Petite Chanoinesse” probably perform the same functions on the other side of the Channel. For there can be no doubt of the quality of the hero’s noblese and that of his associates. They reveal them as very good and quite a lady turns out to be a spy who just manages to escape to Spain in the nick of time. On the last page but one, after an unsuccessful effort at blackmail, it will be seen that the book has every chance of popularity.

W.

SIR ERNEST SHACKLETON is telling the story of his latest Antarctic expedition at the Philharmonic Hall twice daily to the accompaniment of striking moving pictures which are being shown for the first time. He relates the thrilling experience of himself and his companions, and tells of droll humour, and although he passes over lightly the anxious months after the ship was abandoned, one realizes the perils and the long journey of the members of the expedition. We hope Sir Ernest will continue his lecture for some time to come, so that all may have an opportunity of hearing a story and seeing pictures of such unusual interest.

JANUARY 30, 1920
List of New Books
Prepared in co-operation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding with the Dewey system, the sub-heads being indicated, for the benefit of librarians and others familiar with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. The first numeral in these represents the main class, the second one of the subdivisions, and so on.

Those works in the List which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

100 PHILOSOPHY.

Bond (Frederick Bligh). The Hill of Vision: a forecast of the Great War, and of social revolution with the coming of the new race, gathered from automatic writings obtained between 1909 and 1912, and also, in 1918, through the hand of John Alleyn, under the supervision of the author. Script by John Alleyn. Constable. 1919. 8½ in. 159 pp. front. boards. 7/6 n. 133.9

Although purporting to come from certain monks of Glastonbury, and from "controlling influences" associated with them, this medley of philosophical reflections (not strikingly novel); of predictions of war (such as appeared in the newspapers long before 1914), the date when the European war would terminate, and some greater evil still to come (is it supposed to be Bolshevism?); and of critical descriptions of the various national characteristics of Glastonbury, is utterly devoid of patriotic from the Allies point of view—all this is not particularly impressive. As for predictions, a large net will occasionally catch sizeable fish; and to us it seems that one clear presentation of a definite principle, such, for example, as Einstein's theory of relativity, followed by almost precise corroboration, is worth more than all the nebulous vaticinations of supposed Glastonbury monks and their like put together.

 Lansbury (George). These Things Shall Be. Swarthmore Press [1920]. 7 in. 79 pp. paper, 1/6 n. 172

Mr. Lansbury in these essays pleads earnestly for a new spirit in all our relations with one another—that of brotherhood and public service, instead of self-interest and the desire for material wealth. He stresses the implications of this new spirit of brotherhood in industrial conditions at home, and internationally in the relations between white people and the coloured races.

The author succeeds in giving a succinct account of the chief philosophical systems from the time of the Greeks to the present day. In the section on modern philosophy the issues become more alive, and for this reason the author's treatment is more open to objection. But in such a subject as philosophy, where there is nothing on which all agree and scarcely anything which all condemn, this remark could be made about any exposition. For the rest, the author's treatment is readable, and the lists of books for further study appended to each chapter should be helpful to the student.

200 RELIGION.

This account of a movement which from 1806 to 1857 possessed great vitality in North-East Lancashire, and for a long period remained outside the main current of Unitarian history, embodies records of the ministration of Joseph Cooke, an unlearned but very earnest Methodist who founded the sect, and of John Ashworth, James Taylor, Richard Wright and other who, at Rochdale, Oldham, Hyde, Burnley, Rawtenstall and elsewhere, carried on and extended the work of the founder. Finally the movement became merged in Unitarianism.

Walpole (George Henry Somerset), Bishop of Edinburgh. Visions and Judgments. R. Scott, 1920. 7½ in. 132 pp., 3/6 n. 228

In a previous work, "The Sealed Book," the author expounded chapters 4-8 of the Apocalypse. The volume before us is an endeavour to interpret chapters 19-22, and Dr. Walpole assumes, as in the other, that the Apocalypse was written at the close of the first century, to encourage the Church during her persecution by the Emperor Domitian. The bishop's difficult task is carried out with penetration and originality.

300 SOCIOLOGY.

A narrative of the arrest of the author and his friends in May, 1918, and of their detention at Gloucester and Durham Prisons. Release did not come until February, 1919. Mr. Figgis comments severely upon the English prison system, and, alluding to Dostoevsky's famous work, declares that "the true House of the Dead is an English jail."

The authors trace the history of French thrift from the year 1789 to the present day, and draw attention to the influence of these events which they consider have accrued from the compulsory use of the funds of French savings banks in the purchase of rents. Means of remedying the evil are proposed. The book is provided with statistical tables and charts.

The first part (written in August and September, 1917) of a work in which the author sets out with the declaration that "an international proletarian revolution is preparing," proceeds to criticize "Socialist Chauvinists" who "distinguish themselves by a base, servile adaptation to the interests not only of their national bourgeoisie, but also of their State," and follows with an elaborate analysis of the teachings of Marx and Engels. These teachings, the author asserts, "opportunist," such as Karl Kautsky (1889-1914), have distorted and perverted. In an "afterword," written in November-December, 1917, the author expresses satisfaction that he is for the time being prevented from writing the second part of his work, because the eve of the November Revolution of 1917 is at hand, and "it is more pleasant and more useful to live through the experiences of a revolution than to write about it."

500 NATURAL SCIENCE.

Hendrick (Ellwood). Chemistry in Everyday Life: Opportunities in Chemistry. Univ. of Lond. Press, 1919. 8 in. 114 pp., 3/6 n. 540.2

Another addition to the legion of books written in a popular style with the view of setting forth the manifold applications and uses of chemistry, and of encouraging young readers to study the science in their spare time. The treatment is very simple and American in style, and there are few features of originality. Fuels, soils, catalysis, ferment, and steel, and the chemistry of laundering are among the topics discussed. To say that work in the laboratory is "just as complex as learning a trade" does not convey a very inspiring idea of practical chemistry as a subject of scientific study.

See review, p. 141.

This volume of the series, a work in the fruitful region opened up in 1908 by Professor Byron Cummings is of absorbing interest. The sites explored consist chiefly of the cliff dwellings in the canyonous north of El Capitan, formed in a primitive way by

In this paper, read before the Classical Association, Professor Philiimore merely essays to vindicate the a priori probability of [textual] emendation being necessary and possible. He claims that common sense is on his side; and, if it were not for the wit and learning which he thinks it needful to display in support of his position, we should have supposed that common sense might have been left to settle the question unaided. He quotes from the instructions of Cassiodorus to his copyists the "dangerous principle, wherever in desitium hominibus miswritings are found, the faulty places are to be unhesitatingly corrected" -- "a sound principle," he adds, "but dangerous for the men of that age to apply." The element of soundness in the view upheld by Dr. Philiimore's opponents is surely that the principle is dangerous in any age; it must always be applied with caution. Readers of Romantic leanings may be inclined by the following question to doubt whether the writer himself would be cautious enough: "Is it not of the essence of any work of literary art...that it characterises this neatly made and extremely sentimental play, which was presented at Wyndham's Theatre last year by Mr. Gerald du Maurier, Miss Viola Tree and others.

FICTION.

Bashford (H. H.). THE CORNER OF HARLEY STREET: being some familiar correspondence of Peter Harding, M.D. Constable, 1919. 7 in. 271 pp., 4 6 n. The eleventh impression.

A cheap reprint of M. Bordeaux's tragic novel on the theme of forgiveness, which appeared first in 1912.

Champion (Jessie). SUNSHINE IN UNDERWOOD. Lane, 1919. 7 in. 364 pp., 7 n. A light and cheerful story in which three young men impersonate each other whilst visiting in the country. They are, to a certain extent, successful in deceiving their relatives and friends, and many amusing incidents occur.

Clarke (Isabel C.). JULIAN. Hutchinson [1920]. 7 in. 379 pp., 7 6 n. A readable tale, with plenty of incident and a prominent love-interest. The heroine's mother, who has been somewhat failure in all other departments, undergoes a death bed conversion to the Church of Rome; much that is sympathetic in the book is connected with that Church.

Clarke (R. H.). THE VIOL OF SILENCE. Heath Cranton 1919. 8 in. 138 pp. front., 3 6 n. The hero of this story has been punished for a crime committed by another. His career is wrecked, and it is only after a long interval that his innocence becomes patent to the world.

This is an interesting Evangelical effort in the guise of a novel; it is to put fear into the hearts of "those who have never studied the signs of the times," such as the taking of Jerusalem and the overwhelming and drying-up of the Euphrates, which portend the imminence of the Last Day. The Last Day comes off in the last chapter, the good clergyman goes to heaven with all who set under him, and the worldly lady and non-members of his flock are left behind.

Dedicated to "all those who, young or old, have dreamed of the sea," this simple and rather sentimental little story is about a boy whose great desire is to be a sailor. The child is amiable, but scarcely carries conviction.

This might just as well be described as the commonplace experiences of a not uncommon woman; at any rate, the only unusual incident is the lady's visit to the Paris sewers, where she witnesses an explosion of foul gases. She finds herself managing a pension, the guests at which, with the exception of one half-decent woman, are very ordinary and uninteresting people.

Captain Lipscomb's sketches and yarns, among the most humorous of all "how the General Staff Functioned," "Ceremonial," "The Lost Legion," and "Weather Vanes," are pleasantly accompanied by some of Mr. Bateman's clever and characteristic drawings.

Half-a-dozen picturesque, vigorously written, and for the most part amusing tales, dealing with mining prospectors' adventures and experiences. Two of the best are "A Flutter in Eggs" and "The Town-Site of Tra-Lee."

A more authentic presentment than previous fiction has given is the object, and a very attractive and touching picture the result, of Miss Robinson's study of Quaker characters and Quaker life, from 1682 to 1875. All the stories are dated; several introduce historical persons, and many of them actual incidents. All are truthful in the literary sense, even if imaginary details are utilized.

920 BIOGRAPHY.

A record of Gambrée's career under the Empire, during the war of 1870-71, and as parliamentary leader in the Third Republic. Written for the general reader, and illustrated with excellent photographic reproductions.

Tingle (Herbert). TINGLE (Herbert); AND ESPECIALLY HIS YOUTH. S.P.C.K., 1919. 7 in. 121 pp. map, 3/6 n. See review, p. 136.

The subject of this slight but arresting memoir was born in 1855 at Thame, and died early in 1918. As a child he was so delicate that his education was accomplished chiefly by means of games, the interesting feature being that most of them were devised by himself. The author, who was one of Tingle's principal playmates, describes a number of his friend's methods of play; and educationists will find in the book a good deal that is suggestive. The preface is by the Bishop of Oxford.

930-990 HISTORY.

The author has essayed the difficult task of compressing into 250 pages the thousand years' tempestuous history of an unhappy nation; and although the record of the earlier changes of fortune experienced by Russia is necessarily brief, it is clear and likely to be serviceable. The troubled road to the late Tsar, the revolutionary movements, and the nature of Bolshevism are treated with some degree of fullness. Of course there are lacunae, but this is true of far more ambitious books than General Ballard's.

M. Isaac has confined himself to recounting the most important facts of French history in a concise and business-like way. The most striking of origin, feature of the book consists in the illustrations. The costumes, architecture and art of each successive age are well illustrated; portraits of the chief actors in French history are given where possible; and many interesting contemporary engravings are reproduced. Thus etchings by Callot illustrate the wars of the seven years' war, a charming engraving depicts the arrest of Louis XVI. at Varennes, and so on. This should be a very useful introductory history of France.

940.9 THE GREAT EUROPEAN WAR.

Bluet (Antony). WITH OUR ARMY IN PALESTINE. Melrose, 1919. 8 in. 300 pp. il., 7/6 n. 940.9

For religious, archeological, and other reasons, the campaigns in Palestine and Egypt, though they were—to borrow a simile from chemistry—mere "side-chains"—linked to the main "ring" of the war, had, and still have, for many persons a peculiar interest. A considerable number of readers may therefore be expected to welcome this attractively written narrative, by a somewhat member of the H.A.C., of the operations in Egypt against the Senussi tribe; of the drive into Palestine, with its accompaniments of life, flies, septic sores, and later, of scorpions, tarantulas, and scavenger beetles; of the numerous victories over the Turks; and of the capture of Gaza, Damascus, Beyrut, and other cities famous throughout the ages. Good illustrations accompany the letterpress.

Butler (Patrick). A GALLOPER AT YPRES; AND SOME SUBSEQUENT ADVENTURES. With a frontispiece in colours by Lady Butler. Fisher Unwin [1920]. 9 in. 278 pp. il., 15/ n. 940.9

A record of war experiences in Flanders and in the trenches of the Somme by a son of the distinguished painter of "The Roll Call." Lady Butler's picture of the heads of her son's three chargers is an adornment of the volume. The author's remarks upon the contrast between French and English discipline are interesting.

Crosse (E. C.). THE DEFEAT OF AUSTRIA, AS SEEN BY THE 7TH DIVISION; being a narrative of the fortunes of the 7th Division, from the time it left the Asiago Plateau, in August, 1918, till the conclusion of the Armistice with Austria on November 4, 1918. Deane & Sons, Year-Book Press, 1919. 9 in. 131 pp. il. por. maps, apps. boards, 7/6 n. 940.9

The Rev. E. C. Crosse, late Senior Chaplain (C. of E.) 7th Division, gives a clear account (enlivened by intimate touches concerning the daily life of the soldiers engaged) of the achievements of the Division during the operations which resulted in the final defeat of Austria. The capture of Papadopoli Island (in which the 2nd H.A.C. and 1st R.W.F. were prominently engaged) the take of the Pavesi, and the passage of the Montecino are among the stirring episodes included in the narrative. The accompanying maps and sketches, by Sergeant E. Luton, R.G.A., are of conspicuous merit.
Appointments Wanted

Scholarships, etc.

The Gustav Sachs Memorial Studentship, founded to promote the study in Greek lands of Greek philology, history, literature, and archaeology, will be awarded in October, 1920. For particulars apply to the Secretary, British School at Athens, 19, Bloomsbury Square, London, W.C.1.

Sales by Auction

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge

Will sell by auction at their large galleries, 34 and 35, New Bond Street, W.1, on Tuesday, February 10, and three following days, at 1 o'clock precisely.

Printed books comprising the property of the late Sir Clements Markham, K.C.B.; the property of Mrs. H. R. Weldon, of 15, Bolton Gardens, S.W.1; the property of the Rev. F. C. Stewart, Esq., of 17, Grenville Road, W.; the property of the Rev. A. T. Grant (deceased), of the Red House, Wemys Castle; the property of the Right Hon. Lord Knaresborough; the property of Mrs. Parker, of Broomfields, Wilmington; the property of W. H. Campion Esq., C.B., of Danny, Haxton; the property of the late A. D. S. de Vahl, Esq., of 97, Lancaster Gate, W.; the property of A. C. B. Russell, Esq., Rouge Croix, and the property of the late Sir W. H. Weldon, K.C.V.O., of the property of the College of Arms, and including French illustrated books of the XVIIIth Century in contemporary morocco bindings; a few illuminated and other manuscripts, including a volume of notes by Horace Walpole; books with Coloured Plates and Books in Fine Bindings; early printed books; English literature; topographical works, including a finely illustrated copy of Lyons' Magna Britannia; works on bibliography, heraldry, and the fine arts; travel, sport, natural history and horticulture, etc.

May be viewed two days prior. Catalogues may be had.

Authors’ Agents, etc.

The authors’ alliance are prepared to consider and place MSS. for early publication. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place authors’ interests first. Twenty years’ experience. Please note new address: 93 and 94, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.2.

Authors

MSS. placed at highest prices; free monthly prizes; terms for stamp.—Cambridge Library Agency, 6, Henrietta-st., W.C.2

University woman (Hons. Mod. Lang. Trip.) undertakes all kinds research, Indexing, French, German, Italian, Spanish, Dutch, Danish translation.—M. K., 7, Phoenix Lodge Mansions, W.6.

Proof reading, indexing, researches, revision—Linguist, good experience.—Mr. F. A. Hadland, 15, Bellevue Mansions, Forest Hill, S.E.23.

Bookellers’ Provident Institution

A registered friendly society founded in the year 1837 for the assistance of members and their widows and children when in necessitous circumstances.

An annual subscription of one guinea, or a donation of ten guineas, entitles the donor to honorary membership with the privilege of voting at general meetings; whilst a bequest of twenty guineas constitutes the executor an honorary member for life, with power to vote.

Subscriptions or donations will be thankfully received by the secretary, Mr. William Poulten, Stationers’ Hall Court, London, E.C.4, who will gladly furnish any further particulars that may be desired.

Contact with the Other World.

The latest evidence as to communication with the dead—By James H. Hyslov, Ph.D., LL.D., author of "Problems of Philosophy." (c) Royal 8vo, 485 pages. Illustrated. 25s. net.

The Truth of Spiritualism.

By "Rita" (Mrs. Desmond Humphreys). Crown 8vo, cloth. 3s. 6d. net.

The Menace of Spiritualism.

With a foreword by Father Bernard Vaughan, S.J. By Elliott O’Donnell, author of "Ghostly Phenomena." Crown 8vo, cloth. 5s. net.

Old Man Savarin Stories.

By Edward William Thomson. Crown 8vo, illustrated. 7s. net.

Fame and Failure.

The story of Catholic celebrities who rose only to fall—By Julian Ellis. Demy 8vo, illustrated. 12s. 6d. net.

Madame Prune.

By Pierre Loti. Translated by S. R. C. Plimsoll. Demy 8vo. Illustrations in colour by Mortimer Menpes. 16s. 6d. net.

Why We Do It.

Psychological Gossip.—By R. McMillan ("Gossip"), author of "Origin of the World," of which 12,000 copies have been sold. Crown 8vo, cloth. 6s. net.

The Beginner at Billiards.

By Edwin Anthony ("Cut Cavendish"), author of "How to Win at Auction Bridge." Crown 8vo, cloth. illustrated. 3s. 6d. net.

T. Werners Laurie, Ltd., 30, New Bridge St., E.C.4

A Tragic Document which everyone should read.

A PRISONER OF PENTONVILLE.

By "Red Band," 3/6 net.

London: Elkin Mathews, Cork Street, W.1.

Booksellers & Catalogues

SECONDHAND BOOKS.

An important manuscript—

The Character of a Trimmer

(By Sir George Savile, Bart., First Marquis of Halifax, 1663-1665.)

A large 4to MS. in contemporary mottled calf, written in a remarkably clear and legible hand, with catchwords, and separate titles. The most brilliant piece of political prose of its century.

Price £25.

Full particulars of

1. Chaundy of Oxford Ltd.
2. Albemarle Street, London, W.1

Books and Autographs. Catalogues Free.

Art Exhibitions

RENOIR, MONET, MANET, DEGAS, GAUGUIN, DELACROIX, etc., etc.
Exhibition of select paintings and drawings by modern French masters.

ELDAR GALLERY, 40, Great Marlborough St., W.
Open 10.30 to 6. Admission 1s. including Catalogue.

COLNAGHI'S GALLERIES
144, 145, 146, NEW BOND ST., W.1.
EXHIBITION OF DRAWINGS AND STUDIES
BY

CHARLES SHANNON, A.R.A.

10/5 except Saturday.
Catalogues, 6d

Exhibition of Painting:

FEBRUARY 3rd and following days

THE CHELSEA BOOK CLUB
65, Cheyne Walk, Chelsea.

To Art Collectors, Antiquarians, and Museums.—
For sale.—Colonel J. H. Rivett-Carnac's unique Collection of Brass and Copper Figures of the Purnana Deities, and sacrificial, Temple, and other implements of Hindu ritual and worship, acquired during 20 years' collection in India, described, exhibited, and known as "THE LESSER HINDU PANTHEON," and considered the second finest collection of Mythological Hindu Metal Work in existence. This was fully described and illustrated on 12 photogravure plates in No. 72 (October, 1900), Vol. IX. of "The Journal of Indian Art and Industry," a copy of which is possibly procurable from Messrs. Bernard Quaritch, 15, Piccadilly, W. This collection, comprising over 200 pieces, is now on view at Messrs. A. H. Wheeler & Co.'s offices, at 119-121, Temple Chambers, Temple Avenue, London, E.C.4, to whom inquiries may be addressed.

Typewriting &c

Typewriting of every description carefully and promptly executed at home, 1s. per 1,000 words; carbon copy, 3d. per 1,000 words. Duplicating, Cambridge Local.—Miss Nancy McFarlane, 11, Palmeira Avenue, Worclife Easson.

Typewriting.—Authors' MSS., Examination Papers, Letters, Circulars, Testimonials, General Copying, Duplicating, etc.—J. Trimnell, 8, Moira Terrace, Cardiff.

IMPORTANT.
The Publisher will be glad to hear from readers of "The Athenaeum" who experience any difficulty in obtaining copies. All communications sent to 10 Adelphi Terrace, W.C.2, will receive immediate attention.

Subscription Rates.

INLAND,
£1.8s. 2d. per annum £1.10s. per annum
post free. post free.
Shorter periods in proportion.

Subscriptions should be sent to The Publisher, "The Athenaeum," 10, Adelphi Terrace, W.C.2.
THE SUPERSTITION OF DIVORCE
By G. K. CHESTERTON. "Makes out an impregnable case for preserving the sanctity of existing marriage laws and for making divorce the most special kind of dispensation."—The Morning Post. "Once more the most entertaining of our controversialists shows us how to laugh and grow-wiser..."—Harold Spender in The Sunday Times. "Startling new statements concerning the Prime Minister's attitude on the question of war with Germany during the fateful week which preceded our declaration of hostilities."—The Daily Express. "Everyone is talking about Mr. W. W. Rock's book on the Premier."—The Eastern Daily Press. With 9 Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 5s. net.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE AND THE WAR
By WALTER ROCH. "A book which ranks high in the library of books which has already been produced on the controversies of the war... Narrative clear and readable."—Harold Spender in The Sunday Times. "Startling new statements concerning the Prime Minister's attitude on the question of war with Germany during the fateful week which preceded our declaration of hostilities."—The Daily Express. "Everyone is talking about Mr. W. W. Rock's book on the Premier."—The Eastern Daily Press. With 9 Illustrations. Cr. 8vo. 16s. net.

LETTERS OF ANTON TCHEHOV
Translated from the Russian by CONSTANCE GARNETT. The self-portrait of a great genius. "The talk of the poet and artist Tchehov."—Tuesday. With 8 Portraits. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net. Just published.

LIMBO
By ALDOUS HUXLEY. These strange and satirical stories will establish the author as one of the most notable writers of the younger generation. Narrow Cr. 8vo. 3s. net. Just published.

WILLIAM SMITH: POTTER AND FARMER

PRELUDE
By BEVERLEY NICHOLS. A public-school novel by a young writer which will arouse attention and discussion. Cr. 8vo. 7s. 6d. net. Next week.

THE YOUNG VISITERS
By DAISY ASHFORD. With Preface by J. M. BARRIE. 13th Thousand. Cr. 8vo. Boards, 3s. 6d. net. White Cloth, 5s. net. Lambskin, 7s. 6d. net.

SACRED & PROFANE LOVE
The Text of ARNOLD BENNETT'S "New Play. "It was no wonder that the first-night audience, when he was called before them, made such a fuss of Mr. Bennett, for in the simplification of one act he had dealt candidly and effectively with human beings in the grip of two powerful passions."—The Nation. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

NOTES ON THE SCIENCE OF PICTURE-MAKING
By C. J. HOLMES, Director of the National Gallery. 4th Ed. With a Preface on Recent Tendencies in Art. Demy 8vo. 8s. 6d. net.

THE TALES OF ANTON TCHEHOV
By CONSTANCE GARNETT. Translated from the Russian. Post 8vo. Cloth, 3s. 6d. net. Leather, 4s. 6d. net.

97 & 99 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C.2.
Appointments Vacant

UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH.

LECTURESHIP IN ITALIAN.

The University Court will shortly proceed to appoint a Lecturer on Italian Language and Literature, and they invite applications. The tenure of the Lectureship will be for a period of five years, with eligibility for re-appointment or for such shorter period as may be arranged.

The salary is £400 per annum, rising by annual increments of £10 to £500 per annum.

The appointment will run from the commencement of the next academic year on October 1, 1920.

Applicants are requested to send fourteen copies of their letter of application, with any testimonials they may desire to submit, to the Secretary to the University, before the end of February.

WILLIAM WILSON, Secretary to the University.

UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH.

CHAIR OF FORESTRY.

The University Court will shortly proceed to appoint a Professor to the newly-instituted Chair of Forestry at a salary of £1,200 per annum, and they invite applications.

The appointment will run from the commencement of the next academic year on October 1, 1920.

Applicants are requested to send fourteen copies of their letter of application, with any testimonials they may desire to submit, to the Secretary to the University, before the end of March.

WILLIAM WILSON, Secretary to the University.

Borough of Colwyn Bay Council Committee

Certificated Class Teachers are required for the Boys' Central School and Central Classes. Trained Certificated Teachers, men and women, are required in other schools in the Borough.

Application forms and scale of salaries will be forwarded on receipt of stamped addressed foolscap envelope.

E. Jenkins, Secretary.

Education Office, Guildhall, Colwyn Bay.

KING EDWARD'S GRAMMAR SCHOOL, CAMP HILL, BIRMINGHAM.

At end of April, a Form Mistress with good History qualifications and English or Geography as a subsidiary subject.

Experience desirable; games a recommendation. Salary £160-£200-£250, with allowance for previous experience. Apply at once to the Head Mistress.

MOULTON GRAMMAR SCHOOL, SPALDING, LINCS.

Wanted, as soon as possible, Two Assistant Masters, Graduates with experience in Secondary Schools. Interest in games a recommendation.

Apply to the Headmaster.

BARNESLEY HIGH SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Wanted, in April, well-qualified Mathematics Mistress to organize the department and take some advanced work. Salary according to West Riding scale (250 or 370 to 530). Apply, at once, to the Headmistress.

Appointments Vacant

DENBIGHSHIRE EDUCATION AUTHORITY.

COULWYN COUNTY INTERMEDIATE BOYS' SCHOOL.

Applications are hereby invited for the POST of HEADMASTER of the above School.

The Headmaster will receive a fixed stipend of £180 per annum, and a further increment will be calculated on such a scale, uniform or graduated, as may be fixed from time to time by the School Governors, at the rate of not less than £1 10s. nor more than £3 a year, but in no case shall the salary be less than £500 per annum.

The Headmaster will also be provided with a house free of rent, rates, and taxes.

Applications must be Graduates in Honours of a British University and a knowledge of Welsh is desirable.

The person appointed will be required to carry out, and be subject to, the provisions of the Denbighshire Intermediate and Technical Education Scheme No. 11 and any amendment thereof which may be hereafter made so far as the same relates to the Ruabon County Intermediate School.

Candidates who desire the receipt of their application to be acknowledged should enclose a stamped addressed post card.

Canvassing disqualifies.

Applications endorsed "Headmaster Ruabon County School," accompanied by copies of three recent testimonials must reach the undersigned on or before March 13, 1920—10 copies of the form of application and of the testimonials to be sent by each candidate.

J. C. Davies, M.A., Secretary and Director of Education.

DENBIGHSHIRE EDUCATION AUTHORITY.

WILLOW COUNTY SECONDARY SCHOOL.

Applications are hereby invited for the POST of HEADMASTER of the above School, the duties to commence in September, 1920.

Commencing salary £50 per annum.

Candidates must be Graduates in Honours of a British University and a knowledge of Welsh is desirable.

Candidates who desire the receipt of their application to be acknowledged should enclose a stamped addressed post card.

Canvassing disqualifies.

Applications endorsed "Headmaster Denbigh School," accompanied by copies of three recent testimonials must reach the undersigned on or before March 13, 1920—10 copies of the form of application and of the testimonials to be sent by each candidate.

J. C. Davies, M.A., Secretary and Director of Education.

LANCASHIRE EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

The Lancashire Education Committee are at present organising a Temporary Training College at Lancaster for ex-service men of good general education who desire to be trained for teaching in Elementary Schools. It is proposed to open the College after Easter, and to provide a Two-Year Course leading to the Final Examination for the Teachers' Certificate granted by the Board of Education. The Committee invite applications for the following posts:

(a) A LECTURER IN ENGLISH.
(b) A LECTURER IN HISTORY.
(c) A LECTURER IN MATHEMATICS AND SCIENCE.
(d) A LECTURER IN GEOGRAPHY.

Candidates should hold an Honours Degree or other special qualification for the position, and must have had some teaching experience in institutions for Higher Education, but not necessarily in a Training College.

Owing to the temporary nature of the College, the appointments will be for two years only. Salary £400—£500 a year (non-resident), according to qualifications. Further particulars and forms of application (which must be returned before Saturday, February 28), may be obtained from the Directors of Education, County Offices, Preston.

WEST RIDING COUNTY COUNCIL.

MEXBOROUGH AND DISTRICT SECONDARY SCHOOL.

WANTED for next term, a MASTER OR MISTRESS with good qualifications for teaching Botany. Salary for men begins at £130 and rises to £300. Salary for women begins at £180 to £250 and rises to £330. Apply, by February 21, to Headmaster.

For further appointments see pages 164-165.
INVESTMENT RISKS
AND
HOW TO AVOID THEM

BY

SIR JOHN ROLLESTON.

The call of to-day is for the highest rate of interest with safety of capital.

The general contents of the book are of intense practical interest.

It is short in length—a distinct advantage in the rush and tear of modern life.

Yet it is comprehensive, adequate and correct.

It presents the subject of investment in popular form, and shows the advantages of certain securities over others.

It defines clearly the dangers to be avoided.

A Complimentary Copy will be sent, post free, to all applicants mentioning The Athenæum,

INVESTMENT REGISTRY, LIMITED,

(ESTABLISHED 1880).

6, GRAFTON STREET, NEW BOND STREET, LONDON, W. 1.

DIRECTORS.

The Right Hon. LORD MORRIS, K.C., P.C., D.C.L. (Chairman).

The Duke of Argyll.

The Right Hon. VISCOUNT HILL.

The Right Hon. VISCOUNT KNOLLYS, G.C.B.

FREDERICK LAST.

Lieut.-Col. W. SELBY LOWNDES.
Appointments Vacant

Oswestry Education Committee.

HEADMASTER OF SCHOOL OF ART.

The Oswestry Education Committee invite Applications for the post of HEADMASTER of the Oswestry School of Art. Appointment from April 1, 1920. Salary £200, with opportunities for private work.

Applications should be received by February 17, 1920, by the undersigned, from whom all further particulars may be obtained.

G. W. FERRINGTON, Clerk to the Committee.

The Salt Schools, Shipley.

The Governors invite applications for the appointment of HEAD MISTRESS of the Salt Girls' High School, to commence her duties in September next. Candidates must be Graduates (preferably in Honours) of a University in the United Kingdom, or possess equivalent qualifications. Initial salary, £350 to £450 per annum, according to qualifications and experience. The number of pupils at present in the school is 247.

Further particulars and forms of application may be obtained from the undersigned by forwarding stamped directed envelope, and should be returned not later than March 8, 1920.

Walter Popplestone, Secretary.

Hull Municipal Training College.

WANTED after Easter, a WOMAN LECTURER in GEOGRAPHY. Particulars may be obtained from the Principal, to whom applications should be sent not later than February 21, 1920.

City of Sheffield Education Committee.

Applications are invited for APPOINTMENT as CERTIFIED MASTERS and CERTIFIED ASSISTANT MISTRESSES for service in the Elementary Schools of the Authority.

REVISED SCALE OF SALARIES.

MEN: Minimum ... ... £150 per annum. Maximum ... ... £360 per annum. Annual increments ... £10.

WOMEN: Minimum ... ... £136 per annum. Maximum ... ... £288 per annum. Annual increments ... £8.

In the case of Trained Certificated Teachers each year spent in a Training College will be regarded for the purpose of fixing the commencing salary of a Teacher as a year of service with the Sheffield Education Committee.

In fixing the commencing salary of a Teacher, certain previous experience, in a like capacity under other Authorities may be counted as service with the Sheffield Education Committee.

Forms of application, which must be returned to the undersigned as soon as possible, may be had on receipt of a stamped addressed envelope.

PERCIVAL SHARP, Director of Education.

Education Office, Saltaire Road, Shipley.

County Borough of Portsmouth.

Public Libraries and Museums.

Applications are invited for the post of THIRD ASSISTANT LIBRARIAN, who should have had experience in public library work and should hold the qualifications necessary for registration as a M.L.A. Preference will be given to one who has served in H.M. Forces. Duties will comprise supervision of branches, or such other work at the Central or Branch Libraries as may from time to time be allotted by the Borough Librarian.

Salary will commence at £100 per annum, rising by annual increments of £10 to £120; for the present, war bonus on Award 84 will be paid in addition.

Applications enclosing copies of not more than three recent testimonials to be sent to the Borough Librarian, Central Public Library, Portsmouth, so as to be received by first post on Wednesday, February 18, 1920.

Canvassing members of the Council, directly or indirectly, will disqualify.

G. HAMMOND ETHERTON, Town Clerk.
Appointment Vacant
BOROUGH OF BERMONDSEY.
LIBRARY ASSISTANT.

THE Council of the above Borough invite APPLICATIONS for the APPOINTMENT of a LIBRARY ASSISTANT. Candidates must have had practical experience in the work of a Public Library and hold at least two Library Association Professional Certificates. Salary £125 per annum plus £90 18s. war bonus. Applications on forms to be obtained from the undersigned, with copies of two recent testimonials, must be delivered to me not later than 12 noon on February 23, 1920, endorsed "Library Assistant."

FREDK. RYALL,
Town Hall, Spa Road, Bermondsey, S.E.,
February 4, 1920.

Booksellers & Catalogues
SECONDHAND BOOKS.

J. A. BURNS, 105, Bury St Edmunds, Suffolk.

In Preparation—Catalogues 185, Natural Science and Mathematics.

" Catalogue 186, Occult, Mysticism, Folk Lore, Orientalia, English and Foreign Literature.

Librarians, Executors, and others desirous of either disposing of or buying Fine, Rare, or Standard Books in all classes of literature are invited to communicate with W. HEFFER & SONS, Limited, Booksellers, Cambridge.

Complete Libraries Purchased. Valuations for Probate.

FIRST EDITIONS OF OLD PLAYS.

SHERIDAN—Pizarro, 8vo, 63s. net, 1797. £1 10 0

FIELDING—The Fathes, 8vo, half-calf, 1778. £1 10 0

CUMBERLAND—The Fashionable Lover, 8vo, half-calf, 1772. £1 7 6

GAY—The Distress'd Wife, 8vo, boards, 1743. £1 12 0

All immaculate copies and sent post free.

L. CHAUDY OF OXFORD LTD.

EGYPT, PALESTINE, and the FAR EAST; Travel; Arabian Nights; and Napoleon Era. New Catalogue post free on application. J. A. ALLEN & CO., 16, Grenville Street, London, W.1.

W. & G. FOYLE, LTD., 121-125, Charing Cross Road, London, W.2

FOREIGN BOOKS, SECOND-HAND AND NEW.

Plenty in Stock. Orders for Rare Books carefully attended to.

The London Foreign Book Co., 2, Langham Place, W.1

Authors’ Agents, etc.

THE AUTHORS’ ALLIANCE are prepared to consider and place MSS. for early publication. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors’ interests first. Twenty years’ experience. Please note new address: 35 and 94, CHANCERY LANE, LONDON, W.C.2

AUTHORS’—

MSS. placed at highest prices; free monthly prorates; terms for stamp.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 8, Henrietta St., W. C.2

UNIVERSITY WOMAN (Hons. Mod, Lang. Trip.) undertakes all kinds Research, indexing, French, German, Italian, Spanish, Dutch, Danish translation.—M. K., 7, Phoenix Lodge Mansions, W.6.

AUTHORS:—Wanted MSS. of every description for publication in volume form. Fiction, Poetry, Short Stories, Plays, Children’s Books, etc. Promising new writers specially sought.—Write "Books," Box 565, SELLS, LTD., 188, Fleet Street, E.C.4

VERY FINE SET OF IVORY CHESSMEN, red and white, Staunton pattern, quite new, with full-size board. £25.

—Dr. Lewis, Finningley, Doncaster.

Art Exhibitions
ROYAL ACADEMY
The Nation’s War Paintings
IMPERIAL WAR MUSEUM EXHIBITION
Weekdays, 10-6, LAST WEEK.

RENOIR, MONET, MANET, DEGAS, GAUGUIN, DELACROIX, etc., etc.

Exhibition of select paintings and drawings by modern French masters.

ELDAR GALLERY, 40, Great Marlborough St., W.

Open 10.30 to 6. Admission 1s., including Catalogue.

"A most attractive little exhibition... The 'Nude' is certainly one of Renoir's supreme achievements."—P. G. Rossety in The Observer.

"A splendid little show. There is hardly a picture or drawing which does not merit special attention."—The Queen.

"Without borrowing 'crowned' works it would be difficult to make a collection more truly representative of the artists concerned."—Evening Standard.

"It is an event of unusual importance to have the opportunity of seeing a magnificent 'Nude' by Renoir and a Claude Moret so perfect as 'The Rain.'"—Westminster Gazette.

This interesting little collection—"The Athenæum,... Collected with discrimination."—The Daily Mail.

THE MODERN SOCIETY OF PORTRAIT PAINTERS

Tenth Exhibition now open at R. I. Galleries, 195, Piccadilly.

NEW SCULPTURE BY EPSSTEIN

also

SENEFELLER CLUB. 10th Exhibition of Lithographs by Members and BONNARD, CARRIERS, DAUMIER, DELACROIX, FANTIN-FOARIA, GAUGUIN, GOYA, MANET, MATISSE, RENOIR, RODIN, STEINLEN, TOULOUSE-LAUTREC, VUILLARD, etc.

Leicester Galleries, Leicester Square, 10-6

WALKER'S GALLERIES, 118, New Bond St., W.1

Exhibition open until February 14th.

COLNAGHI'S GALLERIES

144, 145, 146, NEW BOND ST. W.1

EXHIBITION OF DRAWINGS AND STUDIES

BY

CHARLES SHANNON, A.R.A.

10-5 Except Sunday.

Catalogues, 6d

Typewriting &c.

TYPEWRITING OF EVERY DESCRIPTION carefully and promptly executed at home—Is. per 1,000 words; carbon copy, 3d. per 1,000 words. Duplicating, Cambridge Local, etc.

MRS. NANCY McFARLANE, 11, Palmeira Avenue, Westcliff Essex.

Typewriting. Authors’ MSS., Examination Papers, Letters, Circulars, Testimonials, General Copying, Duplicating, etc. — J. THORNE, 8, Moira Terrace, Cardiff.
The General Meeting of the London Joint City and Midland Bank Limited was held at the Cannon Street Hotel, London, E.C., on January 29th.

The Right Hon. R. McKenna, the Chairman, presided. In opening his speech the Chairman expressed the personal loss they had all sustained by the death of their late Chairman, and dwelt at length upon Edward Holden's great qualities and the invaluable service rendered by him to their bank.

He was sure it would be in accordance with the shareholders' wish that they should interrupt their proceedings, and before passing to the business of the day, should express their feelings in a formal Resolution. He therefore moved:—

"That this meeting desires to record their profound sense of personal and public loss in the death of Sir Edward Holden, and to convey to his sons, Sir Harry Cassie Holden and Major Norman E. Holden, and to the other members of his family, this expression of their deep sympathy."

The Resolution was carried by the meeting standing in their places.

The Currency Question.

The Chairman next proceeded:—

I am going to ask you to consider with me to-day a problem which has been much discussed in the Press and in Parliament. Nothing gives so much concern to the public at the present time as the great rise in prices. Masses of people find almost insuperable difficulty in bringing their expenditure within the limits of their income, and they clamour for a remedy. So far as I have seen, the most popular proposal for reducing prices is to fix a limit to the currency note issue. But is this issue really the cause of high prices? May it not be that the great increase in currency notes is itself only an effect of another cause, a mere link in the chain which ends in high prices?

In the first place let us look at the estimated figures of currency, Bank deposits, and prices of commodities, as they stand to-day, compared with 1914. The total amount of currency in circulation held by the public in 1914, i.e., gold, silver, copper coin, and Bank notes, was £128,000,000. To-day the corresponding figure is estimated at £393,000,000, an increase of £265,000,000, or 207 per cent. The estimated amount of currency held by the Banks in 1914 was £75,000,000, and in 1919 £191,000,000, an increase of £116,000,000, or 154 per cent. Before the war, the total deposits of the Banks of the United Kingdom (other than the Bank of England), including the name deposits money held on current account as well as on deposit account, amounted to £1,070,000,000. The corresponding figure last month was about £2,300,000,000, an increase of £1,230,000,000, or 115 per cent.

The actual spending power of the public is gauged by the total amount of currency in circulation added to the total amount of Bank deposits. In 1914 the public spending power was £1,198,000,000; to-day it is £2,693,000,000, an increase of £1,495,000,000, or 125 per cent.

I turn now to a comparison of the prices of commodities of everyday use or consumption in 1914 and at the present time. If we take 100 to represent the cost of living in 1914, the corresponding figure to-day would be about 225, or an increase of 125 per cent. The spending power of the public and the cost of living show the same percentage increase of 125.

Bank deposits, the Chairman said, are derived from two sources and from two sources only. The first and most obvious source is by payments of currency into the Banks. Anyone who takes notes out of his note-case and pays them into his Bank creates a deposit. The second source from which deposits are derived could not be described with equal simplicity, but after a detailed analysis the Chairman concluded that only Bank loans or advances need be taken into account.

Let us look now at the increase of Bank deposits since 1914 and see to what extent this increase is due respectively to payments in of additional currency and to Bank loans. In June, 1914, the Banks held £75,000,000 of currency. Last month this figure stood at £191,000,000. The Banks, therefore, held money in currency to the extent of £116,000,000, and to this extent the increase in the aggregate of Bank deposits is accounted for by payments in of currency. But it is estimated that since June, 1914, Bank deposits have risen by £1,230,000,000. If £116,000,000 of this amount are accounted for by payments of currency into the Banks, there remain £1,114,000,000, which, if the previous analysis be accepted as correct, we must attribute to Bank loans.

Now that we have cleared so much ground, we must not forget the real object of our search. We are seeking the relation between the increase of Bank deposits, the increase of currency, and high prices: and we have got so far as to see that Bank loans are the main source of the growth of Bank deposits. As an increase of deposits means an addition to our purchasing power, we should expect such an increase to be followed by a rise in prices. But we must guard ourselves here from a generalisation which may be too broad. If money is borrowed by manufacturers and traders for the purpose of the production or movement of commodities, the increase of purchasing power consequent upon the loans is followed in due course by an increase in the amount of commodities available, and the rise in prices which might be expected from a greater demand is corrected by a greater supply. Let us for a moment examine what takes place when a Bank makes loans or advances in the ordinary way of trade. Suppose the case of a loan or advance to a manufacturer who uses the money to pay for raw material or wages, or some other expenses in the course of his business. When the goods are manufactured and sold to the merchant, it is expected that the proceeds of the sale will be used to pay off the Bank loan. The merchant in his turn may have borrowed from his Bank to pay the manufacturer, and there may be a whole series of loans from Banks, each paid off in its turn as the goods pass from their primitive state of raw material to their final destination as finished goods in the hands of the consumer. But when the consumer has paid cash for the goods, all the series of loans and advances in the ordinary course of commerce will have been an increase in Bank deposits only so long as the goods were not finally disposed of. In this view of Bank transactions, loans by Banks, and therefore deposits, would only increase in total amount as the total of commodities increased. There would be a greater purchasing power for the time being, but there would also be a greater supply in process of production.

State Loans.

Let me now sum up the case so far as we have gone. We have seen that during the last six years Bank deposits have increased by £1,230,000,000. Of these loans we find that payments of additional currency into the Banks account for £116,000,000. We have seen that any other cause of an increase in deposits except Bank Loans is not large, and we have concluded that Bank Loans have been responsible for an increase of £1,100,000,000 in Bank deposits. We have seen further that if these loans had been made to manufacturers and traders in the ordinary course of their business the increase in deposits, and consequently in purchasing power, would not of itself have caused a permanent rise in prices as the additional deposits would have been followed by an additional supply of commodities. To whom then have these loans been made? It is impossible to give precise figures, but the best estimate I can form is that of the total of £1,100,000,000, £800,000,000, including Treasury Bills, have been lent to the State, and £300,000,000 to trade. The Government, under the overwhelming necessity of war effort, has been the great borrower from the Banks. The loans to the State have led to a still greater increase of deposits, and as they have remained outstanding long after the commodities they were raised to pay for have been consumed, they have been an inevitable cause of a rise in prices.

Government Borrowing.

The Chairman next analysed the three forms of Government borrowing—from the public, from the Banks, and from the Bank of England. He showed that the first leads to an increase of deposits or purchasing power, and that the second leads to an increase of deposits exactly equal to the amount borrowed, but does not increase the amount of Bank cash (including balance held at the Bank of England). He continued:

The first case of Government borrowing which we have to consider is that of borrowing direct from the Bank of England. In that case a credit is given by the Bank of England to the Government, who draw upon it and pay out the amount to contractors. In due course the contractors pay the money they have received into their accounts with their own Banks, and deposits are thereby increased. The Banks now hold more money, which in their turn they pay into their accounts at the Bank of England, and so increase their cash balance. There was no previous withdrawal in this case from Bank balances and the increase in the balances exactly equal to the amount of the Bank of England's loan to the Government. Here we see both an increase in customers' deposits and an increase in the balances of the Banks at the Bank of England. These balances are the basis upon which the Banks found their advances; in the increase in them will necessarily be followed by additional advances whether to their customers or to the Government with a consequent further increase in deposits. We conclude from this analysis therefore that loans by the Bank of England to the Government have a much greater effect in raising prices than any other form of Government loan, as they increase immediately the total deposits and consequently the power of the public, but they also increase the power of the Banks to make further advances which in due course lead to still more deposits and still greater purchasing power.

The Rise in Prices.

Now that we have examined the different methods of Government borrowing and have considered the effect of each in increasing Bank deposits, it remains for us to look at the course of events as they have actually occurred since 1914 in forcing a rise in prices. At the outbreak of war, throughout its course, and right down to the present moment, the Government have been large buyers of commodities, greatly in excess of their normal demands. The first consequence of the immense Government purchases was to stimulate production. Machinery was used to its full capacity; the number of people employed was greatly increased; women took the place of men, and every country therefore increased the total national output. But enlarge the output as we would, it could not keep pace with the nation's requirements. Demand outstripped supply, and, just as it happens when a period of comparative trade depression is succeeded by a trade boom, there was a natural rise in prices. At once more currency was needed, partly to pay the wages of the large number of workpeople employed, partly because with higher prices shopkeepers keep more money in their tills. To the extent that more currency was issued the spending power of the community was increased. But up to this point the increase was not great. A new condition had to be introduced before any considerable rise could take place. There must be a mere increase in currency, the total of which in any case only represents a small part of the public spending power: but, far more important, there must be a serious addition to Bank deposits. It was not long before this new condition arose. To meet the extraordinary greater demand the Government had to borrow freely from the public, from the Banks, and from the Bank of England. It is unnecessary to recapitulate the effects of this borrowing. Bank deposits increased enormously. There was no proportionate increase in the supply of goods, and the usual consequences followed. Prices began to rise, and the rise in prices was very gradual at first, but it had to go on in order to enable the general demands for increased wages. As these now rose the cost of production rose too, and another turn was given to the screw on which prices were steadily mounting. But higher wages and higher prices mean a greater demand for currency. The weekly wages have got to be paid in legal tender money. In the course of the week the Bank of England pays out in wages comes back through the shops to the Banks, and is paid out by them again to meet the next week's requirements. But as prices and wages rise, not all of it comes back, and each week a larger amount is retained in the pockets of the people, in the tills of shopkeepers, and in the tills and reserves of the Banks.

We may stop here to ask, is there any stage in this process at which it would be possible to limit the rise in currency? The main demand for currency is to meet the weekly wages bill. If wages increase, whether because more workers are employed, or because rates are higher, additional currency must be brought each week into circulation. If the supply were cut off, a substitute would have to be found. At the outbreak of war there was not enough legal tender money to satisfy these additional requirements, and at once postal orders and even postage stamps were used to make good the deficiency. If men and women are to be employed, and paid, means of paying them must be found, and an arbitrary limitation of currency would merely inflict intolerable inconvenience upon the public.

Although, as I venture to think, the increase in currency is not the cause of high prices, yet I believe the public have shown a right instinct in fastening upon this increase as a matter for anxiety and even alarm. Though not the rain-storm itself, it is the gauge which measures the rainfall. The figures are easily apprehended, and the weekly records can be readily followed. These figures show that they who would check every advance by the Bank of England to the Government is followed by a fresh issue of currency notes. Once the nation can free itself from the need for these advances, the rise in prices, so far as it is due to an increased demand, will cease, and the currency in circulation will no longer expand. When these advances are paid off prices will tend to go down, and the currency in circulation will diminish.

When we look to the future we naturally ask, shall we ever get back to pre-war prices and pre-war currency and Bank deposits? If I might hazard an opinion, it would be that prices will remain permanently on a far higher level than in 1914. The rise that has taken place is not local. It is not even European and American. It covers the whole world. The cost of living in Japan has risen quite as much in this country. In India and China, where human wants are much less than with us, and where custom plays a far stronger part in fixing prices, there is also much above the pre-war standard. Increased production will bring down prices to a certain extent, but the purchasing power of the world measured in money cannot be materially diminished. Deflation is bound to be very slow. Any attempt, indeed, to bring it about rapidly would cause widespread ruin among manufacturers and traders. The greatest caution would be necessary in handling our financial machinery and many of our pre-war ideas must be modified in view of the fundamental change in our conditions.

A Plea for Economy.

The only condition on which we shall be able to check the rise in prices is that our annual expenditure is brought within the compass of our revenue. In State as in domestic finance we must learn to make both ends meet, and the case is not in the least bettered if we only balance our accounts by selling out capital stock and placing the proceeds to the credit of our revenue account. The expenditure of the Government is tantamount to the consumption of the quantity of commodities which the money would buy, and this must not exceed the amount of commodities the consumption of which the community are compelled to deny themselves by reason of the taxes they have to pay. If it does, we run the risk, as is indeed the case, of reducing the value of our currency and retarding our production. This is not a plea for additional taxation. Far from it. Our existing taxation, which I believe higher than in any other country in the world, is already dangerously near the point at which thrift, business enterprise, and needful capital development become seriously impaired. But it is a plea for a change in the nature of our tax. It is a plea for the substitution of some tax which will not ruthlessly cut down or postponement of all financial outlay by the State as will reduce our expenditure to a figure less than our tax revenue, for by this method alone can we hope to restrict the issue of currency, check the rise in prices, restore our foreign exchange, and re-establish London in her old position as the financial centre and free gold market of the world.

The Report was adopted and the proceedings terminated with a vote of thanks to the Chairman.
MESSRS. METHUEN’S ANNOUNCEMENTS

NEW ILLUSTRATED ANNOUNCEMENT LIST SENT FREE ON APPLICATION

THE THEORY OF RELATIVITY. By A. Einstein. Translated by Robert W. Lawson, Sheffield University. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

In this book, which is written for the average reader, Prof. Einstein explains his famous theory of Relativity, which has so excited the Scientific world. It is intended primarily for those readers who, though interested in the trend of modern thought, are not conversant with the mathematical analysis used in theoretical physics. The Theory of Gravitation, which Einstein derives from his general theory of Relativity, clears away many of the defects of the older theory. It has already explained results of astronomical observation which have long been a stumbling block. It has stimulated thought and marks the commencement of a new era in natural and scientific and philosophical research.

General Literature
THE PHANTOM JOURNAL and Other Essays and Diversions. By E. V. Lucas. Fcp. 8vo. 6s. net.
The LURE OF THE MAP. By W. P. James. Fcp. 8vo. 5s. net.
NOT THAT IT MATTERS. By A. A. Milne. Author of "The Day's Play." Fcp. 8vo. 6s. net.
OLD VILLAGE LIFE. By P. H. Ditchfield, M.A., F.R.A.S. With many Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.
The EVANGELICAL REVIVAL. By S. Baring-Gould. Demy 8vo. 15s. net.
SCALA MUNDI. By Arthur Chandler, Lord Bishop of Bloemfontein. Author of "Ara Coeli." Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net.
A HANDBOOK TO THE SEPTUAGINT. By Richard R. Ottoy. Crown 8vo. 8s. net.
GREEK TRAGEDY. By Gilbert Norwood, M.A., Professor of Greek in the University College, Cardiff. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.
The BEE-MASTER OF WARRILLOW. By Tickner Edwards. Author of "The Lore of the Honey Bee." With 12 Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.
The CONFESSIONS OF JACOB BOEHME. Compiled and edited by W. Scott Palmer. With an Introduction by Evelyn Underhill. Fcp. 8vo. 5s. net.
The BATTLE OF THE MARNE. By George Herbert Perris. With 12 maps and plans. Crown 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

Sport, Travel, etc.
MOUNTAIN CRAFT. By G. Winthrop Young. Crown 8vo. 15s net.
A BOOK OF THE SEVERN. By A. G. Bradley. With 16 Illustrations in colour by R. H. Buxton. Demy 8vo. 15s. net.
SKATING. By A. E. Crawley. Fcap. 8vo. 3s. net.
CROSS-COUNTRY SKI-ING. By Arnold Lunn. Fcap. 8vo. 5s. net.
AUCTION PIQUET. By "Rubicon." Fcp. 8vo. 4s. net.

PHILOSOPHY, ECONOMICS, POLITICS, etc.
BERSON AND HIS PHILOSOPHY. By J. Alexander Gunn, M.A., Professor of Philosophy, University of Liverpool. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.
SOCIAL EVOLUTION. By Benjamin Kidd. A new edition. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.
CHAOS AND ORDER IN INDUSTRY. By G. D. H. Cole, M.A. Crown 8vo. 7s. net.
SOCIAL ECONOMICS. By J. Harry Jones, M.A. Professor of Economics in the University of Leeds. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.
ECONOMICS. By James Cunnison, M.A., Lecturer in Social Economics in the University of Glasgow. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.
NATIONALITY. By Sydney Herbert. Assistant Lecturer in International Politics, University College of Wales, Aberystwyth. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.
The PSYCHOLOGY OF PERSUASION. By William Macpherson, M.A., Inspector of Schools for the City of Bradford Education Committee. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

Scientific and Technical
CHEMISTRY FOR PUBLIC HEALTH STUDENTS. By E. Gabriel Jones, M.Sc., F.I.C., Lecturer in Public Health Chemistry in the University of Liverpool, Deputy Public Analyst for the City of Liverpool. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.

How They Did It.
HOW THEY DID IT. Crown 8vo. 8s. net.
HOW THEY DID IT. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.
PILATE GAVE SENTENCE. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.
WELL-TO-DO ARTHUR. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.
ADMIRAL TEACH. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.
O PERPETUATE LOVE. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.
CALL MR. FORTUNE. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.
LOVE WILL FIND OUT THE WAY. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.
SESTRINA. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

DAD. Albert Payson Terhune. F. Wren Child.
JOHN BULL, JUNIOR. Grace S. Richmond.
RED AND BLACK. Charles Alden Seltzer.
FIREBRAND TREVIISON. Edna Ferber.
ROAST BEEF MEDIUM. John Charles Beecham.
The ARGUS PHEASANT. The GODS OF MARS. Edgar Rice Burroughs.
TYOPA. Ernest Glanville.
The CODE OF THE MOUNTAINS. Charles Neville Buck.

METHUEN’S POPULAR NOVELS.

METHUEN & CO., LTD., 36, ESSEX STREET, LONDON, W.C.2
THE PUBLIC LIBRARY CHARTER

A NEW Public Libraries Bill was introduced into the House of Commons on November 28 last, and, after being amended in the Lords so as to bring certain portions into line with the general law, received the royal assent on December 23. This quick and satisfactory passage is very encouraging after the short shrift accorded to the private Bill brought up time after time before the war. The new Act is not a comprehensive measure, such as was foreshadowed by the Interim Report of the Adult Education Committee, briefly reviewed in The Athenæum of January 2; it is not the mature result of a wide survey of the possibilities of public libraries in a reconstructed society. But it has got rid of the most paralyzing obstacle to the welfare and future growth of libraries, and provided for their extension to rural districts under the authority of the county councils. Such an amendment to the Acts of 1892 and 1901 has been long overdue, and the congratulations of every one in favour of widening intellectual culture, and putting science at the service of all the workers, will go out to the Library Association and the Carnegie United Kingdom Trust.

The former has fought a long battle for the removal of the rate-limit of 1d. in the £, which brought the libraries to the verge of bankruptcy; the latter, by financing a number of rural library systems and providing a successful object-lesson, has been the instrument in remediating the chief defect in former legislation. However imperfect, the Act of 1919 is the natural complement to the Education Act of 1918.

By an order of the Ministry of Health, the powers of check and audit relating to public libraries formerly vested in the Local Government Board were last year transferred to the Board of Education. By the new Act, the administration of public libraries may be handed over to Education Committees, and when the Public Libraries Acts are adopted in future these committees must assume control, except the power of raising a rate or borrowing money. But the fear agitating many minds that all the public libraries in the country were to be put under the Board of Education and the local Education Committees, and run as a sort of adjunct to the schools, has not been realized. The present library authorities will not be displaced, unless by their own consent. Except in county boroughs, they may relinquish their powers on agreed terms to the county councils; but the option is left to themselves. Inevitably, this will result in many anomalous situations. Some borough and rural districts will be absorbed in county systems, others will stand out. The anomaly would be glaring should any of the metropolitan library authorities elect to resign their duties to the London County Council, whilst the others continue as they are. On the face of it, the provisions of the Act are largely experimental. If large systems of libraries are found after a few years to work better than the detached units, the policy of co-ordination under central authorities will surely be extended.

This was the policy advocated by the Adult Education Committee. Unfortunately, that Committee did not take counsel with those having practical experience of library administration; its report contained bad mistakes and met with severe criticism. It tried to tackle the question whether the authorities should remain separate and independent, or be grouped in districts for purposes of co-operation, or be placed under one central or various regional boards; but, not having studied the problem in the light of expert knowledge of ways and means, it was unable to provide a convincing answer. Many think that it is time we had a national library system instead of a vast number of individual libraries and groups of borough libraries. In the larger cities, all except London, in cities where these groups form considerable systems in themselves, and where, now that the rate-limit is gone, there should be no lack of resources, the evils of individualism will not be so evident. But detached libraries of moderate size can never provide for the multifarious wants of modern
THE NEW EL GRECO AT THE NATIONAL GALLERY

Mr. Holmes has risked a good deal in acquiring for the nation the new El Greco. The foresight and understanding necessary to bring off such a coup are not the qualities that we expect from a Director of the National Gallery. Patriotic people may even be inclined to think that the whole proceeding smacks too much of the manner in which Dr. Bode in past ages built up the Kaiser Friedrich Museum, largely at the expense of English collections. Even before the acquisition of the El Greco there were signs that Mr. Holmes did not fully understand the importance of "muddling through." And now with the El Greco he has given the British public an electric shock. People gather in crowds in front of it, they argue and discuss and lose their tempers. This might be intelligible enough if the price were known to be fabulous, but, so far as I am aware, the price has not been made known, so that it is really about the picture that people get excited. And what is more, they talk about it as they might talk of some contemporary picture, a thing about which they have a right to feel delighted or infuriated as the case may be—it is not like most old pictures, a thing classified and museumified, set altogether apart from life, an object for vague and listless reverence, but an actual living thing, expressing something with which one has got either to agree or disagree. Even if it should not be the superb masterpiece which most of us think it is, almost any sum would have been well spent on a picture capable of provoking such fierce aesthetic interest in the crowd.

That the artists are excited—never more so—is no wonder, for here is an old master who is not merely modern, but actually appears a good many steps ahead of us, turning back to show us the way. Immortality if you like! But the public—what is it that makes them "sit up"? So surprisingly one wonders. What makes this El Greco "count" with them as surely no Old Master ever did within memory? First, I expect, the extraordinary completeness of its realization. Even the most casual spectator, passing among pictures which retire discreetly behind their canvases, must be struck by the violent attack of these forms, by a relief so outstanding that by comparison the actual scene, the gallery and one's neighbours are reduced to the clef of a Whistlerian Nocturne. Partly, for we must face the fact, the melodramatic apparatus: the horrid rocks, the veiled moon, the ecstatic gestures. Not even the cinema star can push expression further than this. Partly, no doubt, the clarity and the balanced rhythm of the design, the assurance and grace of the handling; for, however little people may be conscious of it, formal qualities do affect their reaction to a picture, though they may pass from them almost immediately to its other implications. And certainly here, if anywhere, formal considerations must obtrude themselves even on the most unobservant. The extraordinary emphasis and amplitude of the rhythm, which thus gathers up into a few sweeping diagonals the whole complex of the vision, is directly exciting and stimulating. It affects one like an irresistible melody.

Ernest A. Baker.
and makes that organization of all the parts into a single whole, which is generally so difficult for the uninitiated, an easy matter for once. El Greco, indeed, puts the problem of form and content in a curious way. The artist, whose concern is ultimately and, I believe, exclusively with form, will no doubt be so carried away by the intensity and completeness of the design that he will never even notice the melodramatic and sentimental content which shocks or delights the ordinary man. It is none the less an interesting question, though it is rather one of artists' psychology than of aesthetics, to inquire in what way these two things, the melodramatic expression of a high-pitched religiosity and a peculiarly intense feeling for plastic unity and rhythmic amplitude, were combined in El Greco's work; even to ask whether there can have been any causal connection between them in the workings of El Greco's spirit.

Strange and extravagantly individual as El Greco seems, he was not really an isolated figure, a miraculous and monstrous apparition thrust into the even current of artistic movement. He really takes his place alongside of Bernini as the greatest exponent of the Baroque idea in figurative art. And the Baroque idea goes back to Michelangelo. Formally, its essence both in art and architecture was the utmost possible enlargement of the unit of design. One can see this most easily in architecture. To Bramante the façade of a palace was made of a series of storeys, each with its pilasters and windows related proportionally to one another, but each a co-ordinate unit of design. To the Baroque architect a façade was a single storey with pilasters going the whole height, and only divided, as it were, by an afterthought into subordinate groups corresponding to the separate storeys. When it came to sculpture and painting, the same tendency expressed itself by the discovery of such movements as would make the parts of the body, the head, trunk, limbs, merely so many subordinate divisions of a single unit. Now to do this implied extremely emphatic and marked poses, though not necessarily violent in the sense of displaying great muscular strain. Such poses correspond as expression to marked and excessive mental states, to conditions of ecstasy, or agony, or intense contemplation. But even more than to any actual poses resulting from such states, they correspond to a certain accepted and partly conventional language of gesture. They are what we may call rhetorical poses, in that they are not so much the result of the emotions as of the desire to express these emotions to the onlooker.

When the figure is draped the Baroque idea becomes particularly evident. The artists seek voluminous and massive garments which under the stress of an emphatic pose take heavy folds passing in a single diagonal sweep from top to bottom of the whole figure. In the figure of Christ in the National Gallery picture El Greco has established such a diagonal, and has so arranged the light and shade that he gets a double repetition of the same general direction, in the sleeve and the drapery of the thigh.

Bernini was a consummate master of this method of amplifying the unit, but having once set up the great wave of rhythm which held the figure in a single sweep, he was able to gratify his florid taste by allowing endless embroidery in the subordinate divisions, feeling secure that no amount of exuberance would destroy the firmly established scaffolding of his design.

Though the psychology of both these great rhetoricians is infinitely remote from us, we tolerate more easily the gloomy and terrible extravagance of El Greco's melodrama than the radiant effusiveness and amiability of Bernini's operas.

But there is another cause which accounts for the profound difference of our feeling to these two artists. Bernini undoubtedly had a great sense of design, but he was also a prodigious artistic acrobat, capable of feats of dizzying audacity, and unfortunately he loved popularity and the success which came to him so inevitably. He was not fine enough in grain to distinguish between his great imaginative gifts and the superficial virtuosity which made the crowd, including his Popes, gasp with astonishment. Consequently he expressed great inventions in a horribly impure technical language. El Greco, on the other hand, had the good fortune to be almost entirely out of touch with the public—one picture painted for the king was sufficient to put him out of court for the rest of his life. And in any case he was a singularly pure artist, he expressed his idea with perfect sincerity, with complete indifference to what effect the right expression might have on the public. At no point is there the slightest compromise with the world; the only issue for him is between him and his idea. Nowhere is a violent form softened, nowhere is the expressive quality of brushwork blurred in order to give verisimilitude of texture; no harshness of accent is shrunk, no crudity of colour opposition avoided, wherever El Greco felt such things to be necessary to the realization of his idea. It is this magnificent courage and purity, this total indifference to the expectations of the public, that bring him so near to us to-day, when more than ever the artist regards himself as working for ends unguessed at by the mass of his contemporaries. It is this also which accounts for the fact that while nearly everyone shudders involuntarily at Bernini's sentimental sugariness, very few artists of to-day have ever realized for a moment how unsympathetic to them is the literary content of an El Greco. They simply fail to notice what his pictures are about in the illustrative sense.

But to return to the nature of Baroque art. The old question here turns up: Did the dog wag his tail because he was pleased or was he pleased because his tail wagged? Did the Baroque artists choose ecstatic subjects because they were excited about a certain kind of rhythm, or did they elaborate the rhythm to express a feeling for extreme emotional states? There is yet another fact which complicates the matter. Baroque art corresponds well enough in time with the Catholic reaction and the rise of Jesuitism, with a religious movement which tended to dwell particularly on these extreme emotional states, and, in fact, the Baroque artists worked in entire harmony with the religious leaders.

This would look as though religion had inspired the artists with a passion for certain themes, and the need to express these had created Baroque art.

I doubt if it was as simple as that. Some action and reaction between the religious ideas of the time and the artists’ conception there may have been, but I think the artists would have elaborated the Baroque idea without this external pressure. For one thing, the idea goes back behind Michelangelo to Signorelli, and in his case, at least, one can see no trace of any preoccupation with those psychological states, but rather a pure passion for a particular kind of rhythmic design. Moreover, the general principle of the continued enlargement of the unit of design was bound to occur the moment artists recovered from the debauch of naturalism of the fifteenth century and became conscious again of the demands of abstract design.

In trying thus to place El Greco’s art in perspective, I do not in the least disparage his astonishing individual force. That he had to an extreme degree the quality we call genius is obvious, but he was neither so miraculous nor so isolated as we often suppose.

The exuberance and abandonment of Baroque art were natural expressions both of the Italian and Spanish natures, but they were foreign to the intellectual severity of the French genius, and it was from France, and in the person of Poussin, that the counterblast came. He, indeed, could tolerate no such rapid simplification of design. He imposed on himself endless scruples and compunctions, making artistic unity the reward of a long process of selection and discovery. His art became difficult and esoteric. People wonder sometimes at the diversity of modern art, but it is impossible to conceive a sharper opposition than that between Poussin, and the Baroque. It is curious, therefore, that modern artists should be able to look back with almost equal reverence to Poussin and to El Greco. In part, this is due to Cézanne’s influence, for, from one point of view, his art may be regarded as a synthesis of these two apparently adverse conceptions of design. For Cézanne consciously studied both, taking from Poussin his discretion and the subtility of his rhythm, and from El Greco his great discovery of the permeation of every part of the design with a uniform and continuous plastic theme. The likeness is indeed sometimes startling. One of the greatest critics of our time, von Tschudi—of Swiss origin, I hasten to add, and an enemy of the Kaiser—was showing me El Greco’s “Laocoon,” which he had just bought for Munich, when he whispered to me, as being too dangerous a doctrine to be spoken aloud even in his private room, “Do you know why we admire El Greco’s handling so much? Because it reminds us of Cézanne.”

No wonder, then, that for the artist of to-day the new El Greco is of capital importance. For it shows us the master at the height of his powers, at last perfectly aware of his personal conception and daring to give it the completist, most uncompromising expression. That the picture is in a marvellous state of preservation and has been admirably cleaned adds greatly to its value. Dirty yellow varnish no longer interposes here its hallowing influence between the spectator and the artist’s original creation. Since the eye can follow every stroke of the brush, the mind can recover the artist’s gesture and almost the movements of his mind. For never was work more perfectly transparent to the idea, never was an artist’s intention more deliberately and precisely recorded.

Roger Fry.
This suggests that the real name of the plant is “Love-in-idle,” whereas Parkinson (1699) says of the pansy that “Some give it foolish names, as Love in idleness, Cull mee to you, and Three faces in a hood.” An odd circumstance which Sir Francis does not mention is the immense gap in English literature when we come to examine the familiar Forget-me-not (Myosotis). It is not in Shakespeare, nor anywhere where we have sought it. It may be a comparatively modern piece of sentimentalism introduced from Germany. Prior’s “Popular Names of British Plants” is still, we believe, the main authority; but it is out of date in philology, and not always adequate in detail. We wish that Sir Francis would revise it, showing, for instance, that the hardebell in Shakespeare’s time and for some time after was the wild hyacinth, which seems a bad mistake to-day.

“The Names of Characters in Fiction” is another attractive theme. Here Sir Francis shows taste and judgment, but he has not carried his researches or comparisons far, nor has he formulated any rule out of his examples. Novelists have in this matter improved on the crude practice of their predecessors. We quite agree that an initial letter with a dash is not satisfactory: it does not suggest a personality or a real place. We feel that, when by a malicious stroke of the pen Fielding turned the Mr. B. of "Pamela" into Mr. Booby, he was taking a fair chance. Lytton was the latest novelist of repute, we think, to write about the little town of L.—. Scott, Dickens, Thackeray, all indulged more or less in names directly suggesting a calling, habit, or detail of personal appearance. Lytton, angry enough to write of the Asinomy, even put jokes in italics for fear the public might miss them. Throughout the nineteenth century this direct labelling was on the decrease, and now only professional humorists (who must be always amusing), writers for the pantomimes, and other authors who aim at getting, without any subtlety, straight to the heart of the great public, indulge in such "humoristics" as "the little town of Slopington-on-Sloshy." Thackeray could be feebie in this way. In "The Newcomes," chap. ix., Miss Honeyman, eager for news of Brighton lodgings, was told by her servant—how the family who had taken Mrs. Bugsby’s had left as usual after the very first night, the poor little infant blistered all over with blisters on its dear little face.

Dickens could be as bad, teasing us with facetious and impossible names; but his case has been considered in full detail by the indefatigable American thesis-writer, whose collections are, as usual, more valuable than the conclusions reached. Dickens and Thackeray coincide once or twice, e.g., there is a Clemency Newcome in "The Battle of Life." Apart from neutral names which mean nothing in particular, the best, we think, are those which at first sight appear to be neutral, yet yield up their sense to a little ingenuity on the reader’s part. Such are the luxurious Percy Silwright of "Pendennis," and the Sculler of "Martin Chuzzlewit," the land or bog agent who sent confiding men to Eden. He suggests at once the scorpion and the adder. An excellent example of this sort of name is Willoughby Patterne; but Meredith, markedly influenced by Dickens, could also produce a feeble punning name like Mr. Tonans. His later epigrammatics, it has been unkindly suggested, rightly bear impossible names. A good name is a great help, but, when you have invented it, someone may come forward and accuse you of libelling him. It is disappointing, when you have taken considerable pains to evolve a suitable name for a Professor, to find it already occupied by a gentleman of that standing.

The author’s reminiscences of his earlier days are homely and pleasant; we cannot help feeling that the Darwins were a delightful as well as a distinguished family and lost nothing by missing the discipline stern Victorians would have applied. Further biographical studies concern Thomas Harene, a stout old Jacobite with whom, as with Boswell, spite added to style; Sydney Smith, and Dickens. From the "Memoir" of Sydney Smith phrases have been skilfully selected, though we miss his remark a few months before his death, "I verily believe that, if the knife were put into my hand, I should not have strength or energy enough to stick it into a Dissenter." The plums of the "Memoir," we may add, are mixed up with a good deal of sue, and Smith’s conceived friend Jeffrey is not now rated high as a critic.

Sir Francis gives a sympathetic account of Dickens, but does not elaborate his character. The key to his disposition, as The Athenæum has said before, is that he was, or could have been, a great actor. His delight in the stage is extraordinary, and he signs his cheques with more flourish under his name than most authors find necessary. He was also a bourgeois who thought it well to add to a competent fortune by public readings at the expense of his health. Beginning by hypnotizing his vast public, he ended by being hypnotized by it, and making concessions, as at the end of "Great Expectations," which were a betrayal of true art. He had an unpleasant habit of satirizing his friends and nearest relations. That Shakespeare did the same, making his father into Polonius, is, we gather, suggested by Sir Walter Raleigh; but this charge is pure conjecture, not a happy guess, not the way of great art.

V. R.

A SUNSET

Over against the triumph and the close... Amber and green and rose...

Of this short day,
The pale ghost of the moon grows living-bright
Once more, as the last light
Ebb slowly away.

Darkening the fringes of these western glories,
The black plentasmagories
Of cloud advance
With noiseless motion... vague and villainous shapes,
Wrapped in their ragged fustian capes,
Of some grotesque romance.
But overhead where, like a pool between Dark rocks, the sky is green
And clear and deep,
Floats wingedly a cloud, with curving breast
Flushed by the fiery west,
In god like sleep...

And in my mind opens a sudden door
That lets me see once more
A little room
With night beyond the window, chill, and damp,
And one green-lighted lamp
Tempering the gloom,
While here within, close to me, touching me
(Even the memory
Of my desire
Shakes me like fear), you sit with scattered hair;
And all your body bare
Before the fire
Is lapped about with rose flame... But still,
Here on the lonely hill,
I walk alone.

Silvery green is the moon’s lamp overhead,
The cloud sleeps warm and red,

And you are gone.

Aldous Huxley.
MORE CRINOLINES

Victorian Recollections. By John A. Bridges. (Bell. 7s. 6d. net.)

The Manners of My Time. By C. L. H. Dempster. (Grant & RICHARDS. 10s. 6d. net.)

Memories of an Old Etonian. By George Greville. (Hutchinson. 16s. net.)

Recollections of Lady Georgiana Peel. Compiled by Ethel Peel. (Lane. 16s. net.)

Fame and Failure. By Julian Ellis. (Werner Laurie. 12s. 6d. net.)

Mr. J. A. BRIDGES, the author of "Victorian Recollections," is annoyed because (so he says) it has become the fashion for writers in the Press and elsewhere to allude to what they term the Victorian Era in terms of acute disparagement, as if all the happenings of that prolonged reign were utterly futile and absurd. "Herman Merivale, himself an eminent Victorian, tells an anecdote about the box-keeper of the Princess's Theatre in the sixties which may console Mr. Bridges and those who feel as he does. This expert, when asked his opinion on the relative merits of the rival Hamlets, Charles Keen and Fechter, replied: 'Mr. Keen was great. But with 'im 'Amlet' was a tragedy, with Mr. Fechter it's quite another thing. He has raised it to a mellerdram.' Mr. Bridges will appreciate the point.

After all, the writer at whom he is biting his thumb has made Victorianism amusing, and is that not worth a temporary blow to its dignity? It will probably be with the Victorian era in general as it has been with the crinoline in particular. When it was just taken off, it was buried like the skeleton of a crime. When Pinero revived it, apogetically, in "Trelawny of the Wells" in 1898, the audience tittered. A dozen years later the Russian Ballet produced "Carnival," and the crinolines conquered. As soon as they ceased to be solemn they were found to be fascinating, and have become quite a vogue on hoardings and magazine covers. Yet Mr. Bridges makes this confounding admission: "I grant that the crinoline was absurd." For shame! Will he be throwing up his brief so early in the case?

If we are searching for the quintessence of Victorianism, we should go to its truest chronicler, Disraeli. Readers of "Lothair" will remember Mr. Phoebe's garden party:

"The flower garden was bright and curious, and on the lawn was a tent of many colours, designed by herself, and which might have suited some splendid field of chivalry." The ecclesiastical peers back into the Middle Ages, and discerns a Church that was the friend of the Bourgeoisie, and such tendencies appear as "Young England" and Tractarianism. Their secret is to their initiates; to the onlooker they are just an added note of fantasy on a stage already tumultuously varied. The railroad has come, but the periwigged coachman remains. The Bishop is doffing his wig as an obsolete trammel, but the Puseyite parson is fitting on his chasuble. The nobles are starting to dress like the bourgeoise, but the bourgeoise are housing themselves like the peerage.

Cruidity of taste, naïveté of outlook are the marks of such periods of confusion. Surfeited with new dishes, new discoveries, the educated palate is over-stimulated; it loses the faculty of discrimination. Meanwhile those social classes are rowdying up the feast who lack all training in delicate discernment. But crudity after all means youthful vigour, and naïveté is almost the condition of enterprise. "Every ambition," says Mozley of the decade in which Victoria mounted the throne, "found its stimulus in the doctrine that everything was wrong, yet capable of being effectually and almost instantly righted." Clear-sightedness is a sorry check on such fervours. What man would make a career who could gauge its value? The Victorian age is pre-eminent in careers, precisely because of its mental simplicity. Disraeli, the Mephistopheles of the era, was as simply seduced by the glamour of its tinsel as schoolboys used to be by its glittering palms.

In the eyes of the Victorian could such a man have been proud to be Prime Minister? There was nothing then that was not wonderfully worth while. Open a volume of Leech's drawings: what a strong and jubilant wind blows through the pages! Note the flashing Amazonian cavalcades, with how conscious a glory the plumes and skirts take the breeze. Every ball is Cinderella's ball for these young ladies. What majesty, too, in the languor of the "swell"! How studied the whiskers, the peg-tops and the drawl! He cares for nothing—and would weep with rage if you doubted it. But the life of the middle class, you think, was flat and prosaic. Then study the epic of little Mr. Briggs. He finds a crack in his ceiling that needs repairing, and to a dustman he asks if he can't get the job done. From the busy scaffolding he directs the operations with the zest of Napoleon laying out a battle. His doctor advises a little horse-exercise, and forthwith he must purchase a stud and ride steeplechases.

Thus he is as resourceful as a trifle anxiously. There is the servant-gal announcing that she must call on her milliner! There is the dustman inquiring of his mate: "Is it the kerrek thing to take one's 'at into a hevening party?" This England, we know, was no paradise for the dustman and his fellows, but there must have been something buoyant in the atmosphere to keep them from drowning in these. Even the omnibus conductor seems to wait with the passengers, and shout out "All the way to El Dorado!"

But here we are rambling on about John Leech and similar trivialities, and we have not tabulated the country houses which Miss Dempster visited, nor noted that before Archie Peel proposed to Georgiana Russell in the billiard-room at Strawberry Hill he (characteristically!) took care to ascertain that it was empty, nor even narrated how Queen Victoria, as Mr. Greville learned from his mother, took occasion to remark: "Oh! the chops are not bad." The truth is we are horribly afraid of these books. Mr. Bridges himself perturbs us as much as the others. Was Victorian life, after all we have said, just a stretch of dullness to those who experienced it? In despair we flutter the leaves of our volumes again, and..."
AMBITION

T HIS rather ambitious work, "in effect, a new synthesis of modern history," forms part of the "American Historical Series," a series of text-books intended to be comprehensive, systematic, and authoritative. The critic of these volumes has thus a double task before him: he has not only to estimate the amount and value of the author's contribution to the science of history, he has to pronounce on its validity as a text-book for advanced students, American and otherwise.

American scientific text-books have gained a firm foothold in this country, and justly so; they satisfy the three criteria enumerated above. We cannot feel that their historical works are likely to take the same place in our schools. The atmosphere in which they are written, the state of mind which they assume in their reader, the very connotations of the words they use, differ toto caelo from ours in Europe. That which is a remote past for America is a familiar yesterday here, while English ignorance of all but a few episodes of American history has only ceased to be ludicrous by becoming a public danger. Thus historical text-books, the better they are suited to transatlantic use, are the more unfitted for exportation. As a handbook for English students, Professor Abbott's work can only be used with caution; his surveys of mediaval and Renaissance scientific progress are too wide to admit of accuracy of detail, his views of the foreign politics of sixteenth-century Europe are hardly modern enough even to be called conventional, and his knowledge of the economics of the growth of modern capitalism is negligible.

On the other hand, Professor Abbott has got hold of a first-class idea in his attempt to show the reaction of extra-European activities on the various nations of Europe. Any history is merely a selection of facts presented in a more or less systematic way, and this selection implies a more or less conscious tendency. Its survey from the religious point of view, is, on the whole, the best worked-out up to the present; Europe is regarded as the battlefield between two opposing creeds and habits of thought, which alternately grope until a third equally opposed to both comes into prominence and puts their conflict into the background. Another equally well-worked line of inquiry is that of the rise of the middle class into power—the beloved "Constitutional History" of our fathers and grandfathers. But there are many other standpoints which have not yet been occupied. The history of Europe as influenced by economical causes is almost untreated; the shifting of trade routes is opening a new view of old trade markets, the supply of the precious metals and the shifting values of their ratio, the problem of exchange—all these have had an enormous effect on the political development of the Continent. Then, again, the change of national character produced by the growth of the mendicant orders and enforced celibacy on the one side, and by emigration on the other, offers a tempting outlook on history. There can be no doubt that the characteristics of the Italian people have been materially altered by the constant withdrawal from its potential parents of all exhibiting generous, romantic, or self-denying instincts, from the early part of the thirteenth century. The fifteenth-century Italy must have had these characteristics pretty thoroughly removed from its stock. In Protestant countries, and more especially in England, a similar process took place by emigration—a removal of the more vigorous and enterprising of the middle class, partly conditioned by religious fanaticism, succeeded in the last century by a continuous straining out of all the best elements of the agricultural and labouring workers, which has left us in some districts a local population reverting to the Neolithic type.

We have read through Professor Abbott's book carefully, and gladly acknowledge that in many respects it is a very useful supplement to any of the manuals at present in use among students. We have already indicated its chief value, the fuller sense it gives us of the reactions of America and India on the foreign policies of France, England and Spain. This is admirable, and would have made a book of itself, if treated fully. But the impression that the history has left on us as a whole is that of formlessness. Professor Abbott has attempted a task which appears to have been beyond his power, at any rate at present; in the words of Cicero, he has bitten off more than he could chew. Before there can be a synthesis there must be a synopsis. The sort of general view which consists in not being accurate about individual facts does not fall under this head. We open the book at random, and find a statement that "French legal primacy had been an acknowledged fact from the days of Alciati's settling in France."

And it was hardly before the middle of the seventeenth century that tradition begins to disappear. Among the early evidences of its decline had been the work of Pufendorf and the beginning of the publication of those English law reports which presently swelled to such proportions and such importance.

English law reports were being printed before 1490, while Alciati was born in 1490. This case is only typical of hundreds of similar inaccuracies, which irritate the man who knows, and mislead the student who wants to learn. Generalities can hardly be more truths than the statements on which they are founded, and if these are so loosely made as to be incapable of verification, a generalization from them is of little value.

A good deal of thought has evidently been devoted to the illustration of these volumes. They are handsomely printed, and while the originals of the illustrations are in most cases themselves reproductions, they must have a value to students unaccustomed to the richer variety of the best English illustrated histories. We feel sure that if Professor Abbott will in his next volume clearly define the points he wishes to make, and make sure of his facts, however unimportant, before he uses them, he will produce a work of permanent value. No one can "infuse a sense of unity into the narrative of European activities" (a most awkward phrase): that sense must be in the narrator's mind.

R. S.
PREHISTORIC MAN IN THE TRENCHES

THE ANCIENT ENTRANCED AND CAMPS OF GLOUCESTERSHIRE.
By Edward J. Burrow. (Cheltenham and London, E. J. Burrow & Co. 21s.)

In these sad days, when printing is expensive, and book-lovers mostly belong to an impoverished class of the community, it is satisfactory to find that a beautiful book may still occasionally be produced. Mr. Burrow is at once the author and the publisher of what may be termed a pictorial survey of the earthworks of Gloucestershire; and we hope that he will not regard it as a slight upon his archaeology if we praise him first and foremost as an artist. His sketches are not mere schematic representations designed for the student of ancient monuments as such, but little lyrics in black and white that must help every Englishman to appreciate the beauty of his native land. We gather that this labour of love extended over some three years, the complementary problem of the extent of space to be covered being solved by the use of a motor-car. Doubtless, led on by so seductive a guide-book, the fortunate possessors of similar motor-cars will travel up and down the county to view what the unassisted eye might in many cases altogether miss; for the plough tends to efface, while tree-planting, though in a way it helps to preserve, at any rate is apt to deform and conceal, the immemorial outline of mound and ditch. Let us hope that among these luxurious pilgrims a few trained archaeologists may be included; though, to be candid, we do not recognize the names of many such experts in the published list of subscribers. Be this as it may, it is up to the county, now that it stands thus openly in the conviction of possessing a vast number of prehistoric sites that almost without exception remain wholly unexplored, to take its local archaeology seriously, and not leave excavation to the rabbits. We cannot all, perhaps, carry out investigations on the royal scale of a Pitt-Rivers; whose work, by the way, was largely concerned with a neighbouring region, and at Wandsdyke it lay just across the border. But, given sufficient experience in the methods of careful digging, good results may be obtained without great expenditure of time or money. To leave the vallum alone and search along the bottom—only it must really be the bottom of the fosse is a safe working rule for those who must economize effort. Again, if there is any sign of one line of earthworks crossing another, it always pays to dig at the nodal point. Meanwhile, so long as the field-worker takes full notes concerning the relative positions of everything he finds, he need not himself be competent to determine their significance, more especially as bearing on the question of date. Here, then, is a pleasant and useful task awaiting Gloucestershire men of intelligence and leisure. Perhaps the University of Bristol, which, we note, is purchasing this book for its library, will take a leading hand in the game.

Mr. Burrow prefixes to his graphic record of sites an introduction intended to give the reader some idea of the successive peoples that have occupied the land, and incidentally to impart to him a sense of the glamour of the prehistoric such as he obviously feels himself in no small degree. The archaeologist will not be hard on him for dealing somewhat sketchily with the intricate theme of the race-history of Britain. Indeed, until the Gloucestershire sites are properly explored, there can be no chance of getting beyond generalities. But a local survey carried out in a scientific spirit and with the various aids supplied by an all-round anthropological training can illuminate the dim past as with a searchlight. For untold generations the Gloucestershire men from the rampart of the Cotswolds have gazed across the Severn flats at the hills of the Silures, determined not to be bested by that pertinacious people. But they must look to their laurels now, seeing that the Silures have taken to anthropologizing about themselves to some purpose. Witness the elaborate study of racial types in Wales by Messrs. H. J. Fleure and T. C. James that appeared in the Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute for 1916. Here it is attempted—in a speculative spirit, no doubt, but with a due regard for the control of fact—to determine the geographical conditions which must have governed the gradual opening-up of the country, such as the avenues of approach, the commanding situations, the good lands accessible to this or that kind of exploitation, the bad lands, whether bad relatively to those who did not know how to improve them, or absolutely so that only the outcast might cherish them as a hiding-place. In this way we can form a tolerably accurate notion how, when wave after wave of population broke upon the Welsh hills, the waters would mingle in the open channels, but in nooks and crannies a single wave might leave behind it a little stagnant pool, consisting in some peculiar people whose inbred features perpetuate an otherwise vanished race.

Now the high parts of Gloucestershire ought to prove a first-rate hunting ground for anthropological types, and doubtless the long-headed Mediterranean man of the Neolithic immigration, the broad-skulled Alpine of the Bronze Age, and the medium-headed Nordic or Alpino-Nordic of the Iron Age (the last a form less easy to isolate) exist side by side in the Cotswolds to this day—not to speak of later races. But how make racial stocks, even when thus broadly associated with cultures, responsible for particular constructions in the way of earthworks? Only the spade can reveal the required evidence. At most in a few cases the eye can detect by its shape a Norman moat, or the more regular kind of Roman camp. In many cases, too, we must suppose that the same stronghold has served the needs of many peoples in turn. The Palaeolithic hunter, we may assume, had no need for earthworks at all; nor probably had Neolithic man until near the end of the Stone Age, when he was well embarked on the pastoral and agricultural life. In Late Neolithic times, however, population was relatively dense, it would seem, and moreover was mainly confined to open parts of the country, such as notably the chalk and other elevated ground of the South. It would then become necessary to construct shelter camps to ward off wolves or interfering neighbours, and even with antler-picks and similar rough tools this might be done effectively, especially at the Severn, where there was a good slope to lighten the labour. In the subsequent Bronze and Late Celtic periods the need for similar strongholds would increase, as a result of greater crowding, intenser war, and better weapons and tools. On the other hand, the Roman occupation introduced entirely new features of construction, though the older fortifications must have come in handy enough for minor posts. Mr. Burrow supplies a diagram to explain the Roman plan of holding back the Silures by a line of camps along the Cotswolds. This theory would apply well enough to the first phase of the Roman invasion of Britain, when their sphere of influence was apparently bounded to the North-west by the boundary of the tribe of the Silures. The line of the Avon may be extended to the point at which its headwaters nearly touch those of the Wellow. At a later stage, however, the Severn can have had no great value as a frontier, as the settled lands in which the Roman took an interest as a corn-grower by this time extended to the foot of the Welsh mountains. All this has been argued out very plausibly by Mr. Belfloc in his little book, "Warfare in England." As for the period of subsequent confusion when Angles and Saxons drove the Romanized Britons into the West, there must have been plenty of spade-work thrust upon both sides, and especially on the weaker, and indeed it is very likely that much more of what we class as prehistoric belongs to this relatively late chapter of our salwar history than is usually supposed. Even Roman cults do not pretend to have vanished, as many a Briton may have clung to his hoard till a Saxon, intent on a less symbolic form of wealth, caused him to scatter it as he ran and did not stop to pick it up. So much for conceivable origins. Meanwhile, there are the venerable monuments ready to yield us actual history if only we take the trouble to search it out.

R. R. M.

A BRITISH SOLDIER’S “ROLAND”
The Song of Roland. Done into English, in the Original Measure, by Charles Scott-Moncrieff. (Chapman & Hall. 7s. 6d. net.)

It was a lucky chance that led one of our young warrior poets “on a hot afternoon in the summer of 1918” to turn “into the coolness of Hatchard's,” and there to find the volume containing the translation of the “Roland” by Petit de Julleville with Muller's text. Had Captain Scott-Moncrieff possed as a scholar we should have felt bound to chide him for not supplementing this discovery by a certain volume of further research, which we would have shown him that not even Léon Gautier, whose latest edition, we are assured, is to form the basis of the second issue of the present work, has said the last word on the text.* But we are dealing with an impetuous young soldier who was naturally inspired by this trawaille of one of the greatest war-epics, and who has justified his boldness by enriching our literature with a work which am, after the necessary overhauling, easily become one of the best English renderings of a mediaeval poem.

He was, of course, not the first in the field. Apart from the interesting fragment in a South-West Midland dialect, written about 1400 and published many years ago by the E.E.T.S., which represents a French form of the poem differing in many ways from that of the Oxford MS., and leaving on one side, though they are by no means devoid of merit, the two prose versions made by ladies—the one in America (Isabel Butler, 1904) and the other in England (Jessie Crosland, 1907)—there are two complete English verse renderings: that of the learned Irish lawyer, Mr.
John O'Hagan, Q.C. (1889), and that of Dr. Arthur S.
Way (1913), one of the most distinguished among contemporary translators. The former adopts rhyming octosyllabic couplets, the latter a rough-and-ready kind of Alexandrine, rhyming mostly in pairs, but the syllables of which are often expanded into feet. Both are spirit, and each reproduces in its own way the rush of the original, the one by its very conciseness, the other by the syllables hurrying and tumbling over each other.
But, as a sustained poetical achievement, we prefer the translation of Dr. Way, which should never be allowed to fall into neglect, and which, by the way, is, like Mrs.
Crosland's, based on the text of Stengel.

If we now turn again to Captain Scott-Moncrieff, and ask ourselves the question: Would or should he have made his attempt had he been acquainted with the previous one? (for he tells us himself that he was not)—our answer is in the affirmative. For one thing, he had this great advantage over his predecessors: their work was done in cold blood, in the study; his, as it were, in the very heat of battle. Moreover, he was the first to attempt the very difficult task of adhering to the original metre and assonance. When we come to criticize we are disarmed at every turn. The author's prose dedication to three fallen comrades, supplemented by fine poetical tributes to their memory; Mr. G. K. Chesterton's introduction—for once free from paradox, and none the worse for that, containing two or three points that were really worth making; last, not least, Professor Saintsbury's "Note on Technique, remarkable for his unreserved admiration of a former pupil's work than for his gentle reproof of certain failings—all this, and much else, tends to win our sympathy. On the point of technique, we may say at once that we share Professor Saintsbury's dislike of the "kisses in which the assonance is supplied by the penultimate; for instance, CXXX., where the end-words are 'battle,' 'Charles,'

'vassal's,' 'wraithful,' 'damage,' 'army,' 'hereafter,'
'Aile,' 'clasp you.' Far worse, in our view, is the different quality of the vowel sounds in many of the kisses. The foregoing supplies several instances. Or take CXCVI., some of the lines of which end in 'bardins,' gloves,' 'crowd,' 'sound,' 'enough,' 'wood,' 'dis-manor,' 'Malhun;' or, even worse, LXXII., with its
'saw,' 'more,' 'show,' 'valour,' 'overborne.'
"All." The task is so difficult that we have no wish to be pedantic. Many of the shifts employed, such as change of accent, may be excused by archaic use Even 'France la Douce,' 'nor caution knew' may pass muster: so may 'Provence,' 'Maience,' 'confidence,' though somewhat trying. But we hope that some of the more flagrant instances will disappear in the next edition. On the whole, Captain Scott-Moncrieff has justified his use of the assonance. Sometimes, as in versions of Spanish plays (such as MacCarthy's), we regard the attempt as fitful, for the sufficient reason that in these the assonance is entirely lost to English ears, seeing that it does not fall in consecutive lines, whereas in the French epics it does.
Our author reveals in the battle-pieces, the vigour of which has surely never been surpassed; he can be tender at the right moment; nor does he ever miss the spirit of pure religious faith and the fervent note of patriotism that inform the whole. Here is a fair sample of his manner:

In the admiral is much great virtue found;
He strikes Carlun on his steel helm so brown
Has broken it and rent, above his brow,
Through his thick hair the sword goes glancing round,
A great pain's breadth and more of flesh cuts out,
So all bare the bone is, in that wound.
Charles tottereth, falls nearly to the ground;
God wills not he be slain or overpowered.
Saint Gabriel once more do him come down.
And questions him: "Great King, what dost thou?"

Charles, hearing how that holy Angel spake,
Had fear of death no longer, nor dismay;
Remembrance and a fresh vigour he's gained,
So the admiral he strikes with France's blade,
His helmet breaks, whereon the jewels blaze,
Slices his head, to scatter all his brains,
And, down unto the white beard, all his face;
So he falls dead, recovers not again.
"Monjois," cries Charles, that all may know the tale.

We do not agree with the author in recommending his work as "a companion to the study of the Oxford MS.;" for that purpose we should prefer either of the prose versions we have named. But we do recommend it to that large body of readers who can enjoy great literature in translation, without bothering in any way about the original.
Above all, we like to regard it as a worthy tribute offered by one of our fighting men to the enduring value of our Ally—la douce France. On December 8, 1870, Gaston
Paris, speaking amidst the roar of German guns, delivered at the Collège de France that noble address on
"La Chanson de Roland et la Nationalité Française", which cannot even now be read without emotion. We feel that Captain Scott-Moncrieff's work was undertaken in the same spirit.

H. O.
A CANDID FRIEND

My Second Country (France). By Robert Dell. (Lane-7s. 6d. net.)

I t is doubtful whether the really detached observer, supposing him to be possible, ever understands anything. We first love or hate the object presented to us; we investigate and try to understand afterwards. This is obviously true of our relations to human beings, and it also explains much that is otherwise puzzling in the history of science and philosophy. As regards people and those vague entities called nations, however, it is obvious that our conclusions are the result, and not the cause, of our emotional reactions. The opinions that the people of one country form about those of another are probably, from the rationalist’s point of view, amongst the most worthless products of the human mind. They are usually rationalizations of emotions awakened by fictitious objects. They have no correspondent to anything real, but they are of profound importance in human affairs. Thus the present English feelings about the two completely fictitious objects depicted in the press as Germany and Russia promise to be of great importance to the immediate future of the world. The prolonged residence of every Englishman in both countries would probably educe a different set of emotions and lead to opinions having a closer relation to facts, but it is impracticable. The best alternative is to study the opinions of Englishmen who have had closer contact with the objects of their emotions, to allow for the sort of Englishmen they are (which it is not difficult for other Englishmen to do), and to use this material in forming one’s own conclusions.

The present book by Mr. Dell is an excellent example of what we mean. Mr. Dell has resided for several years in France, has met many sorts of French people, and is a kind of Englishman with whom we are thoroughly familiar. He is an intellectual of the political, Socialistic type. He is very earnest, a little bitter, well read in the political theories of his group, and a severe moralist. We know his type quite well, and we have a sincere admiration for it; we believe it to be a type which is, at the present time, providing a good deal of such salt as the earth is receiving. We know also that it is a type that is apt to be a little ignorant of practical psychology, a little too theoretical, a little too prone to tighten large, shambling, lax thing, the ordinary man. When, as always happens, the ordinary man continues to sprawl, continues to indulge his appetites and to sin against his own interests, the earnest expounders of those interests sometimes grow petulant. They may even give up the ordinary man in disgust—Socialism has more than its share of backsliders—or they may invent the Perfect Proletarian. Mr. Dell is not free from this tendency. He is, like all his type, disillusioned; nevertheless, he must have faith. So he divides French humanity into the sheep and the goats. The goats are the petit bourgeois, the usurers, and the sheep are the proletariat. Mr. Dell surveys their selfishness and stupidity of man—as he finds it in the rentier—with disgust; on the other hand, he keeps his faith untarnished and hopes to have the honour of taking part in the “dictatorship of the proletariat.” The detached-observer attitude, therefore, is not very prominent in Mr. Dell’s pages; towards the end, indeed, the last traces of detachment vanish and we are presented with frank Socialist propaganda. So much the better; as we have indicated, the detached observer is only a sly deceiver.

What, then, is the France presented by Mr. Dell? It is, in the first place, a much more credible France than the one made familiar to us by our sentimental writers. Mr. Chesterton’s happy peasant proprietors and Mr. Bello’s malignant Jew financiers wear quite a different look in Mr. Dell’s pages. Mr. Dell’s French peasant is an avaricious, stupidly conservative, suspicious and yet gullible, hard-working, unimaginative, unenterprising, uneducated man. His thrift is a vice, and one of the reasons why France is less prosperous than it might be; and his ambition is to be a rentier. Mr. Dell’s Jew is a gentleman who differs from the true Frenchman by being less of a money-grabber, more generous, and by having more interest and better taste in the arts. It must be admitted that the broad traits of these pictures agree pretty well with our general experience of peasants and Jews. As regards the petit bourgeois, we doubt whether he is quite as detestable as Mr. Dell makes out. The fact that he dodges paying income tax whenever he can probably means, as Mr. Dell thinks, that he will provoke a revolution in which he will lose everything. He is undoubtedly stupid, but to avoid income-tax is human; he is not necessarily a monster of selfishness. We are a little sceptical, too, about Mr. Dell’s French proletarian; we suggest that the abyss separating him from the rentier is not quite so wide and deep as Mr. Dell makes it. We make this suggestion purely on general principles: we pretend to no special knowledge. We have an innate distrust, however, of black-and-white diagrams. But when we leave actual people, and come to institutions, the political system, banking, railways, religion, etc., Mr. Dell displays all the peculiar excellences of his type. His analysis is acute, modern and thoroughly interesting. It will surprise many readers to discover how backward France is in nearly all its public institutions. Mr. Dell suggests that the centralization in Paris and the profound conservatism of the French people are together responsible for the comparative inefficiency of the French State services. We think he is right in pointing out that the French interest in ideas is, in a way, superficial. The French are always willing to change the form, provided the substance remains unaltered. In England we dread changing a form, but we unobtrusively change the substance. That is why monarchical England is more democratic than republican France. In these matters Mr. Dell is at his best; he is clear, competent and always readable.

J. W. N.

THE LIBRARY AS A “LAB”

In a lecture on "The Library as a Laboratory," delivered to the School of Librarianship on Monday last, Professor A. F. Pollard registered another plea against the tyranny of rules and the cult of uniformity in the future development of our libraries. In too many towns the public library, the museum, the municipal college, and the schools are all out of touch with each other. The borough records are in the municipal offices, the ecclesiastical records are scattered. Yet for any fruitful study of local history—the essential basis of national history—all should be together. Books are but a part of the materials for historical study—or, for the matter of that, any branch of science. Maps, historical atlases, plans of cities at various periods, original manuscripts or facsimiles, seals of the different authorities, reproductions of Papal Bulls and other documents, are required to make history real and intelligible. Any one who had seen a court-roll would understand why the insurgents of 1381 rushed out and burned all of these documents they could seize. Such is the apparatus of historical study: the means involved co-operative work in which the library would become a "collaboratory." As a valuable method he instanced a card-index, in which should be entered up corrections of old or recent mistakes, new facts, and new sources, with the results published for the benefit of the broader public in a bulletin. An infinite waste of time would be saved to students, who now have to find out all these things for themselves. Students tend to be too passive. There are millions of facts, and millions of interpretations of those facts. By testing knowledge, by asking all the possible questions, we may make sure of getting the right answer.
THE EASY PATH

FULL CIRCLE. By Mary A. Hamilton. (Collins. 7s. net.)

There is no doubt that the author of "Full Circle" has faced her difficult subject with courage and sincerity. But it is the novelist's courage, the novelist's sincerity. These are good, sound, familiar weapons which in a world of turn-tails and sentimentalists we cannot afford to despise, but it is just because her handling of them is so dexterous that we find ourselves wishing to Heaven that Mrs. Hamilton would throw both away and begin all over again without them. It is, we realize, a rude measure to propose, for it would mean the sacrifice of the charming composition of her novel; and this would not be an author whose mind delights in a sense of order, in composing for each character and scene the surroundings that are appropriate and adequate to it. What is the result? The result is another extremely able novel, written with unerring taste and sentiment, well informed, interesting. . . . It is a great deal better than the average novel—but is that enough? Just for the reason that in taking the easy accepted path Mrs. Hamilton has looked towards the difficult one, we say it is not enough and that "Full Circle" is by no means the novel it might have been.

Her difficult subject is this. Here we have the Quilhamptons, a family of brothers and sisters, passionately united by the tie of blood and by their affection for a beautiful home. They are met together on the occasion of the eldest sister's marriage, and the meeting is overshadowed by the fact that they realize the time has come when the "home life" must end and they must go their several ways and risk losing themselves in life. We are made to feel that in their case the risk is by no means small. Spontaneous, rich, gifted, original creatures that they are, they are, somehow, a shade too fine for life; there is a doubt whether, at the last moment, the habit to withdraw, to seek shelter, will not prove too strong. Of them all, Bridget is the one who, the others feel, is most likely to win through and be happy. Staying with them is a Socialist friend of their brother Roger, one Wilfred Elstree. This strange creature is a herald (but against all the rules carrying a trumpet) whom life has sent them, and they in their turn. The educa- tion of the family has been through the book, crude, harsh, hideous, selfish Elstree. At his touch her blood catches fire; at his glance she swoons. They live together until he tires of her and throws her away, to snatch from Roger's arms a little doll of a creature, and, after breaking her, to disappear for four years. On his reappearance he asks Bridget to marry him, but she begs him to wait for six weeks, and at the end of that time he is, of course, engaged to another. Now if Bridget had really loved Elstree, if he had not been such an out-and-out ranting, roaring stage-Socialist, if their relationship had been important, and yet there had been in his nature some queer brutal streak, some lack of imagination which drove him to seek in another only the means of renewing himself—if Bridget had recognized this and yet won through. . . . But Love? We have a most convincing account of her physical reactions, of her enjoyment of him and the anguish she suffered when he left her and she waited for the bell to ring—for a letter—a sign—hoped and gave up hope. But Love? Why, on his reappearance after four years Mrs. Hamilton sacrifices the feelings of her heroine to a description of the room by firelight in which Elstree is siting. Fatul gift of the pen, fatal sincerity of the novelist! How can we believe in Bridget unless we have the whole of her? How can we accept the fact that she did win through if we are not told to what?—if we are put off, cleverly, indeed, with a description of the fascination of London?

We realize in writing this we are too severe upon the author, but it is her fault. If she did not convey the impression that she might have written "Full Circle" from within, how can we be content with her view of it from without?

K. M.

PROMISE

GOLD AND IRON. By Joseph Hergesheimer. (Heinemann. 7s. net.)

Mr. Joseph Hergesheimer is a writer whose few books have been hailed by the generous critic as masterpieces of their kind. Perhaps it is owing to the fact that he comes from America that his praise has been more formal, less familiar, less—may we say?—avuncular than that which they are accustomed to bestow upon our very own young men. In the latter case, it is their habit upon the appearance of a first novel, however superb they may consider it, to acknowledge the fact that the writer is a young writer. "These young men have grown up in our midst. They have attended our schools, they have been to our Universities and come down. While we do not dispute their genius for one moment, we question whether the finest flower, the ripest fruit is yet within our hands." But Mr. Hergesheimer has been allowed no youth. They have been to the woods for him already; they have returned with an armful of those strange branches that look and smell like laurel, and there is nothing more to be said except to say it over again.

Nevertheless it is just this quality of "promise" which we venture to think he possesses. It is more noticeable than ever in the stories collected under the title "Gold and Iron." These three stories are all most obviously the work of a writer who feels a great deal more than he can at present express. They are in form very similar. In the long, slow approach to the "crisis," he writes well and freely; he takes his time, one has the impression that he feels, here, at this point he is safe, and can afford to let himself go. But when the heart of the story is reached, when there is nothing left to depend upon—to cling to—then he is like a young swimmer who can even swim very well, dispersed himself unafraid and at ease as long as he knows that the water is not out of his depth. When he discovers that it is—he disappears. So does Mr. Hergesheimer. But watching sympathetically from the bank, we hope the disappearance is only temporary.

K. M.

THE STUDY OF ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY TO-DAY.—Inaugural Address by J. P. Whitney, Dixie Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the University of Cambridge. (Cambridge, University Press. 2s. 6d. net.)—Professor Whitney's appointment to the important chair he now holds was welcomed by all those who believe that what the study of religion most needs at the present moment is an infusion of sweetness and light. A large part of this inaugural address is taken up, as usual on these occasions, with tributes to former occupants of the chair. Professor Whitney is sufficiently fitted to do justice to his predecessors, however much their views may have diverged from his own, yet we feel that even his generous appreciation falls short of doing full justice to Henry Melvill Gwatkin. It hardly brings out those artistic qualities in which this dear controversialist was supreme. The hundred and seventy years for which Mr. Whitney and Mr. Hergesheimer are as perfect a piece of writing as any historian has accomplished. Into this little space Gwatkin has packed, without a trace of overcropping, the whole religious and political world of the fourth century, each figure alive and distinct, each scene a firm and finished miniature. Whatever his deficiencies as a historian, as a writer he will not be easily surpassed.
Science

PSYCHOLOGY IN INDUSTRY

LECTURES ON INDUSTRIAL PSYCHOLOGY. By Bernard Muscio. (Routledge. 6s. 6d. net.)

It is no fresh discovery that some ways of performing even the simplest tasks of manual labour are less taxing than others, or that a pause, say for tea in the middle of the afternoon, may have an exhilarating effect, or that a certain physique is desirable in each trade; but an intelligent and systematic study of the easiest and most economical movements needed for a particular industrial process, of the distribution of time between work and rest, will add materially to mutual efficiency. The introduction of scientific methods into the workshop has been one of the notable results of the recent depression. Where a considerable amount of manual work is required, the cost of production is lessened and the output increased.

Mr. Muscio points out, no adequate body of information to which an employer or workman wishing to reduce or eliminate fatigue can turn for information. Little or nothing is known of the cumulative effects of work, of the causes which make monotonous work distasteful to some persons while it may be agreeable to others; of the extent to which strain might be avoided by reduction of noise, and of the medical and physiological results of the mental strain.

The necessity of maintaining a maximum output during the war led to the establishment of the Health of Munition Workers' Committee to remedy the effects of ignorance in the use of human labour which would not have been displayed had horses or hounds been concerned, and the first ground has been broken in this country by the publications of this committee. But the present problem is a different one, namely, to secure a standard output with a minimum of effort from the workers, ensuring to them a reserve of vitality and leisure which will go to promises of a new world other than a platform value. An instance of the results of psychological methods in industry will serve to illustrate their possible uses. Thirty-five girls selected for their short reaction times did as much work as bicycle-ball inspectors in an eight-hour day, and a half-hour day, taking two days' holiday per month at their own option, and 120 girls not so selected in a ten-and-a-half-hour day, while the accuracy of their work was two-thirds greater. Although the wages of these girls were increased by nearly 100 per cent., the cost of production was largely decreased.

The history of scientific management and the use which has been made of psychological methods in America is not encouraging, and the conclusions of the Hoxie Report are calculated to give pause to enthusiasts. After stating that at its present stage scientific management "is in many respects crude, many of its devices are contradictory of its announced principles, and it is inadequately scientific," the Commissioners continue:

The second point is that neither organized nor unorganized Labour finds in Scientific Management any adequate protection to their standards of living, any progressive means for industrial education, or any opportunity for industrial democracy by which Labour may create for itself a progressively efficient share in efficient management. And, therefore, as unorganized Labour is totally unequipped to work for these human rights, it becomes doubly the duty of organized Labour to work unceasingly and unsparingly for them, and, if necessary, to combat an industrial development which not only does not contain conditions favourable to their growth, but, in many respects, is hostile soil.

Mr. Muscio, in a fair general survey of the charges brought by Labour against scientific management as appears by the contents of sympathetic studies and experiments, to show that none of the objections can be regarded as final. He admits the exploitation of Labour under the Taylor and kindred systems, the small share of profits represented by the increased wages of individual workers, the fact that increased output was not coupled with an adequate reduction of hours of labour, and the interference with the power of collective bargaining which is an essential principle of trade-unionism. He also admits that scientific management has led to temporary unemployment and that it has been associated with a "driving," although the object of psychological study should be to diminish this, and to relieve the strain due to increased speed of machinery. On the other hand, he does not allow that manual workers stand to lose by further subdivision of labour, and consequent destruction of craft skill, provided their rights of collective bargaining are safeguarded, and he reduces the argument against labour-saving appliances to an absurdity by following its extreme logical consequences.

The apathy of Labour towards the need for increased production is often represented as a depraved desire to restrict output and so shirk a fair day's work, but such critics are apt to overlook the fact that, under present industrial conditions and warned by American experience, Labour has little to gain from increased production, and much to fear from the introduction of psychological methods without safeguards. There is no guarantee that the present struggle to obtain or keep fair rates of pay would cease; and the demand for security of employment, which can alone dispel the fear overshadowing the minds of the workers, cannot be met.

They are not interested in the argument of the political economist that increased efficiency in the production of boots will cheapen the cost of boots and therefore increase the demand, so long as they perceive that a higher standard of efficiency leads to the dismissal of individual workers, and further suspect that employers cherish an army of unemployed for their own ends.

It is safe to prophesy that, although time and motion study and other applications of industrial psychology may be tolerated in factories where the general conditions are above the average, the attitude of the workers will remain unaltered until there is a fundamental change in the respective functions of Capital and Labour. The reports of the Whiteley Committee have been regarded in some quarters as a new gospel, but it was pointed out in a note by a minority of the Committee that they had not solved any problems arising out of the relations between Capital and Labour, but had only suggested machinery by which such problems might ultimately be solved. The successful adoption of psychological methods is only possible with the intelligent and responsible co-operation of the workers, and Labour must have full opportunities to devise and insist upon its own safeguards. The introduction of such methods must be accompanied by experiments in joint industrial control, and in the assignment of contracts for labour to Trade Unions or Works Committees, made under the most favourable conditions and in a spirit hopeful of success, and not as a challenge to Bolshevism.

The Industrial Fatigue Research Board, appointed to carry on the work begun by the Health of Munition Workers' Committee, is undertaking inquiries which should materially extend present knowledge, and has already published reports of considerable interest on certain aspects of the question. The proposed Institute of Industrial Psychology, with facilities for laboratory research and for training psychologists for industrial posts, should carry the matter a stage further if the sympathy and assistance of Labour are enlisted. But unless the opinion expressed above is beside the mark, experiments in factory management are essential and none too late, one of the national factories might well be dedicated to this purpose. The results obtained by the Industrial Fatigue Research Board and by the proposed Institute can best be put to a practical test in works where Labour has some share in the control; under any other conditions important factors in modern industrial psychology must inevitably be disregarded.
SOCIETIES

Geological.—January 21.—Mr. G. W. Lamlugh, President, in the chair.

D. Buttle, C. P. Chatwin, J. Davies, W. G. Langford, E. Merrick, Florence Annie Pitts, Dr. Pierre Pruvost, Mrs. Eleanor M. Reid, H. R. Wellis and A. K. Wells were elected Fellows.

Mr. Richard Dixon Oldham gave a demonstration on a model to illustrate the hypothesis of a somewhat rigid crust resting on a somewhat yielding substratum, as applied to the problem of the origin of mountain ranges.

Linnean.—January 15.—Dr. A. Smith Woodward, President, in the chair.

A special vote of thanks was accorded to the Institute of Preventive Medicine for its gift of a large number of volumes on Sponges, formerly the property of the late Professor E. A. Minchin.—Mr. J. K. Matthews was admitted a Fellow. Dr. James Davidson was elected a Fellow.

Dr. A. B. Rendle stated that M. Jules Cardot, the eminent French bryologist, was early in the war driven by the German advance from his home at Charleville, with less than twenty-four hours' notice, and had to abandon all his possessions. Able at last to return to Charleville, he found that the greater part of his property had been destroyed; his family furniture and possessions, his books and MS. notes, his instruments, and a large portion of his collections, either ruined or disappeared. The one part of his belongings left practically intact is his mounted Herbarium of Mosses, consisting of about 10,000 species, represented by about 30,000 specimens. The Herbarium is a valuable one, containing the types of a large number of species. It is M. Cardot's desire that his Herbarium should find a permanent place in the Park of Natural History. The Museum authorities are willing to find half the necessary amount, the remaining half to be raised, partly in this country, partly in America, among botanical friends and sympathizers. Bryological friends in the United States have intimated their willingness to do this, and an agreed price of 10,000 fr. has been mentioned between the Museum and M. Cardot; and the proposal to raise one-fourth of that amount in this country would at the present rate of exchange need a sum of between 400 and 450.—Mr. H. N. Dixon is acting as treasurer of the fund, and contributions will be gladly received by him at 17, St. Matthew's Parade, Northampton.

The General Secretary gave a lantern lecture entitled “Methods of Potatoes' Illustration during Fossil Days.” Specimens of the blocks and of plates resulting from the processes described were shown on the table.

Royal Institution.—February 2.—Sir James Cotton-Browne, Treasurer and Vice-President, in the chair.

The thanks of the members were returned to Mr. A. B. Bence Jones for his present of copies from scientific journals of abstracts of Faraday's Friday Evening Discourses, used by Dr. Bence Jones in his Life and Letters of Faraday.—Dr. W. H. Bailey, Mrs. Champton de Crescenty, J. Campbell Dewar, Mrs. Drescheld, G. Bramwell Ehrenberg, and Dr. W. R. Parker were elected Members.

Society of Antiquaries.—January 29.—Sir Hercules Read, President, in the chair.

The Rev. J. K. Floyer read a paper on the ancient manor house of the bishops of Winchester at Esher. The only remaining portion of the Bishop of Winchester's manor house at Esher is the brick gatehouse, built about 1485. A map of 1606 shows the extent of the site when it was completed by Bishop Wainfleet. The gatehouse corresponds in material and design with others built in England by those who had taken part in the wars in France in the fifteenth century, and the origin of these gatehouses may probably be traced to that country. The first house on the Esher manor was probably erected in 1245, and was considerably enlarged in 1381. All except the principal dwelling-rooms was rebuilt by Bishop Wainfleet. Cardinal Wolsey attempted to acquire the house from Bishop Fox, so that he could be near Hampton Court when this was being built. He gained possession of it in April, 1529, and about three years later retired to Esher on his disgrace, remaining there until February 1539. Henry VIII. acquired the manor in 1538. Richard Drake had the custody of three high admirals of the Spanish Armada, as prisoners, from 1588 to 1592. The house was altered in various ways, chiefly by Kent, about 1729-30. About 1806 Mr. Spicer pulled down all except the gatehouse, which remains with alterations by Kent.

FORTHCOMING MEETINGS

Fri. 6 King's College, 4.—"Eccelesiastical Art." Lecture IV., Professor P. Dearmer.
University College, 5.—"Italian Society in the Renaissance." Lecture III., Dr. E. G. Gardner.
King's College, 5.—"Historical Theories of Space, Time, and Movement: The Antinomies—Zeno, Kant, Bradley." Professor H. W. Wilcox.

Fri. 6 King's College, 5.30.—"La Dynastie de Macedoine: III. Les Bulgars," Dr. L. Oeconomos.
University College, 5.30.—"Greek and Roman Industry." Mr. M. Cary.
Philological, 5.—"Some Middle English Problems," Sir Israel Gollancz.
Royal Institution, 5.30.—"Landor and the Classic Manner." Sir Walter Raleigh.

University of London, South Kensington, 3.—"London, Surrey and the Anglo-Saxon Conquest," Mr. A. F. Major.

Mon. 9 Geographical, 5.—"Characteristics of the Ground as seen from the Air," Capt. H. A. Allan Lloyd.
King's College, 5.30.—"The Apocalypse," Lecture II., Archbishop Charles. Swinburne (Lectures.)
King's College, 5.30.—"Outlines of Greek History: The Isaraut Deconstruction, 718-802," Professor A. J. Tolembec.
University College, 5.30.—"Guillaume de Machaut's Literary and Musical Work," Lecture I., Miss Barbara Smythe.

Dr. Williams's Library (41, Gordon Square, W.C.), 6.—"The Analysis of Mind," Lecture XIII., Mr. Bertrand Russell.

Tues. 10 Royal Institution, 3.—"The Search for Gold," Professor G. Elliot Smith.
Institution of Civil Engineers, 5.30.—"Experiments on the Horizontal Pressure of Sand." Mr. P. M. Crossthwaite.
"Overturning Moment in Retaining Walls," Dr. A. R. Bolton.
King's College, 5.30.—"The Philosophy of Kant," Lecture IV., Professor H. Weldon Carr.
University College, 5.30.—"The Golden Age in Danish Literature," Lecture I., Mr. J. H. Holwe.
University College, 5.30.—"Holland and Belgium," Lecture I., Professor P. Geyl.

Wed. 11 University College, 3.—"History and Drama in the Divina Commedia," Lecture III., Dr. E. G. Gardner.
(Barlow Lectures.)
King's College, 5.30.—"The Problem of the Middle Danube," Dr. W. R. Seton-Watson.
University College, 5.30.—"The Changes as shown by Corn in the Rights in the Usages and attaching to Property," Lecture II., Sir John Macdonell.
University College, 5.30.—"Wergeland, Wellhaven and Collett," Lecture I., Mr. I. C. Grondahl.

Thurs. 12 University College, 2.50.—"Egyptian History," Miss Murray.
Royal Institution, 3.—"Recent Progress in Applied Optics," Lecture II., Professor A. E. Conrady.
Royal Society, 4.30.—""""Christ in Modern Thought," Dr. W. E. Orchard.
University of London, 5.30.—"Italian Literature," Lecture IV., Professor Antonio Cippico. (In Italian.)
University College, 5.30.—"English Architecture in the Nineteenth Century," Mr. F. M. Simpson.
University College, 5.30.—"August Strindberg," Lecture I., Mr. J. Bjorkhagen.

Fri. 13 King's College, 4.—"Eccelesiastical Art," Lecture V., Professor P. Dearmer.
University College, 3.—"Italian Society in the Renaissance," Lecture IV., Dr. E. G. Gardner.
King's College, 5.30.—"Eccelesiastical Music: The Use of Plain Chant in the English Service," Capt. Francis Burgess.
King's College, 5.30.—"Historical Theories of Space, Time, and Movement: The Void—The Old Atomic Theory—Lucretius—Dewar," Professor H. A. Panter.
King's College, 5.30.—"La Dynastie de Macedoine: IV. L'action de Byzance en Occident," Dr. L. Oeconomos.
Fine Arts

DUNCAN GRANT

TO-DAY, when the Carfax Gallery opens its doors at No. 5, Bond Street, and invites the cultivated public to look at the paintings of Duncan Grant, that public will have a chance of discovering what has for some time been known to alert critics here and abroad—that at last we have in England a painter whom Europe may have to take seriously. Nothing of the sort has happened since the time of Constable; so naturally one is excited.

If the public knows little of Duncan Grant the public is not to blame. During the fifteen years that he has been at work not once has he held “a one-man show,” while his things to periodic exhibitions have been rare and unobtrusive. To be sure, there is a picture by him in the Tate Gallery. But who ever thought of going there to look for a work of art? Besides, during the last few years the Tate, like most other places of the sort, has been given over to civil servants. Duncan Grant is a scrupulous, slow, and not particularly methodical worker. His output is small; and no sooner is a picture finished than it is carried off by one of those watchful amateurs who seem a good deal more eager to buy than he is to sell. Apparently he cares little for fame; so the public gets few opportunities of coming acquainted with his work.

Duncan Grant is, in my opinion, the best English painter alive. And how English he is! (British, I should say, for Cézanne, Matisse, Picasso, etc.) Of course he has been influenced by Cézanne and the modern Frenchmen. He is of the movement. Superficially his work may look exotic and odd. Odd it will certainly look to people unfamilair with painting. But anyone who has studied and understood the Italians will see at a glance that Duncan Grant is thoroughly in the great tradition; while he who also knows the work of Wilson, Gainsborough, Crome, Cotman, Constable and Turner will either deny that there is such a thing as an English tradition, or admit that Duncan Grant is in it. For my part, I am inclined to believe that an English pictorial tradition exists, though assuredly it is a tiny and almost imperceptible rill, to be traced as often, perhaps, through English poetry as through English painting. At all events, there are national characteristics; and these you will find asserting themselves for good or ill in the work of our better painters.

Duncan Grant’s ancestors are Piero della Francesca, Gainsborough and the Elizabethan poets. There is something Greek about him, too; not the archeological Greek of Germany, nor yet the Greco-Roman academicism of France, but rather that romantic, sensuous Hellenism of the English literary tradition. It is, perhaps, most obvious in his early work, where, indeed, all the influences I have named can easily be found. Then, at the right moment, he plunged headlong into the movement, became the student of Cézanne. He admired, though not, curiously enough, of Bonnard, the modern artist with whose work his own has the closest affinity, and, for a year or two, suffered his personality to disappear almost beneath the heavy, fertilizing spate. He painted French exercises. He was learning. He has learnt. He can now express, not someone else’s ideas, but himself, completely and with delicious ease, in the language of his age. He is a finished and highly personal modern artist.

I dare say Duncan Grant’s most national characteristic is the ease with which he achieves beauty. To paint beautifully comes as naturally to him as to speak English does to me. Almost all English artists of any merit have had this gift, and most of them have turned it to sorry account. It was so pleasant to please that they tried to do nothing else, so easy to do it that they scrambled and gambolled down the hill that ends in mere prettiness. From this catastrophe Duncan Grant has been saved by a gift which, amongst fine men, is not uncommon. He is extremely intelligent. His intellect is strong enough to keep in hand that most charming and unruly of its sister gifts, sensibility. And a painter who possesses both sensibility and the intellect to direct it is in a fair way to becoming a master.

The sensibility of English artists, whether verbal or visual, is as notorious as their sense of beauty. This becomes less surprising when we reflect that the former includes the latter. The fact is, critics, with their habitual slovenliness, apply the term “sensibility” to two different things. Sometimes they are talking about the artist’s imagination, and sometimes about his use of the instrument: sometimes about his reactions, and sometimes—in the case of painters—about the tips of his fingers. It is true that both qualities owe their existence to and are conditioned by one fundamental gift—a peculiar poise—a state of feeling—which may well be described as “sensibility.” But, though both are consequences of this peculiar delicacy and what I should like to call “light-triggeredness” of temperament, they are by no means identical. By “sensibility” critics may mean an artist’s power of responding easily and intensely to the aesthetic significance of what he sees; this power they might call, if they cared to be precise, “sensibility of inspiration.” At other times they imply no more than sensibility of touch: in which case they mean that the contact between the artist’s brain and his canvas has the quality of a thrilling caress, so that it seems almost as if the instrument that bridged the gulf between his fingers and the surface of his picture must have been as much alive as himself. “Sensibility of handling” or “hand-writing” is the proper name for this. In a word, there is sensibility of the imagination and sensibility of the senses: one is receptive, the other executive. Now Duncan Grant’s reactions before the visible universe are exquisitely vivid and personal, and the quality of his paint is often as charming as a kiss. He is an artist who possesses both kinds of sensibility. These are admirable gifts; but they are not extraordinarily rare amongst English painters of the better sort. In my judgment Gainsborough and Duncan Grant are the only English painters who are not endowed with sensibility of both sorts, but I could name a dozen who have been handsomely supplied. In my own time there have been four—Burne-Jones (you should look at his early work), Conder, Steer and John, all of whom had an allowance far above the average, while in America there was Whistler. No one, I suppose, would claim for any of these, save, perhaps, Whistler, a place even in the second rank of artists. From which it follows clearly enough that something more than delicacy of reaction and touch is needed to make a man first-rate. What is needed is, of course, constructive power. An artist must be able to convert his inspiration into significant form; for an artist who ventures out from a tentative, tremulous, excited vision to an orderly mental conception, and from that conception, by means of the problem and with the help of technique, to externalization in form. That is where intelligence and creative power come in. And no British painter has, as yet, combined with sure and abundant sensibility, power and intelligence of a sort to do perfectly and without fail this desperate and exacting work. In other words, there has been no British painter of the first magnitude. But I mistake or Gainsborough, Crome, Constable and Duncan Grant were all born with the possibility of greatness in them.

Many British (or, to make myself safe, I will say English-speaking) painters have had enough sensibility—tion to make them distinguished and romantic figures. Who but feels that Wilson, Blake, Reynolds, Turner and Rossetti were remarkable men? Others have had that facility and exquisiteness of handling which gives us the enviable and indefatigable producer of charming objects—Hogarth, Cotman, Cowen, Whistler, Conder, Steer, Davies. Indeed, with the exceptions of Blake and Rossetti—two heavy-handed men of genius—and Reynolds, whose reactions were something too perfunctory, I question whether there be a man in either list who wanted much for sensibility of either sort. But what English painter could conceive and effectively carry out a work of art? Crome I think has done it; Gainsborough and Constable at any rate came near; and it is because Duncan Grant may be the fourth name in our list that some of us are now looking forward with considerable excitement to his exhibition.

An Englishman who is an artist can hardly help being a poet: I neither applaud nor altogether deplore the fact, though certainly it has been the ruin of many promising painters. The doom of Englishmen is not reversed for Duncan Grant; he is a poet; but he is a poet in the right way—in the right way, I mean, for a painter to be a poet. Certainly his vision is not purely pictorial; and because he feels the literary significance of what he sees his conceptions are apt to be literary. But he does not impose his conceptions on his pictures; he works his pictures out of his conceptions. Anyone who will compare them with those of Rossetti or Watts will see in a moment what I mean. In Duncan Grant there is, I agree, something that reminds one unmistakably of the Elizabethan poets, something fantastic and whimsical and at the same time intensely lyrical. I should find it hard to make my meaning clearer, yet I am conscious enough that my epithets applied to his painting anything but precise. But though they may be lyrical or fantastic or witty, these pictures never tell a story or point a moral.

My notion is that Duncan Grant often starts from some mixed motif which, as he labours to reduce it to form and colour, he cuts, chips and knobs about till you would suppose that he must have quite whittled the alloy away. But the fact is, the very material out of which he builds is coloured in poetry. The thing he has to build is a monument of pure visual art; that is what he plans, designs, elaborates and finally executes. Only, when he has achieved it, we cannot help noticing the colour of the bricks. All notice, and some enjoy, this adscititious literary over-tone. Make no mistake, however, the literary element in the art of Duncan Grant is what has been left over, not what has been added. A Blake or a Watts conceals a picture and makes of it a story: a Giorgione or a Piero di Cosimo steals the germ of a poem and by curious cultivation grows out of it a picture. In the former class you will find men who may be great figures, but can never be more than mediocrities: Duncan Grant is of the latter. He is in the English tradition without being in the English art. He has sensibility of inspiration, beauty of touch, and poetry; but, controlling these, he has intelligence and artistic integrity. He is extremely English; but he is more of an artist than an Englishman.

Clive Bell.

EXHIBITIONS OF THE WEEK

South Kensington Museum.—Sculpture by Auguste Rodin. Goupil Gallery.—Water-Colours by Professor Frederick Brown.

Rodin is perhaps the most skilful modeler in clay who ever lived; he had the tactile sense—the special sense of the modeler developed to the highest degree. He had, moreover, a subtle sense of contour and silhouette—the special sense of the painter. But he was relatively weak in the concrete structural sense—the special sense of the sculptor—modeled over the whole. Not too much attention was given to the superficial aspects of the human form, or was more responsive to sentient surfaces; no modeler ever produced more vibrant fragments. No painter ever drew more sensitive lines than the contours of Rodin’s best works. But no sculptor of anything like his eminence ever failed so often to conceive his subject in the round, or to create a structure capable of looking its best in the open air. Rodin’s works invariably look their best indoors, and photographs of some pieces are more impressive than the sculptures themselves. Hardly any of his works are admirable from every angle; few have more than two good views, many have only one. If the photographic view is the best, and if the appropriate lighting and background, we get a concentrated version of a silhouette and its encircling contours—which corresponds but too often, we suspect, to the sculptor’s original concept. But the qualities that went to the making of Rodin as an artist were not merely technical qualities. He had a great perception of a great outline, and a fine sense of line. The whole constitution of the man appears in his first three important works—the “Man with a Broken Nose,” “The Age of Bronze” and “St. John the Baptist.” These three pieces epitomize the three strains of his aesthetic outlook, the three contiguous paths along which he was destined to tread as an artist. Rodin made his debut with the “Man with a Broken Nose,” and the path which it represents is the most personal of the three and the most modern in aesthetic conception. The head was the forerunner of “La Vieille Hauemière,” the “Balzac,” the portrait of Jean Paul Laurens, and a host of experiments. The Age of Bronze represents the path of academic realism, in which Rodin never achieved anything more perfect. Indeed, the work conceived in this point of view went steadily downward, and degenerated eventually into the soft and sentimental whitenesses which emerge from swirling pools of marble and are labelled “Fallen Angel” or “Broken Lily,” or something equally non-plastic in significance. “St. John the Baptist,” which is the first result of the artist’s study of antique sculpture, which he developed later to the climax of his art in “The Bourgeois of Calais.” All three paths are represented at South Kensington: the first by a series of bronze sketches, “Cybele,” “The Muse,” “Figure of a Woman,” and the Expressionist portraits of “T. Duchesne,” “A”; the second by “The Age of Bronze” itself, and one or two unimportant marble groups; the third by “St. John the Baptist” and the beautiful “Prodigal Son,” better known as “Appel Suprême.” The Rodin gift includes at least two masterpieces, and is priceless evidence of the working of a great artist’s mind. Rodin offered his sculptures in humility, but also in a fine confidence that they were a fitting tribute to the great nation which received them; he offered them with a grand and complex gesture—a gesture worthy of his own art.

Professor Frederick Brown has devoted many years of his life to teaching at the Slade School. With his colleagues in the famous institution he has fought valiantly for the principles of classical draughtsmanship against pretty stippling and journalistic “shininess.” He has removed the cataracts of the photographic vision from the eyes of successive generations of students. He has helped small men to attain competence and at least one big man to touch greatness. This is a record of service which appears at its true value when we examine his exhibition of watercolours at the Goupil Gallery. For these drawings prove that Professor Brown has enough skill and knowledge to have enabled him to accomplish much more had he taken to more experimental work. He is known to do so. “Lesser” (No. 26), “The End of a Sunday Morning” (No. 27), and “A Scene in the Highlands” (No. 34) are excellent in their way.
Music

A GERMAN CRITIC ON MODERN MUSIC

II.

As representative composers of modern Germany Bekker picks out Reger and Mahler (who are both dead), Schönberg, Franz Schreker and Ludwig Rottenberg. Of the first three English audiences know a little at any rate; the other two names, I confess, are unfamiliar to me. The first is a composer of operas, the second a composer of songs. Schreker’s operas, which Bekker regards as the greatest since Wagner, are described as being very much under Latin influences, essentially melodic, and looking back towards Gluck and Handel in the sense in which Debussy looks back to Rameau. The songs of Rottenberg have been generally criticized as being too much in the nature of recitative, but are to be considered as an advance on those of Hugo Wolf. It is difficult to form any general conception of modern German tendencies from such summary descriptions.

In comparing the musical conditions of Germany with those of England and France at the present moment, the most striking difference seems to be in the respective attitude of these countries to the music of the past. Germany is a land of learned researchers. The historical investigation of musical origins has been more thoroughly and conscientiously pursued there than in any other country. But the antiquaries are a little group apart. Some of them happen to be interested in modern music; but generally speaking the bulk of the musical public is in no way affected by the achievements of their scholarship. Just as German literature is considered to begin with Lessing, so German music begins with J. S. Bach. In France, on the other hand, the music of Rameau, of Couperin, of Lulli, and even that of Jannenquin is quite frequently to be heard. Here in England Purcell, Byrd, Dowland, Gibbons and a host of others are constantly being performed all over the country. There is no sharp line of demarcation between the admirers of the old and the admirers of the new. The scholars who dig up the old music that lies buried in our libraries do not feel that their task is done until they have secured the actual performance of it; and it is in many cases those scholars who are the keenest enthusiasts for the music of our own day.

Another, and perhaps a more important, point of difference between Germany and England lies in their attitude towards folksong. The early precursors of the folksong movement in England used to point to Germany as the land where the national musical heritage of the people was properly appreciated and cultivated. As a matter of fact Brahms, whose folksong settings were the chief cause of all this enthusiasm, was notoriously undiscriminating, and accepted as genuine tunes which had been deliberately made up to throw ridicule on the folksong movement of an earlier generation. And, apart from such errors as these, it may be said that to the average German mind a folksong was a popular tune composed between 1800 and 1850. There were older ones; but the favourites which were firmly stuck in the great heart of the German people dated mostly from the days of Weber and Mendelssohn.

That meant that their musical interest was principally harmonic. Folksong in German music meant much the same thing as the hymn tunes of Stainer and Barnby did in the music of England. Germany has never known the new musical outlook that came into English music with the first maturing of the folksong movement. To German musicians the modes are still the church modes, interesting only to the specialist in liturgy. We in England know, thanks to some of our folksongs, that the "ecclesiastical" modes can be as cheerful and human as the conventional major and minor. There was before the war a brief period during which it seemed that the folksong movement was going to have a vigorously regenerating influence upon English music. At the present moment this regenerating influence seems to have entirely lost its force. The folksong movement is lively enough. Thousands and thousands of young persons appear to be dashing away with the smoothing iron and acquiring an art of dancing which combines the maximum of energy with the minimum of grace. But in the early days of the movement those who were most interested in it hoped that composers would arise in our own country who would be saturated with their native melodies as Haydn and Dvorak were, and like them would draw from the music of the people the inspiration of their operas and symphonies. Two men there were who might have achieved this ideal, two who had been practical collectors of folksongs and had absorbed them into their very bones, so that almost every phrase they wrote had the natural shape and cadence of traditional melody. George Butterworth, whose few published works showed him likely to be the greater, although the younger of the two, was killed in the war. Vaughan Williams has been silent for five years.

In the meantime new influences have made themselves felt. The old collectors’ enthusiasm is a thing of the past. The folksong movement would nowadays be better described as the folksong industry. Thanks to our commercial composers the folksong style has become a commonplace cliche. It no longer commands our respect; it has even found its way into the popular hymn-books. Reluctantly, remembering the thrill and the excitement of past years, we begin to wonder whether the German critic is not right in regarding such experiments merely as picturesque effects of colour. The mistake of the folksong enthusiasts was in attaching too much importance to the moral and sentimental aspect of the business. These tunes were supposed to stand for rural simplicity; they were pure, healthy, English and all the rest of it. The result was that even Butterworth, who possessed a technique for better things, seemed mainly preoccupied with their emotional and dramatic values. The only way to make them fruitful as the far-down roots of English music was to consider them disinterestedly, to ask oneself not whether they were morally good, but whether they were beautiful. And if they were beautiful, it should not have sufficed to present them, as they so often were presented in a number of symphonic poems and other works, simply as melodies either supported on an almost motionless bass or clothed with deliberately eccentric dissonances. They should have been worked contrapuntally, rigidly and ruthlessly as Purcell might have worked them, and then perhaps they might have evolved for their craftsmen a new originality of expressive dissonance analogous to that which arises from Purcell’s single-minded pursuit of the melodic line. But as long as English musicians go on wasting time over the merely quaint and picturesque they are no more likely to produce work of permanent value than the average old-fashioned German whom they despise for his sentimental attachment to the classical tradition of Schumann and Brahms.

EDWARD J. DENT.

The Menestrel contains a letter from M. Fernand Baldensperger replying to the statement made by certain German critics that with the disappearance of German rule, musical enthusiasm would also disappear from Alsace-Lorraine. M. Baldeesperger quotes the subscriptions to the concerts of the Strasbourg Conservatoire in the last year of German direction was 719; in the first year of French direction, 869. The figures are interesting, although it may be doubted whether, in view of the war conditions of 1917-18, they prove anything.
CONCERTS

MISS LILIAN MCKINNON and MISS EURIDICE DRACONI gave pianoforte recitals on two successive nights (Jan. 26 and 27) entirely devoted to the works of Scriabin. If recitals of this kind are to continue, one hopes that they will be concerned more exclusively with the late-middle and late Scriabin, who at any rate an individual, though, in our view, an extremely limited one. We very quickly tire of the early Scriabin, in whom—downfalling the "Divine Poem"—the styles of Chopin, Liszt, Schumann, Wagner, and Tschaikowsky wage a too-evident struggle for predominance. And if examples of every period are to be included, it is surely better to arrange the programmes on something like a chronological basis, so that we can trace to some extent the evolution of the composer's characteristic idioms. In the programmes before us was this principle observed; Miss Draconi, for instance, played the Fifth Sonata—an interesting transitional work—and then went back to the Preludes numbered Op. 16, which sounded in consequence utterly futile.

In the method of interpretation, these two recitals offered as strong a contrast as one could desire. Miss McKinnon, as usual, played everything as pianistic, pure and simple, avoiding dynamic extremes, and relying on an extremely subtle and artistic gradation of tone in the middle register to achieve contrast of effect. In Miss Draconi's playing everything was much more heavily emphasized; she gave the impression of playing a piano transcription from an orchestral score, rather than the pianistic version for the pianoforte. We believe Miss McKinnon's method to be decidedly the right one for this composer, whose orchestral writing, as a matter of fact, reflects his piano technique very strongly.

The conductor at the Philharmonic Society's Concert on January 29 was Mr. Adrian Boult, and the chief works performed were Delius' Violin Concerto, Holst's suite "Beni-Mora," and Brahms' Fourth Symphony. The Concerto would affect one more deeply if the composer had not said the same kind of thing so often before. The Concerto moves about in solid harmonic chunks, whose incessant chromaticism leaves one cold, simply because one feels it has become a formula which Delius is content to exploit without questioning its validity. Over this accompaniment the solo violin keeps up a vague and almost continuous monologue that has many charming moments, but lacks incision and coherence. Delius' besetting sin has always been: a tendency to rely too exclusively on harmonic effect, and ignore problems of outline, texture, and design; for some time now his harmonic formulae have been wearing thin, and the purely sensuous beauty they achieve can no longer satisfy us. If one heard the Concerto without knowledge of his other work, one would welcome it as a beautiful and individual piece of music; as one looks back on "Sea Drift," "Paris" and "Appalachia," one becomes aware that it lacks vitality and significance. It was played by Mr. Sammons with delightful ease of style and purity of tone, though with less than his usual fervour, whilst the way in which Mr. Boult managed to scale down the orchestral dynamics and throw the solo part into the strongest possible relief was deserving of very high praise. "Beni-Mora" is an arresting work, and the last number is, both in boldness of conception and certainty of execution, second to nothing the composer has yet written.

Mr. DOUGLAS MARSHALL, at his recital on January 27, gave us, amongst other things, some unfamiliar numbers by John Dowland—a foretaste of the edition on which Mr. Fellowes is now engaged. If the rest of the selection maintains anything like the same level, the edition will be a treasure indeed, for these songs are magnificent, and, to tell the truth, made the rest of the programme seem very small by comparison. And repose in the singing of them would not have come amiss, but Mr. Marshall is going to be a good singer all the same. He sings with his head; all he needs to cultivate is a greater flexibility of style, and more variety of tone-colour.

Mr. ALBERT SAMMONS and MR. WILLIAM MURDOCH gave an extremely interesting recital on January 31, when sonatas by Dohnányi, Brahms, and John Ireland were played by the composers. The ensemble of Mr. Murdoch and Mr. Sammons is remarkable, considering that their respective styles and temperaments, to judge by their solo playing, are as different as could well be imagined. Mr. Sammons appears to exercise on Mr. Murdoch a restraining influence of which one often feels the need when one hears the latter playing by himself.

MUSICAL NOTES FROM PARIS

Although the score of M. Charles Lévaüé's operatic version of Anatole France's masterpiece, "La Rôtisserie de la Reine Pédanque," was completed before the war, it has had to wait five years for its first performance, which took place on January 12 at the Opéra-Comique. Obviously, any attempt to find a musical equivalent to the peculiarly characteristic spirit and flavour which distinguishes all the writings of the great French stylist is practically foredoomed to failure; there is nothing in common between music and either France's mentality or his methods. One would have thought that any sensitive musician would have realized the truth of this in general, and especially in the case of this particular work. However, since M. Georges Dociquoi has seen fit to dramatize "La Rôtisserie," or rather to transform it for the theatre, and M. Levade has not hesitated to write his score round this transformation, the result must be criticized as it stands. Not only is it said to be the immature work of a composer who suffers in the process of being dressed up for the stage, and the cream and true richness of the book, which is its style, has had to be sacrificed to make room for "incident." The result is a more or less conventional opera-plot of romance and adventure, with the chief high lights on such episodes as Catherine's supplication to the Abbé to carry off of Jehan from her passion, and the murder of the Abbé by the vengeful musician, d'Astarac. All this may be legitimate enough, and will be liked by people who like this sort of thing, but we are sure that if the real Jacques Tournebroche were to see the good Abbé as he is now appearing on the stage of the Opéra-Comique, he would have no small difficulty in recognising his "bon maître." It is only fair to add, however, that if we accept this conception of the rôle, M. Jean Périer's acting as the Abbé Jérôme is masterly in its way; and all the cast are well up to the standard of the Opéra-Comique. We have left M. Levade's music to the end because there seems really so little to say about it at all. It is quite inoffensive, but seems to have been composed according to no particular plan, and shows little or no originality. There are bright spots here and there, but as a whole it sadly lacks the impress of a strong personality.

In the meantime the strike of the artists of the Opéra (orchestra, ballerinas, etc.) is over, and performances began again on January 20, after the strike had lasted eighteen days. The strikers have got their increase, but will have to work somewhat harder for the privilege—in other words, the Director retains the right to call upon them for thirty-six performances gratis per annum. This would appear to be a somewhat novel way of adjusting financial demands, but the strikers profess themselves satisfied, and have certainly won their "principle."

The strike may have one curious result owing to an ill-considered gesture on the part of M. Saint-Saëns. During the strike the artists gave popular concerts in Paris and the suburbs, at which they performed extracts from their repertory. M. Saint-Saëns, hearing of this, formally forbade the syndicate to play any of his works at these impromptu concerts—to which the strikers replied that while this prohibition was no embarrassment to themselves at all, it would be more likely to result in a decision being taken by the whole of the artists' syndicate throughout France which would be very far from flattering to the author of "Samson et Dalila," but for which he would only have himself to blame. In other words there is a serious possibility of M. Saint-Saëns' compositions being "boycotted" by all syndicated musicians throughout the length and breadth of France.*

On January 27 Mme. Sarah Bernhardt was to create at Lyon, with artists of the Comédie-Française, M. Moutet de Mermoz's "Ariane," to be given with incidental music taken from the composer's works.

R. H. M.

* This decision must subsequently have been modified as, since the above was written, "Samson et Dalila" has been performed again at the Opéra.
ON PRODUCING SHAKESPEARE

T HE recent revivals of "Hamlet" and "Julius Caesar" have given fresh prominence to the difficulty of presenting Shakespeare on our stages. It used to be the fashion to say that the sublimity of the poet made an adequate embodiment of his fancy impossible; nobody would have laughed at that more heartily than Shakespeare. He wrote, most carefully, for the theatre, but, unluckily, not for our theatre. What he and the dramatists of his period had in view while they worked was a bare platform projecting into an arena, upon which no visual illusion of reality could be attempted. Every effect must be gained through the medium of the ear; place and time must be created by the spoken word, without any help from scenery, lighting or costume. The modern stage, on the other hand, is a living picture framed by the proscenium, and to the totality of the illusion built up on it the words of the author contribute only a part. When a play of the "platform" epoch is prepared for the "picture" stage the troubles begin.

To start with, the main character of the oratorical drama, with its long soliloquies and descriptive narratives, is ill-adapted to realistic conventions. The more "actual" the trees in Capulet's garden appear, the less credible is the rhetoric of the lovers. There occurs, moreover, an unfortunate duplication when the scenery evoked by the author's verse is confronted with the brushwork of Messrs. Daubs.

To-morrow night when Phoebe doth behold
Her silvery visage in the watery glass
Decking with liquid pearl the bladed grass.

What is your limelight man to do after that? Equally baffling is the question of "curtains." If Shakespeare were to return to the works he would, doubtless, refuse to gratify the actor-manager in "Hamlet" by cutting out Fortinbras and ringing down on "The rest is silence," but, just as certainly, he would not end with:

Take up the bodies: such a sight as this Becomes the field, but here shows much amiss.
Go, bid the soldiers shoot.

He had to take up the bodies, or leave them behind the Elizabethan stage had no curtain to cover them. In these and a score of ways Shakespeare was bound to the requirements of his playhouse. He must insert masques and dances; he must write, or at least indicate, scenes for the "clown"; he must seize every opportunity of a combat, for the theatres were still arenas for sword-play and wrestling; on every excuse for his heroine to disguise herself, he must get his fearful "girls" back into their breeches. But perhaps the most troubesome feature of his plays, from the point of view of the modern producer, is their length. When no time was wasted in shifting heavy scenery, it was possible to speak many more lines than can be said in the course of a modern show. But it is an error to suppose that by getting rid of scenery we shall be able to play Shakespeare without cuts. A phrase in the prologue to "Romeo and Juliet," alluding to "the two hours' traffic of our stage," has been far too literally interpreted. It is but the orator's "Let us consider for a few minutes," when he means at least forty of them. Shakespeare, therefore, must not have been played in two hours, nor did the audience expect it. They were indulged to longueurs. The difficulty about Shakespeare is felt just as acutely by us in the case of a contemporary publication, the Book of Common Prayer. Time seems to have had none of its alleged pecuniary value at this date.

The structure of the seventeenth- and eighteenth-century theatres presented no great inconvenience for Shakespearian productions. It is true the old platform was fast disappearing into the proscenium arch, but the boxes still stood upon the "apron," the portion of the stage left projecting into the audience, and, whenever extra seating was urgently needed, a wooden "amphitheatre" was run up in front of the backcloth, without the least sense of incongruity. We are obviously still far from the "picture" convention. That did not arrive till the first quarter of the nineteenth century, and we shall not be far out in connecting it with Pianch, the historian of costumes, who gave a great impetus towards theatrical realism, both in details of dress and scenic elaboration.

The first great victim of the new ideal was Charles Kean, who during his tenancy of the Princess's, in the fifties, invented the archaeological Shakespeare revival. A performance of "Richard II." or "The Merchant of Venice" now became an excuse for resuscitating medieval England or Renascence Italy. Old annals were ransacked for details of dress, the stage was loaded with piles of solid scenery, and the text was hacked about freely to provide more occasion for spectacle. When Cleopatra's barge was actually to be shown at a cost of £500, why retain some thirty lines of blank verse describing it, which could only be a falsehood of the setting? But there is no real need to dilate on this type of production; it is one with which everybody is acquainted.

Irving may be said to have grappled, in some measure, with the new Franklinism. He, and to a greater extent perhaps Forbes Robertson, had an inking that the advance in stage mechanism might be put at the service of Shakespeare instead of tyrannizing over him, might illustrate without obscuring his purpose. But, whatever heir good intentions, they were overwhelmed by Beerbohm Tree. "Tontouns de l'audace" was his motto, and, in a succession of revivals which finally provoked revolt, he seethed Shakespeare in the vat of his extravagant imagination. Because he abstained from the refinement of lines and scenes, he felt justified in every other outrage, mangling, transposing, inserting whole tableaux and dumb situations of his own. He only once achieved success by this method. It was with "Henry VIII.," and the explanation is simple. That pageant libretto may have been bought by Shakespeare, but he certainly never wrote a line of it.

While rebellion against the whole archaeological and realistic system was maturing, Mr. Oscar Asche suggested a better way. He had not yet opened his penny Oriental bazaar, and was still an artist in whom great hope could be placed. In his memorable revival of "The Merry Wives of Windsor," he came within an ace of giving a pictorial production that should blend unobtrusively with the spirit of the play, and yet, by a "fugue" of his imagination, just missed it. There was a curious poignancy about the wintry English landscape in which he set the comedy, a note of reproach against the shill buffoonery of the actors. But that was Mr. Asche's poetry, not Shakespeare's. A producer has no more right to embellish than to disfigure his author.

Meanwhile, more drastic reforms were judged imperative. The experiment was tried of bringing back the Elizabethan stage, totus teres atque rotundus. It was disastrous. Conventions unnoticed in the sixteenth century are stumbling-blocks to-day. Absurdity reached its climax in a revival of this type when Archbishop Chichele in "Henry V." appeared in the "magpie" and frilled sleeves of a Protestant prelate. The new antiquarian pedantry was as bad as the old. Mr. Granville Barker at the Savoy took refuge in curtains and pattern decorations. The subtle aroma of Bunthorne then enveloped everything, and Falstaff would have recoiled coughing from the doors. Again the proper solution was only just missed. In dealing with a problem analogous to the Shakespearian one, the task of arranging "The Dynasts" for the stage,
Mr. Barker displayed both the wrong and the right way of treating it. An attempt to show part of the Battle of Trafalgar against the background of pale yellow curtains was as flat a failure as could well be imagined. But the scene representing the Beacon on the hill-top with a dim sky backcloth of equal simplicity was an almost incredibly perfect illusion. So long as realistic costumes are worn, we cannot, without a painful jar to the eye, dispense with realistic pictorial scenery. But the simplest scenery is the most convincing. Once this is grasped, our troubles will be over. We shall no longer be getting in the way of Shakespeare.

D. L. M.

MR. TODD TRIUMPHS

WHAT a long way a little touch of psychology will go in theatre! It must be said that it may be grossly distorted to adapt it to the philosophy of those for whom the commercial theatre caters, but—a starving man is not particular about cooking. Let the playwright show us however fugitive a trace of reality, cast the most flickering light upon our own minds and feelings, and we shall take it immediately. In Mr. Todd's Experiment," to the Olympia the Mr. Walter Hackett cannot be said to do more than this, but he does this much, and by comparison we account what he has written a good play. Better see life caricatured than not see it at all.

Arthur John Carrington was a boy of thirty who had regularly gone to the dogs. He wore soft slippers by his own fireside, sported a beard, like a dirty Bolshevik, and wasted his hours translating Slav poetry. His rich uncle, ready for any sacrifice that would allow him to bask in the reflected glory of his nephew's career, was at his wits' end. Was not the misguided young man on the very verge of refusing a fat government job? To him in his despair entered (uninvited) the family friend, Mr. Todd.

Mr. Todd (who comes very near being a genuine creation) is a warm-hearted, irreligious ass, whose hobbies are clairvoyance, sentimentalism and his own infallibility. He knows—not from clairvoyance, but from confidences received—what is the matter with Arthur John. Arthur John has been bruised by life and has ceased making efforts. How has that happened? You perceive the swelling of Todd's bosom as he answers: "Woman!" Forthwith, on a little dream-stage inset in the larger scene, we are shown how A. J. as a schoolboy proposed to the vicar's daughter, who curtly told him she must marry money, to which he then cried, to console a hussie married lady whose husband ill-treatment, and made the mistake of thinking that, when she begged him (as a gentleman) to leave her, she meant it; how finally he engaged himself to a brisk young actress, and broke it off on learning that she had only just off with the old love before getting on with the new. None of this does much credit, it must be confessed, to A. J. No one expects an adolescent to be more responsible for his actions than a patient under laughing gas, but the combination of stupidity and pettiness is surely rather rare. We generally get Penelopi if we miss Mr. Pokker.

Todd now explains that all three of these ladies happen at the moment to be living in London, and proceeds, by methods of "suggestion" as blatant as only he could devise (there is certainly real humour in this Todd), to induce A. J. to dress up and call on them. One of the three, he argues, must marry money. So the lady of the house, the parson's daughter has become a dyed and flirtatious widow; the luscious enchantress is more seductive than ever, and welcomes A. J. with a warmth that suggests far too much experience in that sort of thing since he last saw her; the brisk young actress becomes a keen and successful manageress and needs no vouching to tender her old lover may forget the wrong she did her. Upon Todd, jubilating with the rest of the family on the success of the great experiment, there returns the haggard figure of Arthur John, seeking to smother the last stirrings of his manhood in those tender lips.

But there is a good angel that watches over Todds. In this case her name is Fancy, a poor relative, who (we understand) helps her mother to keep house for Arthur John. She sees through beard and slippers with the clairvoyance of love and would do anything for him. Todd's gift for creating muggles leads him to talk in a way that makes A. J. believe Fancy is going to marry this elderly maniac. Resentment flares up, then jealousy; a delightful little scene follows in which Fancy with trembling audacity holds on to the misunderstanding by giving up the chance of her life, and Arthur John recovers a motive for living. He calls for a top hat worthy of Mr. Nares and announces his readiness to take that job. The curtain must fall on an embrace, of course, but what sends the spectator away with a happy feeling is the thought that Todd in some distant small room is proclaiming once more his infallible methods of cure.

The play then is an essay in the Barrie style, disfigured, like so much of Barrie's theatrical work, by cheap concessions to the sentimentalism of the stalls, but showing that if the author dared to be himself he could write a first-class psychological satire. In fact, in Todd he has done so. Todd at no point infringes on the ideals or prejudices of the stallholders, so Todd is allowed to move as truth dictates. Therefore Todd will save the play, and probably win it a run of some hundreds of nights. If this happens, let Mr. Holman Churke, his impersonator, have the credit he deserves. It is perhaps the least yet done by the fantastic actor, so brilliant when he gets part that suits him, so much at sea when he is given a role that does not. Mr. Fred Kerr is as good in the character of A. J.'s uncle from Manchester, with his robust abomination of Todd and all his works. These two really carry the whole piece through on their shoulders. What there was in Arthur John to tempt an actor of Mr. Owen Nares' intelligence and mystery. Does he feel it a duty to waste himself on these breed-and-butter parts to gratify his admirers? He would have many more admirers if he would do work worthy of him. Miss Lloyd, Miss Polini and Miss Albanesi are all admirable as A. J.'s three kiths; and Miss Marion Lorne, as Fancy, is suggestive of Miss Hilda Trevelyan would have done well with the character. That was exactly what was asked of her.

Correspondence

ART AND THE SCHOOLBOY

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

MY DEAR SIR,—I am induced by your article on "New Year's Suggestions" (Athenæum, January 2) to relate what I did many years ago for encouraging the love of art and music among my pupils at Eton, where I was a Master from 1860 to 1875.

I travelled much abroad, and generally returned with a number of artistic photographs. I had these simply framed and lent them to my boys to hang up in their rooms so as to displace the commonplace pictures which their taste had chosen. When they left I often allowed them to take away with them any picture which they specially preferred; and I know that this had a considerable effect in forming their taste. One of my pupils was accidentally drowned at Oxford, and when I visited his parents I found that they had hung in their drawing-room the pictures which had adorned his room at Balliol, and they were all works of art of which he had made the acquaintance in my house. Also I was every other Saturday at home to my friends, and provided for them first-rate chamber music played by artists from London. These concerts the older boys were allowed to attend. I knew that a large proportion of my pupils would be wealthy patrons of art and music, and I thought it extremely important that they should be brought up to appreciate the very best in these departments.

This practice was disliked by some of my colleagues, and especially by the Head Master, who thought it effeminate and dull-thinking, and it eventually brought about my dismissal. Looking back after more than forty years, I am quite satisfied with the results, and think that the good I did was cheaply purchased by the loss which I suffered. I hope that others will not be deterred from following my example.

Yours faithfully,

Oscar Browning,

Via Pietro Cavallini, Roma,
January 12, 1920.
THE NEGLECT OF OLD ENGLISH HISTORY

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—May I venture to point out a novel, valuable, and interesting feature in the October number of History: the Quarterly Journal of the Historical Association? On its pages from 176 to 180 the main lines of historical research as pursued at three English universities—those, namely, of Leeds, London and Manchester—are indicated; and the titles of the theses submitted, the names of the authors, and the names and titles of the professional directors are given. The period covered is from 1911 to 1918. The total number of theses is 106. The University of Leeds has furnished 20 theses, that of London 67 and that of Manchester 19. Only one university has produced a thesis relating to England before the Norman Conquest. This thesis elucidates the importance of Winchester as the capital city of England from the tenth to the twelfth century. It was prepared by Mr. P. Meadows (M.A., Lond.), under the direction of Mr. Hubert Hall, as long ago as 1911. The position then is—out of 106 historical theses submitted at three English universities in eight years, only one deals with Old English history. This is less than 1 per cent. I will leave comment to others.

In the bibliographical list appended by Dr. R. W. Chambers to his admirable work on "Width" (1912), no fewer than 167 works connected with his subject, or elucidatory thereof, are noted. Out of 29 periodicals consulted, 3 are English; out of 21 editions, 7 are English; of 12 comments or translations without text, 2 are English; and out of 105 editions of O.E. poems and related works, 83 are foreign and 22 English. The period covered is one of eighty-five years. The subject of research is the oldest Germanic poem known, and, as Dr. Chambers pointed out in Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, 1915, p. 158, the only editor who had attempted comment and explanation in the thirty years previous to 1912 was Professor F. Holthausen.

On November 7, 1917, Professor Flinders Petrie read a paper before the British Academy entitled "Neglected British History." He was dealing, it will be remembered, with the history of this island in Brythonic times. His vigorous attack was acquiesced in to a certain degree by Dr. R. W. Chambers, who revealed the fact to us in History for April, 1919, p. 45, that English scholars had been waiting for 330 years for an edition of Geoffrey of Monmouth's "Historia Regum Britanniae," which would not be dependent upon the whims of an sixteenth-century German printer (e.g. Jerome Cromelin of Heidelberg, 1587), which would be reliable; and which would take into account the twenty-seven MSS. of Geoffrey's "Historia," which are in the British Museum and were written in the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries. As Dr. Chambers said: "This is deplorable." Yet one printed English text is independent of the German edition. Is it to be wondered at that Professor Flinders Petrie should have found occasion to complain of the neglect of British history?

Yours obediently,

ALFRED ANSCOMBE.

30, Albany Road, Stroud Green, N.4.

RENOIR AND THEORIES OF ART

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—The apotheosis of Renoir in your issue of January 23 implies that all the world is prepared to join in the pan. Of course, anybody has a right to publish a personal opinion; but no one has the right to assume that his opinion is shared by everybody else, and to adopt the first-person-plural pronoun and other tricks of style in order to simulate support to the assertion. In a matter like art ideals, such an assumption becomes an offence to those who differ.

The views of the writer of the article are, in fact, shared by an extremely small minority of art-enthusiasts in this country. That perhaps is the occasion of a disingenuous method of vilifying the aims and work of past masters. It is not a matter of the common sense of the writer, which, for his new wares; but it is regrettable in the domain of culture. When one does not count the meaning of the writer's more obscure passages, by tearing aside the verbiage, the falseness of his postulates grows more and more glaring. He talks of an idea and a theory of Renoir’s, but explains them only by invoking a contrast with the ideals of the pure impressionists which he presents as “disconcertingly silly.” He speaks of “that superior necessity of overturning pictorial values”—amazing arrogance! Whose is the necessity? Perhaps it is the necessity of those who are “tired of questioning Nature with the eyes”? If so, let them rest themselves—to the great advantage of all; for those who grow tired are those who cannot succeed. Turner never grew tired. The writer speaks of “the terrible ‘lighting’” of the landscape impressionists. What, one may ask, is a greater factor in the graph of art than “lighting”? If painters are not to bow to any god, it must be to the sun, who alone makes Nature visible, who alone makes effect possible. Yet the author deprecates that in earlier work “the effect becomes the theme.” Certainly it does, and that not only to painters, but to ordinary folk who are moved by the beauties of Nature.

But the apologists of the new “isms” admittently find themselves “tired” of Nature. They therefore fall back upon themselves and their “abstractions.” They have propounded pseudo-metaphysical theories to fit these abstractions, and with them they flood our journals. They claim discoveries. One is “the divine laws of equilibrium” (in which Renoir is said to have collaborated with Cézanne). This, whatever it may mean, has special reference to pictures which show what is claimed as the secret of Nature’s stability, and it does so with “rounded masses” which “roll one over the other.” Comment is unnecessary.

So far from an apotheosis, what would be much more acceptable to level-headed people is a diluge at the advent of this reaction in the world of art; or, to use the author’s own expression, at “the ridiculousness of these after-dinner theories, in which metaphysics often fills more space than painting.”

Having thus wisely apprehended the futility of metaphysics on the part of the older painters, why could not the writer of the article see them also as undesired in the attempts of the new?

The Fine Art of Painting deals with the appearances of things only, otherwise all past work and criticism is wrong. To claim that it can be reduced to what is nothing but expository diagrams of the painter’s turgid introspections is not only “disconcertingly silly”; it is a serious crime against the past and the future of Art.

Yours truly,

F. C. TILNEY.

Walden, Cheam, Surrey, January 24, 1920.

"SCOTS"

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—Mr. Erskine of Marr is really quite wrong. Scots is Scots, and Gaelic is Gaelic. Scots is not “a dialect of English,” as Mr. Erskine calls it. It is a language quite as good as English and quite as ancient. Mr. Erskine again is mistaken in writing of the language of Gavin Douglas (my collateral ancestor) and Burns as if they were the same language. Burns wrote what might loosely be described as a dialect of English. He wrote English with a liberal sprinkling of Scots words. Douglas on the other hand, like James of “The King’s Quhair” and “Auld Dunbar,” wrote pure Scots. To deny the existence of “Scots” as a language, quite distinct from Gaelic on the one hand and English on the other, is simply fantastic.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

ALFRED BRUCE DOUGLAS.

Shelley’s Folly, Lewes, Sussex.

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—It appears then that Mr. Erskine’s quarrel is not with your reviewer, but with Gavin Douglas and those who followed him in calling their language “Scots”; and he insists upon “the claim of Gaelic to that title” (Athenæum, January 23). But the Gaelic-speaking people no longer want it. “Scots,” or “Gaelics” is not grammatically a Gaelic form, and that people have for more centuries than we need count called themselves Gàidheal or Gaeil and their language Gaeil. It was Lowlanders like Mr. Erskine who persisted in calling them Scots. Douglas and his successors found it desirable to distinguish their own standard literary language from that of England. Though developed from Northumbrian, it was then just as little or as much of a "dialect" as the literary English developed from Middle English. To mark the difference in the literary languages the Scottish writers, from the name of their country, applied the form "Scots" or "Scote." Or are we to drop the name "Scotish" also, and confine it to the region north of "the Scots Water" of old—the Forth? Or go the whole hog and return "Scotia" to Ireland, which has the first historic claim to the title? There is no reason, even in polity, to reverse a long-standing and convenient usage. For myself, as a Gael, it is a matter of ironic pleasure, of which I may not be deprived, that the northern kingdom should be distinguished by name, dress, weapons, and music borrowed from the people whom the Lowland element once so heartily despised.

Yours, etc.,

W. MACAY MACKENZIE.

Edinburgh.

[This correspondence must now close.—Ed.]

THE FIRST FOLIO POEM INITIALED "I. M."

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sirs,—May I ask in your columns whether a set of coincidences discovered by me in the First Folio predatory matter be a mere chance set, or a purposely arranged set? Until within living memory the general supposition was that "I. M." stands for John Milton, and I happen always to have preferred such supposition to the modern suggestions of James Mabbe or Jasper Mayne. Hence, remembering having come across an arguable reference to a letter-number code in some Marston poem or play, a day I applied several codes to "I. M.'s" poem.

The absurd hyphens in line 2 seemed a conceivable filium labyrinthi. The repetition of the opening word as the first word of line 3 seemed another. The eight lines or chessboard depth of the poem seemed yet another.

I discarded the superfluous hyphens so as to get only lexicon words, found that a three rows deep top could only occur in a letter F, and, as no full chessboard of word-values is obtainable owing to the shortness of some lines, had to experiment with the first four columns of lexicon words as equal to half a chessboard.

With only one code, the positional order of letters, or \( \Lambda = 1 \) to \( Z = 24 \) code, could I get any noteworthy result. But this was really noteworthy.

Here, first, are the words and values of the half chessboard area:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>WERE</th>
<th>看望</th>
<th>Shake-speare that</th>
<th>31</th>
<th>78</th>
<th>103</th>
<th>47</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>FROM</td>
<td>the</td>
<td>World's Stage</td>
<td>49</td>
<td>32</td>
<td>85</td>
<td>50</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WEE</td>
<td>thought</td>
<td>thee dead</td>
<td>31</td>
<td>95</td>
<td>37</td>
<td>14</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TEL</td>
<td>thy Spectators</td>
<td>that</td>
<td>53</td>
<td>50</td>
<td>129</td>
<td>47</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TO</td>
<td>enter with applause</td>
<td>33</td>
<td>59</td>
<td>57</td>
<td>86</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CAN</td>
<td>dye and live</td>
<td>17</td>
<td>32</td>
<td>18</td>
<td>45</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>THAT'</td>
<td>but an Exit</td>
<td>65</td>
<td>41</td>
<td>14</td>
<td>55</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>THIS</td>
<td>a Re-entrance to</td>
<td>54</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>98</td>
<td>33</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

And next the "frame" of outside values, and the conceivably hinted-at F:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>31</th>
<th>78</th>
<th>103</th>
<th>47</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>49</td>
<td>50</td>
<td>50</td>
<td>49</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>31</td>
<td>14</td>
<td>55</td>
<td>37</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>53</td>
<td>47</td>
<td>37</td>
<td>14</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>33</td>
<td>86</td>
<td>59</td>
<td>87</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>55</td>
<td>65</td>
<td>65</td>
<td>55</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>54</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>98</td>
<td>33</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Now for the coincidences: (1) Both the "frame" and the F total 990 in word numerical value; (2) in both instances the colour of square division is 439 White and 551 Black when all 32 squares are placed on a chessboard; (3) the cross-sum (for all 92 values, 290) is divided as three top rows 103, five bottom rows 177, while the colour of square vision as regards all eight rows is in exactly similar proportion.

Neither I nor any acquaintance, Sir, can how such a set of coincidences can be explainable as a result of mere chance.

Respectfully yours,

J. D. PARSONS.

---

Foreign Literature

A SPANISH TREATISE ON ENGLISH EDUCATION

La Educación en Inglaterra. Por José Castillejo. (Madrid, Ediciones de "La Lectura," 12 ptas.)

EVERYBODY who chanced to meet Señor Castillejo on any of his recent visits to this country must have been struck by the variety of his interests as well as by the alertness of his intelligence. It was manifest that Spain, acting through the Junta de Ampliación de Estudios, was exceptionally fortunate in her choice of an educational representative. Most of the data in the present elaborate volume were already collected as far back as 1914, when war broke out; as the moment was not propitious for publication, there was nothing for it but to await a more favourable opportunity.

It may be said at once that the book was well worth waiting for. Señor Castillejo has given us a very thorough piece of work. Some of it necessarily takes the form of schedules and synopses, and this schematic feature—a synthesis of many of the works noted in the extensive bibliography which occupies double columns on pp. 647-659—is probably regarded by the author as the most valuable part of his compilation. Unquestionably it is the section of the book on which most labour has been spent, and doubtless this will be the verdict of Spaniards who use the volume mainly for purposes of reference. English readers, however, will probably turn with most interest to the Introduction, and to the final chapter, both of which were manifestly written after the body of the volume was completed.

It is not difficult to guess on which side the author's sympathies lay during the recent struggle; his handsome acknowledgment of indebtedness for general inspiration to the late Francisco Giner de los Ríos is tantamount to an avowal on this head. There was, we take it, a moment at the outset when Señor Castillejo shuddered at the possibility that our entire educational system might perforce have to yield to more specialized methods. He is no indiscriminating admirer. Obviously he sees the weak points in a scheme which tends to produce an excessive multiplicity of examinations, and the complete separation which often exists between teachers and examiners. Much as he favours specialism, Señor Castillejo is far too shrewd to ignore the conspicuous advantages of a less stereotyped plan in developing individual character.

Ese es, acaso, uno de los secretos de la civilización inglesa: una gran cantidad de fuerza personal almacenada en cada individuo por una educación liberada, se canaliza para la vida en un estrecho casco con un empiece irrisible.

This (p. 404) is a distinct personal expression of opinion, comparatively rare in the present volume.

The author has aimed at giving us a useful and complete account of our educational position. His success is undoubted in dealing with the past. It may be that one or two expressions towards the end of his Introduction are unduly pessimistic in tone. These, however, are concerned mainly with the future. Señor Castillejo has not the brilliant suggestiveness of M. Max Lecler, but he is nowise inferior to his French predecessor in accuracy of information.

J. F.-K.

"Headmaster" writes to point out that the second sentence of the second paragraph of his letter on "Comparative Greek at Oxford" in last week's Athenæum (p. 152) should have read: "nor is there any reason to suppose that a "modern" professor, a high-class Government official or a retired Headmaster would have any greater knowledge" (not "any Greek knowledge").
M. PAUL BOURGET has achieved a distinction somewhat rare, if by no means unheard-of in the world of letters. That world has not waited till his death to make up its mind as to his position in it. It has decided upon his particular niche, and has set him therein. It has reviewed the product of over forty years, of enormous energy and industry allied to wide culture and a wider curiosity, and has formed a definite opinion of its value, an opinion which posterity is unlikely to reverse. That opinion must, one imagines, bring some contentment to M. Bourget as he looks back upon his work. The wild and extravagant praise of early days may be gone, but there has come in its place something better. He is to-day, as he must know himself to be, already an institution. The niche accorded to him is that of a classic, a minor classic if you will, but still a classic.

M. Bourget owes much to the influence of other writers, and much also to himself for the influence which he has resisted. (O fantômes des temps d'autrefois, fleurs fanées!).

The Place of M. Bourget

Laurence Albani. Par Paul Bourget. (Paris, Plon-Nourrit. 8 ff.)

shows the inspiration of Lamartine and Musset, perhaps also of his contemporary François Coppée. He has studied Balzac faithfully. The Abbé Dimnet has declared that he is the nearest approach to Balzac we have to-day. If that be so, he is a Balzac in little, of the drawing-room. The ideas of Taine have influenced him. Of his contemporaries, he has not escaped the attraction of M. Barrès, his junior by eight or nine years. Few French writers of to-day have. But before M. Barrès had come to power he had resisted a more crude temptation. He had refused to run before the chariot of Zola. A solitary standard-bearer, he had kept flying his standard, on which was emblazoned "le roman psychologique" in face of that then all-conquering banner bearing the device "le roman naturaliste." The school of Zola fell, but M. Bourget continued rebelling on his way.

For forty years he has been analysing sentiments and studying emotions. He has recognized very clearly his own powers and limitations. He is not a creator; he is an analyst. And he has analysed chiefly the sentiments of one class: the high-life, Paris society. He has always been obsessed by sex. That subtle, super-civilized creature that is the Parisienne of the cultured and idle classes—alas for Paris and for us all that the two should be so often synonymous!—he has reflected with the passion of a butterfly-hunter. Her doubtings and passions, her treasons and fits of remorse, he has examined with that patience and enthusiasm of the connoisseur. Her male companion, brilliant and unstable, has interested him only less. He has painted quite a picture-gallery of weak-kneed heroes. He has, in fact, sometimes seemed to suggest that it is men of the finest susceptibilities, such as Hubert Liurian of "Cruelle Enigme" and Vincent La Croix of "La Duchesse bleue," who are most inevitably doomed to failure and disappointment in their contact with the world.

But he has not been merely an analyst; he has dabbled to some extent in politics and propaganda. The Dean of St. Paul's sees the world resolving itself into blacks and reds, reactionaries and revolutionaries. M. Bourget is definitely a black. It would be inapt to ask whether he is a traditionalist because he is a Catholic, or a Catholic because he is a traditionalist; it is a fact that he is both. And because he is both he is, or was—for he may have "rallied" like some other good Frenchmen since the war—a royalist, at least in theory. Royalty represents to him the continuity of tradition. France's worst danger, he thought with MM. Barrès, Maurras, and other disciples of Taine, was forgetfulness of tradition. The religious tradition and the family tradition were alike neglected. So M. Bourget added a device to his standard, and sat down to write "L'Étape" and "Un Divorce." Of them it need only be said that there is no need to go to them for an understanding of French nationalism. "Les Déracinés" is still the first and last word on that subject. But it is perhaps to be noted that with English readers M. Bourget's reputation has suffered owing to the fact that his political ideas are "unfashionable" with English critics at the moment; just as Anatole France has gained additional glory in their eyes for the opposite reason.

In his latest book, "Laurence Albani," there are no politics. Neither is it a novel of the aristocracy, though the slight sketch of an aristocrat in the book, an Englishwoman, Lady Agnes Vernham, is masterly, and in the author's best manner. It is also a portrait that no other French observer could have drawn. M. Bourget has studied the English he has met in London and on the Riviera to some purpose.

Laurence Albani is the daughter of a peasant proprietor, cultivating a few acres of ancestral soil near Hyères. The family had been prosperous and growing in importance before the Revolution, "but whether the boundary between the bourgeoisie and the nobility." But the forced subdivision of property had gradually brought it down. The father of Laurence retains some traces of refinement; her brother and sister are frankly peasants. The girl herself is physically and mentally a "throw-back" to her pre-Revolution ancestry. Her difference from the rest is accentuated by the two years she spends as companion to Lady Agnes, travelling in France and Italy, and at Vernham Manor in England. On the death of her patroness she returns to her family, which she loves genuinely; and very soon, as might be expected, "innumerable little details of the daily life began to grate upon the gueule-de-moisielle that she had become." Her too-fine sensibilities are continually being wounded by her surroundings.

Then comes a chance to return to the life of delicacy and refinement that she has lived with Lady Agnes. She is courted by two men: Pierre Libertat, a rich young bourgeois sportsman, and Pascal Couture, a small cultivator like her father, whom she has known from childhood. Pascal she loves for his gentleness and the poetry in him, but to marry him will be to fasten herself to such a life as her parents'. With Pierre she will be a châtelaine. The struggle is a hard one, but the outcome inevitable. She gives up her dreams.

Elle avait compris que cette délicatesse des choses, tant goûtée par elle chez lady Agnes, n'était que la transposition d'une autre délicatesse: celle du cœur. Cette délicatesse-là, elle la rencontrait, vivante et complète, dans cet humble camarade de son enfance, et, continuant de le contempler avec une émotion attendrie, elle répondait: "Non, je ne t'ai pas préféré. Je t'ai aimé.

The book is a truly delightful excursion into a new field. It will not add very much to its author's reputation. Certainly we do not imagine that it will rank with "André Cornélis" or that charming "nouvelle," "La Dame qui a perdu son Peintre." It is written by a man still in the full enjoyment of his powers, a master of his craft, if ever there was one; but by a man who has done with the ardours of youth and is drawing near to old age. It is written with the polish of great technical skill. There is more action in it than in some of his previous works, and it escapes the risk of dullness, as some of them do not. But M. Bourget's faults and merits are what they were. His danger still is, as Mr. Gosse noted a good many years ago, a dalliance with "interminable psychological reflections until our attention has betrayed us." His supreme merits are imagination and insight into the characters of his age. It is by reason of them that his fifty volumes are definitely a part of French literature.
Exactly thirty-five years ago, on the 9th of February, 1885, M. Bourget dedicated "Cruelle Enigme" to Henry James, between whose work and his own there are so many points of similitude. In that dedication he laid down a formula which he considered every novelist, of no matter what school, must follow:

"Nous tombions d'accord que les lois imposées au romancier par les diverses esthétiques se ramènent en définitive à une seule: donner une impression personnelle de la Vie."

He has been doing that ever since, and his impressions are worth reading.

C. F.

ANTON TCHEHOV

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTE (1860-1887)

PART II.*

In August, 1879, Anton went to Moscow to enter the University. He took with him two schoolfellows as lodgers, and this made it possible for the family to take a better flat. At that time, after many vain efforts, Anton's father at last got a job as clerk in the stores of a merchant, for which he was paid forty roubles a month and was lodged free of charge. He came to see his family and children but rarely, and they could not exist on so little money. And so Anton, from the very moment of his arrival, took the household on his youthful shoulders. All worked hard to alleviate the family's financial circumstances. That winter, Anton sent to a humorous paper called The Dragon Fly a story entitled "A Letter to My Learned Neighbour." He was looked upon as the master of the house, and the father. His will was law, his opinion always considered, and "who knows"—writes his brother—"what would have happened to our family in the absence of Alexander and Nicolay, if Anton, had not come at that time from Taganrog?"

"The need for money set Anton writing stories. Nicolay drew caricatures, Ivan prepared to be an elementary school teacher, and little Michael copied lectures for undergraduates. The mother and Marie worked very hard. "It was a tough reunion of all the members of the family, gathered round Anton, and bound together by sincere, sympathetic friendship," writes his brother. "What will Anton say? What will Anton think of it? How will Anton regard it?" became the watchwords of the family. His literary successes and failures were followed with the closest sympathy of all.

In 1884 Tchehov left the University—a doctor, and very soon he began to practise in a Zemstvo hospital in Tchikino, under a well-known doctor-therapeutist, Archangelsky. There he looked after the peasants and grew to know their life and the life of the poor generally. After a few months, Tchehov, at the request of a doctor-friend on temporary leave of absence, became the head doctor of a Zemstvo hospital in Zvenigorod, where he had a mixed medical practice, attended at inquests and was the medical expert to the courts.

The summer of 1885 Tchehov and his family spent at Bakhino with the Kissyelkovs, with whom they had spent three previous summers. The Kissyelkovs were a rare, talented family. The cousin of the well-known diplomatist count, Kissyelkov, such an idol to Marie Vladimirovna Begitchev, director of the Moscow Imperial Theatres. He was an author and an art connoisseur, and the Tchehov brothers loved to hear of his adventures in Russia and abroad. Marie Vladimirovna was also a writer. She and her husband were the friends of Tchaikovsky, Dargomyzhsky and Salvin. There were long discussions in their home on music, literature and the theatre.

Anton's brother Michael thus describes their life in Bakhino: "We used to get up very early. At about seven o'clock in the morning Anton would sit down at his table and begin to write. At that time he contributed to a Moscow paper, Oskolki ("Splinters"), and to the Petersburg Gazette in Petersburg, and in all those stories one would find some scene or other from the life at Bakhino, this or that character, the hosts or guests, or the people from the villages close by. Dinner was served at one o'clock. After dinner the whole company would go off to the Daragonov woods to gather mushrooms. Anton was passionately fond of gathering mushrooms, and while walking in the woods he more easily found subjects for his stories. Near the Daragonov woods there stood a lonely church which always captured his attention. Service was held there only once a year, but at night the sound of the ringing of the bell this or that man rang the hours. That church with the night-watchman's hut by the wayside gave Anton the idea for his "Witch" and "The Evil Deed." Back from the woods, Anton wrote again or played croquet; at eight o'clock supper was served. Afterwards, the Tchehovs would go to the Kissyelkovs' big house in Babkino and Begitchev sat at the table playing patience, the tenor; Vladislavlyev, sang and the governess, Elisabeth Alexandrovna, accompanied him. All the Tchehovs would sit round Marie Vladimirovna and listen to her stories of foreign countries, of Tchaikovsky, Dargomyzhsky, Salvin. I can positively affirm that Tchehov's love of music developed from that particular time. Anton would make jokes, was always gay and talked nonsense. The painter, T. T. Levitan, who was also at Bakhino, drew Crimean scenes in the album, and Anton wrote funny descriptions under them. On these evenings a great deal was talked about literature and art; the names of Tourgeniev, Pisemsky and Schotrin were ever present. With enthusiasm all would deal with them. All the serious periodicals and newspapers were received. Thanks to the cheerfulness of nature and to the charming people, Anton Tchehov was gay. He wrote, he was praised by the critics, they foretold a brilliant future for him, he was well in health. Sometimes during the summer evenings Levitan and he would dress up in Peasant circuiter clothes, and Anton would fall backward, and a perfectly Oriental scene follow. Or, at other times, Levitan would be brought before the court. Kissyelkov was the President, Anton Tchehov the Crown Prosecutor, for which purpose he would wear a proper make-up. Both were in uniform embroidered with gold. Anton Tchehov's presentation speech made the company roar with laughter.

Everything would have been all right but for the scarcity of money. From the Oskolki Tchehov received very little, and had the right to publish only a definite number of lines per month, and the Petersburg Gazette very often withheld payment. That is why Tchehov had very often to remind his editors of his money, since it would be the only work for the money that he had earned.

To these money troubles a new anxiety was added. In 1886 Anton Tchehov had a haemorrhage of the lungs. It meant consumption, but he believed little in it, or consolled himself with the thought that it was once, before his haemorrhage, and he therefore tried to be gay just as usual, going about with his friends and attaching no significance to the state of his health. When he returned to Moscow, his sleep was troubled, he was twitched, he twisted, he twisted, he twisted, he twisted, he twisted, he twisted... Later on, when he lived on his estate at Melikhovo, he used to get frightened at night, dreaming of a "black monk." This dream he used as the theme of a story.

In 1889 Anton Tchehov began writing for the Novoe Vremya, which started a new feature especially for him—a Saturday supplement. From henceforward he attributed no more importance to his work for the Oskolki than for Osokhov as the field of activity had opened for him. Under the influence of Grigorovitch, who was the first to salute his talent, Tchehov began to take his literary activities far more seriously. There occurred a crisis in his literary activity and in his outlook on life; he became more judicious and less and less gay, giving himself completely to literature. He continued to work very much during the night. Still, before he liked to see people round him, could not dispense with them, and would give parties to young people, mostly to Conservatoire and University students.

In 1887 Tchehov took a trip to the South of Russia, and visited his native place; his letters written to his sister on the journey are full of wit. On returning to Moscow, he wrote his play "Ivanov," which was staged by Korsch. With this play the first period of his literary activity ends.

List of New Books
Prepared in co-operation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding with the Dewey Decimal System, the sub-categories being marked, for the benefit of librarians and others familiar with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. The first numeral in these represents the main class, the second one of the subdivisions, and so on.

The works in the List which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

100 PHILOSOPHY.

Chesterton (Gilbert Keith). The Superstition of Divorce. Chatto & Windus, 1920. 8 in. 3/ n. 173.1 "The philosophic peculiarity of divorce and remarriage, as compared with free love and no marriage, is that a man breaks and makes a promise at the same time." Marriage is a divine institution. That is the basis of Mr. Chesterton's reasoned attack on legal divorce. Divorce "is not the dissolution of the legal obligation of marriage ... for the simple reason that no such obligation exists." Marriage is more fundamental than institutions and contracts, being a relation established by nature for the renewal of the race. Though Mr. Chesterton hardly adds anything new to the controversy, his book is an interesting study in style. Critics are calling attention to polyphonic prose as something new. He had been doing it.

Redgrove (H. Stanley) and Rowbottom (Jeanne Hélôise). The Indictment of War: compiled from the works of the world's greatest minds. Containing many passages from the works of foreign authors now for the first time translated into English. Daniel, 1919. 9 in. 548 pp. bibliog. index, 10/6 n. 172.4 This book is a notable achievement. It is an ably chosen gathering from the writings of distinguished people of all ages who have condemned war, from Buddha, Aristophanes, and Baccyllides to Thomas Hardy and James Maude Royden. Full references are given, and the authors are arranged alphabetically. Of course an equally remarkable collection might be made of pronouncements in defence or praise of war, men being divided on this subject into two diametrically opposed schools of thought.

Rolle (Richard) of Hampole. The Officium and Miracula. Edited by Reginald Maximwood Woolley. S.P.C.K., 1919. 7½ in. 97 pp. 3 ill. index, 5/ n. 189.5 The Latin text of these two works of the mediaval monk and mystic is presented here from a collation of the three existing MSS., with variant readings in footnotes, and an excursus on the life of Richard Rolle of Hampole and on the MSS. as an introduction. The "Officium" has been twice printed before, but apparently not the "Miracula." Both works are main sources for records of Rolle's life.

200 RELIGION.

Williams (J. Herbel). Inspiration. Sands, 1919. 7½ in. 267 pp. index, 5/ n. 260 Briefly and clearly the author discusses and explains the position of the Roman Catholic Church in relation to the divine inspiration of the Scriptures. The Church, he says, holds that the books of the Old and New Testaments "have God for their Author and ... are delivered ... to the Church herself." The author’s comment is that this "is Plenary Inspiration beyond any mistaking." He defends also the doctrine of Verbal Inspiration, and states that it is approved by the Church. The book embodies quotations from the Encyclical of Pope Leo XIII. "Providentissimus Deus," as well as references to some of the opinions expressed by Cardinal Franzelin.

300 SOCIOLOGY.

Pormoor (Sir Charles Alfred Crripps, 1st Baron). Paish (Sir George), and others. The Famine in Europe: the Facts and Suggested Remedies: being a report of the International Economic Conference called by the Fight the Famine Council, and held at Caxton Hall, Westminster, on the 4th, 5th, and 6th of November, 1919. Swarthmore Press, 1920. 10 in. 126 pp. app. paper, 4/6 n. 330.6 The impressive report of the Conference convened by the Fight the Famine Council, in which distinguished economists, medical authorities and other persons of eminence took part, sets forth many distressing facts as to the terrible condition of the populations of Central Europe and Russia, where there exists a shortage of food and fuel. With reference to milk, Miss Emily Balch states that in Germany, Austria and Bulgaria there is actual need. Switzerland is short of milk. France has suffered a "most serious and grievously" (Sir George Paish). Italy is in much the same situation as France. In numerous areas there is a paralysis of transport, with consequent dislocation of industry. "In Russia there was a complete breakdown of credit" (Sir George Paish).

The second part of the report deals with suggested remedies for the appalling state of things. The resolutions passed by the Conference, six in number, are given here. Among them is a recommendation that a "world conference of economists, Government representatives, and co-operators should be summoned to deal with the high cost of living, the difficulties of exchange, and the necessity for providing credit for European countries.

Winship (A. E.). Danger Signals for Teachers. Chicago, Funk & Wagnalls, 1919. 7½ in. 204 pp. 1/25 n. 371 The teaching profession is no exception to the general rule that every business or vocation has its special dangers. "The war has placed education on the throne in all democracies; it has made a real demand for statesmen in education ... it will largely have failed if it does not develop these statesmen." Nudging makes a teacher ridiculous. "The nearest short route to control; but leadership is the only sane way." Teachers must remember that there are physical, and social, and emotional changes in every boy and girl every twelve months. The writer discourses at large on "real democracy in education," and drops useful hints such as those quoted above. He also drops curious Americanisms like "dicker" and "putter" which are beyond ordinary English comprehension.

400 PHILOSOPHY.

Ferlin (M.). Il Piccolo Vocabolario: a list of two thousand Italian words arranged in logical groups for sentence building ("Harrap's Modern Language Series"). Harrap [1920]. 5 in. 72 pp. paper, 8d. n. 453.2 Out of a size convenient for the waistcoat pocket, this little vocabulary contains four series of five hundred words each, the words being arranged in groups of ten. The system of classification adopted is excellent.

Pickles (Frederick and John E.). Home and School Exercises in Composition Through Reading: Junior Book. Dent [1920]. 7½ in. 94 pp. apps., 1/3 n. 428.6 Part 1, of a series of books designed to teach the art of composition by the "direct method," i.e., not by the study of grammatical rules, but by careful observation of the works of good writers. The authors quoted include Freeman and Dickens. Each extract is followed by searching exercises.

Roper (A. G.). Album Latium: an easy Latin Vocabulary for preparatory schools and the lower forms of Public Schools. Oxford, Blackwell, 1919. 7 in. 36 pp. paper, 1/6 n. 473 The suggestive and explanatory footnotes to each of the thirty sub-sections into which this vocabulary is divided will be of considerable assistance to the user of the text, and constitute a capital feature of an excellent little book.

500] NATURAL SCIENCE.

*Coward (T. A.). The Birds of the British Isles and their Eggs. First Series. Warne, 1919. 6½ in. 376 pp. ill., index, 12/6 n. 598.2 There is certainly room for this comprehensive, well-illustrated, well-printed, well-arranged handbook of British birds. The 242 coloured illustrations are reproduced from the pictures made by Archibald Thorburn and others for Lord Lilford's "Coloured Figures," and there are 65 photographs by Richard K_carton and others. The illustrations of the eggs are taken from Hewitson. Mr. Coward writes well, and, like a wise man, is not afraid of emphasizing the personal element in his knowledge, and many of his descriptions are of the rare kind which allures not merely the grown-up, but also the boy naturalist. We congratulate the author and the publisher most sincerely on this first part of their work. It comprises families Cordyline to Sulidide.

600 USEFUL ARTS.

Barton (Frank Townsend), THE COTTAGE'S PIG: being a practical treatise on pig-keeping for the small-holder and coteage. Jarrolds, 1919. 7½ in. 63 pp. ill. 3/6.4

A useful little manual by a member of the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons.

Boulnois (Helen), THE DOMINION OF HEALTH ("Rider's Mind and Body Handbooks," 12). Rider & Son, 1919. 7 in. 77 pp. 1/6 n. 615.881

The writer lays stress upon the value of auto-suggestion in the maintenance of good health, and declares that by the attainment of "perfect health" by the power of mind" great benefit results. The remarks concerning the proper way of resting are noteworthy.

Gordon (A. Knuyett), HEALTH IN THE HOME. Jarrolds, 1919. 7½ in. 245 pp. front. apps. index. 5/ n. 613.5

Beginning with the postulate that if we learn something of the way in which maladies attack the human body we shall acquire a knowledge of methods of training and strengthening the defensive powers of the body, and thus become able to prevent numerous illnesses, the author discusses the body as a machine, together with some of the factors which operate as driving forces. He then describes various common symptoms, and states the diseases to which they may each be due. He claims that the cure can be reversed. Cures are not suggested because they are dependent upon an examination of the individual. Nor are school hygiene, surgical first aid, and home nursing included in the scope of the work. There are excellent volumes on these subjects. But there is much in the present book which may be read with considerable advantage.

*Sarsfield (James), INSECT PESTS AND HOW TO BEAT THEM: including notes on plant diseases, soils, and manures. Pearson, 1919. 7½ in. 202 pp. ill. app. index. 3/6 n. 632

The author deals in an interesting and practical manner with farm, garden, orchard, greenhouse, and soil pests; considers them from the small-holder's standpoint; includes much that is useful concerning defensive and offensive measures which may be adopted against them; and discusses fungoid diseases of plants, the chemistry of fertilizers, and the like.

700 FINE ARTS.

Hayden (Arthur), BYE-PATHS IN CURIO COLLECTING. Fisher Unwin, 1919. 9 in. 462 pp. ill. index. 21/ n. 739

This is another of Mr. Hayden's useful books. He classifies a heterogeneous collection of objects in a practical, if slightly unscientific way under such headings as "Boxes," "Man and Fire," "Birds," "Plants," "War and Peace," and might not look immediately for spinning-wheels under the third of these headings; but there is a fairly good index. Mr. Hayden's advice is sound, and his insistence that the function of the curio collector is to rescue works of art is welcome in these days of indiscriminate high prices. The half-tone illustrations are clear.

*Photograms of the Year 1919: the annual review of the world's pictorial photographic work. Edited by F. J. Mortimer. Riffe [1920]. 11 in. 32 pp. 64 pl. paper. 5/ n. 779

The well-known annual attains with this number its 24th year, and is more diversified than ever, and above the average in accomplishment. War-photographs are conspicuously few, though "Day breaks, cold, shrieking, and bloody," by Capt. Bostock and C. W. Bostock, is powerful. Pictorial photography naturally draws its inspiration from the painters; what struck a visitour to the salon most was the number of photographers who manage to convey the style and mannerisms of individual artists.

780 AMUSEMENTS, GAMES, SPORTS.

Ker [pseud.], The New PATIENCE; or, Solitaire for Two. With rules of play, hints to players, and scoresheets. McIlroy, Nast & Co. [1919]. 7 in. 72 pp. 2/ n. 795

The old games of patience are adapted for two players.

The new edition of this amusing skit on golf and golfers is illustrated by Harry Furniss.

800 LITERATURE.

Cervantes Saavedra (Miguel de), *Schevill (Rudolph), Cervantes ("Master Spirits of Literature"). Murray, 1919. 8 in. 392 pp. bibil. index. 7/6 n. 883.32

It is, perhaps, not altogether remarkable that so few do not remain to us of the youth of Cervantes, for his father Rodrigo, a struggling "medico cirujano," seems to have been a kind of Micawber. However, it is something to know that at the time of the publication of one of the greatest books given to the world, the author was old, that he was a soldier by profession, a gentleman "and poor," and that he wrote a summary of Cervantes' life, and the accompanying critical analyses of parts 1 and 2 of "Don Quixote," of the twelve "Exemplary Novels," and of the master's other works, are of notable interest and value. It is curious that Charles Jarvis' translation of "Don Quixote," published in 1742, is not mentioned in the bibliography, as well as the translations by Shelton and Motteux.

*Darwin (Sir Francis), SPRINGTIME; and other essays. Murray, 1920. 7½ in. 253 pp., 7/6 n. 824.9

See review, p. 172.

Tolstoy (Lyof Nikolaevitch), NOYES (George Rapall), Tolstoy ("Master Spirits of Literature"). Murray, 1919. 8 in. 407 pp. bibil. index. 7/6 n. 891.7

The second volume of this series, of which Professor C. H. Grange's "Dante" was the first. The author deals not only with Tolstoy's written works, but also with what he believes of his life as having a bearing upon the literary output of the "great writer of the Russian land"; and some reference is made to Tolstoy's inculcable moral and religious influence upon the passing and coming generations of society. Pictures are presented of Tolstoy's family and racial environment; and the author brings well into the foreground his intense sincerity, deep interest in education, revolutionary ideas, and love for all men. He discusses very fully Tolstoy's ethical system and theological views, and in the conclusion brings critical analyses of "War and Peace," "Anna Karenina," "Resurrection," and other works remarks upon Tolstoy's consistent realism and independence or neglect of technique. The conclusion reached is that Tolstoy "is the master-spirit among all writers whom Russia has yet produced, and that he is the master-spirit among all the masters of the world since the time of Goethe."

POETRY.

A Boy's Absence. Poems by a Schoolmaster. Allen & Unwin, 1919. 61 in. 142 pp. 1/6 n. 821.9

The theme of these twenty sonnets is the affecation of a schoolmaster for a boy in his charge.

A child my own; I never look to feel The homely pleasures that to most men fall
Yet, having thee, I deem that I have all

A softness, a woolliness of technique, combine with a certain sentimentality of thought to spoil the general effect of the sequence.

Eight new poets are represented in the current number of the Chopbook. Their verses are pleasant enough, but we detect no dazzlingly original talent.
Lowes (John Livingston). CONVENTION AND REVOLT IN POETRY. Boston, Mass., Houghton Mifflin (Constable), 1919. 8 in. 446 pp., $1.75 n.

By sprinkling his discourse with colloquialisms such as "we" and "we've," and "the car," and "don't wantonly," Lowes thinks that he is getting in closer touch with his students than if he kept to the style of a formal paper to a learned society; but, even if he talked so, he surely need not write and print expressions that are out of place in prose, and his prose is vigorous enough to do without them, and too good to be wantonly disfigured. The ideas of convention and acceptance which are the basis of his doctrine remind one somewhat of Rousseau and his contract social. Why postulate an agreement to accept certain literary conventions, when it is obvious that poetic meanings are seized instinctively because of the suggestive quality of the words conveying them? Creative intuition cannot and should not assume the authority of poetic faith. The greater part of the book is an instructive though elementary study in the analytics of literature. In the later chapters much importance is attached to the Imagists; but the best part is a discussion of metre, vers libre, and the incursions of prose, in which Professor Lowes comes to much the same conclusion as recent investigators of the actual facts of rhythm, viz., that vers libres are sometimes verse and sometimes prose, and that there is no tertium quid, neither verse nor prose.

Meynell (Viola). VERSES. Secker, 1919. 7½ in. 38 pp., 2/6 n.

There is a certain under-emphasis in Miss Meynell's tone, a certain flatness and dryness in all she says. Reaction against an easy exuberance is good; but we wonder sometimes whether Miss Meynell has not carried the reaction too far. Silence and impassivity are, at certain moments, the most effective gesture; but they are effective only by comparison with the violence of passion. A whole drama pitched in a whisper would end by being simply dull. Miss Meynell's method is excellent when her flatness is made the vehicle of a powerful emotion, as, for instance, in "The Vocabulary." But where there is no contrast, where flatness of language expresses a flatness of thought, the method fails as an authority for poetic faith. Oppressed by the grey quiet earnestness of "The Frozen Ocean" and "Jonah and the Whale," one realizes that sophistications, prettinesses, conceits and over-emphasis have their uses.

808.1

Still another American handbook on the analytics of literature, this time assisting the reader's approach to contemporary poetry. The author explains the pattern of a poem, organic rhythm, images and symbols, and diction. She does this sensibly and in an unexceptionally way, and has been allowed by the authors and publishers to give nearly two hundred poems in full from living poets—including a number who might almost be described as the futurists.

822.33 SHAKESPEARE.

Parsons (J. Denham). THE "READ IF THOU CANST" EPITAPHS AT STRATFORD UPON AVON: a study in coincidences. The Author, Ravenwood, 45, Sutton Court Road, Chiswick, W., 1918. 8½ in. 16 pp., paper, 822.33

The author suggests that the inscription to Shakespeare in Stratford Church embodies a cryptogram setting forth that Bacon wrote the poems and plays; and that the code is a combination of gematria, or signalling by the number-values of the letters making up the words, with the use of the Pythagorean bases or root digits of the words and letters. Empedocles, in this dual process in composition and the supposed cryptogram, Mr. Parsons has discovered coincidences which, he considers, "arguably" point to Bacon as the true author of the poems and plays. Many facts are given in the pamphlet in support of this hypothesis. Most of the figures have been checked by the present writer; and a number of coincidences have come to light that can be said, for almost anything may to appearance be proved by the eclectic and imaginative handling of numbers.

BAIN (F. W.). THE INDIAN STORIES OF F. W. BAIN: vol. 12, THE LIVERY OF EVE. Lee Warner, Riccardi Press, 1920. 9 in. 106 pp. (Sold only in sets, $100 10s. net, 3 volumes.)

The last volume but one of this beautiful edition of Mr. Bain's stories. "The Livery of Eve" was first published in 1917. Mr. Jacob's presswork and the Riccardi type together make these Riccardi Press books the finest examples of contemporary printing that it is possible to buy at the present time.

BEACH (Mrs. William Hicks). SHUTTERED DOORS. Lane, 1919. 7½ in. 313 pp., 7/6 n.
The life-story of a girl with a fortune left her by a Boer uncle. "County people" with well-ordered houses, persons whose ancestors were Saxon, or even, possibly, British, an all-pervading duke, an exemplary bishop, and an old lady whose correct and refined manner of dying edifies the reader, chiefly constitute the society of "poise" and tone into which the reader of this book is introduced. The most appealing part of the story is the picture of the clashing of the heroine's mother to her ancient home.

The author has found a remarkable opening for her story: a late evening cruise is seen on an evening walk out of the sea off New Guinea. She is unable to tell who she is or how she came in the water, but repeats the names of three or four islands in the neighbourhood, one of which has a very weird reputation. Having thus gripped the reader's attention, the author retains it to the end as she relates the strange incidents that occur to the party when they reach "the terrible island."

Hamilton (Mary Agnes). FULL CIRCLE. Collins [1919]. 7½ in. 388 pp., 7 n.
See review, p. 179.

See review, p. 179.

*Meredith (George). CELT AND SAXON. Constable, 1919. 9 in. 297 pp., 7/6 n.
A reprint in the admirable "Standard Edition" of Meredith's works. The binding in blue cloth is discreet and dignified, the type clear, and the paper not too woolly. An excellent library edition.

Mr. Muir in these stories and sketches treats the many folk problems of matrimony, and portrays with skill and precision numerous types of wedded existence. Many of the marriages he depicts were failures. The egocentric husband, the wife without a thought beyond dress and a "good time," the marriage that is a union only in outward form, and the contrast between the "owned" or "sheltered" women and those who enter convention for independence—these are some of Mr. Muir's themes.

A cheaper edition of the striking novel of prehistoric times.

To this cheap reprint of his pre-war novel the author contributes a short preface on recent events in Egypt.

910 GEOGRAPHY, TOPOGRAPHY, ANTIQUITIES.

913.4241
See review, p. 176.

A new edition. Poland, Czechoslovakia, Jugo-Slavia, Hungary, and the several Russian States are clearly shown, as well as the present boundaries of Germany.
920 BIOGRAPHY

Croke (Richard).

A brief biographical essay, full of wit and sympathy, on the Richard Croke (1489-1558) who was the first Greek Reader and first Public Orator in the University of Cambridge. Croke was one of the earliest English humanists; a friend of Erasmus, in the printing of whose "Lubrications" he had a large share; the founder of Greek studies in Leipzig University, where he, like other contemporary humanists, lectured to a rapturous audience. We hope that Mr. Sheppard had a like experience when giving this lecture; he deserved it.

Dempster (C. L. H.). The Manners of My Time. Edited by Alice Knox. Grant Richards, 1920. 9 in. 258 pp., ill. 10/6 n. 920

See review, p. 174.

*Kelly's Handbook to the titled, landed and official classes for 1920. Kelly's Directories, 1920. 7½ in. 1773 pp. 20/ n. 920

"Kelly's Handbook" is so comprehensive that it forms a useful supplement to the Peerages and "Who's Who." This forty-sixth annual edition has kept abreast of the changes brought about by the war, as shown by the inclusion of Finland, the Republic of Poland, and the Kingdom of Serbes. Croates and Slovenes among the nations having Ministers and Consuls in London.

This reprint of the first volume of the famous memoirs comes down to the battles of Austerlitz and Jena.

Peel (Lady Georgiana). Recollections of Lady Georgiana Peel. Compiled by her daughter Ethel Peel. Lane, 1920. 9 in. 326 pp. ill., 16/ n. 920

See review, p. 174.

A review will appear.

930—990 HISTORY.

*Abbott (W. C.). The Expansion of Europe (1415-1789): a history of the foundations of the modern world. Bell, 1919. 2 vols. 8½ in. 834 pp. ill. maps, index. 30/ n. 940

See review, p. 175.

Dell (Robert). My Second Country (France). Lane, 1920. 7½ in. 323 pp. index, 7/6 n. 944.09

See review, p. 178.

A succinct history of the Byzantine Empire from the foundation of Constantinople in 330 A.D. to its fall in 1453. Copiously illustrated with excellent photographs of Byzantine architecture, mural decoration, etc.

In M. Hautecoeur’s work, which is in four main sections—"The Crisis of October, 1917," "The Policy of Nationalities, January—October, 1918," "From the Armistice to the Conference (November, 1918—January, 1919)," and "Italy and the Peace Conference (January—June, 1919)"—the causes of the Italian crisis, and of the uncertainty among the Allies concerning the solution of the Adriatic problem, are traced to the hesitations of the Boselli Cabinet, to the disputes between interventionists and neutrals, to the pacifist campaign conducted by official Socialists and others, and to various military considerations. The necessity of the avoidance of disunion among the Allies, and especially between France and Italy, is emphasized.

S-descrist (Frederick C. de). The Making of America—Volume I. King, 1919. 8 in. 344 pp. maps, apps. index, 6/ n. 973

From Columbus’s discovery of America to the Fourth of July celebration in London in 1918, Professor S-descrist writes a short history of the American people, having specially in view the need of making Britons see America’s problems from the ordinary American’s point of view. He is at fault, however, in assuming that the ordinary Briton “cannot realize the effect of the obstinate resolve of George III. to compel the colonist to do what he pleased and nought else.” As one of his own countrymen recently demonstrated, it is the American histories for schools, and not the English, that have inculcated an erroneous view of the early relations between the two nations.

940.9 THE GREAT EUROPEAN WAR.

This, the sixth and concluding volume of Sir Conan Doyle’s perspicuous history of the late achievements of the British Army in the West, passes in review the wonderful series of victories which were gained after April, 1918, by the forces led by Rawlinson, Horne, Byng, Plumer, and Birdwood; bears unstinted tribute to the gallantry of our Overseas troops; and testifies to the d awakened the American soldiers. The volume closes with a summary of the events preceding the Armistice, and of the principal terms of peace.

Jones (E. H.) and Hill (C. W.). The Road to En-Dor: being an account of how two prisoners of war at Yozgad in Turkey won their freedom. Hodder & Stoughton, [1920]. 9 in. 367 pp. ill. apps., 8/6 n. 940.9

This book is far more than an interesting narrative of the escape of two British officers from Turkey, and of the successful deception of Turkish and other officials by a system of spurious spiritualistic "messages," devised, in the first place for amusement, by the author and artist. The record possesses importance as a piece of exceedingly detailed, first-hand evidence that "intelligent, scientific, and otherwise highly educated men" can be completely deluded by the "arts and methods employed by mediums in general." To have made such an exposure at the present time is to have done a real and lasting service.

Sales by Auction

PRINTED BOOKS

PRINTED BOOKS, comprising:

The property of the late Sir Clements Markham, K.C.B.; the property of Mrs. H. R. Weldon, of 15, Bolton Gardens, S.W.; the property of F. C. Stewart, Esq., of 17, Crossvenor Road, S.W.1; the property of the Rev. A. T. Grant (decd.), of the Red House, Wemyss Castle; the property of the Right Hon. Lord Knaresborough; the property of Mrs. Parker of Broomfields, Wilmington; the property of the Rev. T. C. of Downside, Ireland; the property of the late A. D. S. de Vali, Esq., of 97, Lancaster Gate, W.; the property of A. G. R. Russell, Esq., of the property of the late Sir H. W. Weldon, K.C.V.O., of the collection of French Illustrated Books of the 18th Century in Contemporary Morocco Bindings; a few illuminated Manuscripts, including a Volume of Notes by Horace Walpole; Books with Coloured Plates and Books in Fine Bindings; Early Printed Books, English Literature, Topographical Works, including a finely illustrated Copy of Lyson's Magna Britannia; Works on Biography, Heraldry and the Fine Arts; Travel, Sport, Natural History and Horticulture, etc.

May be viewed two days prior. Catalogues may be had.
THE PRICE OF GAS

THE price of gas, has, it is true, risen since the war; but it has risen far less than most other household necessaries.

The rise is due to perfectly plain causes. Here are some simple statistics:

- Labour has on the average increased... 300%
- Coal—the chief raw material... 150%
- Oil—largely used in manufacture... 300%
- Machinery and other plant... 200%

1. The average price of gas has not, however, risen 100%; and dividends are generally lower than before the war.

2. This great public utility organisation, which has served the nation efficiently and economically for upwards of a century, and which contributed so considerably a part towards victory, is now working as one man to serve the nation in the new era in the same spirit of sound science and sane salesmanship, and is to-day in a stronger position than in the past, with a still greater future before it for united service to the community.

THE BRITISH COMMERCIAL GAS ASSOCIATION

A co-operative research and advisory body, representing the chief gas undertakings in the United Kingdom, both Company and Municipal

47 VICTORIA ST., WESTMINSTER, S.W.1

G 57
Appointments Vacant

METROPOLITAN BOROUGH OF ST. PANCRAS.

MALE SENIOR LIBRARY ASSISTANT.

The St. Pancras Borough Council invite applications for the post of Male Senior Library Assistant, age 23 years or over. The salary is £110 per annum, rising by annual increments of £10 to a maximum of £150 per annum, plus bonus at present in accordance with Civil Service Awards No. 84 and 101, amounting to £25 rising to £40 per annum. Candidates must have practical experience in a public library, and hold certificates of the Library Association in cataloguing and classification. Forms of application may be obtained from the undersigned, and must be returned by February 20, 1920.

C. H. F. BARRETT, Town Clerk.

KINGSTON-UPON THAMES PUBLIC LIBRARY.

The Library Committee invite applications for the post of Chief Assistant, to begin July, 1921, to assist in the School of Librarianship. Candidates must have had practical experience in a public library, and hold certificates of the Library Association. Applications, with recent testimonials, and endorsed by the undersigned, should be received at the Library by February 26.

PORTSMOUTH EDUCATION COMMITTEE (Higher Education).

MUNICIPAL SCHOOL OF ART.

Principal: Thos. T. Nelson, A.R.A.

An appointment as Assistant Master is vacant.

The Education Committee invite applications for the appointment of an Assistant Master of special qualifications in Modelling. Candidates must hold a recognised qualification of the Board of Education:—The full Associateship Diploma of the Royal College of Art, an Art Master's Certificate in Modelling, or a University degree in Fine Arts. Applicants must be under the age of 35 years, have a salary of £200 per annum, increasing by £10 annually to £250. The commencing salary in the scale will be fixed according to the candidate's qualifications and experience.

Application forms and further particulars may be obtained from the Secretary, Offices for Higher Education, The Municipal College, Portsmouth, to whom applications should be returned so as to be received not later than noon, Wednesday, the 25th instant, accompanied by copies of not more than three recent testimonials.

H. E. CURTIS, Secretary.

SOUTHEND-ON-SEA EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

MUNICIPAL SCHOOL OF ARTS AND CRAFTS.

Required Assistant Master holding Full Art Master's Certificate or R.C.A. Diploma, for general art instruction and design applied to crafts (including metalwork). Salary £200 plus increments for experience up to 10 years on Graduate Scale (maximum now under consideration).

Applications stating qualifications and experience and date when free to be sent immediately to A. J. Connaughton, Esq., Principal, at the School.

H. H. FARLANDS, Director of Education.

---

CITY OF SHEFFIELD EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

Applications are invited for appointment as Certificated Assistant Masters and Certificated Assistant Mistresses for service in the Elementary Schools of the Authority.

REVISED SCALE OF SALARIES.

MEN

- Minimum: £150 per annum.
- Maximum: £210 per annum.
- Annual increments: £10.

WOMEN

- Minimum: £150 per annum.
- Maximum: £175 per annum.
- Annual increments: £8.

In the case of trained Certificated Teachers each year spent in training College will be regarded for the purpose of fixing the annual salary of a Teacher as a year of service with the Sheffield Education Committee.

In fixing the commencing salary of a Teacher, certain previous experience in a like capacity under other Authorities may be counted as service with the Sheffield Education Committee.

Applications, which must be returned to the undersigned as soon as possible, may be had on receipt of a stamped addressed envelope.

PERCIVAL SHARP,

Director of Education.

LANCASTHIRE EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

The Lancashire Education Committee are at present organising a Temporary Training College at Lancaster for ex-service men of good general education who desire to be trained in Elementary Schools. It is proposed to open the College after Easter, and to provide a Two-Year Course leading to the Final Examination for the Teachers' Certificate granted by the Board of Education. The Committee invite applications for the following posts:

- (a) A LECTURER IN ENGLISH.
- (b) A LECTURER IN HISTORY.
- (c) A LECTURER IN MATHEMATICS AND SCIENCE.
- (d) A LECTURER IN GEOGRAPHY.

Candidates should hold an Honours Degree or other special qualification for the position, and must have had some teaching experience in institutions for Higher Education, but not necessarily from a Training College.

Owing to the temporary nature of the College, the appointments will be for two years only. Salary £100—£300 a year (non-resident), according to qualifications. Further particulars and forms of application (which must be returned before Saturday, February 28) may be obtained from the Director of Education, County Offices, Preston.

PRINCIPAL, and PROFESSOR of ENGLISH wanted in June for a Native College in India. Honours Degree essential. Rs.750 a month (present equivalent £208 10s. a year), rising to Rs.1,000 a month. Passage paid. Age not an impediment. Full particulars and address for applications, and for appointment of age and Degree must be sent by February 21, 1920.

HULL MUNICIPAL TRAINING COLLEGE.

WANTED after Easter, a WOMAN LECTURER in GEOGRAPHY. Particulars may be obtained from the Principal, to whom applications should be sent not later than February 21, 1920.
THE ACADEMY [Advertisements] February 13, 1920

Appointments Vacant

ROYAL NAVY.

APPLICATIONS are invited for APPOINTMENTS as INSTRUCTOR LIEUTENANTS in the Royal Navy. Candidates must be under 30 years of age, have had a University Training, and have taken an Honours Degree in Mathematics, Science or Engineering; they should also have had some teaching experience.

The rates of pay are from £365 per annum on entry to a maximum of £490 per annum as Instructor Commander. Promotion, by selection, to Instructor Captain is also open, with a maximum of £1,277 per annum.

Retired pay to officers over 40 years of age, after 12 years' service, ranges from £300 per annum for an Instructor Lieutenant to a maximum of £900 for an Instructor Captain, according to length of service. Service pension is also allowed to officers if invalided before becoming eligible for retired pay.

For further particulars apply in the first instance to THE SECRETARY OF THE ADMIRALTY, Whitehall, S.W.1.

KING EDWARD'S GRAMMAR SCHOOL, CAMP HILL, BIRMINGHAM.

At end of April, a FORM MISTRESS with good History qualifications and English or Geology as a subsidiary subject. Experience desirable; games a recommendation. Salary £400-£600, with allowance for previous experience. Apply at once to the Head Mistress.

CITY OF BIRMINGHAM EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

BOURNVILLE GIRLS' DAY CONTINUATION SCHOOL.

1. WANTED, after Easter, an ASSISTANT MISTRESS able to develop an appreciation of ENGLISH and if possible of MUSIC (taking class singing) using modern methods suited to girls 16 to 18 years of age.

2. WANTED immediately, an ASSISTANT MISTRESS for ENGLISH and NATURE STUDY. Gardening an additional qualification.

A degree (or equivalent) and secondary school experience desirable. Salary in accordance with the Committee's Scale for teachers in Secondary Schools. Forms of application and Scale of salaries may be obtained from the undersigned.

P. D. INNES, Chief Education Officer.

CITY OF BIRMINGHAM EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

COTTERIDGE BOYS' DAY CONTINUATION SCHOOL.

WANTED, as soon as possible, an ASSISTANT MASTER for MATHEMATICS and SCIENCE. A degree (or equivalent) and secondary school experience desirable. To teach boys from 14 to 18 years of age. Salary in accordance with the Committee's Scale for Teachers in Secondary Schools. Forms of Application and Scale of Salaries may be obtained from the undersigned.

P. D. INNES, Chief Education Officer.

BOROUGH OF CAMBRIDGE EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

TRAINED CERTIFIED MEN TEACHERS are Required for—Central Council School, and Central Classes attached to Milton Road C. School and Morley Memorial C. School, the latter being a Demonstration School for Homerton College. St. Philip's C. E. Boys' School—Trained Certificated Man. Application forms and scale of salaries will be forwarded on receipt of stamped, addressed foolscap envelope.

E. JENKINS, Secretary.
Education Office, Guildhall, Cambridge.

WEST RIDING COUNTY COUNCIL.

MEETING and have been DISTRRICT SECONDARY SCHOOLS.

WANTED for the next term, a MASTER or MISTRESS with good qualifications for teaching Botany. Salary for men begins at £180 to £300 and rises to £450. Salary for women begins at £150 to £250 and rises to £300. Apply, by February 21, to HEADMASTER.

THE SALT SCHOOLS, SHIPLEY.

THE Governors invite applications for the appointment of HEADMASTER of the Salt Girls' High School, to commence her duties in September next. Candidates must be Graduates (preferably in Honours) of a University in the United Kingdom, or possess equivalent qualifications. Initial salary, £350 to £450 per annum, according to qualifications and experience.

The number of pupils at present in the school is 247.

Further particulars and forms of application may be obtained from the undersigned by forwarding stamped directed envelope, and should be returned not later than March 8, 1920.

WALTER POPPLESTONE, Secretary.

EAST LONDON COLLEGE (University of London), E.1.—PHYSICS DEMONSTRATOR required immediately. Salary £250.—Particulars from Prof. C. H. Lees, F.R.S.

LIBRARIAN AND SECRETARY ( Fellow of Library Association), about to be demobilised, seeks re-engagement. Over 20 years' municipal Library experience. Highest credentials. Apply Box 808, ATHENÆUM Advertisement Office, 170, Fleet St., London E.C.4.
Art Exhibitions

RENOIR, MONET, MANET, DEGAS, GAUGUIN, DELACROIX, etc. etc.
Exhibition of select paintings and drawings by modern French masters.

ELDAR GALLERY, 40, Great Marlborough St., W.
Open 10.30 to 6. Admission 1s. including Catalogue.

"A most attractive little exhibition... The 'Nude' is certainly one of Renoir's supreme achievements." - P. G. Kossoy in The Observer.
"A splendid little show. There is hardly a picture or drawing which does not merit special attention." - The Queen.
"Without borrowing 'en plein air' works it would be difficult to make a collection more truly representative of the artists concerned." - Evening Standard.
"There is hardly anything that is not adequately representative and of thoroughly acceptable quality." - Birmingham Post.
"It is an event of unusual importance to have the opportunity of seeing a magnificent Nude by Renoir and a Claude Monet so perfect as 'The Rain.'" - Westminster Gazette.
"This interesting little collection..." - The Athenæum.
"Collected with discrimination." - The Daily Mail.

AN EXHIBITION OF DECORATIVE PANELS
In Coloured and Inlaid Woods.
February 7th to March 6th.
Open 10 to 6 (including Saturdays).
Admission Free.

MONARRO GROUP (First Exhibition) of Impressionist Paintings at THE GOUILP GALLERY, 5, Regent Street.
1s. 3d. (with Tax). 10.5.30.

NEW ART SALON
160, Shaftesbury Avenue (First Floor)
EXHIBITION OF PAINTINGS by BRACQUE, DERAIN, LUDE, MARCHAND, MODILLIANI, PICASSO, SIGNAC, VLaminck.
Daily 10-6. From 17th February.
THE MODERN SOCIETY OF PORTRAIT PAINTERS
Tenth Exhibition now open at R. I. Galleries, 195, Piccadilly. 10.5.

Meetings

GEOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON

The Anniversay Meeting of this Society will be held at the Society's Apartments, Burlington House, on Friday, February 20, at 3 o'clock.
The Fellows and their Friends will dine together at Stewart's Restaurant, 50, Old Bond Street, W.1, at 7.20 p.m. Tickets (15s. each, inclusive of still wines) to be obtained at the Society's Apartments not later than February 18.

LECTURE ILLUSTRATION by optical lantern undertaken and slides made... - LEVETT, 46, Beechcroft Road, London, S.W.17.

Sales by Auction

VALUABLE FRENCH and ENGLISH BOOKS.
WILL SELL by AUCTION, at their Large Galleries, 34 and 35 New Bond Street, W.1, on Wednesday, February 18, and two following days, at 1 o'clock precisely,

1. VALUABLE PRINTED BOOKS,
the property of C. Gori, Esq., 68, Pall Mall, S.W.; a selected portion of the valuable library removed from Erlestone Park, Wilt's, sold by order of G. Watson Taylor, Esq., and of the Trustees of the will of the late S. Watson Taylor, Esq., books selected from the library at Hamilton Palace, sold by order of the Trustees of the late Duke of Hamilton, and a selection from the library formed by the Right Rev. Bishop Lynden of St. Asaph (1756-1830), and now the property of R. E. Birch, Esq., of St. Asaph.
May be viewed two days prior. Catalogues may be had of the Auctioneers, and of Hugh C. Webster, Esq., Hamilton Estates Office, The Palace, Hamilton.

Booksellers & Catalogues

SECONDHAND BOOKS.
In Preparation—Catalogue 185, Natural Science and Mathematics.
Catalogue 186, Occult, Mysticism, Folk Lore, Orientalia, English and Foreign Literature.
Librarians, Executors, and others desiring of either disposing of or buying Fine, Rare, or Standard Books in all classes of literature are invited to communicate with W. HEFFER & SONS, Limited, Booksellers, Cambridge, Complete Libraries Purchased. Valuations for Probate.

EGYPT, PALESTINE, and the FAR EAST; Travel; Arabian Nights; and Napoleon Era. New Catalogue post free on application.—J. A. ALLEN & CO., 16, Grenville Street, London, W.1.

MILTON FIRST EDITIONS. A FINE COLLECTION.
Paradise Lost, 1667; Paradise Regained, 1671; A Defence of the People of England, 1692; Letters of State, 1694; P. Rupee. Anglo-India Defensive and Salamis Defensive Regli, 1561-2; Epistolarium Familiarum Literarum, 1674; and Cromwell, 1676.
The Seven Volumes of this Interesting and Rare Collection may be seen at L. CHAUNDY OF OXFORD LTD.
2, ALBEMARLE STREET, LONDON, W.1.

BOOKS AND AUTOGRAPHS. CATALOGUES FREE.

HERALDRY.—For Sale, privately (preferably to student or collector), large quantity of Heraldic Material, collected by deceased scholar. May be viewed in London.—Write Box 132, c/o MATHER & CROWTHER, LTD., 10/13, New Bridge Street, E.C.4.

THE OVID PRESS

T. S. ELIOT
RA VOS PREC.
£1 1s. 6d. post free.

WYNDHAM LEWIS
"... among the most powerful things of their kind in contemporary art..." — Good(e). £2 2s. 0d.
250 only of each, a few signed.

H. GAUDIER-BRZEZSKA 1891-1915
20 Drawings. A Few Copies Remain. Now 17s. 6d.

IN MARCH.
THE BLACK COUNTRY. A book of 20 drawings by E. A. WADSWORTH. 12 in colotype, with introduction by ARNOLD BENNETT. £1 1s. 6d.

BELSIZE PARK GARDENS.— N.W.3.
BOOKS FOR INVESTORS

BY

C. R. STILES, F.S.S., F.R.G.S.

PUBLISHED BY

THE FINANCIAL REVIEW OF REVIEWS.

THE SIMPLEX INVESTORS' ACCOUNT BOOK

Price 6s. Net.

- The Simplex Investors' Account Book combines the Maximum of Efficiency with the Minimum of Labour.
- The Simplex Investors' Account Book is a necessity to every private investor who wishes to supervise his investments properly.
- In simplicity of arrangement it is far ahead of anything of its kind ever before published and enables the investor, without the slightest trouble, to watch closely the progress of the securities he holds.

THE SIMPLEX INVESTORS' DIARY

Price 5s. Net.

Size 3½ x 5½, suitable for the pocket.

"For the use of investors nothing more desirable could be devised."—Insurance and Financial Gazette.

The Simplex Investors' Diary contains: A Dictionary of Investment Terms; Investment Yield Table; List of Bank Transfer Days; Articles on Investment and Income Tax; a series of useful Simplified Calculations: a number of Statistical Tables; Foreign Money and Weight Equivalents; Stock Exchange Scale of Commissions; Dividend Dates of Government and Municipal Securities: a complete Postal Guide, together with a ruled Diary for the year.

MODERN METHODS OF INVESTORS' BOOK-KEEPING

Price 6d. Net.

Brevity, simplicity and efficiency in the keeping of private investors' accounts can only be attained by divorcing the methods of accountancy from those practised by the various commercial and industrial undertakings. The method of keeping investment accounts described in this booklet is simple in the extreme.

THE ALPHABET OF INVESTMENT

With an Introductory Note by ELLIS T. POWELL, LL.B., D.Sc.

Author of "The Evolution of the Money Market."

Price 3s. Net.

Demy Octavo.

PRESS OPINIONS.

"Mr. C. R. Stiles has dealt very thoroughly with the question of wealth, capital and investment. . . . Some really valuable advice and instruction to investors is given."—Liverpool Courier.

"It enables the reader to assimilate the maximum of information in the minimum of time—which is no small recommendation nowadays."—The Financial News.

"Mr. Stiles has successfully accomplished the task of elucidating the methods of investment so as to make them comprehensible to the man in the street."—Aberdeen Daily Journal.

"Mr. Stiles' work is useful, not to warn the public of rotten stocks: nothing will do that—but providing safe rules of how to invest and what to expect in reason."—Syrup and Shipping.

SELLING AT A LOSS TO MAKE A PROFIT

Proof of a Paradox

Price 1s. Net.

"Mr. Stiles, an acknowledged expert on finance, combats the view that an investor holding a depreciated security suffers no loss so long as he does not sell. He gives cogent reasons in support of the recommendation to sell holdings which strict examination proves should be sold, and thereby to recover, if possible, money lost in unsatisfactory securities."—Aberdeen Daily Journal

THE FINANCIAL REVIEW OF REVIEWS

6, Grafton Street, New Bond Street, London, W.1.
CRAFTSMEN CRITICS

It used to be said of some primitive people that they lived by taking in each other's washing; and now it is said, by the malicious, that our literary craftsmen live by reviewing each other's books. That is not a whole truth, but it is half true, because most of our young writers have taken over a system long familiar in France and are by way of giving only their leisure or stolen hours to the production of original work. For the rest, in good faith or bad faith, they occupy themselves in writing about what other craftsmen have done in the same or a similar field. There are several reasons for this. One is that neither imaginative nor critical work is well enough paid to provide a whole income for more than a few lucky ones. Another is that, however creative, and however desirous of splendid effort, one cannot be always creating (since the production of original work is more exacting and exhausting than any other kind of activity). And the third is that, just as busmen, on their holidays, used to sit up beside the drivers of other buses on the familiar route, so the craftsman cannot resist the sight of other men's work, and must instinctively approach it in its technical aspect and appraise its performance in the light of his own specialist knowledge. His judgment is not patient and elaborately sympathetic. It may be formed from a single stroke of the brush, or a single sentence. It may be perversely expressed and intolerantly conceived; but it is as rapid as a woman's opinion of another woman, or of her costume. It is as rapid, and as unshakable. And yet it is rarely invalid, for it is technical, and therefore expert, as no considered estimate by the non-practitioner can ever be.

The criticism of the craftsman has its obvious defects. Being so near to the object estimated, it may possibly be deficient in what might be called "horizons," and in those superb generalizations which stagger the mind into acceptance of unfamiliar truth. But the technical attitude is one to which no amateur can attain, and as it is often expressed in the summary phrases which one thinks of as marginalia it is not well represented in the matter of sustained critical works. The craftsman, as I have suggested above, judges quickly, intimately, sometimes capriciously; and his observations are often too casual and fragmentary to produce conviction in the ordinary receptive mind. To other craftsmen his words may give delight, so that these others incline to sneer at the critic who writes from the outside; but to the majority of people, always some years behind the fashion in aesthetic ideals, and to professorial critics (who are a little long-sighted, and who cannot therefore see anything very near to them), the words of the craftsman are arrogant impertinences. It is as though, fussily, he should tell us what to think of his own products. We condemn his egotism, and turn to the comfortable stretchings of men who live in studies and generalize at ease regarding the decadence of contemporary talent. They at least, we feel, estimate original work as of secondary importance to income and good dinners. They at least understand that art must be disciplined by patronage and maintained in all its abnormality, so that it may remain the preoccupation of the few and the sophisticated.

The craftsman is regarded by the general public as mothers are regarded by the hypothetical State: he is to produce the finished article for the general good, and is not to discuss his organism or his rights as an individual. We do not want to hear about them, although we have a furtive interest in his private life, much as we have in the doings of monkeys, or of those of dirty promiscuous little flies. If he has views on his craft not generally held by those who use the results of that craft as a relief from ennui, he becomes intolerable. He finds himself ruffled and displeased by the general attitude to all but the moral and sentimental aspects of his work. The poor craftsman, resentful and contemptuous though he may be, is firmly told in reply that works and not theories are his part in life. He is hustled back into his pinafore, and is set again to his last. The professional aesthetic critic, brought out from his study by all the racket, explains to our contentment that the craftsman has never been a good critic, that he has not read Aristotle, Lessing, or the Schlegels, and that his judgment is essentially fallacious and eccentric. The critic becomes eloquent about catharsis, the unities, selectiveness, the mythopoeic faculty. ... We are soothed; our excitement is assuaged; and the critic returns to his study in pardonable complacency. Once more he has been a priest, standing between the mysteries and the rabble—the doctor (or midwife) standing between the enfeebled, recently delivered mother and her inquisitive visitors. He, knowing the aesthetic theories of all the professional critics who have ever lived, alone has the right to enter the holy of holies and reveal such of the truth as seems good to him.

This struggle embitters the craftsman, who thinks the critic, in his turn, a very conceited person. He demands to know what the critic has ever done to put his accumulated theories into practice; and he is tempted to talk arrogantly of the Incomprehensible Secret, of the Artist's place in the Universe, and of his sacred calling. That is very unwise. In fact, he makes a fool of himself. There is no Incomprehensible Secret at all. The craftsman works at the bidding of his temperament; the critic no less. The craftsman often, in all humility, exaggerates his own practice into a sufficient theory; the critic sometimes is a man and a theorist before he is a critic. Ideally, he is receptive to all varieties of the craft he studies, distinguishing their qualities with impartiality: really, it is impossible for him to avoid reacting—not merely to the work, but to the personality which is, or which he finds, behind the work, and to any disturbance of his preconceptions. The limitation which has debarred him from executive work is a very powerful one, and it has its serious consequences upon his mind. Absence of a creative impulse does not imply a greater receptivity. It sets bounds to that sympathy which often enables the craftsman to appreciate talent which is personally detestable to him. The critic cannot love all men, and he is perhaps less ready than the practising craftsman to understand the work of one who sets his teeth on edge by conceit, or rationalism, or different breeding, or persistence in some unwelcome form or colour-scheme or harmonic idiosyncrasy. Ideally, this should not be so: practically, as it is inevitable, it should be allowed for in all counter-estimates.

Roughly, then, we have the imperfect man practising first and afterwards, in the light of his personal aesthetic experience, criticizing others, or the imperfect man criticizing others in the light of established theories without experience comparable to theirs. I may write about the pangs of birth, and by information gathered from books or narrations plus the use of sympathetic imagination may be able to generalize about mother love; but what I write will never have precise authenticity. The case of the critic is not unlike this. He can watch a craftsman at work, can talk to him, theorize, and believe he understands; but as nobody understands why a perception is transfigured in the execution the critic will always be talking about something of which his imagination is finite. He must always be working back from the finished article, and relating his apprehension of the individual work to his general conceptions of the proper course of art. Often he will interpret magnificently; he may sweep the skies with a grandiloquent mental gesture; he is very necessary as a trained observer who focuses one craft and reveals it in its proper relation to other crafts; but the craftsman who reads his words, however grateful for praise or understanding of his own work, will generally be more conscious of the critic's limitations than of his merit. Towards the critic who is only a critic he will always show the intolerance of the professional to the sophisticated amateur.

The modern habit, however, may change all this. I can think now of some craftsmen who are very erratic appraisers of other people's work; but they are men or women who belong by instinct to an older and less self-conscious generation of English executives, who throw off their work as a sort of game, and without aesthetic delight. They are more concerned with "getting it across" than with any higher attribute of their craft. The real craftsmen-critics of the present day are fashioned otherwise. Their danger lies in the opposite direction; for they are almost too concerned with technical problems, and care less for emotions and ideas than for the frames within which those emotions and ideas are exemplified. On the whole, however, I believe that the probabilities at the moment are in favour of good criticism, because where you have a genuine, if not very passionate, creative impulse, and a higher level of artistic educativeness than England has hitherto known, you are likely to get in the craftsman-critic a very great deal of imaginative understanding. The long essay of interpretation has gone the way of the Victorian giants. If it revives it will have been purged. It will not have the solemn wrongness of an essay by one of our older critics. But that will be because we shall have escaped from moral and biographical judgments, and shall care more for the thing that has been created. Technical criticism may have its defects, but at any rate it is more imaginative, closer to the original work, and more pungent and alive than a biographical survey and the kind of floating appraisal which, as a revelation, is just dead. The more people know about art and craft, and the more they can understand of their essential nature, the greater will be the appreciation of art in England. That is why, in spite of the obvious dangers of a sterile art, the day seems to me rather happily in the hands of the young craftsmen-critics. On the one hand they avoid the banal; on the other, pretentious nonsense. The world would be well rid of these refuges of mediocrity, and anything which hastens their oblivion is bound to be healthy.

Frank Swinnerton.

The appointment of Professor W. P. Ker as Professor of Poetry at Oxford will give delight to many even of those who, like ourselves, desire to see the famous chair given occasionally to a poet. For Professor Ker is a scholar and critic of the first rank. His books on the Dark Ages and on Medieval Literature belong to that rare class of works of scholarship which fascinate the general reader, for they are saturated with a sense of reality.
“RIDICULUS MUS”

WHEN Dr. Grainger exclaimed, “Now, Muse, let’s sing of rats!” Sir Joshua Reynolds and his friends burst into laughter, which was not lessened by the discovery that “rats” was an alteration, honoris causa, from the more alliterative “mice.” Yet rats and mice and such small deer are no laughing matter, as we have had abundantly impressed upon us by statisticians, who juggle with figures and compute losses in millions with the airy detachment of a departmental official. And as the Pope once launched the anathema of the Church against flies, so,—but, let us hope, more effectually, the Government have decided to legislate against rats. Up-to-date methods of destruction are being preached,—mainly consisting, apparently, in the widespread scattering of dangerous poisons; but it is possible that we may get a few hints from the practice of our ancestors, especially in the matter of traps, for, as Topsell truly remarks, “it is as necessary, or rather more necessary for most men to know how to take Mice than how to take Elephants” (though, for the benefit of any whose estates are overrun with elephants, I may mention that they can be bird-limed with glue made from certain fish called Osyrinchii, found in the Caspian). The reverend gentleman goes on to describe a number of different traps, including the two following:

Take two smooth boards about the length of thy arm and in breadth half thy arm, but join it so together that they may be distant from the lower part in length some four fingers or little less, with two small spindles or clefts, which must be at every end one, and fasten Paper under them, and put a piece of paste therein, having cut overthwart in the middle, but you must not fasten it nigh the middle, and let it be so bound that it may easily be lifted up betwixt the spindles, that if by slipping it should be altered, it might be brought again to the same form. But the two spindles spoken of before ought to be joined together in the ends above, and beyond them another small spindle to be made, which may hold in the middle a crooked wedge or butten, upon which the which may be hanged a piece of Hogs skin, so that one of them may easily be turned upside down with the skin, and put thereunto a little piece of earth or stick, that the Mice may easily come to it. So that how many Mice soever shall come thereto, and to the meat, shall be taken, always by bowing the Paper into his wonted place.

There is an excellent piece of workmanship to catch Mice; which I will here set down: Take a piece of wood, the length of both thy fists, one fist broad and two fingers thick, and let there be cut off about some two fingers, a little beyond the middle of half the breadth. And that breadth where it was cut out to be more declining and lower, after the manner of this letter A. And you must put to the side of this a piece of wood, half a circle long, bending, and in the middle part of each side holes pierced through, so that this half circle may be strait, and plainly placed to the foundation of the wood, that the trap being made, it may rest upon the same half circle, and upon this half circle let there be placed iron nails very sharp, so that the instrument by falling down may cover the Irons of the half circle as soon as ever they touch the same.

I cannot say that I have used either of these traps myself, so I shall be interested to hear as to their efficacy from anyone who succeeds in making them from these simple instructions: perhaps it should be pointed out that they are intended to catch “the vulgar little Mouse,” and should be made proportionately larger for rats, which are similar to mice except in size, and in the fact that “their tail is very long and almost naked, void of hair, by reason whereof it is not unworthily counted venomous, for it seemeth to partake with the nature of Serpents.”

Another method of getting rid of mice is to catch one alive, feed it for some time on the flesh of other mice, and then let it loose, when it will kill and eat all the others. A diet of hips might be equally effectual, for “Mice and Wolves, if they taste of the wilde Rose and drink after it, do not only die but also fall into madness and bite their fellows, communicating the quality of the disease to every one they bite.” Incidentally it may be mentioned that “the bitings of Mice are healed by no other means but by green Figs and Garlic being mixed and mingled together, and so anointed thereupon.” Even this might not avail against that ravening beast the Shrew, which is so savage that “from the venomous biting of this Beast we have an English Proverb or Imprecation, I beshrow thee, when we curse or wish harm unto any man, that is, that some such evil as the biting of this Mouse may come unto him.”

Against the evil that they do may be set such facts as that “of the heads of Mice being burned is made that excellent powder for the scouring and cleansing of the teeth, called Tooth-soap," and that a very simple remedy for “the disease called the Rhume, which falleth down and stuffeth the nostrils,” is to kiss the snout of a mouse. They are also occasionally useful as foods—rats being a regular article of diet in a beleaguered city; for instance, “whiles Aniball lay in siege before Casilinum a rat was sold in the towne for two hundred Sesterces: the man who bought it at that price lived, but the partie who sold it for greenedesse of money died for hunger.” The moral of this story is excellent and clear, but one cannot help speculating as to the size of the rat. Even in time of peace the Dormouse is a dainty morsel—"sweet and fat like Swine’s flesh.”

The Dormouse is also morally excellent for the singular piety with which it nourishes its aged parents. For the matter of that, even ordinary mice have a quality “which is denied to many men, namely, to love and to be wise together,” as is shown by the way in which, if one of their number falls into the water, the others form a chain, hanging on to each other’s tail, to rescue him. There was once a mouse that fell into a tub of ale when no friends were by to save him, and was reduced to calling to a passing cat for help. The cat, not being hungry, agreed to save him if he would swear to give himself up when called upon; this he did, but when the cat, some days later, went to his hole, he refused to come out, and on her indignantly saying, “But you swore you would!” he replied, anticipating Omar, “Indeed I swore, but was I sober when I swore it?”

L. F. SAIZMAN.

The little green literary magazine called Voices (monthly, ts. net) begins a new series this month. Henceforward it is to be published by Messrs. Chapman & Hall. One of the great merits of Voices is that it is innocent of any suggestion of episteme; its shortcoming is that it seems to lack a critical programme, so that its contents are often heterogeneous. But every number contains its fair quota of good things. We understand that the prosperity of the magazine is largely due to the self-sacrificing enthusiasm of the editor, Mr. Thomas Monk, to whom we wish every success in his gallant enterprise.
REVIEWS

MR. DOUGHTY’S POETRY

MANSOUL; OR, THE RIDDLE OF THE WORLD. By Charles M. Doughty. (Selwyn & Blount. 7s. 6d. net.)

M. Doughty, whose poem is more than a little disconcerting, makes quite clear to us one at least of his aims in writing it. He is, he says on the opening page of “Mansoul,” one of “Colin’s crew”; and in the final vision of the poem, in which he sees two youths celebrating Chaucer and Spenser, he declares his intention in these unmistakable words:

Chanted his fare an hymn, when this had ceased,
Of Heavenly Beauty: with soft warbling voice.
(How I admired the turning of each verse!)
Of Edmund, my lodestar, the ditty was:
(Whose Art is mine endeavour to restore.)
English poetry degenerated, but a good way
As lavrock doth, which lifted up of Love
In spires exultoth in the Element;
Devoid of all offence of grounding flesh.

The description of Spenser’s achievement in the last four lines is important because Mr. Doughty’s poetic style is in many respects un-Spensarian to an extreme. He makes use, it is true, of many Spenserian words; but the use he makes of them is singular. For instance the word “fere” (companion), which is in the passage we have quoted, occurs, we believe, but four times in the whole of Spenser’s works. In “Mansoul” it appears at least a dozen times. Mr. Doughty is, therefore, deliberately archaizing.

That is the first great difference between Mr. Doughty and his exemplar. Spenser was not in the least an archaist; on the contrary, he was one of the boldest of poetical innovators, in language and in rhythm. His work is strewn with words which he invented and attempted to acclimatize. Mr. Doughty, on the other hand, would have us back not merely to Spenser, after whom, he considers, English poetry degenerated, but a good way beyond Chaucer. He employs Anglo-Saxon alliteration freely: “His fingers formed First fathers of the World; and breath of life, In their clay breasts he breathed.” His language is, in the main, Anglo-Saxon, and though he evidently admires Spenser’s melody, he is generally at some pains not to admit it into his own poetry. The general result is that Mr. Doughty is a good deal more difficult for a modern to read than any part of Spenser. Spenser is limpid, Mr. Doughty (except in certain passages which shall be discussed hereafter) decidedly obscure. He wages a war of extermination against the article, and is quite ruthless in his inversions of the verb.

This obscurity is purely linguistic; once the barrier of archaism is pierced, the sense is plain, and indeed the contrast between the elaborate castellations and the unadorned straightforwardness of the interior is a little curious. In seeking an explanation of this, Mr. Doughty’s conception of Spenser’s genius as a purity undefiled by Chaucer’s grossness— “Yet sooth to say, not all commendable is, That Geoffrey writ: too oft he speaketh full large”—may help a little, and another gleam is shed by his dismissal of Spenser’s successors as lacking “fullness of Vision and diviner’s art.” Evidently, to Mr. Doughty, the substance of poetry is pure and simple, a cool white light rather than a stained radiance. There is a sense, we believe, in which this is true, but it is a sense different from Mr. Doughty’s. The quality he seems to desiderate is the final achievement and not the preliminary condition of poetry; an ultimate lucidity is born of the intensity of the poet’s contemplation of a material which is by no means pure and stainless. It is impossible to submit experience to a preliminary process of sterilization before the poetic spirit works upon it—impossible, that is, if the final achievement is to have the lucidity which is permanently significant.

We suspect that Mr. Doughty’s lucidity is not of this high order. Our suspicion is not based on these opinions of his, but is merely confirmed by them. When we try to look deeper into the structure and the argument of “Mansoul,” we are baffled by the sense that there are no depths. There are fine episodes, but each is a thing apart, strengthening no echoes of what went before and itself awakening no reverberations. This feeling of an underlying jeuness may be due in part to a half-conscious process of the compulsion of the comparison is unavoidable. For Mr. Doughty takes Mansoul into the underworld to confront him with the wise men of the past, from whom he may seek an answer to the riddle of life. Such an apparatus must inevitably put us in mind of the terrific uses to which it has been turned by some of the great poets of the world, and we cannot help being sensible of an alarming shrinkage in the scope of the modern poet’s vision. By the aid of Merlin’s glass Mansoul may see a more exact historical pageant than any of Mr. Doughty’s predecessors, but it is a pageant curiously deficient in the quality of awe, perhaps even of elementary proportion. For breadth of vision seems to have reduced almost to the ridiculous condition of a squint when Kaiser Wilhelm is envisaged as the arch-villain of the drama of the ages:

A mountebank felon, crowned, was their High Captain; Worm I arrogating style, to his mad self; Of Deputy Ruler of Gods Universe. Frown of whose Tamerlanish countenance; He deemed, as he struts forth, should quell the World. Worlds crimes for this long had cherished he rugged close. While-ere, fond childhoods whisper, in false breast; Dark fantasy inflaming his presumptuous youth; And working ever since, in his recantant thought.

There is, we suppose, no reason why patriotism of the more intense and exclusive kind should not inspire high poetry; but an emotion of this kind must be isolated. Unless it can be given the ideal scope of Virgil’s glorification of the Roman imperium or Wordsworth’s vindication of England, it is utterly discordant in a poem which professes to ponder the destinies of humanity.

In short, Mr. Doughty’s epic, considered as an epic with a challenging title, suffers from an essential vacuity. The high argument is never convincing. Instead of feeling, as we are told Minimus, the actual narrator, felt, that we ourselves are vitally involved in Mansoul’s sublime quest, we are too often conscious of him as a vague unimportant, who questions rather shadowy impersonators of great men and receives the monotonous answer “Be good.” From so, it we ourselves know of them, they had something more arresting to say. This is, we admit, a somewhat extreme view of the fundamentals of Mr. Doughty’s poem, and we do not deny that Mansoul’s encounters with the shades often have a different dignity; but the fact that a slightly comic vision of them is sometimes not only possible to have, but impossible to escape, is fatal to the success of the poet’s main intention.

So much for Mr. Doughty’s failure; now for his achievement. That passionate love of England which on the epic plane so desperately distorts the structure of his poem, on the narrative plane inspires passages of pure and lucid beauty, where the deliberate assignment of himself to Spenser has helped materially the miracle.

Firstly, Mr. Doughty’s language becomes clear; an exquisite fitness descends upon it. From rugged and harsh it changes to musical in despite of the author’s impossible punctuation. All his arduous archaizing, which elsewhere attains so spasmodically to success, here has a deep appropriateness, for Latinities have added nothing to the power of our language for natural description. The style and the matter are beautifully conghous:

And having slaked thereat mine eager thirst;
I slumbered till a turtles' gentle dowl.
That feared not yet Mans shape; folding from flight
Their rattling wings; lighted on vermil feet;
 Jetting, with mingling peace, their slumbering;
 With crooning throat-bole; voice of peace and rest;
All round about me, at that their drinking-place.
Thence faring upward, towards that waters' source;
Which, full of sunbeams, gurgles from hid grot,
In ivy-embovd mossy steep above:
And oft sunk up, reneweth as oft her course;
In channels clear; surging from gilded sand;
I stayed, where want grasy holms impart;
Those streaming waters, bordered all along;
With daphne and willow herb, sweet sedge, laughing robin;
With woodland garlanded and sweet eglantine,
And azureb blue hyacinth;—doubly shallow
Forget-me-nots lift our frail thoughts to heaven.
Broods o'er those thorny eyots drowsey hum.
Bourdon of glistening bees, in mails of gold.
Labouring from sweet to sweet, in the long hours
Of sunny heat; they sound their shrill small clarions.
And hurl by booming dors, gross bee-fly kin;
(Broad girded, diverse howed, in their long pets.)
That solitaire, whose weary light endures,
In Summer skies, each becking clover-tuft haunt.

Mr. Doughty has not one but many passages of this authentic beauty. Power, ease, mastery, the ability to strike the note unerringly—these are his whenever he turns to describe and celebrate the nature in which he delights. In this he may truly claim to be one of "Colin's crew."

And here too, we think, Mr. Doughty fulfils his own Spenserian ideal. He also seems to be "lifted up of love," and certainly he is "devout of all offence of groundless feele." There is a white, austere in his vision of nature, an incisive outline in his pictures of flowers and creatures of the earth, which marks the closeness of his community with the Spenser who wrote:

And each one had a little wicker basket
In which they gathered flowers to fill their basket.
And with five fingers crept fully feathery
The tender stalks on by.
Of every sort, which in that Meadow grew,
They gathered some; the Violet, palfid blew,
The little Daisyl, that at evening closes,
The Virgin Lillie, and the Primrose tow,
With store of vermil Roses,
To deck their Bridgromes posies ...

On this side Mr. Doughty is a true poet sprung of a great line. He is with Spenser as Mr. Hardy is with Shakespeare; with Shelley as Mr. Hardy is with Keats. But on the philosophic side, in respect of that authentic quality of great poetry which Arnold called "criticism of life" and which we call "comprehension," he fails woefully short both of his own ancestors and of Mr. Hardy and his. It might be tempting to trace the deficiency to an appreciation of Spenser that is, in our judgment, as partial as it is passionate; but that is not the order of things. Some essential faculty for truly comprehensive experience has been omitted from Mr. Doughty's composition, and the bias of his mentality has led him to a profound, but exclusive and biased passion for his master. Describing too much of life, he has conceived of too much as non-existent, with the result that "Mansoul" is far from being, as it should be, and as we believe it was courageously intended to be, co-extensive with the soul of man.

J. M. M.

On Tuesday next at 3 o'clock Professor Ernest Wilson begins a course of two lectures at the Royal Institution on "Magnetic Susceptibility"; on Thursday, the 19th, Mr. A. H. Smith delivers the first of two lectures on "Ancient Greek and Roman Life"; and on Saturday, the 21st, Sir J. J. Thomson begins a course of six lectures on "Positive Rays." The Friday evening discourse on February 20 will be delivered by Dr. E. J. Russell on "British Crop Production.

PSYCHO-ANALYSIS AND THE SAVAGE

TOTEM AND TABOO: REMEMBRANCES BETWEEN THE PSYCHIC LIVES OF SAVAGES AND NEUROTICS. By Sigmund Freud. Translated by A. A. Brill. (Routledge. 10s. 6d. net.)

THE ordinary Englishman, if his traducers are to be believed, has no use for a theory until it obviously pays. Be this as it may, psycho-analysis as a branch of medicine is now generally acknowledged in this country to be productive of good results; and with the psycho-analytic method the name of Freud is permanently associated. Great pioneer as he is, however, he cannot be supposed to have once for all demonstrated the principles on which the fortunate experiments of himself and others with neurotic patients have hitherto been carried out. The explanation of the psycho-analytic therapeutics is still in the making; and no one could show himself more ready than does Professor Freud himself to recognize this, his investigations being conducted throughout in the spirit of the strictest science. The present work may be regarded as a tentative device by him in order to verify his provisional assumptions by reference to a fresh region of experience. If the laws that seem to hold good in the case of those afflicted by hysteria or by shell-shock are not impugned, but, on the contrary, corroborated, when we pass clean beyond the sphere of the pathological, and study perfectly healthy and normal, if uncivilized human beings, then the proof is advanced as it were by a whole stage. Incidentally, an independent body of workers is consulted, and the effects of such bias as all specialization of training and of the direction of interest must involve are to a corresponding extent eliminated.

The main contentions of the psycho-analytic school of thought may be briefly and untechnically stated as follows. We possess a number of inherited impulses which the conditions of life do not allow us to satisfy impartially, so that there is conflict between them and some are suppressed. Though suppressed, however, these remain latent in the mind, and, so far as the supreme controlling power fails to act, are subject as it were to leakage. Such leakage relieves the tension, and is thus in itself pleasant. But, from the standpoint of the controlling will, which legislates for the whole man, the surreptitious impulse is an escaped criminal. The latter must at least conform outwardly to standards of respectability if he is to be tolerated. Meanwhile, the psycho-analysts form a detective force whose business is to discover the wicked desires and motives behind all those disguises; it being hoped—and from a practical point of view this is the crux of the matter—that such discovery will lead to the removal of the pest. Now certain situations are specially apt to occasion conflict in the depths of our being. Our emotional attitudes towards them is, in Freudian language, ambivalent. We desire and reject, love and hate, at once; though, as such a self-contradictory mood is unbearable, one of the contrasted feelings has to go under and, if we can manage it, stay under altogether. It may easily give us the slip, however, by adopting the mask of a virtue. In that case we indulge in it and are so far vicious without knowing it—vices, that is, from the standpoint of the conscious policy whereby we seek to satisfy our nature as a whole.

Now the savage, like the child, and like the hysterical patient, is easily seen to be relatively deficient in self-control; so that emotional leakages are likely to occur in the case of the individual, and likewise to display their effects in the social life. On the other hand, if savage human nature is weak as regards its inner system of controls, it makes up for it by submitting to a formidable mechanism of external restraints. Custom is king, say tyrant. Moreover, custom abounds in negative prescriptions. Taboo, nearly, the rule "Thou shalt not, because thou shalt not," invades every corner of private and public life. Meanwhile, such conscious policy as directs affairs is at best purblind, tradition, like a pediatric schoolmaster, insisting needlessly on trilles. "No wonder that "nature will not"—that the injured feelings find a vent, the bad ones being reinforced by many that are good or at least indifferent.

Let us consider, for example, the taboos connected with burial and mourning. The convention is that the dead must be mourned; that the removal of a member of the group must be treated as a loss, even if it be notorious that the deceased was a detrimental. Dislike for the dead being barred as such, can it not discharge itself by some secret channel? Consequently men are led to think of the dead as hateful, as vampires that persecute the living; so that it becomes positively meritorious to hate them. The psychological process involved is that one that Freud would term "displacement by projection," our own feelings being reflected by the object which the phantasy creates. It is a step further if we follow him in his attempt to find the ultimate ground of this ambiguous attitude towards the dead in his so-called "father-complex," according to which father and son are in one aspect of their relation enemies because rivals.

Or, again, we may take the case of the taboos bearing on kingship. Without going far below the surface, we can discover hidden motives why the king should be envied and therefore hated, even while the duty of honouring him as a great man dominates the field of attention. So the primitive king plays the great man at a certain cost of personal comfort. Society sees to that, thereby working off its spite more or less unawares on the object of its ambivalent affections. The Timnes of Sierra Leone according to Sir James Frazer, administers a beating to their elected king on the evening of his coronation. Thus are the seats of the mighty rendered uneasy, literally or metaphorically, throughout the savage world.

Other classes of taboos which this book discusses must be passed over, in order to leave room for some consideration of Freud's crucial instance, namely, the incest-taboo, as embodied in the institution of exogamy and in those curious aversions which obtain among relatives by blood or marriage. Exogamy is treated by Freud in connection with totemism, though he is well aware that many authorities believe the two, even if usually found together, to be in no wise causally connected. The study of certain animal phobias displayed by neurotics leads him to suppose that the totem is the surrogate or substituted equivalent for the father who is the rival for the mother's love. The incest-prohibition is enforced, but the surrogate is sacrificed by way of vicarious vengeance. On the other hand, such a discharge of wicked hate provokes remorse, and this in turn reinforces the incest-feeling, so as henceforth to put group-sisters on the same plane of sacredness as group-mothers. The merits and defects of the theory are to be appreciated only by a careful study of its details. If it appear fantastic, this is perhaps due not so much to the psychological handling, which is masterly throughout, as to the attempt to affiliate it to Atkinson's imaginary picture of the sire of the horde who kicked out his sons at pairing time until at last he succumbed to their combined attack—a "just-so story" which is no better and no worse than many a savage myth on the same subject.

Apart from the particular solutions which it offers, the book will be valuable to the anthropologist as providing him with a new method, or one variant, with an improved method, of analysing those emotional attitudes of the savage which have been long known to involve a dualism—a pivoting, as it were, between impulses that pull opposite ways. On the other hand, whether Freud's application of the notion of infantilism to the savage can be accepted is highly doubtful, more especially where it is mainly a question of comparing the manifestations of the sex-impulse in the very young. The savage may be like a child in some respects, but he is in no sense sexually immature. Hence the analogy—and the so-called recapitulation theory at best provides an analogy—breaks down completely just at the point at which it is needed most. For, stripped of its implications concerning sex, as embodied in the doctrine of the Oedipus complex and so on, the Freudian interpretation leaves anthropology very much where it was before, as regards the ultimate origins of exogamy, totemism and so forth—namely, in the dark. Meanwhile, the psycho-analytic method stands, whether its present results are fully acceptable or not; and, as handled here by a master, can be studied fruitfully by all, whatever value they may attach to the conclusions actually reached.

R. R. M.

OLD HOLLAND

HENRY FOX, FIRST LORD HOLLAND. By the Earl of Ilchester. 2 vols. (Murray. 32s. net.)

FEW politicians have left a more sinister reputation behind them than Henry Fox. In his last years the Livery of the City of London denounced him as "the public detour of unaccounted millions," and though their case fell through from lack of evidence, the slur remained. Just after his death the gentle Gray drew on the recollection of a visit to Kingsgate, Fox's group of architectural monstrosities near Margate, and penned the bitter lampoon beginning:

Old, and abandon'd by each venial friend,
Here Holland formed the pious resolution
To smuggle a few years, and strive to mend
A broken character and constitution.

Castlereagh, it may be, was more actively odious when he died, but subsequent research has gone far to rehabilitate Castlereagh's memory, as regards his management of foreign affairs, at any rate. The dust of depreciation has remained undisturbed on Fox's grave, except for the half-hearted flick of Macaulay'sbroom. "He was," wrote the essayist in 1844, "the most unpopular of the statesmen of his time, not because he sinned more than any of them, but because he canted less." And even with that qualification, Macaulay concluded that: "as a public man he has no title to esteem."

Lord Ilchester has far too keen a sense of historical justice to attempt to whitewash this grimy figure. He makes fairly enough such points as can be made, and on one important point he conclusively acquires Henry Fox. He was not, despite John Wilkes and Alderman Beckford, a public defaulter. "He had nowhere exceeded his rights. The morality of his manipulation of the Pay Office funds can be called in question, but not the legality." He was, in short, what we should call nowadays a war profiteer, made additionally obnoxious because he had executed his own and Lord Bute's vengeance on the Duke of Newcastle by a proscription which, in Macaulay's picturesque phrase, "extended to tide-waiters, to gaugers, to doorkeepers." But even if the outcry against Fox was exaggerated, Macaulay's verdict holds good; he has no title to esteem as a public man. His career may remind some of Fanny Burney's deterioration in fiction from a merry limpidity to the vilest Johnsonese. It may remind others of the decline of Millais from the painter of Ophelia to the facile pot-boiler. At all events, he is a study in degeneration, a degeneration not to be excused by advancing years or indigent circumstances. He merged, so well, one of Walpole's young men, remaining faithful to his chief after his fall, unlike Bubb Dodington and others whose baseness he eagerly resented. Under the Pelhams he acquired the reputation of a first-class debater (with good temper as a valuable asset) who, as was afterwards said of Peel, could play on the House of Commons like an old fiddle. Then he began to go wrong, and Lord Ilchester has every excuse for hesitating to indicate the precise turning-point. Fox clearly tricked Pitt during the whirl of intrigue that followed Henry Pelham's death, but apart from incompatibility of character, could the pair have acted together to any purpose? They would have had to find a Duke, and though honest mediocrity was available in his Grace of Devonshire, whose resemblance to his more famous successor is so close as to be laughable, they had ultimately to take service under the Duke of Newcastle, the Mazarin of English history.

Pitt, secure in his mastery of foreign and war policy, could use Newcastle pretty much as he pleased, but Fox could not. He had first to act under the Duke as a distrusted and circumscribed henchman, leading the House without authority, and with no voice in that "tickling of the palm" which he so well understood, and next to accept the Paymastership, which meant the end of all his political ambitions. Giving the conditions of eighteenth-century politics, a man of Fox's origin could not hope for independence. Though he eloped with a Duke's daughter, the aristocracy never accepted him as an equal. He was to them "the footman's son"—a gross libel, since his father, old Stephen, had begun life as a page, a different matter altogether—exactly as Canning was afterwards "the actress's son." And so Fox had always to be somebody's "man," first the Duke of Cumberland's, then Newcastle's, then Bute's. No wonder that honourable hopes died within him, and he was content to be idle and grow rich. He might have ended much as St. Alwyn, Goschen and other superintended statesmen has faded out in our time, if Bute had not pitched on him to push through the House a peace which, though reasonable in itself, was unpopular through the glamour of Pitt's influence. Fox brought to the task an efficiency in corruption acquired in the school of Walpole and Old Scrope, combined with a vindictiveness peculiar to himself. There must, as Lord Ilchester remarks, have been a vein of latent cruelty in his composition. Retribution, at any rate, came swiftly upon him in the shape of a bare peering when he had hoped for a Viscountship with, perchance, the Privy Seal as well, and a retirement spent in whin-pairings for an ardent, snears at his enemies, before whom he certainly did not qual, and lamentations over the ingratitude of his associates. To quote Gray one more:

"Ah," said the sighing peer, "had Bute been true.
Nor Mungo's, Rigby's, Bradshaw's friendship vain!"

Only, from the correspondence published by Lord Ilchester, it is clear that for "Mungo" we should read Calcraft, and for "Bradshaw," Shelburne. But stet Rigby. His parting was characteristically brutal. "You tell your story of Shelburne; he has a damned one to tell of you; I do not trouble myself which is the truth." And on he drove.

Holland's groans over the deserters came from his heart. He was a genuinely affectionate man, lavish both with his feelings and his purse. Early in life he offered to hand over half his salary as Secretary-at-War to his brother, Lord Ilchester. The answer was a grateful refusal, and, "Whatever you do save, for God's sake, save it for your children." In the heyday of his wealth he lent money right and left, amongst others to George Selwyn and Edmund Burke, and though the loans were on a four per cent. basis, he seldom troubled about the interest. He reminds one in his open-handedness rather of the Fouquet of Dumas "Vicomte de Bragelonne," a character drawn with close fidelity to history. What is more, Henry Fox had the merit of gathering round him an uncommonly interesting circle of intimates. Among his earlier allies were Lord Hervey, Henry Pelham, Hanbury-Williams, Winnington and Horace Walpole. Lord Ilchester is too much inclined to take our knowledge of these men for granted. It would have been worth while, for example, to distinguish the real Lord Hervey, ill-conditioned creature though he was, from Pope's "Sporus."

And he himself one vile antithesis.

Winnington, by all accounts, was a charming fellow, and Horace Walpole considered him as marked out to be Prime Minister of England. For Hanbury-Williams we have to go far afield to Archdeacon Cox's "History of Monmouthshire." Yet he was a curious combination of wit, free-thinker, diplomatist and writer of excellent light verse. His political squibs are fairly familiar through quotation, but equally pointed are such social skits as the Ode to Henry Fox, containing a once famous attack on the "Milesian race."

"Nature, indeed, denies them sense,
But gives them legs and impudence
That beats all understanding."

If, however, Lord Ilchester has somewhat neglected Fox's earlier friends, there was no call for him to say much about George Selwyn, Gilly Williams, as it would appear, and—until the fatal breach—Rigby and Lord Shelburne. We get a not unexpected glimpse of Rigby drinking till two in the morning. Lady Hervey, who was long-lived, seems to run through the whole story; but the eccentric Lady Mary Coke, who might have been expected to make an appearance, does not do so. With her home at what is now called Aubrey House, she was a near neighbour of the Hollands, who gave her some land to round off the little estate on which the shrubs were pulled up by malevolent raiders, and the ducks mysteriously died.?

Kind-hearted man though he was, there was a good deal of the arrisvite about Henry Fox. He ostentatiously patronized art, but it would seem that the evidence of his dealings with Reynolds, Hogarth, Allan Ramsay and other painters has vanished. Hogarth may have taken his portrait twice, since, besides the picture at Holland House, an apparent replica in the possession of Mr. Samuel Ireland was fetched from Hayley's in 1782. In addition to a talent for art, Fox cultivated gardening to a good purpose, with the help of Kent and Charles Hamilton; but his building, as illustrated by Pouncey's quaint view of Kingsgate, vied in atrocity with Sir Francis Dashwood's experiments at West Wycombe. The general tone of Holland House had the profitter's note in it, and "money no object" was written over it all. The parents, or at least the father, deliberately spoiled the children, with the result of dire unhappiness as death drew near them. Lady Holland saw farther ahead than her ppo curante husband, and the sincerity of her warnings comes as a welcome relief to the artificiality of much eighteenth-century correspondence. It is not that one meets there a phrase as "You have already among you had almost our all." Lady Holland, unfortunately, does not seem to have exercised much influence, and the fascinating group danced away to its fate. But what wonderful creatures they are! Lady Sarah Lennox (Lady Holland's sister), having missed a king, leaves her husband for a lover, taking her infant daughter with her. Lady Susan Strangways (Lord Holland's niece) runs away with a handsome actor after a serious attack on Charles's heart. Then there is Charles—but it is needless, after Sir George Frevleyan, to say anything about him—and Stephen; but beyond that he had a virtuosity in the heart of going to the devil it is difficult to say much about Ste. Malalit's maladies, they are not unlike the characters in Mr. Maltby's bright comedy "The Rotters," but with the important difference that they never made the smallest attempt to keep up appearances.

J. S.
THE NAKED MAN

WILLIAM BLAKE THE MAN. By Charles Gardner. (Dent, 10s. 6d net.)

This book is not well written, and it is not a complete success in the attempt implied by the title. It is a readable short biography, not a critique; it is an honest, and not, indeed, a useless book. There is very little to which exception need be taken, and at least it does not set us on the wrong tack. We are not led to believe that Blake was abnormal or hallucinated; we are not encouraged to take too seriously the fact that the infant Blake saw angels in the foliage of Peckham Rye, or to believe that his method of composition was automatic writing. We are left unsatisfied; the book displays no profound analytic ability. But it allows the important fact to appear: that Blake's mind was a perfectly sane mind of abnormal intensity and strong passions, occupied with intelligible objects, and appearing under peculiar conditions, and conditions in some ways peculiarly favourable.

The conception of Blake extracted from Mr. Gardner's book or from any tolerable biography is confirmed by re-reading Blake's poems from beginning to end. If one follows Blake's mind through the several stages of his poetic development it is impossible to regard him as a naif, a wild man, a wild pet for the supercultivated. The strangeness is evaporated, the peculiarity is seen to be the peculiarity of all great poetry: something which is found (not everywhere) in Homer and Aeschylus and Dante and Villon, and profound and concealed in the work of Shakespeare—and also in another form in Montaigne and in Spinoza. It is merely a peculiar honesty, which, in a world too frightened to be honest, is peculiarly terrifying. It is an honesty which the whole world conspires against, because it is unpleasant. Blake's poetry has the unpleasantness of great poetry. Nothing that can be called morbid or abnormal or perversive, none of the things which exemplify the sickness of an epoch or a fashion, have this quality; only those things which, by some extraordinary labour of simplification, exhibit the essential sickness or strength of the human soul. And this honesty never exists without great technical accomplishment. The question about Blake the man is the question of the circumstances that concurred to permit this honesty in his work, and what circumstances define its limitations. The favouring conditions probably include these two: that being early apprenticed to a manual occupation, he was not compelled to acquire any other education in literature than he wanted or to acquire it for any other reason than that he wanted it; and that being a humble engraver, he had no journalistic-social career open to him.

There was, that is to say, nothing to distract him from his interests or to corrupt these interests: neither the ambitions of parents or wife, nor the standards of society, nor the temptations of success; nor was he exposed to imitation of himself or of anyone else. These circumstances—not his supposed inspired and untought spontaneity—are what make him innocent. His early poems show what the poems of a boy of genius ought to show, immense power of assimilation. Such early poems are not, as usually supposed, crude attempts to do something beyond the boy's capacity; they are, in the case of a boy of real promise, more likely to be quite mature and successful attempts to do something small. So with Blake, his early poems are technically admirable, and their originality is in an occasional rhythm. The verse of "Edward III," deserves study. But his affection for certain Elizabethans is not so surprising as his affinity with the very best work of his own century. He is very like Collins, he is very eighteenth-century. The poem "Whether on Ida's shady brow" is eighteenth-century work; the movement, the weight of it, the syntax, the choice of words—

The languid strings do scarcely move.
The sound is forc'd, the notes are few!

this is contemporary with Grey and Collins, it is the poetry of a language which has undergone the discipline of prose; it is not remote from Landor. Blake up to twenty is decidedly a traditional.

Blake's beginnings as a poet, then, are as normal as the beginnings of Shakespeare. His method of composition, in his mature work, is exactly like that of other poets. He has an idea (a feeling, an image), he develops it by accretion or expansion, alters his verse often, and hesitates often over the final choice. The idea, of course, simply comes, but upon arrival it is subjected to prolonged manipulation. In the first phase Blake is concerned with verbal beauty; in the second he becomes the apparent naif, really the mature intelligence. It is only when the ideas become more automatic, come more freely and are less manipulated that we begin to suspect their origin, to suspect that they spring from a shallower source.

The Songs of Innocence and of Experience, and the poems from the Rossetti manuscript, are the poems of a man with a profound interest in human emotions, and a profound knowledge of them. The emotions are presented in an extremely simplified, abstract form. This form is one illustration of the eternal struggle of art against education, of the literary artist against the continuous deterioration of language.

It is important that the artist should be highly educated in his own art; but his education is one that is hindered rather than helped by the ordinary processes of society which constitute education for the ordinary man. For these processes consist largely in the acquisition of impersonal ideas which obscure what we really are and feel, what we really want, and what really excites our interest. It is of course not the actual information acquired, but the conformity which the accumulation of knowledge is apt to impose, that is harmful. Tennyson is a very fair example of a poet almost wholly encrusted with parasitic opinion, almost wholly merged into his environment. Blake, on the other hand, knew what interested him, and he therefore presents only the essential, only, in fact, what can be presented, and need not be explained. And because he was not distracted, or frightened, or occupied in anything but exact statement, he understood. He was naked, and saw man naked, and from the centre of his own crystal. To him there was no more reason why Swedenborg should be absurd than Locke. He accepted Swedenborg, and eventually rejected him, for reasons of his own. He approached everything with a mind unclouded by current opinions. There was nothing of the superior person about him. This makes him terrifying.

But if there was nothing to distract him from sincerity there were, on the other hand, the dangers to which the naked man is exposed. His philosophies, like his visions, like his insight, like his technique, were his own. And accordingly he was inclined to address more importance to it than an artist should; this is what makes him eccentric, and makes him inclined to formlessness.

But most through midnight streets I hear
How the youthful harlot's curse
Blasts the new-born infant's tear,
And blights with plagues the marriage hearse,

is the naked vision;

Love seeketh only self to please,
To bind another to its delight,
Joys in another's loss of ease,
And builds a Hell in Heaven's despite.
is the naked observation; and "The Marriage of Heaven and Hell" is naked philosophy, presented. But Blake's occasional marriages of poetry and philosophy are not so felicitous.

He who would do good to another must do it in Minute Particulars. General Good is the plea of the soundest, hypocrite, and flatterer: For Art and Science cannot exist but in minutely organised particulars.

One feels that the form is not well chosen. The borrowed philosophy of Dante and Lucretius is perhaps not so interesting, but it injures their form less. Blake did not have that more Mediterranean gift of form which knows how to borrow as Dante borrowed his theory of the soul; he must needs create a philosophy as well as a poetry. A similar formlessness attacks his draughtsmanship. The fault is most evident, of course, in the longer poems—or rather, the poems in which structure is important. You cannot create a very large poem without introducing a more impersonal point of view, or splitting it up into various personalities. But the weakness of the long poems is certainly not that they are too visionary, too remote from the world. It is that Blake did not see enough, became too much occupied with ideas. But even these poems evince an intelligence more powerful, in its way, than that of, let us say, either Tennyson or Browning.

T. S. E.

FROM THE FRENCH

FLEURS-DÉ-LYS: A BOOK OF FRENCH POETRY. Freely translated into English Verse by Wilfrid Thorley. (Heinemann. 8s. net.)

THERE are certain subjects which the reviewer cannot approach with too much caution. To express a definite opinion on questions of metre, philology, bibliophily or, finally, translation is to run into the dangers that await the mountaineer on a sun-warmed slope of snow: a single step too decisively taken may bring down a whole enormous avalanche. Over the apparently firm surface of these subjects one must walk delicately, non-committally, for fear of the controversies. For it may be laid down as a literary law that the impetus, the weight and the duration of a controversy increase in inverse ratio to the actuality and immediate importance of the subject under discussion. No man will lightly and recklessly let loose those evil passions which a controversy on the spelling of Virgil’s name, on the trochee in English versification, on the derivation of place-names or the translation of classical poetry infallibly unchains. It is, therefore, with modesty and in a tentative, unemphatic way that we venture to comment on Mr. Thorley’s theory and practice of translation.

Plainly formulated in the introduction to the present volume, this is his theory:

The real task of a translator is that of re-creating, and unless he can bring to his original as much as he takes from it, he had better leave it alone. To a strict scholar this definition of translation may appear to be just what translation is not; but though the makers of mere cribs have their uses, they are not such as concern permanent literature, nor do they help us at all to a relish of its savour.

Turning now to practice, we naturally put the question provoked by the foregoing statement of theory: What does Mr. Thorley bring with him to his task? and, more generally, What ought a translator to bring? Clearly, then, he ought to bring not only a sense of verse, a power of self-expression, but also, if, like Mr. Thorley, he undertakes to translate the poetry of different epochs, a sense of history, of the profound difference between individuals and ages. Mr. Thorley brings with him a considerable measure of both these faculties. He has not brought quite enough to save him from occasional failures. His successes—and there are many of them—are remarkable. Here, for example, is his version of Ronsard’s

"Quand vous serez bien vieille, au soir, à la chandelle":

When thou art old and bye the fire alone

Bent o’er the candle thou dost twirl the skeine,

Then shalt thou query with bewildered eyes

How Ronsard sung thy loveliness long gone.

Then if thy servant hear my lover’s moan

Though toil doth drowse her, yet at that sweet strain

She shall arise to honour thy dead swain,

And give thy name immortal mention.

I shall be buried and long turned to clay

Under dark myrtle-trees whereby I rest;

Whyte thou beside the hearth with shrunken breast

Bwiffet the love that thou didst spurn away?

Then hearken now to thy true love’s behest:

Gather the roses of thy lyfe to-day.

He has, in these lines, admirably caught that easy, melodious eloquence of which the Renaissance was so lavish. It would be possible to cite plenty of instances in Mr. Thorley’s volume where his power of expression and historical sense have come together to produce a completely adequate rendering. Where he fails, the failure—so it seems to us—is due to some default in the sense of history; a failure to perceive, or at least to render, the specific quality which distinguishes one artist from another.

We will take as an example the translation of Théophile Gautier’s “Terza Rima.” The following nine lines of Gautier—

Frère, voilà pourquoi les poètes, souvent,
Buttent à chaque pas sur les chemins du monde:
Les yeux fichés au ciel, ils s’en vont en rêvant.
Les anges, secoutant leur chevelure blonde,
Penchent leur front romantique et leur tendant les bras,
Et les veulent baiser avec leur bouche rose.
Eux marchent au hasard et font mille faux pas;
Ils cognent les passants, se jettant sous les roues,
On tombe dans les puits qu’ils n’aperçoivent pas—are rendered thus by Mr. Thorley:

Brother, behold why poets suffer sore,
With feet that falter on the world’s hard road:
For ever on high heaven do they pore.
And angels shaking their gold locks abroad,
Lean over them with sheltering arms held wide
And round mouths ready with a kiss from God.
They follow random ways with random stride,
Bruised by the wheels of fellow farers’ irce.
Or fallen on pitfalls by them unspied them.

Here Mr. Thorley has brought with him a facile sweetness of his own, has imbibed Gautier in the syrup and pulled him out transformed into a very passable English equivalent of Lamartine. We grant that it is impossible to translate literally: “Eux marchent au hasard et font mille faux pas.” At the same time it is necessary to find in English an adequate equivalent. “They follow random ways with random stride” has a vague, “poetic” quality which utterly fails to express the directness of Gautier, the simplicity which is the result of perfect technical achievement. Mr. Thorley’s power of fluent expression gets the better of his sense of history. What he brings with him obscures what he takes. Thus Rimbaud’s

Je ne parlerai pas, je ne penserai rien,
Mais l’Amour insonne me montera dans l’âme, becomes:

I shall not speak a word, no thought shall fill the heart or head of me;
But love shall flow and fill my soul with its o’erbrimming tide.

The imported element is positively destructive in Mr. Thorley’s version of the “Brise Marine” of Mallarmé:

“I have linked up his ellipses with threads of my own weaving”—with the result that the sense of the original is, at one important juncture, completely altered.

But to harp on Mr. Thorley’s failures is ungenerous. Let us rather express our surprise and admiration that in a volume so large and so varied the failures are not more numerous and more complete.

A. L. H.
WOE FOR THE KINGS WHO CONQUER!

My Diaries. By Wilfrid Scawen Blunt.—Part Two, 1900 to 1914.
(Seeker. 21s. net.)

In reviewing the first volume of Mr. Blunt’s diaries (Athenæum, October 3, 1919) we spoke of its sparkles and its radiance, and its occasional flicker of malice. Malice again flickers through the pages of the second volume, and, though the pen and the mind of the diarist show slight traces of the inevitable stiffness of age, they are still agile enough to keep the reader always interested and frequently amused. When, however, one looks back at these 500 pages in the bulk, one feels that “amused” is an incongruous epithet to apply to one’s attitude to them. For fifty pages, perhaps, the book amuses, but the deeper one goes the less is one amused by Mr. Blunt’s little stories and little sketches, little brilliancies and little purple patches. The interest of this volume is mainly social and historical and no one who reads it can fail to feel that he is a spectator of and participant in a tragedy—one of the greatest and most sordid—of human history and society. There seems to be some truth in the old theory that at regular intervals civilizations rise and flourish only to become corrupt, decadent and moribund. Mr. Blunt himself, when he contemplated the daily life of his friend the Duchess, was conscious that he was living in a moribund or lunatic age. “This sort of society cannot last, it will end in Bedlam,” he ejaculates helplessly in 1908. Bedlam came six years later; the inmates for five years passed through the well-known stage of mania, excitement and exaltation, and are now passing into the further stage of acute depression alternating with outbreaks of violence.

A diary, when it is written by a man of Mr. Blunt’s opportunities, capabilities and weaknesses, is a wonderful observation post from which the philosophic historian can watch the mental, moral and material disintegration of a complex society. Mr. Blunt’s entries, recorded from year to year and almost from day to day, are like little windows opening and shutting upon the scenes, and upon the “behind the scenes,” of history. As these little windows perpetually open and shut upon great events and little men, upon great men and their little events, one gets so vivid an impression of the characteristics of our age that one feels that one has not only grasped its external appearance and the springs of its mechanism, but the very taste and flavour of it. Frankly, the taste of it is most unpleasant, though the human palate can, as this book shows, acquire a relish for a decaying and rotten society as easily as for the tainted meat of partridge or deer. It is only gradually that the reader of these pages becomes conscious that he is being given a vision of an era of politically tremendous events in which the chief actors have no ideals, no hopes, no beliefs, no principles, no understanding—one might say, personal ambitions, personal vanities, personal loves and hates. The judgment may seem pompously exaggerated to anyone who skins the stories and gossip off Mr. Blunt’s diary, lingers over the last wish of the dying Queen Victoria “that her little dog should be allowed to jump up on her bed,” or is titillated by the serious questions of the conduct and marriage of Miss de Burgh and the legitimacy of Pepita’s children. But the diarist’s lightness of literary touch and commendable love of gossip cannot conceal the complete hopelessness and belieflessness of our age; and societies when they sink into decay are always without belief and without hope.

It is curious to note that almost the only person who appears in Mr. Blunt’s pages with any passionate belief is Queen Victoria, who, when she was talking about the possibility of meeting the dead in another world, became quite angry at the idea that she might have to allow King David to be presented to her, on account of “his inexcusable conduct to Uriah.” For the Great Queen, and her beliefs, belonged essentially to an age and a society that had passed away. The era 1890-1914 was not deeply concerned with the family affairs of King David, Uriah the Hittite and his wife Bathsheba. One of its main concerns, we can see through Mr. Blunt’s little windows, was politics, and particularly the politics of imperialism. In the nineteenth the kings had conquered, and the result was the swollen, unhealthy, bullying, cowardly empires of Britain, France, Germany and Russia. It was an age of achieved imperialism, and imperialistic principles and ideals ostensibly were the motive power in politics, and certainly dominated them. “Politics are professionally a ‘dirty business,’ but even the most disillusioned might receive a shock from observing in this book the complete divorce between private opinion and public profession among statesmen whose policy ended in the war of 1914. If this applied only to Mr. Blunt’s enemies or pet abominations, like Lord Cromer and Lord Morley, one might conclude that his personal prejudices had coloured the glass of his little windows, but it applies equally to his most intimate friends, like George Wyndham and Mr. Churchill. Now it would have been bad enough if Europe had been in the first decade of the twentieth century vulgarly jingo and blatantly imperialist, but there is some hope for a society which believes in bad things and follows bad ideals. There is no hope for people who pursue evil without even believing in it. Here we have machine-made jingos, and imperialists without the slightest belief in imperialism.

Mr. Blunt on his last page cries, “Woe for the kings who conquer!” and it is probably true that conquest is always the beginning of defeat; but annihilation, not defeat, awaits the king or nation which conquers without belief in conquest.

L. W.

FALL

So quickly the gleaming paths have drawn together and piled riches;
The river-water is ember-colour, where ran starts of flame;
November breathes on its mirror, Chokod are the black ditches,
And soon tree will face tree with light quivers of shame.

Sunk in reverie, I split with uncertain heel
And bare the firm whiteness of chestnuts; I the sole fam

In this rusty emptiness, where no spirits come; the wheel
Of this year’s loaded mystery turns, reluctant drawn.

Surely this is not the time of that puissance, the intolerable
Sob buried in the warm frame of things, that wrestles and urges

For outlet in agony, and the torrent of all imaginable
Desire of centuries, running subterranean with vast surges!

Rather, looms in the palid roll of sky resignation,
Dented a great time ago with many implements of pain,
Though hard against it rises reproachful the faint elation
Of rutilant elm-tops, out of which scatters unwilling rain.

And I know that those who have comprehension and tearless love

Of this scene are the persecuted life-shrunken, who narrowly fail;

And I know that I shall find none of them, or the haunts where they move,

And that the one thing that I ache for with hopelessness is their measured tale.

G. H. JOHNSTONE
THE NEW "GROWING OLD"

Simplicity
Shepherd's Warning. By Eric Leadbetter. (Allen & Unwin, 7s. net.)

Eli of the Downs. By C. M. A. Peake. (Heinemann, 7s. net.)

The author to-day who chooses to write a peasant novel sets himself a by no means easy task. We have grown very suspicious of the peasant "as he is seen," very shy of dialect which is half prophecy, half potatos, and more than a trifle impatient of over-wise old men, hot-blooded young ones, beauties in faded calico, and scenes of passion in the kitchen while the dinner is hotting up or getting cold. The psychological novel, the novel of manners and what we might call the experimental novel, inspires no such distrust; its field is wide, there would seem to be no limit to the number of its possible combinations, and we have not that strange sense that the author has committed himself to a more or less limited and determined range of experiences. There is, moreover, in the latter case, no temptation to over-emphasize the relation of the peasant to the earth; to make of him a creature whose revolutions are so dependent on the seasons that it is impossible for him to fall in love out of May or to except from the year's end; more difficult still to resist is the inclination to overstep the delicate boundary between true simplicity and false. True simplicity is hard, reluctant soil to cultivate, and the harvest reaped is small, but it wants but a scatter of seed flung broadcast over the false light soil to produce an appearance of richness, of growing and blooming which mocks the patient effort of the honest cultivateur.

Mr. Eric Leadbetter's latest book, "Shepherd's Warning," is, however, an example of the peasant novel wherein these several difficulties are overcome. They cease, indeed, after the first few pages, to have any reality in the reader's mind. In this extremely careful, sincere piece of work, the author makes us feel that he knows every step of the ground he treads, and that his familiarity with it prevents him from wasting time over anything that is not essential to the development of his story. There is not a moment's hesitation; Mr. Leadbetter moves within the circle of his book, easy, confident, and yet in some curious way impressing us as one who is very reticent and not given to exaggeration. He would rather let things speak for themselves, and tell their own tale. What is it all about? It is the life story of Bob Garrett, a farm labourer, from the moment he reaches the top of the hill until—down, down, slowly down—he is an old man with just strength enough to creep into the sun and call his cat. It is an account of how his three orphaned grandchildren, who live with him, grow from little children to young people in the prime of life. It tells how little Sally Dean, whose father murdered his wife because she was a bad woman with wandering blood and wild ways, grew up with the curse on her and went to the bad herself, and, fascinating Bob Garrett's two grandsons, made one marry her that her unborn child, by another man, might have a father. Sally is the wild strain in the book; the thing that can't be accounted for, that seems to be good for nothing; she is the lovely poisonous weed that Bob Garrett can't abide to see growing among his plants, and yet he cannot stamp it out. She feels herself that she ought not to be as she is; but there it is, she can't get away, she can't make herself different, she must live. And we are shown how little by little she is accepted, and with that acceptance she changes in spite of herself; she is no longer an exotic running dark and bright in the hedges for any man to gather.

As the story moves, changes, deepens, gathering new life into it, and yet keeping the old, reaching out toward new issues, and then accepting those new issues as part of it, so the village, Fidding, goes through an identical experience. When Bob Garrett is head ploughman and the finest worker on the farm, it is a self-contained, solid, old-fashioned little place and remote even from the nearest town, Pricheurst. But gradually, like Bob Garrett, it becomes inadequate to the needs of the restless rising generation. They do not sweep it away, but they ignore it until it falls into the background, a small bundle of ancient cottages with nothing but the traces of their former pride and solidity. But what is it there in New Fidding to compare with Old Fidding, where every man could have told you his neighbour's garden down to a row of radishes, and where, in spite of their differences, they were held together by an implicit acceptance of life; but not of "the fever called living"?

"Eli of the Downs" is another novel that has its roots in the English country-side, but Mr. Peake is a writer who has not yet succeeded in putting a rein on his ambitions. In his eagerness to make a great figure of Eli he cannot resist picking him out, even when he is a very small one and scarce more than knee high, and over-loading him with all the ornaments which are handed down as the heirlooms of children preposterous. He hears tunes, sees colours, has a vision in church.

"I did see it, grandam," he ended.

"And what then, deary?"

"I . . . I don't know. I can't. I came back."

Even though years afterwards, in a Japanese temple, his vision comes true, we highly suspect that "I came back." But this fault, which is apparent in the first pages of the book, persists throughout. The author, unlike Mr. Leadbetter, cannot leave his characters to speak their mind; he must speak for them, and even reinforce their statements with a kind of running commentary and explanatory notes which are very tiring to keep up with. He seems, until he carries his simple shepherd overseas and sets him among highly embrowned scenes and persons, to expect our attention to flag. In that he is right, but the chief cause of our fatigue is precisely this habit of endeavouring to capture and to recapture it. But the truth is that "Eli of the Downs" ought to have been a short story of—certainly not more than five thousand words. We do not wish to be unkind to Mr. Peake; but we wish he would be a little less kind to himself, wish that he would play a great many of his sheep and let us have one uninterrupted view of the shepherd.

K. M.

BOOK-PRICES CURRENT

BOOK-PRICES CURRENT, 1919. Vol. XXXIII. Edited by J. H. Slater. (Stock. 32s. 6d. net.)

Nothing new can be said of this indispensable book to everyone interested in either buying or selling old books, and as there are very few scholars who do not at some time or other of their career want to own some rare book, while there are many who would like to know the value of those they have, Mr. Slater's useful handbook to the last season's sales is sure of a good reception. We note that almost all old books which are worth anything at all have risen in value appreciably, though not in proportion to the depreciation of money: but very rare books, or books in great demand, have gone up to enormous prices. "Only those whose business it is to watch the activities of yesterday and to-day can have the least idea of what is likely to happen to-morrow, so far as these old and costly books are concerned." At the same time we must remember that some of these phenomenal prices are due to the existence of one millionaires who means to build up a first-class collection, and that at any moment the bottom may drop out of the market and we may witness a collapse like that of the speculation in Kelmscott books many years ago. Mr. Slater dates the beginning of the present rise as some twenty years old, but we must not forget that even at current prices fine illuminated manuscripts of the best periods are absurdly cheap, and that in their case a further rise is inevitable.
NOTES FROM IRELAND

Dublin, February 6, 1920.

The growth of a more intelligent interest in the cinema has been noticeable in the English press during the past year. Journals which would have scorned to discuss the subject a couple of years ago now possess "movie" critics, and space is given to much argument about the superiority of the infant British industry of motion-picture making. In Ireland, there is a corresponding tendency to apply the principle of Sinn Fein to the production of photo-plays, but the pioneers are not rewarded by the same publicity as their English rivals receive. Unlike Mr. Bernard Shaw and Mr. Vachel Lindsay, none of the intellectuals here has avowed publicly the interest which several have privately confessed in "the silent drama." Neither the Unionist nor the Republican propagandists have realized the possibilities of the camera as a medium for the spread of information and ideas. In the ordinary "picture theatres of commerce," as we shall doubtless be calling them in due course, Irish films are rarely exhibited. When the real "topical events" come round there is usually a small strip of local pictures. These are labelled "Irish Events," and consist, for the most part, of innocent spectacles, games of hurling, or race meetings—uniformly peaceful records with a pleasant suggestion of paradox.

The more ambitious efforts of our scenario-writers and producers have not been a success. Two recent productions, not yet released for general consumption, were a spectacular film of the days of St. Patrick and a screen version of Carleton's novel "Willy Reilly." Like so many of the photo-plays produced on this side of the Atlantic, they are handicapped from the start by the curious prepossessions of the majority of producers outside America. When will it be understood that the art of the screen is not that of the theatre? British and Irish motion pictures are a constant proof that this elementary fact is not realized. Too many of the players are selected because of their success on the stage, as the profits of success are readier and more certain than for the camera.

The conventionality of the Irish films is aggravated in this connection by the fact that not only are the parts played by actors from the theatre, but theatricality is their cult. In spite of Synge and the host of peasant plays and players, country life and country people are reproduced on the screen in terms of picturesque romanticism. The men dress as no Irishman dresses outside the realms of Bouchaud, the women are all "colleens" of the picturesque variety affected by vendors of Irish soap, and the gentlemen who design dust-covers for popular Irish fiction. It seems as if reality—in externals, at least—which should be the greatest advantage in the making of photo plays was entirely lost in the hands of the American producers—a curious departure from the practice in literature, where transatlantic fiction remains in bondage to the most cloying sentimentality.

As you have probably heard more than once, the leaders of Young Ireland to-day are poets and schoolmasters, superior people who are hardly yet aware of the existence of the cinema. It is, I fancy, a commercial rather than an artistic phenomenon, this apparent interest in England in the production of picture plays. Until the potentialities of the camera are as well realized as its evident limitations, the Americans will be left to reap the satisfactions . . . . and the profits. In a couple of years we may not find in all European countries there is a disposition to leave the cinema to purely commercial exploiters and their inarticulate public. In Germany alone is the author more important than the "movie star." for in him is invested supreme control of his work. The producer cannot defy his wishes, and the royalties which they demand are, in many cases, the salaries of certain deities of the American screen. An expert investigator from the United States has recently expressed great amazement at this perversely Teutonic reversal of the supposedly natural order of things. The author's name only is allowed to appear, and to him all honour and profit (elsewhere denied) and, not to think of an attempt to suppress his name in favor of the book, is now the order of the day. If, as an American paper announces, Mr. W. B. Yeats is engaged to play a part in a moving-picture performance of "Cathleen ni Houlihan," this may inaugurate a new phase in the development of Irish films. Then we may look for a new "Celtic Renaissance!"

THE RIGHT SORT OF RURAL LIBRARY

Village Libraries: A Guide to Their Formation and Upkeep
By A. Sayle. (Grant Richards. 5s. net.)

It gives one a nasty shock, the day after the benefits of the Public Libraries Acts have been extended in a practical way to rural districts, to find a believer in village libraries giving what may be called an Irishman's blessing to the new scheme. The alumna of Newnham College who writes this book, after presiding at the inception and the fourteen years' success of a different kind of rural library, deliberately asserts, "it is, in the writer's opinion, greatly to be preferred before a County Library Scheme"; "it is an experiment in communal effort" by villagers who would never have adopted the Acts or have subscribed willingly to a library rate. Without agreeing unreservedly with her preference, let us advise every member of the Rural Library Committees set up under the new Act to read her book. The one thing to avoid is the infliction of a library, ready-made to however excellent a pattern, on a village that does not want it. The great thing to aim at is to secure the goodwill of the villagers and as far as possible make use of local initiative. Given a democratic committee composed of churchwarden, farm labourer, village carpenter, retired barber, and the sexton's and wheelwright's daughters, prosperity will be assured.

The library of which this is the story was formed in 1906 in a more congenial village in the heart of Counties Down and Armagh. The village library was maintained through outside aid, official or other, without ever the patronage of Lady Bountiful, and on the strict understanding that it should "contain the sort of books they want to read, not books chosen for them by other people." The readers paid first 1d. and then 2d. a week; they elected the committee, provided the workers, and the library became "an integral part of the village life." Full details of its working and expenses are given, for the benefit of any following its example; these we pass over, noting only that the practice of discarding books that no one read was early introduced, and due care taken that it should be a live library and not a mere collection of books it was thought the inhabitants might not read. A modest institution, be it noticed also, establishment and maintenance charges, the bugbear of greater libraries, ate up far more income than could be spent on books, though the chief items of expenditure were only for cupboards, stationery, and the like. But here the balance-sheet compares favourably with that of Steeple Claydon, where the library is run under the Acts.

Trained librarians will be scandalized by the home-made system of classification. One of the original subdivisions was "Children and Cookery," which at first blush suggests the study of cannibalism. Cookery, like poetry and gardening, was considered a defect. The shelves of books here were left untouched, a curious departure from the practice of the Anglo-Irish public, where transatlantic fiction remains in bondage to the most cloying sentimentality.

"Children and Cookery," which at first blush suggests the study of cannibalism. Cookery, like poetry and gardening, was considered a defect. The shelves of books here were left untouched, a curious departure from the practice of the Anglo-Irish public, where transatlantic fiction remains in bondage to the most cloying sentimentality.
Science

THE RELATIVITY DISCUSSION AT THE ROYAL SOCIETY

The reception accorded to Einstein's Theory of Gravitation will, in the future histories of science, appear very much the same as that which has welcomed other great scientific generalizations. Discussion of a new theory is, of course, both inevitable and desirable, and opposition is not always based on mere conservatism. But the discussions which greeted Newton's theories, the controversies which centred about Darwin's Origin of Species, and the present-day objections to Einstein's theory have not been, in all cases, of a purely rational character. Many of the Darwinian controversies were, of course, remarkable for their irrationality, but that was because Darwin laid hands on man himself. Rational inquiry is only permitted on matters in which man has little interest, and it is for that reason that Einstein's theory, being concerned with space and time, and having no obvious reaction on morality or politics, is not generally denounced from the pulpit. It has not escaped moral condemnation altogether; its anti-Christian tendency has been detected by at least one vigilant critic, and we have reason to suppose that it is regarded as incompatible with certain views respecting a future life. On the whole, however, the objections to it have been rational, even when they have not been scientific, and there are, of course, some purely scientific difficulties in the way of accepting the whole theory. There appear, also, to be some philosophic difficulties, for it is better, however, to leave these to the philosophers, since, as Professor Eddington has recently pointed out, they seem to be based on "necessities of thought" from which mathematicians are unaccountably exempt. The recent discussion at the Royal Society, in confining itself to the scientific arguments for and against Einstein's theory, did not, therefore, exhaust possible objections. It embraced nearly all those, however, which are of interest to men of science.

The discussion was opened by Mr. Jeans, who, speaking very smoothly and with remarkable fluency, described the experiments on which the restricted relativity of 1905 was founded. His exposition contained nothing essentially new, but it led the audience, with great clarity and swiftness to his goal, a blackboard covered with space-time diagrams. The equations were enshrined the properties of that non-Euclidean four-dimensional continuum in which Einstein places our material universe. One gazed at them with proper reverence, the effect being perhaps heightened by the fact that they were almost totally invisible at a moderate distance from the platform. So far, Mr. Jeans had been going over familiar ground. Presently, however, he came to the point on which the greater part of the discussion centred—the spectrum effect, predicted but not observed. He became judicial and spoke with hesitation. He was inclined to think, he remarked, that if Einstein's symbols are given a physical interpretation, then his theory predicts a shift of the spectral lines; but that if the symbols are regarded from a purely mathematical point of view, then the spectrum effect is not a necessary consequence. For a moment we eyed Mr. Jeans doubtfully, but his face remained impassive and he presently sat down.

Our mind was still engaged in grappling with Mr. Jeans' mysterious hint when we became aware that Professor Eddington, slim, dark, scholarly, was on the platform. He apparently shared our impression that there had been just a suspicion of something almost occult about the previous remarks, for he emphasized the fact that the space-time interval, whose equation Mr. Jeans had been discussing was a measured quantity. One had some difficulty in following his remarks, as he wholly lacks Mr. Jeans' fluency, but that mattered the less when it became apparent that he was repeating what he had said already in that master-piece of exposition, his Report on Relativity for the London Physical Society. He again drew attention to the remarkable fact that the two great principles of Dynamics, the conservation of energy and the conservation of the moment of momentum, are contained in Einstein's law of gravitation. Professor Eddington suggested that this must be taken as strongly confirmatory of the validity of the Einstein equations. As with those of Mr. Jeans, Professor Eddington's remarks were scarcely intelligible to the non-mathematical members of the audience, but Sir F. Dyson, the Astronomer Royal, introduced a more generally intelligible note into the discussion. He pointed out the very real nature of Einstein's achievement in accounting for the motion of the perihelion of Mercury, and briefly described some of the earlier attempts to solve the difficulty, in particular Leverrier's invention of the planet Vulcan, discussed in The Athenæum, Nov. 21, 1919, p. 1228.

So far the discussion had been favourable to Einstein: Mr. Jeans and Professor Eddington had shown how firmly rooted the principle was, and Sir F. Dyson had emphasized its success in prediction. The next speaker, Professor A. Fowler, a great spectroscopist, opened the opposition. In a dry, unemotional, but extremely competent manner, he contrasted the results of spectrum observation with the effect predicted by Einstein's theory. The observations were made both at the centre and at the limb of the sun, and in neither set was the Einstein effect observed. Even if conveniently compensating phenomena are postulated for one set, that does not explain the negative result for the other set. It is impossible to believe, he declared, in a compensating effect which is rooted in the very different conditions which prevail at the sun's centre and at its edge. His array of measurements was certainly impressive, and it was obvious that he saw no way of avoiding the conclusion that Einstein's theory here experienced a definite check. Mr. Cunningham, who followed, restored the mathematical atmosphere, and sketched a line of reasoning showing the limitations of the Principle of Equivalence (that no experiments can distinguish between a gravitational field due to matter and one produced by a transformation of coordinates). He also put in an ingenious plea for the ether, but it turned out to be a very different ether from that of the standard epochodex. He suggested that all aethers, as many as there are spaces and times, i.e., as many as there are observers, and that the actual ether may, like the four-dimensional space-time continuum, have invariant properties. It was obvious that Mr. Cunningham largely accepted the generalized theory, but that he did not regard it as being as crystal-clear as some people suppose. Professor Newall, a very pleasant and sympathetic speaker, appeared to be in difficulties about some of the paradoxical results of the restricted principle of relativity, and put an elaborate question to Mr. Jeans, which that gentleman answered with a courtesy his questioner seemed to find somewhat disconcerting. In the absence of Sir J. Larmor it was supposed that Professor Lindemann's suggestive remarks on the bearing of quanta theory on relativity would bring the discussion to a close. The President called, however, on Professor Whitehead, who delivered a remarkable speech. He spoke with considerable vigour, and, at times, with something like scorn. He produced an equation which, he assured the assembly, accounted for Mercury's motion and the deflection of light as well as Einstein's. As for the spectrum effect, on Einstein's theory, he said, there should be no shift of the spectrum lines, whereas from his own equation one could not say whether there would be an effect or not, an interesting conclusion which excited some hilarity.
Thus the discussion closed, appropriately enough, in an atmosphere of some mystification. One came away with the impression that Einstein's supporters would feel happier if the predicted spectrum of effect comes to be observed, but that he does not expect it to be sufficiently flexible to be able, at a pinch, to dispense with such confirmation. Whatever happens, Einstein's theory has come to stay for a while yet, a fact that must rejoice those men of science who are also artists.

SOCIETIES

ROYAL.—January 22.—Sir J. J. Thomson, President, in the chair.

"The Variations of Wave-Length of the Oscillations generated by Three-Electrode Thermionic Tubes due to Changes in Filament Current, Plate Voltage, Grid Voltage or Coupling," by W. H. Eccles and J. H. Vincent (the object of the investigation was to find the conditions most favourable for the production of continuous oscillations of constant frequency); "Plane Strain: the Direct Determination of Stress," by S. D. Carothers. "An Investigation of the Effects of Electromagnetic Collisions with Platinum Coated with Hydrogen," by H. S. W. Jordan, ascertain whether the Production of Ionization from Platinum is due to Occluded Hydrogen, by F. Horton and Ann C. Davies.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES—February 5.—Sir Hercules Read, President, in the chair.

Mr. R. Garraway Rice, Local Secretary for Sussex, exhibited, on behalf of Mr. J. Howard Cokes, a Palaeadinthe implement and an unfinished neolith found at West Chillingdon, Sussex. The palaeolith, which was of unusual interest, was found in 1916 at 250 feet O.D. It was of peculiar shape and of Late Le Moustier date; the fine patination, one side being light yellow, the other mottled. The neolith was, apparently, an unfinished example of the type known as the 'Thames pick.'

Professor S. Langdon read a paper on a Sumerian figure from Mesopotamia in the Ashmolean Museum. The archaological evidence had thus far been derived almost exclusively from ancient Sumerian cities in the extreme south of Mesopotamia. Mr. Langdon reviewed briefly the bas-reliefs and statues of this region, particularly the collections from Lagash, Nippur, and Uruk. His work is a most important contribution to the dress and physiological characteristics of the Sumerians and the Semites. The statues found in the lower strata at Assur revealed a Sumerian period of occupation and culture before that of the Upper Tigris. The archaeological remains at Astarabad in Persian Turkestan indicated clearly an art and a dress very similar to the prehistoric Sumerian remains of Assur, and of Sumer itself. Philological and other cultural evidence was adduced for proving that the Sumerians of the foundation civilization in Western Asia, belonged to a widely spread agglutinating race, of which the inhabitants of prehistoric Elam, Turkestan and Egypt were, besides the Sumerians themselves, the best representatives. The statue itself which was the subject of the paper was discovered by the 14th Sikh Regiment of the Indian Army, when they were entrenching themselves before the battle of Istarabato. This Arab village was on the right bank of the Tigris, eight miles below Samara. The importance of the discovery consisted chiefly in the region where it was found, for it formed a much-needed link between Southern Sumerian archaeology and the similar remains of the same period in Assyria and Turkestan. The bas-reliefs and statues of Elam of the same period proved a very close relation between the Sumerians and the prehistoric people of Anshan in dress, tureen and physiognomy. The writer defended the Sumerian derivation of the Greek word for fleecy mantle, Tomorrow, from gar-e-nna, gar-e-nu, the probable name of the national Sumerian Semitic and Elamite dress. The word was traced from early Sumerian times through the inscriptions of Babylon and Assyria to the period of Darius and Cambyses, and the passage by Aristophanes, "Wasp," 1131-56, in the Persian mantle survives was discussed. The problem of the relative age of Sumerian and Semetic civilization in Sumur and Akkad was defined, and a solution attempted.

FORTHCOMING MEETINGS

Fri. 13. King's College, 4.—"Ecclesiastical Art," Lecture V., Professor P. Deering.

King's College, 5.30.—"Ecclesiastical Music: The Use of Plain Chant in the English Service," Capt. Francis Burgess.

King's College, 5.30.—"Historical Theories of Space, Time, and Movement: The Void—The Old Atomic Theory—Lucretius," Professor H. Wilden Caw.

Fri. 13. University College, 5.30.—"Greek and Roman Commerce," Mr. M. Cary.

Malacological Societies.

Royal Institution, 9.—"The Volume of the Blood and its Significance," Professor W. M. Bayliss.

King's College, 5.30.—"The History of Learning and Science in Poland," Lecture I., Professor L. Tatarczynski.

King's College, 5.30.—"The Apocalypse," Lecture III., Archdeacon Charles. (Schweich Lectures)

University College, 5.30.—"Guillaume de Machaut's Literary and Musical Work," Lecture II., Mrs. Barbara Smythe.

University College, 5.30.—"Our Historical Inheritance," Mr. Hilary Jenkinson.

Dr. Williams' Library (41, Gordon Square, W.C.), 6.—"The Analysis of Mind," Lecture XIV., Mr. Bertrand Russell.

Aristotelian, 8.—"Impulse, Emotion and Instinct," Mr. F. P. Slack.

Royal Society of Arts, 8.—"Recent Researches in the Cellulose Industry," Lecture I., Mr. C. F. Cross. (Cantor Lecture)

Royal Geographical Society (Eoolian Hall), 8.30.—"The Spanish Zones in Morocco," H.E. the Spanish Ambassador.

Royal Academy, 4.—"The Animal Anatomy," Lecture III., Mr. W. Frank Calderon.

University College, 5.30.—"The Golden Age in Danish Literature," Lecture II., Mr. J. H. Heaweg.

University College, 5.30.—"Holland and Belgium," Lecture II., Professor P. Geyl.

Royal Anthropological Institute, 8.15.—"On the Occurrence of Flint Implements of Man in the Glacial Chalky Boulder Clay of Suffolk," Mr. J. Reid More.

Wed. 18. University College, 3.—"History and Drama in the 'Divina Commedia,'" Lecture IV., Dr. E. G. Gardner. (Barlow Lectures)

Royal Academy, 4.—"Animal Anatomy," Lecture IV., Mr. W. H. Frank Calderon.

Royal Society of Arts, 4.30.—"English Canals and Inland Waterways," Mr. Sidney Preston.

Royal Meteorological, 5.—"The Problem of Sources for the History of the Nineteenth Century," Mr. Hubert Hall.

University College, 5.30.—"The Changes as shown by Comparative Law in the Rights and Duties attaching to Property," Lecture III., Sir John Macdonell.

University College, 5.30.—"Wergelad, Wellhaven and Collett," Lecture II., Mr. I. C. Gröndahl.

Royal Microscopical, 5.30.

Royal Institution, 4.—"Studies of Photo-synthesis in Fresh-water Algae," Professor B. Moore and T.A. Webster.

King's College, 5.30.—"The Sources for the History of British India in the Seventeenth Century," Lecture I., Dr. S. A. Khan.

University College, 5.30.—"August Strindberg," Lecture II., Mr. I. Björkhamn.

Royal Numismatic, 6.—"The Coinage of Offa," Mr. R. C. Lockett.
Fine Arts
THE BURLINGTON FINE ARTS CLUB

NOTES ON THE WINTER EXHIBITION

The Winter Exhibition at the Club has no title, nor indeed would it be easy to find any title for so miscellaneous and accidental a collection. There is a peculiar pleasure in such an absence of plan; these accidental confrontations of objects that have never met before are sometimes quaint, sometimes ironical, sometimes humorous. Objects like the Victorian mother-’o’-pearl ornaments that could hardly force an entrance to a full-dress assembly at the Club are free to display their charms on such an informal occasion. This informality and incoherence release me from the need for any pretence to coherence in my remarks, which will therefore imitate the disjointed ejaculations of a visitor to the gallery.

Crivelli—a risen Christ. But for a fair share of the Venetian taste for colour Crivelli might pass for a German. He is as elaborately descriptive, as ingenious, as romantic, and as entirely innocent of any comprehension of what Italian art meant.

Quentin Matsys: "Marriage of St. Catherine."—A charming picture in a dead tempera painting on a scantily prepared canvas giving an almost tapestry quality. Matsys was very rarely so discreet, so tasteful and undemonstrative. He had, too, a certain psychological imagination; a pale Northern reflection of Leonardo’s smile plays over his women’s faces.

Basaiti: "The Descent into Limbo."—An almost literal copy in paint of a Mantegna engraving. Even if the original had been lost, the contrast between the force of the invention and the meticulous, dull craftsmanship of the execution would reveal the work of a borrower.

Guardi—scene in front of SS. Giovanni e Paolo—a purely delightful picture. Taste, in the rather negative eighteenth century sense, and skill could go no further; and what a knowledge of the painter’s craft dictated the transposition of key, so that we get the effect of sunlight on Venetian façades against the sky by a dull brown against a dark greenish-grey!

Fra Vittor Ghislandi—head of a man. Who ever heard of Ghislandi? A few visitors to the Carrara Gallery at Bergamo may remember him, but the name has no resonance, and yet everyone has heard of Murillo. What an accidental affair fame is! For this one head is worth all the work of Murillo and of half a dozen other famous artists one could name put together. If by accident the name of Velasquez had got attached to it, it would be one of the famous works. Ghislandi lived to an old age and must have done other things worth remembering. He was called Paolotto, an old Italian dictionary says, and studied under Bombelli, who turned him to the study of the great masters, making him in particular attentively examine and copy the heads of Titian in order to discover the marvellous artifice of them. And thanks to this exercise he pushed so far in the art of making portraits and characteristic heads for historical pictures, that in that respect he came very near to the great masters of the good period." Evidently Signor Tiepolo, who wrote the dictionary, knew what he was talking about.

Rubens—wooded landscape at sunset. What an enviable artist Rubens was! He must have had so robust an enjoyment of everything good in life, and then that exuberant belief in his own powers which enabled him to say what he felt about it. He had invented such a free, elastic pictorial language that there was nothing which it could not embrace. For in the seventeenth century it was an unheard-of thing to reduce to pictorial terms such a landscape as this, with the setting sun shining through hedgerow elms. And it was not till nearly two centuries later that artists saw their way to taking it up. Here Rubens has already done what Constable did with more continuous study and more thorough observation, but never more brilliantly and never with such easy confidence.

On a table under this picture is a little bronze angel holding a pricket candlestick—a figure for an altar, presumably. It is attributed to the Pisani school of the fourteenth century. To my thinking this is a masterpiece, one of the very finest of its age in any public or country. The simplification of the forms is conceived with extraordinary understanding, and the rhythmical movement of the whole figure is realized with astonishing perfection—the lost profile of the head in relation to the neck and the movement of the arms is a marvel of sensibility—and the design of the drapery, especially at the back, is a great discovery. I daresay the attribution to the school of the Pisani is right. I can suggest no other that seems satisfactory, and yet something in the treatment of the wreath-crowned head suggests to me rather that second and more searching study of the antique that marked the early quattrocento. But I can find no great name that fits it, and I cannot believe that any but a great name will account for such a masterpiece.

At the end of the gallery hangs a large Raeburn of such revolting vulgarity as one thought had hardly been discovered at that date. But Raeburn, alas! was an original man, an inventor whom we could well have spared. Beside him de Hoogh, who was after all a very minor artist, looks tasteful and distinguished; Zoffany, a discreet and innocent gentleman; and Gainsborough, a giant. The Gainsborough is indeed a delightful picture, full of the delicate sensibility with which Gainsborough was endowed. In this early work he exploits this quality more assiduously, more patiently, than he often found time to do in later life.

ROGER FRY.

The sketches of Sir Bartle Frere, at present on view in the Walker Gallery, bear the same relation to professional pictures that an agreeably written letter bears to literature. They are the work of an amateur who has recorded, for his own pleasure and his friends’, various little incidents that he has seen in the intervals of his military duties. In most of them he deals with Egypt, and he brings to that over-written and over-painted land an eye that is both sympathetic and acute. Here are no stately shrines, nor maidens at an academic well, but the actual country as it has presented itself to so many soldiers during the past five years—a humorous and slipshod country, full of dust and odours and tawsewed waste places and muddy-shaped minarets, and of inhabitants whose chief garment was a nightgown and whose chief remark was “never mind.” Most of Sir Bartle’s models—porters, bathers, Bedouin children, loungers on the sea-wall—seem to be saying “never mind.” His landscapes, too, recall most happily their originals: one may instance a delicate panorama of the Nile from Luxor, and impressive sketches of the Nebi Daniel Mosque at Alexandria and of the cemetery at Damanhour. There are also some faithful renderings of flowers. Of course, yet another Egypt exists, as the present tragic situation proves, but none is very grateful to Sir Bartle for recording the Egypt that he saw. Work such as his was commoner fifty years ago, before photography arose and strangled amateur art. The exhibition closes on Saturday in this week.

We regret to record that Dr. Varley Roberts, organist at Magdalen College, Oxford, from 1882 to 1918, died on February 9. A whole generation of Oxford men will remember with regret the rugged but kindly personality of this magnificent choirmaster.
EXHIBITIONS OF THE WEEK

Mr. Epstein’s portrait busts are superlatively alive. The women who appear before us seem to have been transmuted into bronze by some instantaneous terrific judgment of Heaven. The liquid metal has been poured on to “Petty May,” radiant and defiant at the apogee of sensual youth; it has fallen on the bowed serene head of the artist’s wife, and on the lean hysterial features of “Gabrielle Saome.” About “Lillian Shelley” it is to us an astonishing sensation of momentarily arrested life. Surely romantic realism can go no further than in this beautiful work. Reproduced by another hand, we might doubt the grandeur of the apparition. We might see nothing but theatricality in the majestic attitude, the drooping eyelids, the hang-back hair, the pathetic hands. But before Epstein’s rendering we stand convinced. We believe we are in the presence of a genuine gesture immortalized; we accept the slight contraction of the shoulder-blades as tortured sensibility; we respond to the almost imperceptible tremor of the parted lips. We are convinced, because Epstein was himself conveyed by the emotions of his vision, and by a conception of the modeller’s outlook. They are not flawless, even considered as clay models. We cannot reconcile ourselves to the suggestion of colour in the green wash on “Gabrielle Saome” and in the treatment of the eyes in all the heads; such effects seem to us deplorable concessions to the painter’s vision, unworthy of Mr. Epstein’s power to concentrate on form and his technical distinction.

In so far as his former more sculptural manner is seen at all in this collection it is represented by the “Christ.” The head here is conceived from the point of view of the man with a chisel; but the modeller reappears in the treatment of the hair. In the small manner of the Leicesters we see an astonishment of this discrepancy in approach very evident. In a large gallery or in the open air it would probably be less apparent and the figure would gain in plastic unity. In the confined space it is unified only by the intense quality of the literary content, which reaches us compact and penetrating. A word of praise is due to the directors of the Galleries for the excellent arrangement of the exhibition.

If anyone questions the value of Mr. Epstein’s portraits he would do well to visit the exhibition of the Modern Society of Portrait Painters. Epstein’s work compels our attention and respect. If the word “Silence” were inscribed over the doorway we should regard it as merely appropriate. At the Royal Institute Galleries the first impulse is to treat the exhibits with flippantety. We fall to plunging on the title of the group, and speculating on the greater fitness of some other combination of the same words; we toy with the respective merits of “Society Painters of Modern Portraits,” “Portrait Painters of Modern Society” and “Modern Painters of Society Portraits.” When we begin to examine the pictures in detail we apologize for the first inclination. Mr. Ranken’s “Katharine and Letitia” struck perhaps the note responsible for the first admiration. Had this picture been exhibited fifteen years ago above the signature of John Sargent it might have caused a popular sensation. To-day it will presumably pass unnoticed. For this particular brand of virtuosity can no longer cause a thrill. It is an acrobatic turn which has grown old-fashioned.

Mr. Sargent has often given more than this virtuosity; Mr. Ranken himself has sometimes given us more; but we do not see more in “Katharine and Letitia.” Mr. Guevara’s portrait of Mrs. Fairburn dispelled our flippancy. But coming from Mr. Epstein’s scullery his portrait is a characterization. Epstein gives us all that the most searching eye can see, and more into the bargain—the reflex of his own adoration. Mr. Guevara gives us an agreeable decoration made up of original rhythms and rich colour, and executed in a brilliant though not meretricious technique. But what does he tell us of Mrs. Fairburn? That she is young and charming, wears admirably cut clothes, and moves in sumptuous interiors—all of which we might have learned from other sources. More than this he does not tell us. We look in vain for any information about the individual as opposed to the type. The hat comes down over the eyebrows, the coat-collar comes up over the line of the jaw. What appears of the face is indefinite, and subordinate to the large eyes which follow us round the room. We carry away a memory of these eyes, but no knowledge of their structure, and we should be unable to pick out the lady from a hundred others shopping in Bond Street. Mr. Guevara tells us much more of the lady than Epstein (in the un-revised catalogue). Here the arecbasque of the design is less complicated, the composition more conventional, the colour more crude; but we believe it to be the better work of the two. The tone values are much more sharply defined, the drawing is more expressive and the characterization is more illuminating. It is a notable painting, as notable perhaps—though not so successful—as his portrait of “The Editor of Wheels” shown recently at the Grosvenor Gallery. The realism is as sincere as Mr. Epstein’s but it affects us in quite a different way—because Mr. Guevara does not paint on his knees.

Mrs. N. Munro Summers has nearly succeeded in building a personal art on the foundation of a Slade School training and the study of the paintings of Mr. Augustus John. There is considerable charm in the picture of a woman and child against a pale wall lined with books. The artist uses pretty, limpid colours, and shows wit and intelligence in the selection of subjects. There is a pleasant preciseness, too, in the smooth enamel surface of the flowers. But Mrs. Summers’ eye is not yet very reliable. There are vagaries of tone and proportion which appear accidental.

Mr. Také Sato, the Japanese artist exhibiting at the Burlington Gallery, has attempted to absorb the essence of European art in his own manner. The European artists have attempted to absorb the art of the East. A hybrid result is almost inevitable in both cases. What we like about Mr. Sato’s work is Japanese, and we should like it better if it were more completely Oriental in feeling and outlook.

R. H. W.

DUTCH AND VENETIAN PORTRAITS AT THE NATIONAL GALLERY

Room XXVI. at the National Gallery, which was till recently hung with a representative selection of English portraits lent by the National Portrait Gallery, was reopened on Thursday, the 12th inst., to show a number of portraits and portrait groups chosen from the Gallery collections. The North walls are given to the Northern Continental Schools, and the South to the Italian Schools; and the room affords a rough opportunity of comparing at close quarters the methods and periods of some three centuries of European portraiture. Holbein’s “Ambassadors” is shown between the two large “Family Groups” of Franz Hals and of Michae Sweerts (once assigned to Vermeer), the groups being separated by Van de Velde’s “Young Lady,” and Rembrandt’s “Portrait of Himself” as a young man. On the centre of the Italian wall is the Venetian full-length portrait of Andrea Tron, hitherto ascribed to Pietro Longhi, but not in the known manner of either Pietro or his son. Among the smaller pictures are Lotto’s “Proportional Giuliano,” Moroni’s “Lawyer,” Rembrandt’s “Francois van Waterhoven,” (?), Van Dyck’s “Marchese Cattaneo,” and Van Oost’s charming profile of “Boy with a Muff.”
Music

THE RHYTHM OF OPERA

An opera is, or at least ought to be, a symphony, that is, a piece of music. Probably the majority of operatic failures, either from the composer's or from the producer's point of view, results from a refusal to recognize this principle. When I say that an opera is a symphony, I do not mean a symphony in the narrow sense of a composition for orchestra in the classical form of Haydn and Beethoven, nor do I mean that the orchestral accompaniments to an opera are the most important part of it. I mean that an opera must be viewed, by composer, conductor and producer, as a continuous piece of music, designed on a definitely musical plan. It must have musical form of its own, independently of the libretto and the action. The wise librettist, needless to say, should cooperate with the composer in such a way that the words of the play may suggest a structural conception of the music. Many people (some composers among them) are aware that classical symphonies and other familiar concert works are written in forms which have been classified and codified in textbooks. They are less often ready to understand that music may have a sense of form, even if it is not a form recognized by the schoolmasters; and further, that it is no good breaking violently away from the conventional forms unless one can substitute for them a form more significant.

There is a very prevalent idea that in opera, as in songs and other vocal music, it is sufficient to illustrate the meaning of the words as they happen to come along. This is the ruin of dozens of symphonic poems, in which the words are not sung, but printed in the programme for those who can afford to buy it. No opera can ever be a popular success if it is based on such a false principle. It is easy to find many operas which have been popular successes, but it was not owing to their lack of form; they succeeded, if they obtained a success of any prominence, by virtue of such fragments of form as they did possess. It was not their recitatives but their arias and ensembles which saved them. Gluck said that when he sat down to compose an opera he tried to forget that he was a musician. Mozart never tried to do anything so idiotic, and the result is that his operas have lasted very much better than Gluck's.

Composers may be left to take care of themselves. It is the producers and singers in these days who need to be reminded that they are musicians. It may seem strange to offer such advice to singers, who have been taught to concentrate all their attention on their singing, to the neglect of everything else, yes, to the neglect of the music itself. They err sometimes, in fact, by excess of zeal. In their anxiety to be dramatic, they ruin beautiful phrases in which Mozart or Purcell has expressed everything perfectly, if the singers would only leave them alone and sing them as they are. But that generally needs good singing, and good singing is not so easy as hysterical declamation. The prime necessity is rhythmical continuity. The individual singer must realize, if he has an aria to sing, or a stretch of recitative, that it is all one continuous piece of music; that the beginning bears a relation to the end, that the melodic line must never be broken, or else the emotional line in the minds of the audience will be broken; and once that is broken, the whole emotional atmosphere of the opera has to be worked up again from the very beginning.

He must realize, too, the relation of his own part to the whole, not only in a purely dramatic sense, but in a musical sense as well. In ensembles, for instance, there are endless numbers of places where the least deviation from strict time is fatal: on the part of one singer, for however "dramatic" a "reason," will at once bring the whole structure into complete confusion. It may not be that the other singers are put out and an actual breakdown takes place; the performance may proceed without entanglement, and yet the emotional value of an ensemble be utterly destroyed by a hitch in the rhythmical continuity of it.

More important still is the sense of rhythmical continuity in the conductor and the producer. The difficulties vary according to the style of the opera. An opera of Wagner inevitably forces the singer to go on, though most of us have supposed many singers do their best to retain its driving force. And in a Wagner opera the driving force of the orchestra is generally far greater than that of the voice. The singer can rest on the orchestra and be carried on by its current; but it is fatal to get into the habit of yielding to this temptation. Even in Wagner there are moments when the voice must bear the whole rhythmic burden as singly as in any opera of Monteverdi or Purcell. And it is noticeable in modern opera, too, that when the composer has concentrated his musical thought, good or bad, in the voice parts and obliged the voices to be the real creator of the pulse of the music, the opera will grip the audience and achieve success, even though the actual inspiration of the music be on a low level. Yet it is in the older and the more declamatory styles of opera that the sense of rhythmical continuity is most frequently lost in actual performance. They are broken up into recitatives and arias; further broken up, it may be, with spoken dialogue. It is here that the intelligence of the producer ought to come in. Even a recitative is a piece of music. If it is well written, it has its rhythmic outline, its climax, its balance of phrase. Recitative should always be studied initially on a basis of rigidly strict time, and still on a strictly rhythmical basis even when the rigidity of time may be relaxed. All the great examples of recitative will not merely bear this treatment, but will benefit by it. What has ruined recitative in this country is the "devotional" tradition of oratorio. What is really recitative in an opera is not to be confounded with the recitative in an oratorio, if that is music, not reverence but common sense. It is common sense that will help to reconstruct the continuous line of an opera that is broken up by dialogue.

In most opera-houses the singer comes to the footlights and almost seems to announce—or the conductor, like a toastmaster at a city banquet, seems to announce it for her—"Ladies and gentlemen, pray silence for the celebrated aria Non so piu, as sung by Madame Malibran, Madame Patti, Madame," &c., &c. &c. It has ceased to be part of the play, part of the character; worse still, it has ceased to be part of the opera. There are dozens of arias that have suffered in this way, because some singers cannot bear to have another singer on the stage during their number. It is supposed to be talking to Susanna all the time; but Susanna must leave the stage so as not to distract the attention of the audience from Cherubino's voice-production.

In all such cases the producer must insist on some stage device which links up one scene with another. Moreover, spoken dialogue and action with it must be considered as part of the music. They must be rhythmical, whether the work be verse or prose. Lines must be taken up with the same sense of musical rhythm as in an ensemble; gestures must be made and steps taken in definite rhythms, the one movement made in conscious relation to the other. Speech must glide imperceptibly into recitative, recitative into song; and parallel with this, movement and gesture must be more naturalistic or more conventional according as they accompany speech or music. From the rise of the curtain to its fall the rhythmic line must be continuous. Some actors are so anxious to be natural that they purposely ignore the instrumental interludes, which they fill up with business. This is certainly a mistake. One would not wish to interpret Mozart and Wagner in exactly the same style; but both designed their interludes to express something felt by the characters, and the actors must make such movements as will interpret them. Or rather, the actors must make such movements as will cause the music to interpret their feelings. Herein lies the kernel of the whole problem: the characters on the stage must so sing and so move that the audience are induced to believe that every note of the music, whether sung or played, is created by the force of their emotions. It is not the leitmotiv that produces the gesture, but the emotion which produces both the gesture and the leitmotiv which illustrates it. On the singers, therefore, lies the whole burden of the opera, and it follows that every singer ought to understand the whole opera as intimately as the conductor is expected to do. No wonder that "idealists" is considered a word of opprobrium.

EDWARD J. DENT.

CONCERTS

Miss Sybil Eaton is at present a good violinist by fits and starts. She has some flexibility of style and the right instinct for phrasing, but her tone is not reliable. For a time it keeps at a high level of purity and volume; then something seems to go wrong, and for a minute or two it becomes rough, uneven, out of control. Miss Eaton is a gracious player, and it is well worth while for her to overcome this technical weakness. She was partnered on February 2nd by Mr. Harold Samuel in Brahms' D minor Sonata, but while each played their own part, it is hard to say whether it really suited them. Miss Eaton's grey, austere handling of the violin part hardly fitted the warmer and more romantic playing of Mr. Samuel. The work will bear either interpretation, but scarcely both at the same time.

Mr. Reginald Steggall's new Trio in D minor, played by the London Trio on February 3, is a thing of shreds and patches, mostly cut from an old and austerely magnificent Messrs. Eaton and Nuñez model. The trio is numbered opus 27, so it is time Mr. Steggall was finding his own idiom, if he is ever going to do so. At no time was the playing of a high order: M. Pescak's seems to be short of practice, and his intonation was by no means flawless. But want of rhythm is the real trouble; no member of the trio seems to have any sense of it at all.

The artists at the London Chamber Concert Society's first concert on February 3 were the English String Quartet, and the chief works performed were Debussy's String Quartet and Schubert's Octet. The quartet's playing suffered rather from want of balance; the viola tone was too prominent throughout, whilst the second violin err'd in the other direction. The performance had much about it that one could praise, but showed too clearly that four admirable players may make an equally admirable quartet. In the Octet, naturally, one was much less conscious of this defect, as the additional parts divert a good deal of the attention from the strings, and with the help of Messrs. Hambay (double bass), James (bassoon), Brain (horn), and Draper (clarinet) a very fine and spirited interpretation was given, the tone of the wind being consistently good throughout. In between the Schubert and the Debussy, Mr. Murray Davey sang a group of his own songs, which left the impression that his gifts are of the interpretative rather than the creative order.

Nu pianoforte 'e voce sonata, luntamente . . . One knew that the concert given by Mr. Bertram Binyon at the Zolli Hall on February 5 would be an evening at Naples; one can only wish that it had been more Neapolitan than it was. Mr. Binyon generally limits his repertoire to things which he really likes; his variety of tone is limited, and he is getting a tendency to force certain notes by attempting to take them on the middle register. But in such things as a chamber cantata by Alessandro Scarlatti (Per un momento solo) and in a group of nineteenth-century Neapolitan songs he was admirable, alike in delicacy of expression and beauty of diction. If he sent people away contentedly humming Luna d'argento, lass' o suon, he sent some of his hearers home to read Salvatore di Giacomo. The real poetry and artistic sincerity of di Giacomo, and of the author of Fenestra che lasci si noto luci, showed up well by comparison with some of the other verses. What a pity it is, by the way, that singers of old Italian songs do not get someone to work out the continuo for them in a more scholarly and contrapuntal fashion!

Drama

SOME MORALS AND AN EMOTION

LYRIC THEATRE.—Dryden's "Marriage à-la-mode.”

That delicate appreciator of dramatic values, Mr. Sneer, congratulated the managers because, in the midst of a luxurious and dissipated age, they preserved two houses in the capital where the conversation was always moral at least, if not entertaining. Our own age seems to have reversed the maxim. We do not mind the conversation on our stage not being moral, but we take remarkably good care that it shall not be entertaining. There is no other way of accounting for the fact that while — and — are playing (we hear) to crowded houses, the "Phoenix" has to produce Dryden's "Marriage à-la-mode" under the conventions of a private performance, and is meanwhile told by representative theatrical organs that it is really a disgraceful institution altogether. This preferential treatment surely cannot be due to the circumstance that Dryden drums into our ears matters which modern writers merely labour to insinuate into our imaginations, for that would come perilously near humbug—a vice from which we, as a nation, have been so mercifully preserved. It must be, then, that we are only allowed to see Dryden in private because he is witty, and perhaps on the whole it is a wise precaution. The shock of the unaccustomed is often fatal.

We have said so much because moralizing are expected of a critic on occasions like the present; and we should have been glad to let the moral question go at that. But we find we cannot get away from the moral issue so easily. Somebody keeps jogging our elbow, and pointing out a moral latent in the comedy which audiences are liable to overlook, and which he is keenly anxious they should not be allowed to avoid. We really believe this insistent ghost is the author himself! The point on which, by every artifice in his power, he fixes our attention is the essential worthiness of those two bad young men, Rhodophil, the Captain of the Guard, and Palamede, the courtier. Like Melantha, we develop a tendre for them. Compared with that fretful, frowning, ferocious tyrant Polydamas, or his crafty counsellor Argaeon, or that shiftless wretch, artisan of her own unhappiness, Amalthea, or that remarkably raw cub of a Prince, Leonidas, how brightly they shine! What sanity, what kindness, and (there is no other word) what decency they display on almost all occasions! How unhesitatingly they plunge into a street row to save the supposed "boy" from his tipsy assailants! How simply they accept the fact that one of them will have to forgo a night's certain pleasure to save the strange lad from further misadventures! And then, when the wine is scarcely tasted, and the exasperating message comes from the Castle that an outbreak is feared that night and they must report for duty at once, how uncomplainingly they take their hats and cloaks, with no more solace than Palamede's shattering couplet beginning, "Let rogues defend religion and the laws!" If one half of what Dryden meant to teach his audience is contained in the Epilogue, where Rhodophil challenges them to deny that all along they have been hoping the risky scenes would grow riskier still, the other half, we think, is contained in that great line. He must all along have had in mind to show how much less base these frail mortals were than the eminently respectable world they were hired to support. "Let rogues defend religion and the laws!" But, alas! it is Rhodophil and Palamede who defend them. They would otherwise
IMPOTENT CONCLUSIONS

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—" Tea for Three." A Comedy. By Roi Cooper Megrue.

The plot of "Tea for Three" can be very briefly told. A gay young wife is married to a plodding, rather dull husband. She seeks to be distracted from boredom by renewing acquaintance with a professional lady's man, who is saved from fatuity by his wit and shrewdness. She gets as far as an evening visit to his rooms, but her husband follows and proposes to her admirer a noiseless duel: the one who draws the unlucky card to make away with himself within twenty-four hours. It is the lover who loses, and he accepts his destiny with well-bred stoicism; but, when his suicide is announced in the paper some hours earlier than was expected, the husband is stricken with remorse, and the wife, divining what he has done, declares in a tremendous outburst that he has robbed her of a fine and innocent friendship—a statement which, whether from the fault of the author or the actress, we cannot possibly believe, any more than we believe in the lover's own disinterested appreciation of the lady, as he expresses it when he first announced his intention to commit suicide, to say good-bye, and ultimately to consent, on the husband's entreaty, to forgo suicide. This is all ample enough, but what follows is positively futile. For it is now made clear in a confidential scene with the wife, that the man never did take the duel in earnest, never for a moment contemplated death, and had the fake report of his demise put into the paper by a friend, in the certainty that it would lead to his being forgiven. He was not willing to give his life, he explained, but he was willing to pay £50 to bring off this coup. The three were last seen settling down amicably to tea, after which, we suppose, da capo.

As has been hinted, the strength of the play lies in its delineation of the trained philanderer, who (up to the last act at least) has a sufficiently manly cynicism not to appear a pure papa. Mr. Stanley Logan does the part every justice, and it is a veritable and an exhausting one. For the husband and wife, more thought seems to have been left to rely on what Mr. A. E. Matthews and Miss Fay Compton can read into the text. To find Mr. Matthews being scored off, instead of scoring off other people, is as much of a shock as it would be to see Sherlock Holmes' pocket picked, and by the way he acts he deeply resents it. It is, however, impossible for him not to put some delicious touches into any parting he essays. Miss Fay Compton displays to the full her delicate comic talent, but we do not think the lady was meant to be all call, and when some stroke of genuine feeling was needed, it was, frankly, not forthcoming. Should not such an inaccuracy be a danger-signal to a rising actress?

Correspondence

The Cost of Living at Oxford and Cambridge

To the Editor of The Athenaeum.

Sir,—The correspondence in several of the newspapers and weekly journals on the possibility of student life at Cambridge or Oxford on £105 (or is it £125?) per year interests me, because I think I am perhaps more vitally affected by the problem than any of the writers know to what decreasing case, I stand for undiminished studentship. An application for University Training and Grant was rejected—in some way or other I slipped through the clinks of the regulations. I have, however, a disability pension of 16s. per week, and on that I carry on. So when I, with my 10 per year, read that the student life is important, I am inclined to calculate that this is surely Grossus planting poverty. Of course, the difference in the irreducible cost is enormous. Yet I feel my position is at all events not so hard as some of the cases, and the question is not what I cannot do, but how far I can get. E. M. W.
the excuse of studenthip I have committed all sorts of crimes against independence, but then it is so easy to sponge on people. One is not assisted by a sufficient general austerity. One even receives gratuitous help. People are too kind. I believe if one did get to the dug-out stage the experiment would take the startling turn of a flourishing provision stall, the details being presentations left furiously in the night by anxious neighbours. Was it Mr. Clive Bell who suggested that the young artist should be granted a sixpenny doss-house bed? But isn't this molly-coddling? Sixpence is a singularly difficult amount to earn.

There is another aspect to this question. The natural result of education is revolution. The brightest students of all time compete for positions on the extreme left. The Government which modernizes and subordinates art essentially to economics. English embryonic Lenin is probably even now at Oxford or Cambridge, costing the Government he is destined to overthrow £165 (or is it £225?) per annum. Genius is a cuckoo—he throws his benefactors out of the nest. Therefore, for the preservation of good manners, and the avoidance of ingratitude, is it not better to refuse help to genius? And if genius should not be assisted, who should?

SHAKESPEARE'S HAREBELL

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—It is quite easy to show that the wild hyacinth was Shakespeare's harebell. A flower of the same name and construction, and he is usually accurate in this respect. There is a probability that Fletcher does the same in the bridal song in "The Two Noble Kinsmen," in which (if I remember rightly) Professor Skeat proposed to read,

Primrose, first-born child of Ver,
With harebells dim,
In place of the (to us) meaningless "her bells dim." But it is not necessary to adduce any other proof than is given us by the old herbalists. Gerard figures and describes the English jacinth (hyacinth) as Hare's bell; Parkinson follows him to the same effect, and I am under the impression that others do so too. The first known appearance of the name as applied to the campanula is, I believe, in the Scottish poet Mickle, and later Scottish writers have done much to extend this use of it. But some of our modern poets stick to the older usage. Thus Coventry Patmore,

Touch'd by the zephyr dances the harebell,
Cuckoo sits somewhere singing so loud, in a poem of the very early spring. As for the reason for the name, Phillips ("Flora Historica") suggests that it is due to the fact that the flower occurs frequently in places frequented by hares. I am aware that the name is now usually given to the campanula, but I believe it is pleasant to hear children in Kew Gardens speaking of "the pretty harebells under the trees." I have omitted to say that there is an old rhyme ("quoted by Folkard") which runs:

About St. George, when blue is worn,
The blue harebells the fields adorn.

St. George's Day is April 23. Shakespeare's birthday. I should add that all my citations are from memory, but they may be trusted, and I could add to them.

Yours truly,

C. C. Bell

ART AND THE SCHOOLBOY

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Dear Sir,—Mr. Oscar Browning's letter in last week's Athenæum made me look up the leading article to which he referred, and which I had missed. May I say how much I agree with the writer's plea for combating an indifference to art before it is firmly established, by means of some form of teaching on the subject? But what is the practice of schoolmasters also? But whereas the writer advocates lectures by different types of evangelists, both orthodox and rebellious, and proposes that each should urge his views upon the audience, I would suggest an alternative plan, and one that would be less confusing to beginners. Why not show slides of good and bad versions of the same subject, and leave the boys and girls to decide for themselves what they like? Show them, for example, tree studies by a Sung painter, Claude, Leader, and...
FOREIGN LITERATURE

A DESIRABLE DEVIL

EL DIABLO COJUELO. Por Luis Vélez de Guevara. Edición y notas de Francisco Rodríguez Marín. "Clásicos Castellanos." (Madrid, "La Lectura." 4 ptas.)

EL DIABLO COJUELO. Por Luis Vélez de Guevara. "Colección Universal." (Madrid and Barcelona, Calpe. 30 c.)

VELEZ de Guevara's story has always been a favourite in Spain, and in the eighteenth century it became known to the whole of Europe through the version of Le Sage. The reason for its popularity is not difficult to find. "Cojuelo" is vastly entertaining to read; and it will stand being read in the most perilous conditions to which a classic can be submitted—the actual scene of the story, three hundred years later. I happen to be sitting at a fourth-floor window in the very street to which Cojuelo flew with Don Cleofás, when they perched on the top of a tower and looked down on the most intimate life of Madrid as if the houses had no roofs to them; and I can only wish that some subtle fiend of Cojuelo's tribe would lift the roof from the brains of modern Madrid, so that one could see what was going on inside—and at the same time warm the room a little.

"El Diablo Cojuelo" may not be a work of real greatness, but it has many of the attributes of immortality. It is still interesting to read, and, though not particularly bawdy, has things in it to interest everyone. Do you like the Ballet? Cojuelo boasts that he was the inventor of some of the most famous—or infamous—dances; the Saraband, the Chaconne and the "Bullicucuz." Are you a musician? Guevara is always bringing in music. He gives a diverting description of street musicians, hired to sing madrigals beneath a lady's window, being put to flight by another band hired by someone else for the same purpose. Their performance, he says, cued in "a fugue in four or five different directions." Do you revel in the hectic globe-trotting of Sylvia Scarlett? Cojuelo thinks little of flying over to Constantinople for the night, and pausing in Venice on the way back to chatter with the private secretaries of diplomats in the Piazza. Have you written letters to The Athenaeum in slang in war-time? Perhaps you can explain why it is that all the abuse showered on Cojuelo and Don Cleofás by three strangers at a roadside inn, only the words used by the Englishman are unintelligible? The Frenchman's remarks are in the best traditions of the British soldier, and would be comprehended as they stand by every modern Englishman. But the Englishman in the story, instead of basing his imprecations upon the facts of theology or physiology, merely remarks: "Nitesgut español." It might be thought at first that this wandering "Englishman" was really a German, as indeed is sometimes the case; but Don Francisco Rodriguez Marín (whose learned notes are often as entertaining as Gibbon's) rather pervertedly interprets the phrase as "Nitty (lousy) goose," or even "Naughty Guest." If the Englishman had said "You no bon," he would have been recognizable at once. But "Nitesgut?" Is it not more probable that another explanation is the right one, and that Guevara confounded two unknown Nitesguts in his languages, thinking that Nichts gut would pass for English?

"El Diablo Cojuelo" is connected with a curious piece of literary history. In 1707 Le Sage published "Le diable boiteux," which was taken almost entirely from Guevara, as Le Sage himself admitted. He wrote plays in imitation of Calderon and Lope de Vega, and brought out a shortened French version of the famous picaroon novel, "Don Guzman de Alfarache." His masterpiece was, of course, "Gil Blas de Santillana," which, though Spanish in form and argument, is undoubtedly an original work of Le Sage. Among the learned Jesuits expelled from Spain in the middle of the eighteenth century was a certain Padre Isla, who had written an amusing book on "The History of the Celebrated Preacher, Brother Gerund," and parodied with exquisite humour the conventional type of sermon to which an eighteenth-century Spanish congregation used to listen with complacency and approval. Some time after the ingenious Jesuit was comfortably settled in Bologna, an unknown admirer in Madrid wrote explaining that he was in want; could Padre Isla possibly send him a book which he might sell como pan bendito, i.e., at a high price, as having belonged to the celebrated and unfortunate author of "Fray Gerundillo"? Padre Isla sent him a Castilian version of "Gil Blas," accompanied by a learned and plausible "preliminary conversation" in which he endeavoured to prove that it was not written by Le Sage at all, but by an unknown Spanish author who had composed it during the ministry of Olivas, but had been prevented from publishing it by the Government. Le Sage, he claimed, had spent many years in Spain attached to the French Embassy, and had made friends with a certain Andalucian lawyer, from whom he received the manuscript of "Gil Blas." Isla's version, which is a free translation of Le Sage, was published at Valencia after his death with the title: "Gil Blas, Stolen from Spain and adopted in France by M. Le Sage, now restored to his native land and original language by a zealous Spaniard who will not allow his country to be made fun of." Padre Isla succeeded in converting a certain number of people to his theory; but there is little doubt that it was really a joke, and from the character of the man and his acute sense of fun, this explanation may be considered the most likely. He was, however, seriously opposed by certain erudite Spaniards and Frenchmen, and in 1818 evidence was adduced to show that Le Sage, though exceedingly well read in Spanish literature, had never been in Spain in his life. Since then "Gil Blas" has been proved to be a patchwork, and the sources from which it was compiled have been fully worked out.

Of the two new editions of "El Diablo Cojuelo," that issued in the collection of "Classics Castellanos," is fully up to the standard set by the earlier publications of "La Lectura," both in type and scholarship. The pocket edition in the new "Colección Universal" is remarkably well printed, and has the advantage that, while it explains some of the more difficult words, it does not distract one's attention from the story.

TIRED JOURNALISM

Le Diable à l'Hôtel: ou Les Plaisirs Imaginaires. Par Emile Henriot. (Paris, Émile-Paul Frères. 3fr. 50.)

There are many books which are clearly not literature, and are usually described conveniently as "journalism," but the term does not really convey very much. There is no necessary implication of praise or reproach; it is a mere category, a classification, with no descriptive significance. It can be applied with equal justice to a dozen books which have nothing in common but the lack of certain qualities which are usually regarded as essential to literature. As applied to "Le Diable à l'Hôtel" it means something very like hackwork. We do not know if M. Henriot really passed a few weeks at the Hôtel du Consul Septimius at Aix, or if such an establishment in fact exists. We do not know if he really discussed cabbalism with Michel Riom, and conceived a hopeless passion for Miss Doris Dorotheia Curtiss. But we are inclined to believe every word of "Le Diable à l'Hôtel" because it is so convincingly dull. Surely no one could have evoked so clannish and unsatisfactory a holiday from his imagination. This tedious recital is surely printed straight from the note-book of a tired reporter who has found nothing interesting to report—journalism, in fact, in one of its most depressing phases—the phase when it induces a man to write and write when he has absolutely nothing to say. W.

LETTERS FROM ITALY

VII. PANZINI*

A FRÉDO PANZINI is a writer who has acquired a great reputation in Italy during the last few years. Born at Sinigaglia in 1863, he became a humble master in a Liceo, and he continues to divide his busy life between teaching and literary work. He leaped into fame a few years ago after a long period of obscurity, but success has not spoiled him. He had already found his way, and he has continued to pursue it steadily and calmly, without unduly forcing his rather limited talent in an attempt to achieve more startling effects.

"Il Libro dei Morti," published in 1893, was his first book. It was followed by "Lepida et Tristia," short stories published in Treves' Illustrazione Italiana; "Piccole Storie del Mondo Contemporaneo," where, among commonplace stories and poems that contains Loreto and Recanati; by "Novelle di Ambo i Sessi," and by a large number of short stories in the daily papers and the reviews.

His Dizionario Moderno sets him clearly before us both as scholar and as artist. The mere erudition of the lexicographer is here combined with an instructive insight into the meanings of words by means of which he is able to give us historical rather than verbal interpretations of them. Unlike most dictionaries, it is quite short, since Panzini confines himself to a few selected words and phrases in general use, and instead of explaining them he allows his character, his humour and his craftsmanship to play round them and suggest a commentary.

If we look up the word "humour," which, as we shall soon see, is a very marked characteristic of the man, we find that he says:

The humourist has his own way of expressing truth—a way that is at once marvelously simple and marvelously subtle. The contrast between actual truth and reality and man's normal activities is so glaring that the strongest of feeling it provokes is an impulse to laugh. Under this laugh there generally runs an undercurrent of pessimism. Simplicity is the first condition, the essence of humour.

We shall return to this subject later. For the moment we will turn to Panzini's best book, "La Lanterna di Diogene" (1907). The plot is, as always with him, very slight—a bicycle trip from Milan to a little village on the coast of Emilia which he calls Bellaria. There is nothing in it that has even a shadow of an adventure or a touch of the sporting outlook. Little incidents of the journey, frugal meals in tiny inns buried among mountains, miles. They are, in fact, mere trifles that would leave the reader altogether cold but for the personality of the author, by means of which they are tricked out in attractive colours. At bottom all these incidents are merely pretexts for setting his mind working, since he requires the stimulus of a material object, of the obvious and commonplace contrasts of everyday life, to enable him to embroil his delicate philosophy upon it.

Indeed, he is continually reminding us that he is a philosopher and likes us to know that he reads the "Phædo" and Homer in Greek. But this he does altogether without ostentation and with a kind of melancholy, as if his scepticism had convinced him that the world would go on much the same without either the philosophy or the poems, and that a knowledge of them will at best cast a shadow of melancholy over human affairs. But as a matter of fact he is anything but a philosopher. Face to face with a world that can stand firmly upon its own legs without philosophy he reaches the conclusion that the ideas of the philosopher and the non-philosopher are very much alike, so that, in the last instance, Plato finds himself in the same boat with the swearing fisherman or the Socialist postman who philosophizes in his own way. The contrasts are not reconciled, as the thinker would have it, but instead, treated with a kindly irony based upon an affectionate understanding of life in all its aspects, each one of which possesses an inherent necessity of its own. At bottom his irony is aimed rather at his own weakness for philosophy than at the attitude of the vulgar.

February

13,

THE ATHENAEUM

1920

Panzini's irony has resulted in his being considered a humorist in the English sense of the term. It cannot be denied that his humour often wells up spontaneously, though But it
at times he exaggerates it to the verge of silliness.
is no less true that it does not form an essential element in his temperament, which is too easily moved I might almost say too romantic to be perfectly at home in the fetters ot an ironical mannerism adopted as an end in itself.
His humour is merely a cloak for his feelings, a sort of virginal masculine shrinking from displaying his emotions and his inmost thoughts to the world. In this he reminds us of Gozzano, who also shields the deeper places of his soul under literature and irony.

—

—

But Panzini is better balanced. He has more of the wisdom of the serpent, and is therefore better able to shelter himself behind the mask of his humour.
In
La Lanterna di Diogene " there is a special charm about this reserve, this attempt to conceal himself, his true self, though it insists on peeping out here and there from behind the mask with which he has not yet succeeded in screening himself completely.
But in his later work the fit of the mask is too perfect, and Panzini's methods have the coldness of a mannerism, almost of a cliche.
His decadence has begun.
In "La Lanterna di Diogene" he still retains enough of " Let us be frank the consciousness of his true self to write it is easy to sit in an armchair with a pipe in one's mouth and write a prescription that will reconcile the contradictions of life and still more easy to seize upon the ridiculous side of human life.
True philosophy is better symbolized by the forefinger upon the lips silence." His honestly sentimental attitude towards philosophy and anti-philosophy, touched off as equivalents, finds even better expression
Now everyone knows that, for the fool, the Lord is outside us, while the heir of evolution has taken Him within himseli all very attractive, but as we are mere pigmies, things remain pretty much as they were and we find ourselves terribly alone all
'

:

:

;

—

:

:

—

the same.
But the essentially romantic character of the man is brought out even more clearly by his strong feeling for nature, which finds expression in the numerous lyrics, innocent of rhyme or metre, that stud his pages. He lets himself go when face to face with Nature far more completely than when among his fellows, who always put him upon the defensive.

And Nature appeals to him not merely in the freshness of the free, healthy feelings she awakens, but even more in the spiritualizing of her history. Indeed, he tells us that in setting himself to relate the story of his bicycle one of his objects was to see whether his brain was still elastic, that is, able not merely to receive strong impressions from the beautiful living things around him, but to see all the past that has vanished and ceased to live and to feel the approach of the future. Thus he harmonizes and fuses his historical sense with his feeling for Nature, creating a landscape that is profoundly subjective and lyrical, in the sense in which the artist sees the vast expanse of his own thoughts reflected in the world around him. This is the kind of naturalism that harmonizes best with a man of to-day.

It is not a simple feeling for Nature as " alma parens," not a return of the spirit upon itself, detached from Nature, but a close union between Nature humanized and made history, that is the most striking characteristic of the art we see ripening in the spirit of to-day.
In Panzini, as in Gozzano, this art is only just beginning reflection is often superimposed upon Nature, failing to harmonize with it from the very fact that it remains external to it the inspiration
flags and becomes intermittent.
But both are upon the right way. or at least upon the new way.
If we compare them with D'Annunzio's landscapes, where the lyrical personality is almost swallowed up in the world of sensations wliK b it is impossible to reconcile with these historical landscapes, we shall see that the inspiration is profoundly We mi^'nt almost be dealing with a return to imitative.
Canlucu's historical landscapes, although, in saying so, we are making comparisons that are altogether on the surface, so different is Carducci's conception of history from that of these moderns.
In "La Lanterna di Diogene" I'anzmi plumes himself not a little upon his Hellenism, upon a pagan tendency in his thought.
Yet nothing could be further removed from Hellenism than his sentimental, almost morbidly subjective temperament. And when in his novel " Santippe " (1914)

223 he attempted a Greek subject, the falseness of the result was hardly concealed by the richness of the humour. It is true that he chose for his characters a woman so thoroughly un-Greek as the shrew Xanthippe, and Socrates, the least Greek of all the great men of Greece, who, in his inward struggles, foreshadows in no small degree the subjective struggles of our own day.

But to set them in their Greek milieu was a task altogether beyond his power for although he knows Greek, he is at bottom a thorough modern, tortured in spirit and incapable of getting outside himself.
He has given us a degenerate Socrates, who has become a Panzini and uses Panzini's irony, though all the time he lacks the feeling of a modern writer.
The book is pleasant enough
;

reading, so long as we forget the historical characters and see in it nothing more than a pendant to " La Lanterna di Diogene," a fantasy of the author, who has for the moment donned the clothes of the Greek philosopher.
" La
Panzini's last books have been his least successful.
Madonna di Mama " is the story of the adventures of a professor during the war, very thin and of no importance.
" Un Yiaggio Circolare in Prima Classe di un Povero Letterato," part of which appeared in the Nuova Antologia in January-February, 1915, and which has been published in volume form by Treves of Milan, is merely a rechauffe of
"

La Lanterna

Diogene "

—

a journey with impressions
Indeed, of recent years Panzini's signs of exhaustion. Travelling is for him no longer an excuse for looking about and meditating upon himself it has become a mechanical process for producing books. The true content, the impressions and reflections, recur again and again in a way that is wearisome and commonplace. It is obvious that Panzini has written himself out and has furbished up his old ideas in order to produce a book for commercial purposes.
It is well to read only one thing by Panzini his best work is undoubtedly "La Lanterna di Diogene" because one easily tires of him.
We always find the same antitheses, the same irony, but unfortunately not always the same lyrical confessions
it is only in his best books that they relieve the mediocrity of his half -philosophical, half -artistic humour. But it says much for Panzini that after the deluge of literary bombast and the orgies of sensuality of the last few years, he has brought us back to a world of honest simplicity, in which the taste of the public, now eager for healthy literature, may have a chance of recovering itself.
di

of scenery and people.
artistic vein shows sad

;

—
—

;

GUIDO DE RUGGIERO.

trip

;

;

Da

(Rome, La Voce. 3.50 lire.) Piero Jahier.
Italian writers of to-day have not yet found it necessary to devote portentous volumes to the record of their schooldays, they are showing a tendency to "reminisce" at an age when their fathers were thinking of beginning to live.
In one who has fought through the war this is only natural, for the violent rending of all the threads that linked his early life to the present must give it a peculiar completeness and remoteness. Obviously there is much that is autobiographical in Signor Jahier's " Ragazzo," and once we are through the first chapter with its sensationally futuristic description of the boy's feelings at the sudden death of his father, the erring Calvinist minister, it becomes distinctly interesting, and strikes that genuine note that is so characteristic of its author. The mother belongs to the old school. It is not for her to understand her children. Good management, not sympathy, is wanted to bring up a family of six on a much reduced income, as at least her daughter realizes, and we get considerable
Is not his weekly struggle insight into how it is all done.
with the butcher for a good piece of meat for the family
We see something of among the boy's most vivid memories his school life, where he first Learns the joy of earning money, But clearly
if only for doing .mother boy's exercises for him.
it is the village in the mountains whence his ancestors sprang and where he spends his holidays hat appeals most irresistibly to Signor Jahier, though when at last tie returns thither ho se non finds " nulla, nulla rimasto ferino secondo il cuore Corse le grandi montagne."

Ragazzo.

Though the young

t

—

In the course of March a furthei sale of twenty-six illuminated manuscripts and eight fine incunabula printed on vellum from the Yates-'i hompson collection will be held by Messrs. Sotheby, The books are of the highest rarity in any form more especially when on vellum and illuminated, as most of these are.

—


List of New Books
Prepared in co-operation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding with the Dewey Decimal System; the sub-classes being indicated, for the benefit of librarians and others familiar with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. The first numeral in these represents the main class, the second one of the subdivisions, and so on.

Those works in the List which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

GENERAL WORKS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY, ENCYCLOPÆDIAS, MAGAZINES, &c.

See review, p. 211.

Sayle (A.). VILLAGE LIBRARIES: a guide to their formation and upkeep. Grant Richards, 1919. 8 in. 135 pp. apps., 5 n. 027.4

See review, p. 212.

100 PHILOSOPHY.

Five years ago, the author says, he felt that the war was part of the vindication of the moral order, part of the needed protest against this "God's world" and not just a complicated and bewildering material machine. Yet now, for lack of moral improvement, we cannot find peace. For most men, Mammon still sits in the seat of God. Yet if God is still there "working His purpose out," according as men supply the conditions, then all we need is faith enough to enter boldly upon this "Way of Peace." Canon Burroughs has founded his chapters on the Benedictus; but his book is no commonplace sermon or text-book of doctrine, and will be read with sympathy and edification.

*Freud (Sigmund). Totem and Taboo: resemblances between the psychic lives of savages and neurotics. Authorized translation, with introduction by A. A. Brill. Routledge, 1919. 9 in. 290 pp., 10/6 n. 132

See review, p. 225.

200 RELIGION.

Hennessy (Theodore Harber). Joel, Obadiah, Jonah and Malachi. Cambridge, University Press, 1919. 6½ in. 130 pp. index, 3/ n. 224.7 and .9

Lucid commentaries for the use of young students. Each commentary is accompanied by the text of the R.V. provided with numerous footnotes.

*Selwyn (Edward Carus). First Christian Ideas. Edited, with an introductory memoir, by his eldest son. Murray, 1919. 9 in. 285 pp. index, 9/ n. 225.6

In this fascinating study Dr. Selwyn endeavours to trace the influence of various passages from the O.T. prophetical writings on the writers of the Gospels. The book abounds in neat and ingenious criticism; many knotty points are convincingly elucidated, and the implications of Dr. Selwyn's main thesis make his book more than an interesting and learned contribution to N.T. textual criticism.

A reprint of Archdeacon Srawley's introduction to, and translation of, the bishop's letters.

300 SOCIOLOGY.

*Barker (J. Ellis). Economic Statesmanship. Murray, 1920. 9 in. 624 pp. index, 16/ n. 390.4

The new edition of this valuable book contains a substantial addition of some 200 pages, in which the author examines the economic position and future of Japan and Russia; the British Coal Problem and the Sankey Report (which is described as a disaster); British Railways, Canals and Roads; the Merchant Marine and the Empire; Land and Housing (the author wisely advocates a simple registration of title); British Industrial Inefficiency (here he produces startling figures concerning the output of the British and the American workman); and Labour Unrest. On this vexed topic the author admits that the interests of Capital and Labour must be made identical; this end he hopes to achieve by a form of profit-sharing, increasing the capital of a concern by 80 per cent. and distributing these shares among the workers. There is still the argument of the supremacy of opportunity. Srawley observes at the present time, when the inflation of capital proceeds apace. One may not agree with all Mr. Barker's conclusions, but there is no doubt that his book is a storehouse of important facts and figures.

The report records the flourishing condition of Bootham School, testifies to the widening of the pupils' mental outlook, and includes an account of the successful trial of a limited measure of self-government among the boys of the upper school.

Mr. Branford makes a great display of italics, and thus conveys an impression of much earnestness. His statements have, indeed, all the force of platitudes, and we wish that he had given us a more detailed study of the ways in which his generalities might be applied to actual problems.

A clear and interesting account of the legal aspect of insurance. Although written primarily for those engaged in insurance business, it may be read with profit by the ordinary person who has taken out any kind of insurance policy. Several of the cases quoted are neat, subtle, and thoroughly illuminating.

The author's starting point is the eighteenth century. Chapters are devoted to the industrial and agrarian revolutions; to the beginnings of banking, credit, and industrial capitalism; to poor-law reform, and the regulations of factory life; to mining, railways, and shipping; and to strikes, the co-operative movement, and modern social and industrial conditions.

400 PHILOLOGY.

Buzza (G. Kessen) et Hure (H. E.), La Langue Francaise: grammaire à l'usage des classes moyennes et supérieures. Murray, 1920. 7½ in. 246 pp. 3/6 n. 445

Succinct and clear explanations are the distinguishing features of this grammar, which has been compiled to meet the requirements of secondary school pupils. The book includes some "exceptions" often omitted from school grammars.

There is no near cut to the Russian language, unless, perhaps, for a very keen-versed philologist. The less fortunate neophyte must be prepared for much spade-work and a great effort of sheer memory. On the other hand, such is the structure of Russian that a thorough mastery of the elements, once laboriously attained, rewards the student with almost instantaneous illumination. Mr. Forbes clears the ground admirably by beginning with the pronouns, adverbs and similar particles round which so much of Russian idiom turns. Exhaustive exercises are appended to each chapter, and the ambitious student is referred to the more advanced publications of the same author.
Grace (Stanley W.). A Primer of French Pronunciation. Methuen [1920]. 8 in. 147 pp. index. 3/6 441.5

A work on “practical phonetics” applied to French, which is offered as an attempt at a logical treatment of the pronunciation of the language, and is designed to be a guide to English teachers of French orthoepy. There are some especially good features in the book, e.g. the chapters upon liaison, H aspirate, final consonants, and words frequently mispronounced.

Segal (Louis). Russian Idioms and Phrases. Kegan Paul [1919]. 5 by 7½ in. 52 pp., 2/6 n. 491.7

An extremely useful book. Our only complaint is that the author too frequently paraphrases instead of giving the strictly corresponding English idiom; e.g., “to live like cat and dog” is just as much an English as a Russian phrase.

600 USEFUL ARTS.

A well-illustrated book, the purpose of which is to explain, non-technically, the business of electric “railroading.”

An able summary, dealing with the origin, occurrence, properties, classification, sampling, and analysis of coal.

*Stone (Gilbert). The British Coal Industry. Dent, 1919. 7½ in. 200 pp., index, 3/6 n. 629.33

Sometime Deputy Head of Production in the Coal Mines Department, Assistant Secretary to the Coal Industry Commission, and Secretary to the Controllers’ Advisory Board, Mr. Stone is well qualified to lay before the public some of the psychological, sociological and material problems which are associated with the coal industry, and to deal with aspects of the controversy between the representatives of Capital and Labour respecting British collieries. The author considers that the operations and financial results of the coal industry should be made fully public.

800 LITERATURE.

The current number of this chameleon-hued and lively periodical contains a fine drawing by Mr. Wymund Lewis, and a brilliantly facetious story by him called “Signs of Life.” But why on earth Mr. Lewis should employ his great literary talent on such a piece of epitaphs passes our comprehension. Mr. T. S. Eliot contributes an able, and, we think, thoroughly sound article on the poetic drama d’apres the recent performance of the “Duchess of Malfi,” and Miss Dorothy Richardson supplies a further incident from the infinite life of Miriam, which lacks incisiveness, but is, on the other hand, more than sensationally coherent. The worst item in the number is an intolerably playful article on “Georgian Poetry.”

In her “Incident of Reflection” of the twentieth century in France this admirable French scholar writes chiefly of the last fourteen years, and in studies all too brief characterizes the personalities and the work of Maurice Barrès, Romain Rolland, Edmond Rostand, Claudel, Jammes, René Boylesque, André Gide, Péguy, Barbusse, Duhautel, and Colette.

In this pamphlet, which agreeably combines liveliness and learning, Mr. Phillimore seeks to refute certain arguments recently set forth by Professor Richmond in his inaugural address to the Humanity Committee. Professor Richmond holds that the four autobiographical verses, restored in the Oxford text of Virgil to the position which Nius was in the habit of saying they had occupied before Varrus’ recension, are spurious, and the work of Nius himself. Mr. Phillimore answers, as it seems to us convincingly, that there is no reason to doubt the authenticity of the verses.

Thorp (Joseph). Broken Bridges; or, The Bolshevist: an industrial play in three acts. Grant Richards [1920]. 8 in. 82 pp., 5/ n. 821.9

The author is better at a Labour article than a Labour play. His hero is general organizer of an association of engineers, and in a strike is treacherously menaced with a false exposure for bribery by his employer. He loves the employer’s daughter. All goes well in the end with the workmen and the lovers; not so with the autocratic head of the firm, who gives in all round, and retires a broken man.

POETRY.

Friedlaender (V. H.). A Friendship; and other poems. Country Life, 1919. 7½ in. 72 pp. index, boards, 3/6 n. 821.9

Miss Friedlaender has something to say. That in itself is enough to commend her book to the attention of readers grown a little weary of the emptiness of most contemporary poetic eloquence. She writes of the old, eternally actual themes, love, art, death—and especially death. She has thought about these things, felt them; what she has to say is her own and generally interesting. Her technique is traditional; she handles the established forms with lucidity and precision. At its best her expression is admirable; her weaknesses are due to too easy acceptance of the “poetical” words and phrases of tradition. Thus an otherwise excellent poem, “Art,” is, for us at least, enfeebled by No moment but may have in fee That bright, immortal alchemy.

Rhyne, we know, tyrannical; but nothing except an absolute inevitability of sense and sound can justify the use of a phrase so dead and dry as “have in fee.”

Sackville (Lady Margaret). Selected Poems. Constable, 1919. 7½ in. 141 pp. boards, 6/ n. 821.9

Lady Margaret Sackville is a feminine version of the late Richard Middleton, less vulgar than that luscious poet of paganism, but less securely competent as a technician. Her themes are the themes of Middleton—the gay seasons love and desire with their antithesis of crepuscular quiet, a selected Greek mythology, and the vaguely idealistic “dreams” of the romantics. Out of these materials she makes a bright, easy poetry, which it would be unfair to subject to the test of frequent reading. It is only at rare intervals that something of the permanent quality for eternity remains. Invitatio ad reposes, rises above the level of pleasant facility.

See review, p. 209.

This well-printed volume, the profits arising from the sale of which will be given to the Soldiers and Sailors Help Society, contains some hundreds and twenty war poems. The older generation is represented by such well-known names as Hardy, W. H. Davies, Guion, etc. Many of the youthful war poets are exemplified by poems of Robert Nichols, Sorley, Graves, the arman, Jeffery Day, and many others. Both editor and publishers are to be congratulated on the way in which they have done their tasks.

FICTION.

This well-printed volume, the profits arising from the sale of which will be given to the Soldiers and Sailors Help Society, contains some hundreds and twenty war poems. The older generation is represented by such well-known names as Hardy, W. H. Davies, Guion, etc. Many of the youthful war poets are exemplified by poems of Robert Nichols, Sorley, Graves, the arman, Jeffery Day, and many others. Both editor and publishers are to be congratulated on the way in which they have done their tasks.

Mauro, the illegitimate son of an Italian nobleman, after various adventures undertake to see Florence and enters the service of the younger brother of Lorenzo the Magnificent. He plays an important part in discovering the Plot of the Pazzi to assassinate Lorenzo and his brother, and the author has thus plenty of scope for stirring incidents. The book is closely printed, but the reader's attention does not flag.

Dodge (Henry Irving). _Skinner's Baby_. Jarrolds [1920]. 7 in. 248 pp. boards, 2/ n. $1.85

More than a suspicion of sentimentality is mingled with the mild humour of this American story of a little boy whose sensible upbringing has a wholesome influence on some of his young associates, and leads to more important results.

Leadbetter (Eric). _Shepherd's Warning_. Allen & Unwin [1920]. 7½ in. 270 pp., 7/ n.

See review, p. 211.

McFadden (G.V.). _The Preventive Man_. Lanc, 1920 7½ in. 304 pp., 7/ n.

The coasts of Dorset, and the beginning of the third decade of last century, form the setting of this story. The brother of Sylvester Clitheroe, a Government servant, has met with foul play in the remotely situated homestead of an aged miser. Clitheroe is attracted by the old man's niece, but a misunderstanding separates the lovers until just before the end of the book. The inhabitants of the district are all interested in smuggling, of which there are graphic descriptions. In spite of improbabilities, the book is well worth reading.

O'Brien (William). _When We Were Boys_. Maunsel, 1919. 7½ in. 586 pp. paper, 1/6 n.

A reissue, after the lapse of nearly thirty years, of Mr. O'Brien's novel, which was written during two separate terms of six months' imprisonment inGalway jail.

See review, p. 211.

Vanardy (Varick). _The Two-Faced Man_: a mystery story Jarrolds [1920]. 7 in. 254 pp., 7/ n. $1.85

This story is exciting, but many readers will still think it "jib" at the amount of crime and thieves' slang introduced. Robbery, murder, disguises and "automatons" are salient features of the tale. Two of the chief personages are a mysterious New York saloon-keeper, and a man who combines the parts of detective and thief.

920 BIOGRAPHY.

See review, p. 208.

Fox (Henry), first Lord Holland. Ulster (Giles Stephen Holland Fox-Strangways, sixth Earl of). Henry Fox, First Lord Holland: His Family and Relations. Murray, 1920. 2 vols. 9 in. 381, 402 pp. il. pors. apps. index. 32/ n. 920

See review, p. 206.

The autobiography of the Provençal poet has been well described as a true romance, and a series of _contes pleins de soleil_ expresses the whole life, the spirit and history of his race.

830-990 HISTORY.

Goode (W. T.). _Bolshevism at Work_. Allen & Unwin [1920]. 7 in. 142 pp. po. limp cl., 2/8 n. 947.09

The correspondent of the Manchester Guardian went to Russia last year, interviewed Lenin and Trotsky, and inspected industrial concerns, agriculture, and the Bolshevist system of food control, education, justice, State hygiene, &c. His report is directly contrary to the lurid statements appearing in most English journals. Soviet Russia is apparently as prosperous as could be under blockade conditions, and desires only to be let alone to work out her own salvation. She does not want to carry on propaganda abroad, yet would tolerate British, French, or American propaganda. Education is fostered, and "the materials of a splendid culture" exist in her theatres and collections of art.

Murro (James). _A History of Great Britain_: Part 2, 1603 A.D. to 1919 A.D. Oliver & Boyd [1919]. 7½ in. 616 pp. il. 942.06-09

The second volume of Mr. Murro's clearly arranged history begins with the accession of King James I. to the English throne, and the record is brought down to September, 1919. A useful time chart is appended, but it is a pity that there is no index.

940.9 THE GREAT EUROPEAN WAR.

Beauchamp (Pat), pseud. _Fanny Goes to War_. Introduction by Major-General H. N. Thompson. Murray, 1919, 8 in. 200 pp., 6/ n. 940.9

Fanny, or F. A. N. Y. (First Aid Nursing Yeomanry), writes a vivid, unconventional, and racy story of her experiences in two and a half years' work at the front, and incidentally tells many amusing anecdotes of things witnessed by the way. She went out in January, 1918, slaved in a hospital for Belgian Tommies, acted as cook in another, drove an ambulance, often under fire, and was at length desperately wounded, and returned home with the Croix de Guerre and silver star—only to find that, not being a man, there was no recognized hospital for her to go to, and the civilian hospitals treated her as a mere nuisance.

Bogishevich (M.). _Causes of the War_: an examination into the causes of the European war, with special reference to Russia and Serbia. Allen & Unwin, 1920. 9 in. 136 pp. apps., 5/- n. 940.9

The author, who was formerly Chargé d'Affaires in Germany, develops the thesis that the Austro-Russian antagonism was the chief cause of the war. The book contains much information supporting this contention.

Bordeaux (Henri). _Le Plessis-le-Roye_ (2 Aout, 1914—1 Avril, 1918): un coin de France pendant la guerre. Paris, Plon-Nourrit, 1920. 7½ in. 314 pp. map, paper. 5fr. 940.9

Le Plessis-le-Roye, hard by Lassigny, may well be called a French Thermopylae. About it raged furious battles at the Hamming and the end of the war, and when the Somme battle liberated a large tract of country in March, 1917, the devoted energy of the peasants in reclaiming their desolated lands and homes showed a heroism that responded well to that of the army. M. Bordeaux has made this chronicle of local events a microcosm of the whole struggle on French soil. It relates many thrilling anecdotes of French gallantry, and adds interesting extracts from the diary of a German lieutenant and other personal reports.

Brownrigg (Rear-Admiral Sir Douglas), Bt. _Indiscretions of the Naval Censor_. Cassell, 1920. 9 in. 291 pp. 12 pl. index, 12/6 n. 940.9

The title in itself is enough to attract a host of readers, and they will not be disappointed, for Admiral Brownrigg has many amusing stories to tell as well as many momentous topics to discuss. He describes his relations with pressmen, authors, publishers, and cinematographers, and pays a tribute to the press for the discretion it exercised in using the information communicated to it. Sir Douglas had a most thankless position to fill, but showed himself a man of tact and resource.

Jacomb (C., E.). _Torment_: a study in patriotism. Melrose, 1920. 7½ in. 378 pp. 6/ n. 940.9

There is too much detail in this book to make it very effective as an account of how real patriotism was discouraged, as the writer believes, by the politician and bureaucrat early in the war, and treated with contempt and neglect when, after the Derby scheme, men were forced into the ranks, and, if wounded, hastily patched up and sent out again. He holds that the Armistice was granted too soon, and that we should have gone on for another month, crushed Germany, and prevented, as he considers, the triumph of Bolshevikism and the troubles in Egypt.

Lemonon (Ernest). _L'Allemagne vaincue_. Paris, Plon-Nourrit, 1920. 9 in. 221 pp. paper, 7fr. 50. 940.9

A critical history of diplomatic events during 1917-18 and of the corresponding stages of the war, dealing with both belligerent and neutral countries, and ending with a study of the Conference at Paris and the Treaty of Versailles.
THE NATIONAL PROVINCIAL AND UNION BANK OF ENGLAND LIMITED.

CAPITAL—Authorized - £51,000,000
Paid-up - -
Uncalled - -
Reserve Liability - -
Subscribed Capital - -

RESERVE FUND (invested in British Government Securities) - £7,239,041.

Number of Shareholders, about 33,000.

DIRECTORS.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Name</th>
<th>Position</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>FRANCIS ALEXANDER JOHNSTONE, Esq.</td>
<td>Colony, Sir Claude Villiers Emilus Laurie, Bart., C.B., D.S.O.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>FRANCIS CHARLES LE MARCHANT, Esq.</td>
<td>Society, Sir Samuel Roberts, Bart., M.P.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SELWYN ROBERT PRIORY, Bart.</td>
<td>Sir Felix O. Schuster, Bart.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BUSTAGE ABEIL SMITH, Esq.</td>
<td>E. THOMAS, Esq.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>LINDSAY ERICK SMITH, Esq.</td>
<td>E. J. STEVENSON, Esq.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

DIRECTOR AND GENERAL MANAGER.

FREDERICK ELEY, Esq.

EXTRAORDINARY DIRECTORS.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Name</th>
<th>Position</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>GERALD DUDLEY SMITH, Esq.</td>
<td>London, General Manager, Sheffield Bank Branches.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Col. HERBERT FRANCIS SMITH</td>
<td>London, General Manager, Sheffield Bank Branches.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

BALANCE SHEET, 31st December, 1919.

LIABILITIES.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Description</th>
<th>£</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Cash at Bank of England, and at Head Office and Branches</td>
<td>35,685,652</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Money at Call and Short Notice</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>INVESTMENTS:</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>British Government Securities (including War Loans taken at Cost Price)</td>
<td>48,235,047</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(Of these £182,639 17s. 6d. is lodged for public accounts)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Indian and Colonial Government Securities; Debenture, Guaranteed, and Preference Stocks of British Railways; British Corporation, and Water Works Stocks</td>
<td>3,964,841</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Canal, Dock, River Conservancy, and other Investments, including 23,220 Shares of the Yorkshire Penny Bank of £3 each, £3 paid</td>
<td>1,089,362</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lloyds and National Provincial Foreign Bank, Ltd., 12,000 Shares of £5 each, £2 paid</td>
<td>240,000</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bills Discounted, including Treasury Bills</td>
<td>23,943,269</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Advances on Current and other Accounts</td>
<td>132,737,289</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Advances against War Loans</td>
<td>1,058,157</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Liability of Customers for Acceptances, &amp;c., as per Quota</td>
<td>9,868,418</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bank Promises in London and Country</td>
<td>2,907,811</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>TOTAL INVESTMENTS</th>
<th>£</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>£27,164,043</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

ASSETS.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Description</th>
<th>£</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>CASH:</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>£273,396,337</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

REPORT OF THE AUDITORS TO THE SHAREHOLDERS OF THE NATIONAL PROVINCIAL UNION BANK OF ENGLAND, LTD.

We have examined the above Balance Sheet with the Books at the Head Office and with the Returns from the Branches. We have satisfied ourselves as to the correctness of the Cash Balances, and have verified the Investments held for the Bank, and the Securities held against Money at Call and Short Notices at the Head Office. We have obtained all the information and explanations we have required. In our opinion such Balance Sheet is properly drawn up so as to exhibit a true and correct view of the state of the Company's affairs, according to the best of our information and the explanation given to us and as shown by the Books and returns of the Company.

WILLIAM BARCLAY FEAT. (Auditors).

Principal City Offices.

15, Bishopsgate, E.C. 2.
2, Princes Street, E.C. 2 (Union Bank Office).
1, Lombard Street, E.C. 3 (Smith's Office).
50, Cornhill, E.C. (Prescott's Office).

Auxiliary.

LLOYD'S & NATIONAL PROVINCIAL FOREIGN BANK LIMITED.
Authors’ Agents, etc.

THE AUTHORS’ ALLIANCE are prepared to consider and place MSS. for early publication. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors’ interests first. Twenty years’ experience. Please note new address: 93 and 94, Cranery Lane, London, W.C.2.

AUTHORS’
MSS. placed at highest prices; free monthly prizes; terms for stamp.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 8, Henrietta-St., W.C.2

PROOF READING, INDEXING, RESEARCHES, REVISION
Linguist, good experience.—Mr. F. A. Hadland, 15, Bellevue Mansions, Forest Hill, S.E.23.

Typewriting &c.

TYPOWRITING OF EVERY DESCRIPTION carefully and promptly executed at home, 1s. per 1,000 words; carbon copy, 3d. per 1,000 words. Duplicating, Cambridge Local.—Miss Nancy McFarlane, 11, Palmeira Avenue, Westcliff Essex.

TYPOWRITING. — Authors’ MSS., Examination Papers, Letters, Circulars, Testimonials, General Copying, Duplicating, etc. — J. Trimnell, 8, Moira Terrace, Cardiff.

BOOKSELLERS’ PROVIDENT INSTITUTION
A Registered Friendly Society founded in the year 1837 for the assistance of members and their widows and children when in necessitous circumstances.

President: Her Majesty Queen Alexandra.
President: Charles James Longman, Esq.

An Annual Subscription of One Guinea, or a Donation of Ten Guineas, entitles the donor to Honorary Membership with the privilege of voting at General Meetings; whilst a bequest of Twenty Guineas constitutes the executor an Honorary Member for life, with power to vote.

Subscriptions or Donations will be thankfully received by the Secretary, Mr. William Poulten, Stationers’ Hall Court, London, E.C.4, who will gladly furnish any further particulars that may be desired.

Important.
The Publisher will be glad to hear from readers of “The Athenæum” who experience any difficulty in obtaining copies. All communications sent to 10 Adelphi Terrace, W.C.2, will receive immediate attention.

SUBSCRIPTION RATES:

Inland, Foreign, £1 8s. 2d. per annum £1 10s. per annum post free. post free.

Shorter periods in proportion.

Subscriptions should be sent to The Publisher, “The Athenæum,” 10, Adelphi Terrace, W.C.2.

THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW
With which is incorporated THE INTERNATIONAL REVIEW.

CONTENTS:
1. THE NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY.
   By The Right Hon. C. F. G. Masterman
2. THE PEACE TREATY AND THE POORHOUSE.
   By The Right Hon. Lord Parmaur
3. THE PROBLEM OF THE CURRENCY.
   By Professor A. C. Pigou
4. FOR THE GEORGIAN REPUBLIC.
   By K. H. Nevinson
5. AMERICAN POLITICS IN 1920.
   By Professor Lindsay Rogers
6. THE QUESTION OF THE CALIFORNIA.
   By Professor Arnold J. Toynbee
7. POLITICAL PARTIES AND PROBLEMS OF SOUTH AFRICA.
   By South African
8. HISTORICAL NOVELS.
   By G. P. Godch
9. THE ELIZABETHAN CHURCH AND NON-JEPRODICAL COMMUNIONS.
   By Rev. A. St. L. A. W. Shrewsbury
10. ITALIAN AND SERB: A CONTRAST.
    By Anthony DELL
11. THE GOVERNMENT AND ELECTRICITY SUPPLY.
    By T. H. Minshull
12. THE FIRST REFORM IN EDUCATION.
13. THE POSITION OF WOMEN IN THE CHURCH.
    By Helen Ward
14. WORLD OF NATIONS: FACTS AND DOCUMENTS.
    By J. E. De Montmorency
15. THE ECONOMIC CONSEQUENCES OF THE PEACE.
    By E. C. P. E. Goodhart
16. THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS: LONDON’S ACCOUNT.
    By John Haggard
17. SHORTER REVIEWS.
18. THE SECOND BREAK-UP OF AUSTRIA.
19. LITERARY SUPPLEMENT:
   WINTER WALKING AND TALKING.
   By J. E. De Montmorency
20. REVIEWS OF BOOKS: A JOURNEY OF THE HUMAN MIND.
    By E. C. P. E. Goodhart
21. SHORTER REVIEWS AND NOTICES OF BOOKS.
22. LONDON:
    THE CONTEMPORARY REVIEW COMPANY LIMITED
    10, Adelphi Terrace, W.C.2.
    Price Three Shillings and Sixpence Monthly.

All Rights Reserved
ESSAY COMPETITION

WITH the aim of stimulating a critical interest in contemporary English Literature, The Athenaeum has decided to offer a number of prizes for the best Essays on the subject:

English Literature since 1914

Dr. Robert Bridges and Professor George Saintsbury have consented to act, together with the Editor of Athenaeum, as judges in the competition, the Prizes for which will be as follows:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Prize</th>
<th>Amount</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>First Prize</td>
<td>£50 0 0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Second Prize</td>
<td>25 0 0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Third Prize</td>
<td>10 0 0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Prizes each of</td>
<td>5 0 0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Prizes each of</td>
<td>3 0 0</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Essays for the Competition should approximate, but not exceed 5,000 words in length, and they should be written on one side of the paper only.

The Competition will close with the first post received on Monday, April 19th, 1920, and the result will be announced in The Athenaeum dated June 18th, 1920.

CONDITIONS OF THE COMPETITION
will be forwarded on receipt of a stamped addressed envelope by the Editor of The Athenaeum.
Appointments Vacant

ROYAL NAVY.

Applications are invited for appointments as instructor lieutenants in the Royal Navy. Candidates must be under 30 years of age, have had a University Training and have taken an Honours degree in Mathematics, Science or Engineering; they should also have had some teaching experience. The rates of pay are from £365 per annum on entry to a maximum of £949 per annum as Instructor Commander. Promotion, by selection, to Instructor Captain is also open, with a maximum of £1,277 per annum.

Retired pay to officers over 40 years of age, after 12 years' service, ranges from £300 per annum for an instructor Lieutenant to a maximum of £800 per annum for an Instructor Captain, according to length of service. Service pension is also allowed to officers if invalidated before becoming eligible for retired pay.

For further particulars apply in the first instance to the Secretary of the Admiralty, Whitehall, S.W.I.

COUNTY BOROUGH OF BOLTON EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

MUNICIPAL SECONDARY SCHOOL.

Applications are invited for the following appointments:

1. On the Boys' side, as soon as possible, a Master for Mathematics (preferably one with Honours degree) able to teach the subject up to University Scholarship examinations. Ability to take some Science with Middle Forms desirable but not essential.
2. On the Girls' side, next September, a Mistress for Science and Mathematics, able to teach these subjects up to the standard of the First School Examination.

Salary scale: Masters, Graduates, £180 to £240, then by £15 to £250. Mistresses, Graduates, £160 to £200, then by £15 to £200.

In fixing the commencing salary, special qualifications will be recognised and previous Secondary School experience will be counted. Application forms which should be returned not later than February 28th, 1920, may be obtained from the undersigned.

FRED. WILKINSON,
Director of Education.

Education Offices, Nelson Square, Bolton.

BRISTOL EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

Applications are invited for the post of Director of Education. Salary £1,250 per annum inclusive.

Form of application and schedule of duties may be obtained from the undersigned by sending stamped addressed foolscap envelope, and should be returned not later than March 1, 1920, marked “Director.”

WM. AVERY ADAMS,
Secretary for Education.

Guildhall, Bristol.
February 4, 1920.

BOROUGH OF CAMBRIDGE EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

Trained certificated men teachers are required for:—Central Council School, and Central Classes attached to Milton Road C. School and Morley Memorial C. School, the latter being a Demonstration School for Homerton College. French is required.

St. Philip's C. E. Boys' School.—Trained Certificated Man.

Application forms and scales of salaries will be forwarded on receipt of stamped, addressed foolscap envelope.

E. JENKINS,
Secretary.

Education Office.
Guildhall, Cambridge.

COUNTY HIGH SCHOOL, ILFORD.

Applications are invited for the following appointments:

(a) Master to teach Economics (Advanced Course) and History (Boys' School). Commencing salary £200 to £275 per annum according to qualifications and experience. Increments and maximum according to County Council scale.

(b) Spanish Master for three days per week—Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. Salary £180 per annum.

Applications to be made on forms to be obtained by sending stamped addressed foolscap envelope to the Clerk to the Governors.

Appointments Vacant

LANCASHIRE EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

The Lancashire Education Committee are at present organising a Temporary Training College at Lancaster for ex-service men or other general education who desire to be trained for teaching in Elementary Schools. It is proposed to open the College after Easter, and to provide a Two-Year Course leading to the Final Examination for the Teachers' Certificate granted by the Board of Education. The Committee invite applications for the following posts:

(a) A Lecturer in English.
(b) A Lecturer in History.
(c) A Lecturer in Mathematics and Science.
(d) A Lecturer in Geography.

Candidates should hold an Honours Degree or other special qualification for the position, and must have had some teaching experience in insitutions for Higher Education, but not necessarily in a Training College.

Owing to the temporary nature of the College, the appointments will be for two years. Salary £300, £240, £180, £15 to £200, according to qualifications. Further particulars and forms of application (which must be returned before Saturday, February 28th) may be obtained from the Director of Education, County Offices, Preston.

CITY OF SHEFFIELD EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

Applications are invited for appointment as Assistant Masters and Certified Assistant Mistresses for service in the Elementary Schools of the Authority.

REVISED SCALE OF SALARIES.

MEN:
Minimum ... ... ... £150 per annum.
Maximum ... ... ... £350 per annum.
Annual increments ... ... £10

WOMEN:
Minimum ... ... ... £136 per annum.
Maximum ... ... ... £238 per annum.
Annual increments ... ... £8

In the case of trained certificated teachers each year spent in a Training College will be regarded for the purpose of fixing the commencing salary of a Teacher as a year of service with the Sheffield Education Committee.

In fixing the commencing salary of a Teacher, certain previous experience in a like capacity under other Authorities may be counted as service with the Sheffield Education Committee.

Forms of application, which must be returned to the undersigned as soon as possible, may be had on receipt of a stamped addressed foolscap envelope.

PERCIVAL SHARP,
Director of Education.

COUNTY BOROUGH OF IPSWICH EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

MUNICIPAL SCHOOL OF ART.

A FULLY QUALIFIED ASSISTANT ART MISTRESS is required at once. The person appointed will be required to teach General Art Subjects, including preparation for the Board of Education's Examinations in Industrial Design, including examinations in preliminary knowledge. Candidates possessing the full Associateship of the Royal College of Art, endorsed with a Teaching Certificate, or the new Teaching Certificate of the Board of Education for teachers of Art, the scale of salaries is, minimum £140 per annum, rising to a maximum of £300, but in the case of teachers not possessing either of these qualifications a scale will be fixed accordingly. Previous experience will be taken into consideration in fixing the commencing salary.

The form of application may be obtained from the Principal of the School of Art, High Street, Ipswich, or from the undersigned, and should be returned to the Principal not later than February 28th, 1920.

H. ARMITAGE,
Secretary.

Tower House, Ipswich.
February 14, 1920.

SOUTHEAST-ON-SEA EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

MUNICIPAL SCHOOL OF ARTS AND CRAFTS.

Required Assistant Master holding Full Art Master's Certificate or R.C.A. diploma, for general art instruction and design applied to crafts (including metalwork). Salary £220 plus increments for experience up to 10 years on Graduate Scale (maximum now under consideration).

Applications stating qualifications and experience and date when free to be sent immediately to A. J. Farrands, Esq., Principal, at the School.

H. FARRANDS,
Director of Education.
Appointments Vacant

COUNTY BOROUGH OF SOUTHPORT.
EDUCATION COMMITTEE.
NEW SECONDARY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.
HEADMASTERSHIP.

The Governors of the above school invite applications for the POSITION OF HEADMASTER.
The school will be commenced in temporary premises at the "Woodlands," Lord Street, pending the erection of a new school with accommodation for 500 boys, which is to be proceeded with immediately on a site of 15 acres on the sea front.

Commencing salary, not less than £200 per annum.

It is intended that the school shall be conducted as far as possible after the manner of a Public School for Day Boarders, for which purpose the new school buildings are being specially designed, and it is therefore desirable that candidates should have had some Public School experience.

An Honours Degree of a British University will be looked for. The School will be grant-earning and be conducted under Articles of Government formulated in accordance with the Board of Education's Regulations.

Applications, endorsed "Headmaster, Secondary School," accompanied by copies of three recent testimonials should reach the undersigned on or before Tuesday, March 9, 1920.

WM. ALLANACH,
Correspondent and
Director of Education.

Education Offices, 2, Church Street, Southport.
February, 1920.

LEEDS SCHOOL OF ART.
DEPARTMENT OF LIFE-DRAWING & PAINTING.

REQUIRED immediately, FULL-TIME ASSISTANT in the above Department. Initial salary according to qualifications and experience, but not less than £200. For further particulars apply to the Headmaster.

Forms of application, which should be returned immediately, may be obtained from the undersigned.

JAMES GRAHAM.
Director of Education.

COUNTY BOROUGH OF WEST HAM.
PUBLIC LIBRARIES.
SENIOR ASSISTANT.

APPLICATIONS are invited for the position of SENIOR ASSISTANT at Canning Town Library (open access) at a commencing salary of £91 per annum, rising by annual increments of £5 for the first year, and £6 thereafter to £130, but the maximum not to exceed £120 per annum unless two of the higher certificates of the Library Association be obtained (viz. Classification, Bibliography or Library History). In the event of one or more of these three certificates being obtained, the maximum salary to be reached by further increments of £5 for each certificate but not exceeding £120 in all.

In addition to the above, a War Bonus on the scale of the Civil Service Awards Nos. 84 and 101, equivalent to an additional £89 14s. on the initial salary will be paid.

Applicants must be not less than 21 years of age, and must possess four of the Library Association certificates.

Applications, stating age, and qualifications, and accompanied by copies of not more than three recent testimonials, must be enclosed in an envelope endorsed "Library Assistant" and reach me not later than the first post on Tuesday morning, March 5, 1920, Canvassing will disqualify.

GEORGE E. HILLEARY,
Town Clerk.

Town Hall,
West Ham, E.15.
February 10, 1920.

STOKE NEWINGTON PUBLIC LIBRARY.
LIBRARY ASSISTANT.

APPLICATIONS are invited for the POST OF ASSISTANT.
Salary £35 per annum, including War Bonus. Public library experience and Library Association certificates essential.

Applications endorsed "Assist. to reach me not later than Friday, February 27th inst.

GEORGE PREECE,
Librarian and Clerk.

Public Library, Stoke Newington,
London, N.16.

OLBORN EMPIRE
MATINEES DAILY 5.30, COMMENCING MONDAY NEXT, FEB. 23, WITH TROJAN WOMEN
SYRIL THORNDRIKE as HECUBA.
"The finest piece of tragic acting of recent times."
March 1—CANDIDA.
March 8—MEDEA.

Appointments Vacant

CITY OF CARDIFF.

THE CARDIFF LIBRARY COMMITTEE invite applications for three appointments as MALE SENIOR ASSISTANTS to fill vacancies on the Central Lending, Reference, and Cataloguing Staffs. Salary £200 per annum, rising by annual increments of £10 to £240. Candidates must have had practical experience in library work and hold at least two certificates of the Library Association. Applications accompanied by copies of three recent testimonials must be addressed to the LIBRARIAN, Central Library, Cardiff, and delivered on or before Saturday, March 6.

Appointments Wanted

LIBRARIAN AND SECRETARY (Fello w of Library Association), about to be demobilised, seeks re-engagement. Over 20 years' municipal Library experience. Highest credentials.

Apply Box 608, ATHENaeum Advertisement Office, 170, Fleet St., London E.C.4.

PREPARATORY SCHOOLMASTER free for Summer Term. Long experience House Master; Organ, Singing, Good Games; would take PARTNERSHIP.—"HALL PORTER," Trinity College, Dublin.

Art Exhibitions

DECORATIVE PANELS

Designed by
F. BRANGWYN, R.A., and others in coloured and lined woods by A. J. ROWLEY.

ADMISSION FREE. 10-6 including Saturdays.

HEAL & SON, Ltd., MANSARD GALLERY, 196, etc., Tottenham Court Road, W.

NEW ART SALON

160, Shaftesbury Avenue (First Floor)

EXHIBITION OF PAINTINGS by BRACHE, DÉRAINE, LHOTE, MARCAND MODIGLIANI, PICASSO, SIGNAC, VILAMINCK.

Daily 10-6. From 17th February.

THE EPSTEIN SCULPTURE

"A room of masterpieces."

Leicester Galleries, Leicester Square. 10-6.

THE MODERN SOCIETY OF PORTRAIT PAINTERS

Tenth Exhibition now open at R. I. Galleries.
193, Piccadilly. 10-5.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTER ETCHERS AND ENGRAVERS, 8a, Pall Mall East, S.W.
30th Annual Exhibition. Daily 10 to 5.

WALKER'S GALLERIES, 118, New Bond Street, W.
Exhibition of Rare Old Coloured Aquatints of Places of Interest.

MONARCO GROUP (First Exhibition) of Impressionist Paintings at THE GOUPIOL GALLERY, 5, Regent Street.
16, 3d. (with Tax). 10-5.30.

Typewriting &c.

TYPEWRITING OF EVERY DESCRIPTION carefully and promptly executed at home, 1s. per 1,000 words; carbon copy, 3d. per 1,000 words. Duplicating. Cambridge Local.—Miss NANCY McFARLANE, 11, Palmira Avenue, Westcliff Essex.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS., Examination Papers, Letters, Circulars, Testimonials, General Copying, Duplicating, etc.—J. THOMSON, 8, Moira Terrace, Cardiff.

For Booksellers and further Miscellaneous Advertisements see page 259.
THE FINANCIAL REVIEW OF REVIEWS
The Leading Magazine on Investment
Price 1/- Net
Published Quarterly

The March Issue contains the following Special Articles:

Hints to New Investors
Can a Christian be an Investor?
Investors and Income Tax
Insurance Companies' Shares
Professional Men and Their Investments
The Finances of Mexico
Could Labour Govern?

Ellis T. Powell, LL.B., D.Sc.
The Rev. H. J. D. Astley, M.A., Litt.D.
John Burns, W.S.
A. G. MacKenzie, F.I.A.
Arnold Wright
Percy F. Martin, F.R.G.S.
E. T. Good

All Subscribers are entitled to the use of the Free Information Service. Information Coupons are inset in every copy

Recent Contributors include:

Arthur R. Hinks, M.A., F.R.S.
Percy F. Martin, F.R.G.S.
Ellis T. Powell, LL.B., D.Sc.
Sir Charles W. Macara

J. Norman Collie, D.Sc., LL.D., F.R.S.
C. W. Saleeby, M.D., F.R.S.Edin.
J. Gardner, M.A.
Hilaire Belloc, M.A.
John B. Kershaw, F.S.S., F.I.C.

A Specimen Copy will be sent free to applicants mentioning THE ATHENÆUM

THE FINANCIAL REVIEW OF REVIEWS
6, Grafton Street, New Bond Street, London, W.1.
CRITICAL INTEREST

I n the present number of The Athenæum will be found particulars of prizes which are to be awarded for essays on the subject "English Literature since 1914." Our object in offering these prizes is, as the advertisement says, to stimulate critical interest in contemporary literature. In the phrase "critical interest," as we use it, the emphasis is upon the adjective, for in our own opinion the present age is in danger of becoming definitely uncritical. This may seem almost a paradoxical proposition, for few would deny that the present age is, in the matter of literature, self-conscious to a degree, and there are many to whom the self-conscious and the critical attitude appear to be identical.

We hold that this opinion is radically false. In literature, at least, the critical attitude implies a certain saturation in the literary tradition, and as a condition of this saturation a certain acceptance of the highest literary excellence. At a critical moment—the pun is apt enough to be condensed—there must come a surrender of the self-consciousness to what is excellent. The mere admission that a tradition exists implies a real element of self-submission that is repugnant to an extreme self-consciousness; for self-consciousness, at an extreme point, insists so much upon its uniqueness that it must necessarily be impatient of the suggestion that it does not create its own validity. There is at present abroad a general though unconscious confusion between two categories, those of existence and artistic importance. We can readily admit that any individual consciousness is unique; but that does not in the least imply that it possesses a corresponding rarity value. Before it becomes valuable it must undergo a process of transvaluation, if only for the simple reason that what is unique in the world of existence may be, for that very cause, insignificant in the world of art.

The emphasis nowadays is almost wholly upon difference, upon originality; and apparently the last thing that occurs to a modern mind is to examine whether the difference, the uniqueness, the originality have a value of their own. Instead of applying itself to reducing the element to an essential and inevitable minimum without which the original apprehension would be falsified, the modern mind tends to exploit it. It will wear its rue with a difference, even though the difference ends by making the rue appear like any other herb, or in the end no herb at all, for the end of insistence upon uniqueness, as not a few characteristic modern works of literature show, is complete incomprehensibility.

On the other side, the side of the audience, there is a general abnegation of the critical attitude. Because much poetry is written, the Elizabethan age is returned; because there are many paintings, we are on the threshold of a British cinquecento. The heavens rain superlatives upon the luckless head of young talent; it is bowed with laurels before it has learned to stand upright. And the publishers, who cannot be expected to be immune from the general contagion of ecstasy, announce on the dust-covers of their books that they are masterpieces. Who can blame them? There are so many modern masters and modern masterpieces that it is unfair that the highest excellence should not be shared among all. Is not this a democratic and equitarian age?

Something is wrong; yet the cause is not easy to detect. Since the pontifical days are gone, we hope for ever, it is not incumbent upon us to pretend that we have diagnosed the malady and have the remedy in our hands. Our own nerves are somewhat sensitive, and for our part we could do well with a little less tub-thumping and trumpet-blowing, a little less vulgarity and self-assertion, a little more humility, a few more indications that we are aware we are not such devilish fine fellows. We cannot all be of one mind concerning what is good, but there is room for quite a considerable measure of agreement upon what we mean by "good." Do we mean by "good," in this question of modern poetry for instance, as good as Keats, or Shelley or Browning, or Tennyson, or...
THE DEAD REFORMER

THE light from the green-shaded lamp lit up the porch where a middle-aged man sat reading in a cane chair, with an old-fashioned wooden box at his feet. Heaps of dusty aged papers and note-books lay piled round the chair, a paper fluttering now and again quietly in the faint night breeze that swept in with all the invading breath of the Spring, keen and thrilling from the starlit sky.

On the paved floor, within the yellow circle of lamplight, stood the wooden box, with lid open, encompassed by heaped MSS., docketed memoranda, bundles and bundles of faded Victorian letters, tied with coloured twine, old account books in leather bindings, newspapers yellowed by time, bulky envelopes scrawled and re-scrawled with dates and notes in an angular hand—everything smelling of dead, forgotten lives, and breathing forth the dusty, clinging aroma of museums where desiccated relics and mumified records are preserved piously from the earth's maw that waits to swallow them.

The man in the cane chair raised his eyes from the letter he was reading, and, bending over the wooden box, lifted wearily from it a fresh pile of letters, papers and note-books, diaries, sermons—all the accumulated, hoarded "Literary remains" and personal débris of the Victorian preacher, orator and "reformer," who had died forty years back. Wearily he untied a bundle of blue foolscap papers, and glanced at the first. "The Lease of 3, Chilworth Crescent, Camden Town," fell from his fingers to the floor. He paused, threw the bundle of blue papers on one of the heaps, and lit a cigarette meditatively. Then he raised his eyes and listened.

From the night fields in the plain below came the faint baaing of a lamb floating up the hill, the cry of a fresh life, demanding plaintively its mother's milk. The lamb had struggled painfully into life from the womb in one of the furious March blizzards, it had survived the April snowstorms and razor winds; and now its hungry, asking voice filled the silent fields, while, deeper, stronger, answering, came the anxious bleat of the mother succouring it. Ba-a, Ba-a, Ba-a-a, came the insistent, hungry, pitiful note of greedy life.

The man seized a fresh packet from the wooden box, but while his fingers idly opened it he fell into thought. Sixty years ago this dead man, the Victorian preacher and Radical reformer, was renowned as a great orator. Vast audiences hung on his words; great halls rang with thundering applause, raised again and again when he painted in glowing periods the millennium of Free Trade, Political Reform, Cheap Bread. All that he had written in popular journals on the questions of the day was received and eagerly swallowed by his clamouring generation. And now he was forgotten—utterly and entirely forgotten! The names of his great associates, Cobden and Bright, hung still in the historical firmament, but his was a dim, blurred cobweb in the old Free Trade rafters. He was dead—dead as a sheep long turned into mutton. Nobody ever spoke of him or mentioned his name. Rows of his works, Theological Essays, Addresses to Working Men, Pamphlets, stood unopened on dusty library shelves, or cumbered the two-penny boxes. His writings were dead as he was dead, and nothing could ever bring them back to life. And yet the Victorian reformer in a measure had greatness. He had struggled courageously, with the minority, for his causes before the flowing tide had turned and swept them into triumph. He had fought consistently against sniffing orthodoxy, small-souled tyrannies, high-placed greed. He had never prostituted himself for money or power. But like bigger and smaller men of his time he had draped his propaganda for Education, Knowledge, Self-Improvement, in the thick blankets of moral aims and moral purposes. And all the while the Preacher's flesh, suppressed beneath the broadcloth, had shown that men, his contemporaries, he himself, were not moral animals. And all the dead man's sermons and addresses and lectures were inflated, buoyed up by the great contemporary lie, everywhere preached and disseminated round him, that high purpose and moral endeavour must drive self-seeking greed and craft, ignorance and materialism down into the pit. They had preached it in their journals throughout this age of machinery and steam and furious material energy, while covering the green earth with more ugly buildings and more mean streets and more palls of grimy smoke. Only have high moral aims and unremitting energy and commercial prosperity, only disseminate Free Trade newspapers, and erect Board Schools, and the millennium must come.

And when the Victorian reformer had died, they had thrust his body into a sooty Victorian cemetery, guarded by tall Brunngnern railings from the rows of prim, jerrybuilt mean streets and the gaunt railway embankment, where rolled and bumped incessantly heavy goods trains to and from the Midlands. And everybody had immediately forgotten the Moral Reformer. An aspiring niece had, indeed, planned his "Life"! had made sheaves of notes, had rearranged the piles of newspaper columns, had corresponded with his old friends, had drawn up chapter headings—and then had died, leaving all the materials to an eminent literary man, who had waited awhile and then died too, in his turn. Fresh efforts had been made, but the "Life" had fallen through. And now after forty years there stood the wooden box, dingy and soiled, and everything in it that held the tale of the Moralist's career, his family, his early struggles, his fame, his speeches, his addresses, his discourses, his letters, his criticisms, his investments, his debts, his unfinished works, his loves, his hates—all was dead and covered with dust. Nobody was interested in him or in anything about him. Even his famous speeches were unreadable. There was no beauty, nothing of the cunning or grace of living Nature in all he had ever written.

Impelled by a feeling of weary exasperation, the man rose from the cane chair, and, seizing the wooden box, turned it upside down on the paved floor. Then, reversing it, he began throwing it into everything pell-mell. He glanced with aversion at an unopened packet of faded letters inscribed in a thin, spidery, feminine hand, "Private Letters from J. L. to E. M.", and dropped it quickly into the box. "Ideal, poetical sentiments, petrified like all the rest!" he muttered. Then he turned his head, gazed into the darkness and listened.

From the little copse halfway down the hill, suddenly the stillness was split by the rising notes of a nightingale, throbbing higher and higher with piercing pain, then passing and bubbling with low, ecstatic trills. It was the answer to the wooden box.

EDWARD GARNETT.

NOSTALGIA

Give me my old coat again
That I have worn through many days of rain,
Whose hue is varied, ripened by the sun
To subtle patterns; give me one
Of my old books to read by firelight half asleep,
Whose effaced memories leave gaps of deep Conjecture over thoughts that lie in rest
Beneath their placid linen. Let the best
White hands of silence touch me, and the white
Cool hands of rivers soothing through the night
Into the dreams of tranced sleepers—hands
Reminiscent, binding me with scented hands.
The wake of clouds shall touch me, whose pale ships
Pass suavely over; let the whispering lips
Of twilight tell me of dead loves and legend glories,
And let these flames unscroll their golden stories
And fold them with the pinch of dusty fingers.
Ah, in this darkness many a sunset lingering,
And many a dream within this dozing,
Things slow revealed and dimly closing. . .
Give me my old town again
That I have watched through ghostly scarves of rain,
Through fringes of pale lights, and let me see
Her streets that wound into my brain so stealthily
That I hear yet the chant of them that roars
Along their blinded spectral corridors.
Give my old joy and wonder back again,
The adolescent loveliness of pain;
But let me touch them now, and know and bless
With this new love and dawning tenderness.

IRIS TREE.

1919.

REVIEWS

A STAGE FIGHT

THE SUPERSTITION OF DIVORCE. By G. K. Chesterton. (Chatto & Windus. 5s. net.)

Mr. G. K. CHESTERTON is a writer for the young. It is sufficient to look back over one's own experience and to compare it with that of one's friends to find that increase in years brings, amongst other things, a decreasing interest in the views of Mr. Chesterton. For that reason we hesitate to say that the present book is really the dullest book he has written; we content ourselves with remarking that no previous book by Mr. Chesterton has seemed to us so uninteresting.

When we are young we know very little about the world, our limited experience and the youthful desire for vivid contrasts and dramatic destinies enable us to believe quite a number of fairy tales. It is only slowly that we discover the conditions of existence; that we learn to distinguish the oasis from the mirage, and that we realize the melancholy truth that "Man proposes—but God disposes." "Circumstances—I make circumstances!" said Napoleon. That brings a thrill at twenty, but a wry smile at forty. But while we grow older Mr. Chesterton does not, and so the distance between us widens. Mr. Chesterton remains youthful at heart, which means that he is incapable of profiting by experience. Periodically he makes his appearance on the stage; he continues to slay dragons with all his old zest, brandishing his sword against a background of red fire. But we know now that the sword is a wooden sword, that the red fire won't burn anything, and we have our doubts about the dragons. We never see them anywhere else; which raises the suspicion that Mr. Chesterton previously constructs them behind the scenes. There was a time when we thought these combats terrific affairs, although even then, watching the sword-strokes critically, we occasionally wondered whether the dragon were quite as dead as he seemed. But since then we have grown up and, like St. Paul, have put away childish things, amongst them the greater part of Mr. Chesterton's menagerie of mythical monsters, his sinister Jew financier, his still more sinister "modern science," and, ornamented with wings instead of horns, his happy peasant and delightful Middle Ages. Our suspicion is now a certainty: Mr. Chesterton makes these things himself. In all the territory known to us we cannot discover an authentic footprint of any one of them. Of course, these particular creations have been in stock for a long time. During the war Mr. Chesterton has been chiefly engaged in manufacturing nations; he has produced an England, a France and a Germany that we have not met with elsewhere, and sketched the outlines of a Russia which shows traces, however, of the influence of Lord Northcliffe. He has also composed a Pacifist (black with red stripes) and a Patriot (all white), but the same models are on sale everywhere. To see Mr. Chesterton slashing and hewing at three monsters at once, say a Jew, "Modern Science" and a Pacifist, was a really exhilarating spectacle; had it not been for the fact that there was a war on, we could have watched it indefinitely. The spectacle was exhilarating because, supposing Mr. Chesterton's opponents to be real, our sympathies were wholly with Mr. Chesterton. It is for that reason that, when we were too young to know a fancy from a fact, we admired Mr. Chesterton as a great champion.

In the present book, for instance, he has created a Marriage State and a Divorce Movement which raise, respectively, our enthusiastic approval and our hearty detestation. We know, however, that neither of them exists. Marriage, according to Mr. Chesterton, is the ultimate home of liberty: it is the sole effectual bulwark against the tyranny of the State. It should be indissoluble for two reasons: first, that the granting of divorce means ultimately the enslavement of the community, and second, that it is the expression of a vow, and a vow, for mystical but obscure reasons, must never be broken. The Divorce Movement aims at breaking up this last home of liberty, and is merely another manifestation of the sinister activities of that band of capitalists who are working to bring about the Srvile State. This, so far as we can make out, is Mr. Chesterton’s position. It is not very easy to grasp, because he has, to an unusual degree, indulged his propensity to break his argument in order to comment on anything that occurs to him, and we are not yet clear on some fundamental points—as to what, for instance, Mr. Chesterton understands by a married couple. He seems to attach so much importance to the ceremony as to suggest that he takes the purely legal view. What does Mr. Chesterton understand by breaking the marriage vow? A legal divorce?

The question is important because it bears on Mr. Chesterton’s philosophy of the vow. If the marriage vow consists in saying, “I will never be divorced,” we agree that it is within the power of a man to keep it. But if it consists in a promise to love, and to cherish, it is a promise never to be ill. We think that Mr. Chesterton must intend the purely legal construction, for he says: “The philosophic peculiarity of divorce and re-marriage, as compared with free love and no marriage, is that a man breaks and makes a promise at the same time.” The breaking of the promise here is obviously the act of divorce. Mr. Chesterton’s remark has no other point, for obviously a loveless, but legally married couple may have broken the vow to love one another a week after the honeymoon. In any case, the keeping of such a vow is not a matter entirely within their volition, and such vows, beyond satisfying certain emotional needs at the moment, have no other validity. But, though Mr. Chesterton’s argument shows that this is all he means, he has not got the matter clear in his own mind, otherwise he would not have written his book. If he had realized that all he was defending was a purely legal status, the kind of thing that enables a man to be entered on a census list as “Brown, John; married,” instead of “Brown, John; single,” he would hardly have grown so impassioned in its defence. If, indeed, Mr. Chesterton thinks that the legal tie is all that makes a marriage, then marriage must be defended against him.

As for his other point, that marriage is the last home of liberty, that rests on verbal confusions. Marriage is contrasted with the State: “The State consists of coercion, marriage being an expression of the highest liberty, the liberty to bind oneself. Anyone would think that Mr. Chesterton’s only idea of the State was a ferocious despotism. Even a despotism cannot endure against the will of the people, as the example of Russia shows. But, in any case, the distinction is nonsense. What is the connection between divorce and the franchise? Does a divorced man lose the vote? In a democratic country the coercion imposed by the State is imposed by the people on themselves. It is exactly like Mr. Chesterton’s description of marriage: they manifest the liberty to bind themselves. If Mr. Chesterton replies that England is not democratic, we may perhaps dismiss his argument as the product of the precise degree of democracy that prevails. Later on he develops another argument: the granting of divorce may split society into two camps: those who approve and those who do not. Mr. Chesterton thinks that “it is in this connection, perhaps, that we have to consider most gravely and doubtfully the future of our own country.” It is difficult to suppose that Mr. Chesterton is serious. Of course, there will be people who agree and others who disagree.

There has always been two opinions about everything. Even were divorce as dangerous to England, in this sense, as Christianity was to Rome, does that affect the rights and wrongs of the matter? Would not Mr. Chesterton’s argument apply equally to the reforms he advocates? It is truly an undiscriminating bludgeon that he wields here.

But, indeed, with the collapse of his argument founded on marriage considered, mystically, as a vow, there is nothing in Mr. Chesterton’s book that requires consideration. He has tried to do the impossible. He has taken the Roman Catholic idea of marriage, divorced it from its religious basis, and tried to apply it on its own feet in a rational world. It does nothing of the kind. In common with other articles of the Roman Catholic faith, it forms part of a connected scheme. It rests on certain assumptions, and the acceptance of those assumptions amounts to accepting the Roman Catholic faith. We admit Mr. Chesterton’s dilemma. If he were to expound the Roman Catholic doctrine he would be bound, in fairness, to discuss the Roman Catholic practice—a discussion which, to a writer of his views, might offer delicate difficulties.

The antagonist in Mr. Chesterton’s drama is the wily capitalist working to bring about universal divorce, we find quite as amiable as Mr. Chesterton’s married state.

The masters of modern plutocracy know what they are about. They are making no mistake; they can be cleared of the slander of inconsistency. A very profound and precise instinct has led them to single out the human household as the chief obstacle to their inhuman progress.

Frankly, we do not believe it; not even if Mr. Chesterton assures us that by “masters of modern plutocracy” he means those international Jew financiers. So far as we can see, Mr. Chesterton does not deal with the real case for divorce, and his book leaves the question exactly where it was before.

J. W. N. S.

A PIONEER OF THE RENAISSANCE IN SCOTLAND

Douglas’s Aeneid. By Lauchlan Maclean Watt. (Cambridge University Press, 14s. net.)

The figure of Gawain Douglas, poet, ecclesiastic and political intriguier, is an outstanding one in the literature as well as the history of Scotland, and up to the present he can scarcely be said to have come into his own. So great an authority as the late Professor Hume Brown speaks of Dunbar and Douglas as men “who in any age must have been among the first literary figures of their time.” And there can be little doubt that Douglas’s “Aeneid” has given to its author a rank in literature which very few authors have attained whose “magnum opus” was a translation. Mr. Watt’s scholarly volume can claim to be the most thorough and complete introduction yet written to the personality and work of Gawain Douglas.

To Douglas, as to so many of his contemporaries, the times were grievously out of joint. He was born several generations too late. He was firmly rooted in the old faith, in the political and social outlook of medievalism; but, nevertheless, he had felt the invincible lure of the Renaissance and the mastering charm of the classics. Probably Mr. Watt has done well, and he has certainly meant well, in passing somewhat hastily over the political side of Douglas’s career. Douglas was no worse than many another ambitious cleric; and it was not his fault that he was a victim of that predestination in politics which in Scotland, more than in any other country, has determined the part which one family or another is to play. In other words, he could not help being a Douglas, and being one he played the Douglas game and lost. No more illuminating commentary on the attitude and outlook of the Scots nobility has been written than Hume Brown's chapter in his posthumous "Surveys of Scottish History," and Gawain Douglas's career can be fully understood if it is judged by the standards of his own age, and not misjudged by those of ours.

Mr. Watt's aim is quite clearly stated in the opening words of his preface:

This is an attempt to elucidate Gawain Douglas's work and to place it in its proper setting, as a literary document, in the hope that, until something better is achieved, this may fill a blank in Scottish literature.

In this attempt he has succeeded. The critical part of his work is certainly carefully done. His chapter on manuscripts and readings will without difficulty convince his readers of the superiority of the manuscript in the library of Trinity College, Cambridge, which he has treated as being the most authentic. It may or may not be safe to take at its face value the scribe's own claim for his work that it is "the first correct copy next after the Translation": but the manuscript appears to have such strong claims in the matter of apparent date and superiority of readings that, in the absence of any holograph MS. by Douglas, the Cambridge MS. can solely be accorded the preeminent position. Mr. Watt has fairly established his case showing the close association of the three chief MSS., which he describes as C., E. and R. His Appendix, containing numerous variants between the MSS. and the Latin original of Virgil, cannot fail to be of the greatest use to anyone who attempts the somewhat difficult task of editing the actual text of Douglas's "Æneid."

Much has been written—some would say too much—in the way of comment and explanation on the subject of the influence of the Renaissance on the literature of England. This can scarcely be said to be the case with Scottish literature; and it is only gradually that the great masters of Scottish verse and prose, the men who gave to the vernacular its established position, are receiving the recognition which is their due. To the average reader, even the average educated reader, in the South they remain an almost closed book, chiefly because the Middle Scots language is even more unfamiliar than Middle English. Many a reader who could derive real enjoyment from Chaucer without the aid of a glossary, would find himself seriously perplexed if confronted with Douglas or Henryson, or with a monument of prose such as Bellenden's translation of Boccace's History of Scotland. Mr. Watt's account of the man and his work is very sound and interesting, but it might without disparagement be said that a good deal of his literary criticism as applied to Douglas might perhaps have been taken for granted, and was scarcely needed. Similarly it may be questioned in no unfriendly spirit whether it was essential to enter into so much detail as to what constitutes translation, and what its dangers and difficulties are; while such a scholar who has had even the slightest experience of manuscript work—and Mr. Watt's book is one for scholars—will know to his cost all that Mr. Watt has to tell him about the sources of error, and will scarcely need to have examples from Virgil and Shakespeare to convince him of the perplexities which beset the path of anyone who sets out to edit any text, classical or mediæval.

It would have been a useful addition to Mr. Watt's book if he had given us rather more of Douglas's "Æneid" itself—if, for example, he had added a second appendix containing some selected passages which would assist the average reader to form a clearer impression of Douglas's style. It is not unlikely that someone who has ready access to a printed text of Douglas, and some, after reading Mr. Watt's commentary, would very willingly find in the same volume some specimens of the poet himself.

W. W. S.

CHESS AND SUPER-CHESS

My Chess Career. By J. R. Capablanca. (Bell. 7s. 6d. net.)

S enor Capablanca exhibits in his own person a felicitous union of the several aptitudes of Aristotle, Mozart, the Duke of Wellington, Einstein, Sir Eric Geddes, Sir Auckland Geddes, and the Hampshire Wonder. He is a scholar, artist, scientist, historian. Many of the great players of the world did not take up the game till they were on the verge of manhood, and one or two—Tschigorin, for instance—were men of mature years before they took to it seriously. With Capablanca it seems to have formed part of his prenatal experience. At the age of four he found his father playing chess with a friend, and pointed out afterwards that his parent had only won by playing a wrong knight's move undetected:

He asked me how and what I knew about chess. I answered that I could beat him; he said that was impossible, considering that I could not even set the pieces correctly. We tried conclusions, and I won.

There is something very Mozartean about this achievement. At eight he beat Gomayo with odds of a rook. At eleven he played a series of games against the strongest players in Habana, and beat them all except Corzo. At fourteen, Corzo could no longer hold him. We next find him engaged by other activities:

That same year (1906) I entered the University of Columbia to follow the chemical engineering course. In passing my entrance examinations I obtained the high mark of 99 per cent. in algebra, employing only one hour and fifteen minutes of the three hours we were allowed. . . . I relate these facts for whatever deductions the psychologists may desire to draw.

The last touch is characteristic. There is not a trace of boastfulness in the book ("Conceit," he remarks meditatively, "I consider a foolish thing"); Capablanca's passion is for exact scientific truth. If the truth sets his abilities in a consistently favourable light, that is not his fault.

At the age of 21 he took on Marshall—of all people in the world—and beat him 8 to 1, though his book-knowledge was so elementary that he could not even dodge a Ruy Lopez. Had Marshall played Danish Gambits or such things, he opines the result might have been different. We doubt it. He was fairly under way by now and there was no stopping him. San Sebastian he takes in his stride. The big Petrograd Congress he loses by half a point, the result (unless our memory is at fault) of a moment's chess-blindness, the playing of a KR for QR, or vice versa. During the war there is a hullabaloo, presumably he can find no one worthy of his skill. His return to New York in 1918 arouses our interest again, however:

I had not played chess for one and a half years, but an event occurred which undoubtedly will have some influence on my future career. There was in Habana a young girl of from twelve to fourteen years of age who interested me a great deal. Not only was she intelligent and modest in every respect, but . . . But what? We ask breathlessly.

. . . but she played chess quite well. . . . I decided to teach her something of the openings in accordance with certain theories I had had in mind. . . . I had the great satisfaction of finding that my ideas were, as far as I could see, quite correct.

Señor, señor, what a way to use a poor maiden?

Of the games themselves and their annotations it is superfluous to speak. Some memorable ones are included, and our José can be lyrical on occasion. But the general spirit is one of detached and critical self-observation, and his main object is not to dispassionately analyse masterpieces, but to illustrate the successive stages of development whereby one of the strongest players in the world has attained his strength. Altogether, a book of great psychological interest.

R. O. M.
A DANIEL ON EDUCATION

A SHORT HISTORY OF EDUCATION. By John William Adamson, Professor of Education in the University of London. (Cambridge, University Press. 12s. 6d. net.)

A BOOK about Education that should be perfectly fair, well informed in fact, and moderate in theory may seem to be a thing always unlikely, and now rather less than more to be expected from every generation till the coming of the Coopergiuruses. Most plain men would agree vaguely—and not a few who have some special knowledge of the subject would agree scornfully or mourduly, according to temperament—with Peacock's more than fifty years old dictum that the nonsense talked on it would outweigh all the nonsenses talked on any others. And it was only yesterday that one of Oxford's most recent losses—a man hardly to be excelled in scholarship, practical wisdom, and general and special official knowledge—gravely remarked: "An educational expert is a person whom I regard with the deepest suspicion."

Let us at once run up the curtain by observing that nobody need regard Professor Adamson's book with any suspicion at all. It is quite possible—the last pages, as is natural, make it not improbable—that one might not agree with some of his opinions; for such difference is incidental to all expression of opinion, and certainly not least to the expression of opinions on education. But he has set himself to write, and he has written, a history, and not a plaidoyer; and one of the first things that occur after reading it is regret that it was not written, up to the point then possible, a good many years ago. For it is quite certain that, in all the setting up and upsetting of educational methods and institutions which the last half-century has seen, solid acquaintance with the past and its lessons has been the thing most conspicuously absent. Theory has flouted experience; or, worse still, the (in a horribly multiplied sense) "simple" notion of reversing the engines and going in the teeth of experience has had its way; while in no subject has the malign influence of party politics been more influential.

All this mist of ignorance and mirage of doubleduneness disappears in Professor Adamson's pages. His facts are, so far as we have been able to test them, most accurately stated, the very few points occurring as worth question being of a kind which practically warrants the rest. For instance, that a Jesuit school was rabbled at the Revolution of 1688 does not exactly prove that "Cowley's contemporaries were in no mind for toleration." It is not merely that Cowley's "Proposition" dates nearly thirty, and his death more than twenty, years before the Revolution. It is that he definitely represents the thought, if not of the style, of the first half of the century, and the men of the Revolution that of the second. But this is the merest trifle. Next to accuracy of fact comes clearness of statement; and here no fault can be found. Authorities are duly, but not cumbersomely quoted; the various threads of English and (less minutely, but sufficiently) Continental theory and practice are kept well in hand; and the style, without the slightest pretension, is thoroughly suitable to the work.

But the special merit of the book, already indicated, is the strictly, but not aridly judicial character of the presentation. The most bigoted believer in the doctrine that from a professorial chair no good thing can come might be staggered by a treatise which contains full recognition of the merits of medieval and of eighteenth-century education. To this day the most frightful nonsense is talked about the first, or rather about its supposed non-existence; while those who are not unjust to the Middle Ages are only too likely to be unjust to the eighteenth century. Again, while Professor Adamson has no bites noires he has no heroes; and hero-worship (a very good thing in its way) has been a great nuisance in educational discussion. Were not Coleridge's friends pestered with "Bell and Ball, Ball and Bell"? Have not we others been "deaved" with Comenius and Sturm and the rest of them? Professor Adamson will tell the average phronimos quite as much as he need know about Sturm and Comenius without deaving him at all. On Milton and Locke, on Basedow and Pestalozzi, on Bell himself and that rather robustus person Lancaster he is not only "informative," as some say, but quite sound. As for Rousseau, it is probably impossible that any two men who have any power of independent thinking should exactly agree about Jean Jacques; but there is little fault to find with what is said of him here.

This equitable and really historical treatment of the older and greater figures, and of lesser, but still important persons like La Chalotais, is the best possible preparation (would that more politicians had had it!) for handling the thornier subject of the last hundred years in England. Professor Adamson does full justice to that "voluntary system" which did so much during the first seventy years of the nineteenth century, and which has been gradually choked out (or almost out) of existence as a reward for its well-doing. It may be supposed rather than positively asserted from this book that he is in favour of the "universal and compulsory," if not also of the gratuitous and secular ideals; but there is no trampling of the coat or trampling on the Tommy whatever. The stories of the process are carefully and clearly indicated. There is perhaps only one point which might have been more dwelt on—it is actually glanced at—and that is the disastrous waste, not only of money, which was made after 1870 by the mania for capitalizing the endowments of the smaller grammar-schools and spending them on new buildings in which boys were to be educated at fees inadequate to carry the thing on. That these endowments had not always been made the most of is obvious. But the clumsiest, though no doubt not the least common, method of reform is to "scrap" an ill-worked machine instead of setting it to rights. And it is clear—though there is not much discussion of debatable points—that Professor Adamson by no means trims his sails merely to catch popular airs. Of the Workers' Educational Association, for instance, he writes that it "shows a notable neglect of natural science and the severer forms of study—a neglect which is not compensated by the attention given to less exact and less exciting branches of knowledge." And it is scarcely unfair to read into the last page of his book, with its hope that "British Universities will more and more surrender the office of schoolmaster," a protest against the present tendency to multiply "schools" that so, by hook or by crook, in this "subject" or that, the largest possible number of persons may be stumped with some sort of "degree." It would be unreasonable and perhaps something worse (for, as has been said, the great merit and attraction of the book is its severe restriction to historical history) to wish for more discussion. But it certainly would be interesting to hear Professor Adamson on such apecies of the subject (some of them prudently left alone by most of the experts above alluded to) as the questions: Whether all persons are, beyond a limited point, educable; whether universal education does not divert an alarming proportion of the population—one, too, greatly exceeding any probable number of possessors of the teaching faculty—into the teaching profession; and (most speculative, but perhaps most really important of all) whether it is possible to dilate education without diluting it; or, in other words, whether the maximum of extension does not involve a minimum of value. But these are things periculis et dolosa; and after all Professor Adamson has done better than talk about them: he has supplied intelligent minds. with a great many of the data necessary for settling them, or at least forming reasonable opinions upon them. The "History" of any subject is the indispensable, but alas! too often dispensed with basis of its "Institutes."

George Saintsbury.

THE ETERNAL FOOTMAN

"Ara Vos Prec." By T. S. Eliot. (Ovid Press 15s. net.)

Here is Mr. T. S. Eliot, and here once again is the question: What are we to make of him? It is not a question that even the most assiduous (assiduity is demanded) and interested (interest is inevitable) of his readers would care to answer with any accent of finality. For Mr. Eliot, who is a connoisseur in discrepancy between intention and achievement, it is only to himself an example of it. Nothing so sharpens one's sensitiveness to false notes in life at large as experience of them in oneself; so that there is more than a remote chance that even in regard to "Ara Vos Prec." and while we hold it in our hands Mr. Eliot may whisper deprecatingly:

That is not it at all.
That is not what I meant, at all.

Yes, it seems to us sometimes that the inmost vital core of Mr. Eliot's poetry, the paradoxical impulse of his expression, is his determination to be free to whisper that refrain in our ear; it seems that he is like the chameleon who changes colour infinitely, and every change is protective. True, the range of variation is not truly infinite; there are colours which the chameleon cannot compass. But the chameleon, if he were an artist, would make it an essential of his art not to be hired against a background which he could not infinite.

The question for the critic is to determine whether Mr. Eliot—a conscious artist if ever there was one—has at any moment allowed himself to stray beyond his functional limit. That limit is set in the case of Mr. Eliot at the point where discrepancy ceases between intention and achievement, between soul and body, man and the Universe. At a crucial moment in his beautiful—we insist, precisely beautiful—"Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock,"

The Eternal Footman sneaks.

Since that day Mr. Eliot has fallen deeper and deeper into the clutches of the Footman, who has come to preside over his goings out and his comings in. The Footman has grown into a monstrous Moloch. All that Mr. Eliot most deeply feels is cast into his burning belly—or almost all.

Yet consider the case of men, and of their more perfect exemplars who are poets. Is it possible when the Eternal Footman has given notice, when no longer

Human voices wake us and we drown, when we pass out of the limbo of discordant futility, that there comes to us all the crash, the collapse, the ecstasy, the peace of surrender. Mr. Eliot is like us, terribly like us, for all that he is much more clever: the difference is that the Footman clings to his service longer. With the truly aristocratic, as we know, the Footman will stay for fifteen shillings when he would leave Mr. Bleistein and fifteen guineas; and we admit the implication that Mr. Eliot is truly distinguished. Another implication is that it is difficult for Mr. Eliot to talk to us, and difficult (as the present essay proves) for us to talk to him.

The further question arises—we continue to speak in parables on a matter hardly susceptible of discussion otherwise—whether we are to accept that Footman or not. Is it polite of us, have we a right, to seek an interview with Mr. Eliot when the Footman is not there? The rightness of an action is fortunately not measured by its ease of execution, but neither can we accept the dogma that the difficult is necessarily the virtuous path. Have we a right to say in our turn: "It was not that at all," to insist
UNCONVENTIONAL ANTHROPOLOGY

PAGAN AND CHRISTIAN CREEDS: THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING.

By Edward Carpenter. (Allen & Unwin, 10s. 6d. net.)

ARCHAIC ENGLAND. By Harold Bayley. (Chapman & Hall. 25s. net.)

E VERY science tends to be the concern of a guild, which has a traditional procedure involving a certain apprenticeship on the part of those who would share in the work. Even the anthropologists, with but half a century of organized industry to their credit, feel that they have the right to impose a training and a method on all students of the subject, or even of some specialized part of it such as prehistoric archaeology or comparative religion. On the other hand, there is a line of Terence which, freely translated, runs: "I am a human being, and so I may speculate about human origins as much as I please." Whether Mr. Edward Carpenter or Mr. Harold Bayley belongs, or indeed would claim or care to belong, to the anthropological guild, is at least doubtful. Yet neither is to be denied if he has something to say on that topic of common interest, "man, his past history and future prospects." At most, it may be legitimate to point out certain unconventionals in the treatment. Often Athanasius is right, however, and the world is wrong; and right or wrong, Athanasius, one must confess, always commands our sympathy as a man of courage.

Mr. Edward Carpenter has wide reading and, as far as one can judge, no lack of the critical faculty; so that, presumably, he could play the man of science if he chose. But his interest is less in theory than in practice. He looks forward to a new age, and, preoccupied with his vision of the future, searches the present and the past for such promise as they may hold of the fulfillment of his hope. For him self-consciousness is the enemy. It spoils individualism. The altogether primitive man—who, it would seem, is not to be identified with any actual savage known to science, but represents just one stage lower in the scale of evolution—was a social animal in the negative sense that he was possessed wholly by a group-consciousness in which all sense of private interest was but latent. So long as this condition of "simple consciousness," as obtained, was continued only as a mechanical presumptive insight. With the dawn of self-consciousness, however, which is placed right back in the Stone Age, the imaginative power of fear began. As there was now an image of self before the mind, so images of beings who might threaten or destroy that self were conjured up.

Thereupon religion, viewed in its age-long development, is seen to be the attempt to overcome this primal fear by overcoming its cause, the anti-social self-feeling. The sense of sin, which is selfishness, finds its remedy in at-one-ment, in reunion with some mystic whole symbolical of humanity. Not that Mr. Carpenter wishes "to catch Nature and History in the careful net of a phrase," by seeking to define precisely that highest stage of consciousness in which the world is to be consummated. It is not even possible to gather clearly from what he says whether the aid of religion may or may not altogether be dispensed with on this supreme plane of experience. But his main point is that "in this sequence of growth Christianity enters as an episode, but no more than an episode." "Something better than Paganism and better than Christianity" is to come. For the rest, he labours to show that pagan and Christian rites are but using a different symbolism to express much the same set of ideas; and apparently has no quarrel with Christianity except in so far as it claims a monopoly of religious truth. Surely no Christian of liberal views would to-day refuse to concede a large measure of spiritual value to what he would deem natural religion. Besides, the pagan cults are dead, while Christianity is alive; so that a grave-sided tenderness towards the possible shortcomings of the departed can be indulged in without detriment to practical interests. It may be fairly argued, too, that Christianity has in a plain and reasoned way expounded, and incidentally has enabled Mr. Carpenter himself to expound, a doctrine of atonement which at best is but dimly shadowed forth in the ancient religions as we know them from their fragmentary records. Altogether, then, Christianity comes forth from this confrontation with paganism without loss of credit. As for the question whether it will serve as the ideal religion, this may be deferred until it is decided whether there is to be any ideal religion at all.

The unconventionality of Mr. Carpenter, considered as an anthropologist, comes out partly in the fact that he pays a good deal of attention to themes—such as sun-myths and phallic cults—which are rather out of fashion; and, since to be in the fashion is not necessarily to be right, he is at perfect liberty to take a line of his own. On the astronomical side of the subject he is ingenious, if not convincing; but in any case the argument merely relates to the etymology of certain words, such as Aries (equated with Aegus), and does not greatly help out the psychological theory which forms the essence of the book. Again, he is unconventional (but in a wholly commendable way) in trying to enter, poet-fashion, into the feelings of the primitive animist or totemist towards a nature which, for the simple consciousness, has not yet lost its at-one-ness and become matter as divorced from spirit. Here is Mr. Carpenter's own vision of a tree:

It was a beech, standing somewhat isolated, and still leafless in quite early Spring. Suddenly I was aware of its skyward-reaching arms and upturned finger-tips, as if some vivid life (or electricity) was streaming through them far into the spaces of heaven, and of its roots plunged into the earth and drawing the same energies from below. The day was quite still and there was no movement in the branches, and it seemed to me that the whole tree, as a coagulate or separable organism, but a vast being ramifying far into space, sharing and uniting the life of Earth and Sky, and full of a most amazing activity.

This may not be science, but it helps. And some such words will do to convey an impression of the whole book.

And what is to be said of Mr. Bayley? The loose cover of the book proclaims it as "this profound and far-reaching contribution to English Archeology." Presumably this was written by one who has mastered the subject. Frankly, however, we can neither dive into such profundities nor reach so far out into the empyrean without becoming utterly dizzy. But Mr. Bayley has worked hard and honestly. Nine hundred pages, six hundred illustrations, are there to bear witness to his industry. His authorities (if they are all of them authorities) and his facts (if they are all of them facts) are beyond count. Use him as a quarry, and one will find gold and, may be, other things. But how accept his doctrine as a whole? What ethnologist, for instance, will tolerate the suggestion that the British, the Iberians and the Hebrews are all the same, only under different names? Or what philologist can admit the authenticity of those remains of the British language which Mr. Bayley "recovers" from etymologies of place-names and the like based on more or less common sounds belonging to different families of speech? Another book is promised in which it will be shown how the same words will unlock doors in every direction from Burmah to Peru. In the meantime, we are bidden to rejoice in the fact that we are fundamentally Hebrew-Iberian-Britons and not Germans. As the "chic Cretans" loathed the "Magogel," and the Iberians the "ugsome Mongolians," so our race is antithetic to the German; and indeed it seems to stand to reason that what is chic must naturally be opposed to whatever is ugsome. Perhaps enough has been said to show that this is anthropology of no ordinary kind.

R. R. M.
ORCHESTRA AND SOLO

PETER JACKSON. By Gilbert Frankau. (Hutchinson. 7s. 6d. net.)

THE DARK RIVER. By Sarah Gertrude Millin. (Collins. 7s. 6d. net.)

In the old untroubled days before the Great Hunting, when London—Heart of Empire—still allowed her sleeping children to be served with meat and drink by spies, murderers, pinups and panders, before the Spirit of England was awake, while yet the Sea, which is England’s mother, and Thames, who is the father of England (“and these twin mates in London Pool for all the world to see”), were the playground of youth, in—let us be honest—the stale old days before 1914, Peter Jackson was a cigar merchant with an almost passionate interest in cigarettes, and Patricia, his wife, was his pal. Not more than that? Reason cried (for she was the daughter of Doctor Heron Baynet, brain specialist, Harley Street, who had taught her to think): “Is not that enough?” Instinct whispered “No.” They had three thousand a year, a house in Lowndes Square, five servants, two children, a governess. Life was made up of family parties, theatre-going, a summer holiday, mornings at home and afternoons at the skating rink, and yet—and yet—all was not well with Patricia. She was thirty, and she wanted something more. As for Peter, he was too absorbed in business to think of Life. He thought in terms of cigars, he dreamed in cigarettes. It was not that money and money mattered so much—it was that Peter Jackson could not bear to be a failure. Weaklings to the wall, to the strong man the fruits of his brain. . .

But while Patricia still unaware of matchless denied, wondered, and the sides in Peter’s affairs rose and rose, the “Beasts in gray, murder, rape and plunder in their swinish eyes,” came out of their lair and roared so that civilization might hear. For a month and three days Peter Jackson refused to answer the “eternal Questioning,” tried to ignore “the khaki blossoming now like a brown flower at every street corner.” But one evening, after dinner, after telling his wife a little of what giving up the cigarettes would mean to him, he made her see—“her eyes kindled at the prospect”—that he must go. And from that moment Patricia’s problem was solved, her cup was full and brimming. For now she loved him utterly, beyond friendship. “At a word she had become his mate, his woman to do with as he would.” But from Peter Jackson these things were hidden.

On the strength of having been at one time Corporal Jackson of the Éton Dog-potters Peter got a commission, and gradually, with a man’s job to his hand, the city faded. He became absorbed in the care of his men.

... These men! For of the officers one does not write. The well-educated, the well-off, the comfortable classes must needs defend the country from which they draw their riches and their education, and he who did not do it—voluntarily, without compulsion or fear of compulsion—whatever his fancied responsibilities to his profession, to his businesses, to his house, to his women or his children, is surely anathema maranatha, the moral leper, the pariah among his kind.

Can we not hear, dear reader, an echo of the applause which the Peters and Patricia’s of that time would have lavished upon such words?

Nevertheless, throughout the year’s training before he left for France, Peter was troubled by business; there was a big drop on the cigars, and, bitternes still, the cigarettes had to go. Patricia saw his suffering.

She suffered, and suffered dammably... She even grew to resent her own children, her perpetual “Daddy’s going to France to kill Germans.” But neither the mate nor the mother in Patricia pinched as pal or as playmate; she did her duty, laughter on her lips, gold head high.

Mr. Gilbert Frankau has called his novel a romance of married life. But why not of war—daardful, bloody, glorious, stinking, frightful, magnificent war? The middle of his novel is, if one examines it, nothing but a roaring hymn in praise of killing, for killing is the Job of Jobs. True, poor bloody Tommy was blown to bits, men went mad, died in their thousands, filled the lamentable night with their shrieks and groans, but according to Mr. Frankau they died a man’s death, and little children to-day, who look with wistful eyes upon their father’s sword, may be taught to hope.

His hero came out of it with shell shock, neurasthenia, the fear of consumption, a broken man, enfant—only but for the time. In the country house that Patricia had “made” for him, thanks to Heron Baynet, brain specialist, he soon recovered, and, cigars and cigarettes thrown to the winds, fell in love with his wife. The war had been unto him and unto that woman whom he took for his mate a cleansing fire. And (courage, mes enfants, courage) in a vision that comes to Peter’s cousin God promises that:

Never while earth endured would the Beast utterly perish: for God had created the Beast (Germany) even as He had created Man (the Allies) to subdue the Beast. Without this menace of the Beast, man’s finest attribute—the very manhood of him—would atrophy. He would become flabby, emasculate and in his flableness he would perish...

Well, Mr. Frankau knows his public and we know it too. “Peter Jackson” will go the round of that vast family the Hun-Haters, and the men will say: “Stout chap, that writing fellow,” and the women: “My dear, it is too marvellous for words—it brings all the old thrill back again.” But we find ourselves wishing that he had kept his talent in a napkin rather than put it to such uses.

To read “The Dark River” is, after so much wind and brass, to listen to a solo for the viola. Running through the book there is, as it were, a low, troubled throbbing note which never is still. Wrote that note more deliberate—not louder, or more forced, but, musically speaking, finer—it would be a great deal more effective. This low, throbbing note is essential to Miss Millin’s novel; and we must be very certain it is there, for though the story plays above and below it, that which gives it significance and holds our attention is the undertone. Perhaps a novel is never the novel it might have been, but there are certain books which do seem to contain the vision, more or less blurred or more or less clear, of their second selves, of what the author saw before he grasped the difficult pen. “The Dark River” is one of these. Very often, when Miss Millin just fails to make her point, we feel it is not because she does not appreciate the point that is to be made, but because she is so aware of it herself that she takes it for granted on the part of the reader. It is a fascinating, tantalizing problem, how much an author can afford to leave out without robbing the characters of the “situation”; but that is not quite Miss Millin’s difficulty; she has rather misjudged a little what she has “put in.”

The scene of the novel is South Africa, and the first nine chapters describe the life of John Oliver, diamond digger. It may seem, as the story unfolds itself and is found to be not so much concerned with John Oliver as with the Grant family, and Alma Grant in particular, that these chapters are disproportionately long, but Miss Millin knew what she was about when she wrote them. They give us a sudden view of a country and of an experience that the Grants could not understand, even though they lived in its very midst. But the heart of the book is Alma Grant and how she, who seemed so made for life, somehow just missed life, just missed the fineness of everything. This girl waiting, at first because she could so well afford to wait—the best was bound to be kept for her—and then gradually realizing that, after all, others had pushed in front of her, they were choosing and taking and sharing, until there was nothing for her—nothing but Van Reede—is an unusual and fascinating character.

K. M.
H OW shall we inaugurate this series of literary notes more suitably than by a few reflections on the species at large, by a literary note on literary notes? The subject is one that suggests many pleasant considerations, moral and psychological; it has a history and a sufficiency of odd and curious interest: in a word, a perfect subject for that peculiar form of literature known as the literary note.

To the man of action, intent on making money or war or mischief of some kind or other, as well as to the philosopher inhabiting the realms of pure abstraction, our literary preoccupations will appear profoundly trivial and irrelevant. They bring in no cash, they reveal no new facet of the eternal Truth. What is the good, then, of your literary tittle-tattle? Money-maker and truth-seeker, combined in unexpected alliance, confront us menacingly with this question. What is the good of it all?

What, indeed! There are many other human occupations for which it would be as difficult to give an adequate moral or rational justification. But for our literary gossip we have at least this justification, not, it may be, of a very exalted nature, but none the less wholly satisfying: that it occupies and entertains the mind. Mental occupation, the comfortable sense of being busy—that is what we are all of us always asking for. Ennui is a haunting terror. At any cost we must escape the anguish of being bored, we must find something to fill our leisure. But at the same time we have no intention of tiring ourselves. The first necessity hurries us forward into spiritual adventure, while the discreet, self-preservative vis inertiae restrains our arduous within reasonably trivial bounds. Thus, we might devote our leisure to reading higher mathematics or philosophy; we might occupy our minds by trying to solve the problems of the universe. But, oh! the agony of trying to think abstractedly, the pain of long-continued mental concentration! Our restraining idleness steps in with counsels of moderation. And so, in the end, we turn to stamp-collecting, to bibliophily, to antiquarian research, to the curiosities of literature. In these we find our antidote to boredom, the sense of being busy without the sense of fatigue.

What occupation is pleasant, what less exacting than the absorption of curious literary information? Leisure, a relishing palate and a moderately efficient memory are all we need bring with us. Thought and concentration are quite unnecessary. And there is a further satisfaction: our reading is not merely entertaining; it is instructive too. We flatter ourselves that we are learning something, we pretend that we are plunged in study, working furiously. Yes, working on "The Anatomy of Melancholy," on the "Curiosities of Literature," or the "Literary Recreations" of Sir E. T. Cook. Working, learning. . . . We have already discovered what was Lord Palmerston's solitary reference to the classics, what name Achilles assumed among the women, who wrote the flattest line in English, and a thousand more delightful, unnecessary facts.

There have been whole ages when this spiritual equivalent of stamp-collecting was the principal form of culture. In the days when Burton's fantastic genius was making the first sweepings of the Bodleian into an immortal book, it was not the man who could compose the finest epic, but the scholar who could write the oddest and obscurer literary notes, to whom the world paid homage. Salmusius had the reputation of being the greatest man of genius of his day, because he had written a commentary on Orosius, stuffed with absurd information from every author who had lived since the invention of writing. Compared with him, Milton, who had only written two or three tracts on divorce, but thinly sown with citations, and a few poems in passably golden Latin, was a man of small note, an impertinent schoolboy. For anyone with a literary turn of mind, those were happy days. He could gain a very decent reputation in science and philosophy by merely indulging his favourite hobby of curio-hunting in the books of the past. Now, since these subjects have become so deplorably hard of comprehension, the literary man contents himself with being frankly literary and nothing more. Let others perform the difficult and ungraceful task of distorting their minds into thinking abstractly. Our business and pleasure shall be, like Cousin Pons, to potter up and down our rich little mental museum, commenting playfully or respectfully on the masterpieces, furnishing up old anecdotes, arranging and re-arranging the innumerable little facts which crowd the shelves, if we play the collector's part with enough industry and patience we shall end by having the reputation of being learned men. And what a respectable reputation to have been won so pleasantly! To reach the same summit of reputation the men of science will have had to sweat and groan as we have never had to do.

To be a true relisher of literary curiosities one must have a nose and palate that can detect the mellow flavour of ridiculousness that lurks in the history of all human affairs. One must further bring a great respect for the fact-in-itself. "Here Nelson fell!" "In this bed Queen Elizabeth may have slept!": if you are left cold by such affirmations as these, if you are one of those perverse persons who are interested in facts in only so far as they support or refute theories, then you will never make a good literary man. The more absurd, trivial and useless the fact, the more tenderly should it be cherished. Of such stuff the choicest literary notes may be made.

Facts-in-themselves, concrete solid little facts that cannot by any conceivable possibility be made to serve a theoretic purpose—what pen will ever describe or explain their charm? Or who will analyse that queer emotion that stirs in every literary heart at the reading of such sentences as these?

"About 1676 or 5, as I was walking through Newgate street" (the speaker is John Aubrey of happy memory), "I saw Dame Venetia Digby's bust standing at a stall at the Golden Crosse, a brasier's shop. I perfectly remembered it, but the fire" (the Great Fire, which had destroyed, among other things, Venetia's "sumptuous and stately monument," from which this bust was a piece of salvage) "had got-off the building; but taking notice of it to one that was with me, I could never see it afterwards exposed to the street. They melted it down. How these curiosities would be quite forgot, did not such idle fellows as I am pull them down!" Autolycus.

THE INCORPORATED SOCIETY OF AUTHORS, PLAYWRIGHTS AND COMPOSERS

Major H. Hesketh-Prichard, M.C., D.S.O., owing to ill-health, has been forced to resign his position as Chairman of the Committee of Management of the Incorporated Society of Authors, Playwrights and Composers. The Committee accepted his decision with regret, but are glad to report that although he felt bound to resign the position of Chairman, as it entailed responsible work throughout the year, with much daily worry and a heavy correspondence, he still retains a seat on the Committee. Canon A. C. Deane, who had resigned the Chairmanship in the summer, has kindly consented to resume his duties during the next few months and assist the Society through a difficult crisis.

The election of members in 1920, and the sum paid in annual subscriptions, exceeded in number and amount the figures for any one year since the foundation of the Society in 1884—the elections numbering 380 members, and the annual subscriptions aggregating £2,564.
LETTERS FROM AMERICA

III. THE LUCIFER BROTHERS IN STARLIGHT

Do not know whether it is the custom in England, as it is here, to keep current statistics of the sales of books. Last month, the "best-sellers"—and to compile from many sources a report on those books, fiction and non-fiction, "most in demand at the public libraries." It is an interesting institution, not without its value for the sociologist. Through its medium curious things come to light. Who would have predicted that "The Education of Henry Adams" was a sensation? a work of a biography, and of a fundamentally sceptical character, should for almost a year compete in sales with the most popular fiction, outlasting indeed, as a "best-seller," many books of that nature? Its success was phenomenal. The publishers stood a little bewildered in a glare of light from so unexpected a quarter. It is presumably to take advantage of this that almost simultaneously two new Adams books have been published: one of them by Brooks Adams, Henry Adams' brother; the other by Henry Adams himself, with a preface by Brooks Adams. It is highly doubtful whether either book will remotely rival "The Education of Henry Adams," but in the human element so conspicuous; in both the passion for theory, for the scientific attitude (particularly when it runs counter to the orthodoxy), is paramount. And of both, it goes without saying, the brilliance is manifest.

The book by Brooks Adams is not wholly new. It is "The Municipalities of Massachusetts," and was, as a matter of fact, first published in 1887: a narrative, extraordinarily vivid and entertaining, of the bitter struggle by which Massachusetts, between 1650 and 1783, threw off a narrow ecclesiastical tyranny and obtained civil and religious liberty: a highly local historical document in point of fact, but in effect, also, a finely proportioned witness to a process which is universal. When first published it made a sensation. Later, it became a "classic," but one with which, somehow or other, few were acquainted. By the present generation, it is safe to say, it had never been heard of. It is now reissued with the addition of a preface which is a book in itself, and which relates to the "Emancipation" only in the most charmingly oblique and inferential of ways.

What connection there is, is disposed of in the very beginning. Mr. Adams, re-examining the book after a lapse of thirty years, finds it excellent as history, but, as concerns its philosophical implications, out of tune with his present convictions. When the book was written he still, by that inheritance and inertia, believed in the post-Darwinian doctrine of the evolutionary perfectibility, or "Ascent," of man. This doctrine now appears to him to be naively optimistic. He now sees the world as a chaos, guided by no simple primary law; a chaos in which man, an automatic criminal, doomed to follow forever the line of least resistance, is despite his idealsisms the "victim of infinite conflicting forces." The motive of the whole preface is the conflict between flesh and spirit. Its conclusion is pessimistic in the extreme, a prophecy of gradual or rapid degradation for mankind, to be reached as much by the gradual as by the abrupt. This note of "degradation," which is ultimately the key-note of the thought of both Brooks Adams and Henry Adams, and which was first clearly struck by Brooks Adams in his "Law of Civilization and Decay," is not, however, stressed in this particular preface. What here concerns him is the essential quality of man's nature—idealism as against physical necessity, self-interest as against the interest of the social organism. This is the recurring bitter theme, powerfully played upon. Our pessimist, self-possessed, undisturbed, humorous, gaily ironic, always gentle, runs the rich gamut of history from the time of the Exodus down to the present President Wilson from Paris. It is an extraordinary survey, amazingly complex in its transitions; as a piece of special pleading it comes close to being overwhelming. Is the case so hopeless? That much, indeed, is open to question, and will be sharply questioned by historians and sociologists, not to say by Churchmen. But of the beauty of the preface as a literary document, or even as a vivification of history, there can be no possibility of doubt.

What emerges most in it is what also occupies the greater part of it in point of space—the study, the analysis, or rather the synthesis (since it is created as much as critical, of the character and achievements of Moses. Mr. Adams seize upon Moses as the supreme type of man, the "victim of infinite conflicting forces." The optimist who believed that in his God he had discovered a source of primary moral power to which it was only necessary to connect his social engine to have it function to perfection; the idealist who attempted also to be practical; the practical idealist who believed that the end (the betterment of man) justified any means, and therefore that the cooperative force of God became less frequent and manifest, more and more of a politician, stooping more and more often to fraud and cruelty; eventually, the politician who had lost faith in his "motor," who succumbed to the chaotic physical forces about him, lost control of his people, and committed suicide, disillusioned. It is a superb portrait, one that defies summary; a relentless, but singularly courteous, even poetic epitome of the nature of man as Brooks Adams sees him, and as, perhaps, he is. And the same principles, under his scrutiny, emerge, brilliantly magnified, in his salient turning-points of history between that time and this. One sees the horror of histories which so distresses Mr. Adams, one sees also, as a kind of counterpart, the perpetual accompaniment for man of certain grim physical laws, against which he struggles hopefully forever, only to be forever beaten down.

And it is more persistently, even exclusively to these laws that we turn in the other new Adams book, "The Degradation of the Democratic Dogma." It is a curious farrago—part history, part biography, part autobiography, part—and perhaps, also, a chronicle of the ideas which, in the ten years which again is by Brooks Adams, occupies nearly half the book, and is entitled "The Heritage of Henry Adams." It is followed by three papers by Henry Adams: "The Tendency of History" (1894), "A Letter to American Teachers of History" (1910), and "The Rule of Phase applied to History" (1899). In his preface Brooks Adams faced a difficult task, one in which certain awkwardnesses were inherent. A biography of one who had written the "Education" would be superfluous. What was wanted was a survey of the important influences on Henry Adams, and as these were, in the opinion of his brother, largely, in fact, from his grandfather, Brooks Adams, and the influence of himself, and as the latter was an influence which he no doubt preferred to leave, as far as possible, inferential, it was inevitable that the preface, while ostensibly a unit, would fall, without the author's clear admission, into two parts. In the earlier part the figure of John Quincy Adams rises before us. It is impossible to indicate adequately the wealth and scope of the two longer papers here published, to do justice to them as pieces of literature; or, for that matter, to exaggerate the skill, perceived in retrospect, with which Brooks Adams has traced, in his preface, the genealogy of the ideas there finally elaborated. The whole book, in this sense, is a genealogy of ideas: John Quincy Adams, Brooks Adams, and Henry Adams figure merely, perhaps, as successive "hosts leading in the "Tendency of Degradation," and the "laws of historical evolution." "The truth and Henry are, we here perceive, the extremes, the most "practical" and the most "speculative" respectively; Brooks is the mean, less "practical" than his grandfather, but on the other hand a good deal less a victim of the sort of volitional paralysis to which Henry's profound negativism at last led him to the "Tendency of Degradation." And Henry speculated on what would happen if "some new Darwin" were to formulate the "laws of Historical evolution." "In whatever direction we look, we can see no possibility of converting history into a science without bringing it into hostility toward one or more of the most powerful organizations of our time. The mechanism by which it overthrows social organizations cannot affect our attitude . . . ." Plainly he foresaw a series of terrible disasters to society as it has for the last two hundred years been organized. And asking himself what course of action the teacher of history should pursue in this predicament, the teacher of history, a science, he remarks: "Beyond a doubt, silence is best.

* The previous Letters appeared in The Athenæum for October 10 and December 12, 1919.

Nevertheless he found it impossible to remain silent. And his "Letter to American Teachers of History" and "Rule of Phase applied to History" are his own rich contributions toward a demonstration of the laws of historical evolution. The first of these thoughts is entitled "Law of Degradation applied to the Social Organism." That, at all events, is the theme of it. It is an amazing panorama. The first chapter, "The Problem," asks and answers the question whether life should not be regarded as simply a form of energy, whether "vital" or mechanical, and whether, if so, it should not exactly be said to operate in accordance with the laws of thermo-dynamics, and in particular with the second law—the law that, once lost, is lost for ever. This question is elaborately and beautifully argued, and answered in the affirmative. And at once Henry Adams' magnificent engine of pessimism is on its way, carrying with it perfectly nearly everything to which man attaches importance. The solar system is running down like a clock: man, of relatively late appearance in a world already well "degraded," himself low in the scale of life (considered in terms of energy), dwindles progressively before our eyes; brains are developed only in "improvised" organisms; thought is a "dying" and declining institution among men; a society does also, despite periodic "contractions" (as of the sun) or combustion of fresh races flung in (like so much fuel); the decision of the energies of society, of which man's intellectual development has only served to increase the rapidity, will end when a dead level, or rest, has been reached—a change that will ruin society and the progress of man, in whatever sense, is illusory . . . . The impression of gain is derived from an impression of Order due to the levelling of energies; but . . . the impression of Order is an illusion consequent on the dissolution of the higher Order which had supplied, by lowering its inequalities, all the useful energies that caused progress. The reality behind the illusion is, therefore, absence of the power to do useful work—or what man knows in his finite sensibilities as death . . . . This is sufficiently saddening: the conclusion is, therefore, that there is no excuse for history to be anything but a science, one which cannot truly teach anything but the gradual degradation of man. But in "The Rule of Phase" Henry Adams takes another step. Granted that history must be a science, that it will be basically a study of human society from the point of view of "degradation" (in the thermo-dynamic sense), what principles will govern its direction and rate of degradation? . . . Once more the law of the less is at work, and the law given in the first time it is the Rule of Phase, as formulated by Willard Gibbs. Thought is the universal solvent, the index to the life of man: it is also a physical thing, will obey physical laws. Henry Adams proceeds, therefore, to plot its phases, an astounding undertaking, which results in the tentative prediction, mathematically arrived at, that thought will reach its final or 'etherial' phase in 1921. This phase will last perhaps four years, perhaps fifty. After it will begin the long decline.

This meagre summary may serve to indicate the engrossing character of the book: it cannot possibly give an idea, however, of its force and brilliance, of the charm of personality which constantly moves behind it. One puts the book down, as one does also "The Emancipation of Massachusetts," with the profound admiration for a work of great and rare and intensely moving power.

For it is a singular, delicious spectacle, that of these two Adams brothers, these pessimists, negativists, collaborators in the "bible of anarchy," who nevertheless inherit from their Puritan ancestry such love of order that, like a pair of melancholy Lucifers, they rise in starlight, and observe with wondrous horror the workings of an insensate law which, they declare delightedly, is, from man's point of view, inimical and lethal.

Conrad Aiken.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTES

The sale of books being held by Messrs. Sotheby on the 18th, 19th and 20th inst. appeals to a wide variety of interests. The first 177 lots, the property of Mr. Gorsira, are a typical collection of French literature, nicely bound, such as was fashionable at the beginning of the nineteenth century. The next portion of about 300 lots comes from the library of one of the early members of the Roxburghe Club, and includes what must be a very long set of its publications from 1857 to 1895. We notice that no copy of Mr. Watson Taylor's own books included in this auction is a first edition. A number of small octavos in French armorial bindings of the late eighteenth century, formed by Mr. Taylor after the Revolution. A few of them are identified in the catalogue, e.g., Mme. Victoire de France, Marie Thérèse, wife of Charles X., Mme. Sophie Philippe de France, Mme. Marie Addélade de France, Comtesse de Guzman, Duc de Gramont, son of Louis XIV, Empress Marie Amelia, Comtesse du Barry (very rare), M. de Sartine, Duc de Richelieu, Louis XV, Louis Philippe. Others still awaited recognition. The next set comes from the Hamilton Palace Library, and include two first editions of Beckford; a long set of the Bannatyne Club publications: a very rare page of Dryden'senny rare one by Jonson, and some Spanish Armada tracts.

The most interesting part of the sale to a bibliographer is that of Bishop Luxmore, who collected a large number of early Bibles and Reformation tracts. We shall note only the rarest. Two imperfect New Testaments come first—the Holy Bibles of 1538, printed in London, and the 1548 Tyndale, printed partly in England and partly abroad. The excessively rare "Stories and prophecy out of the holy scripture" is unfortunately very imperfect. There are one in the Bodleian, and a more imperfect one in Cambridge. Another excessively rare book is lot 741, which has the fake imprint of "Sammelband," but was reprinted at Antwerp by Martin Meyer in 1531. Copies are in the British Museum and Cambridge. Lot 752, "The Souper of the Lord," is very rare, and is still a puzzle to bibliographers. It is probably an Antwerp book printed in 1538. Its colophon says Nurnburg. There are a large number of quarto and folio Bibles in English, and some books of general interest.

BOOK SALE

Thackeray has always made a strong appeal to our cousins across the Atlantic. They appreciated him long before he was known outside editorial circles in this country. Almost from the first they paid him the highest compliment they ever paid any English author in those days—they pirated his writings. While The Yellowplush Correspondence was still appearing in Fraser’s Magazine, Messrs. Carey & Hart of Philadelphia published what had been printed—thus bringing out the first publication in book-form of Thackeray’s works in either country. On the other hand, N. P. Willis, the editor of the New York Corsair, when he visited England in 1839, at once made inquiries as to the identity of the authors of “Yellowplush” and “Galahag,” and was surprised and delighted to find that they were the work of the same man. He at once asked Thackeray to contribute to the Corsair. When Thackeray went to lecture in the United States, he became the hero of the day; everybody, he declared, had read his books, and his lectures would please that a book-stall boy on the train invited him to purchase a volume of his own works. His books sold well there, and there has always been, and there is to-day, a wide public for any book about him and his writings.

Americans have always been enthusiastic collectors of Thackeray’s manuscripts, drawings, first editions. Major William H. Lambert of Philadelphia has undoubtedly the finest collection of these in the world, and the catalogue of the sale of his library after his death is a feast for Thackeray enthusiasts. Mr. van Duzer has followed in the footsteps of Major Lambert, and if his collection is not so strong in manuscripts and letters, it is nevertheless a very valuable and interesting collection. Mr. van Duzer has done what the other did not: he has printed a handsome, well-illustrated catalogue. It is true that this is privately printed, and not on sale; but copies have been presented to the British Museum and other great libraries.

Clearly Mr. van Duzer loves his Thackeray. His catalogue is no mere compilation. He describes his items and sometimes discusses them. His knowledge of his subject is as wide as his enthusiasm is deep. Unfortunately, he has not made his catalogue complete. He has not, he admits, attempted to collect or include the many publications of Thackeray and related periodicals which were published in the United States. He refers the student to the admirable bibliography of his brother expert, Mr. Frederick S. Dickson, which is printed in the late General James Grant Wilson’s “Thackeray in the United States.”

Thackeray’s manuscripts are, of course, in various hands. “The Newcomes” is at Charterhouse School, “Esmond” at Trinity College, Cambridge—appropriately enough, for it was at these places that the author was educated; “Vanity Fair” is among the proud possessions of Mr. Pierpont Morgan. Other valuable manuscripts were in the Thackeray library of Major Lambert and have been scattered. Mr. van Duzer has many interesting things to say of the whole of Thackeray’s manuscripts, but the strength of his collection is in his first editions. He has a complete set of the little paper, The Snob, and his successor the Gownsman, issued by Cambridge undergraduates in 1829-39, to which Thackeray contributed; and also of the National Standard (1833-4), owned and edited by Thackeray, who lost in the venture a considerable portion of his patrimony. He has copies of the rare “Flore et Zephyr” (1836), a collection of satirical drawings by Thackeray; and of the still rarer little books “King Glumpus” (1837) and “The Exquisites” (1839), with lithograph plates from drawings by Thackeray, which were probably written by his friend John Borrow. Thackeray’s book has been duly set forth in The Athenæum (February 23, March 2, 9, 1907). First editions of the novels are, of course, in the collection, and Mr. van Duzer has given collations of all the issues, which are of value to other collectors.

The book is one which will be highly prized by students of Thackeray.

Scientifically accurate information regarding mental illnesses and their treatments is crucial. Although Thackeray’s influence remains significant, modern psychiatry has progressed significantly.

MODERN psychology has a distinctly morbid flavour about it, and for the latest views one must often turn to journals and books on nervous and mental diseases. This is due partly to Freud and partly to the war, for Freud has advocated his theories for twenty years and more, but the widespread interest in them dates from the time when the treatment of nervous disorders on a large scale became a military necessity. And although Freud’s psychology arose out of the investigation of abnormal mental states, it has been applied to explain the behaviour of normal individuals in almost every branch of mental activity.

Its conclusions will not please everyone; for it is certainly not on the side of the angels. Our mythology and folk-lore have long been fair play for the psychologists, but the Freudians strip us of every vestige of civilization, and claim that our politics, our views on mathematics or architecture, indeed all the phases of our mental life, are determined by the unconscious strivings of instincts, and in particular of those instincts which lead us to procure our kind. Just as our fathers were disgusted by Darwin’s suggestion that our bodies were descended from the ape, so we feel today some bitterness when our mental structure is shown to have the same origin, and our thoughts are compared to those of a baboon or a herd of cattle. However, it is useless to resist, for although many of the claims of the psycho-analysts are undoubtedly extravagant, yet there is already enough proof to show that the main foundations of the theory are sound.

How far these ideas have taken root in modern psychological literature may be seen from the first chapter in Dr. Read’s book. In it he traces the mental attitude of the soldier through the various phases of his military life. He shows the conflict which precedes enlistment, the struggle between the ego and the herd instincts, between the love of one’s own life and the love of one’s country—the great mother—enforced by the military suggestion of recruiting posters, men in khaki, and later by the whole routine of military training. All these emotional forces help the soldier to act and think as he is told, to forget his civilization and where necessary to behave as one of the pack whose sole purpose is to kill its enemies.

We may object that most soldiers knew what they were about and had good reason for their actions, but the psycho-analysts pay little attention to conscious reasoning except in so far as it serves to reveal our unconscious tendencies. For them our most logical train of thought is mere “rationalization,” the pitiful attempt we make to deceive ourselves into the belief that our thoughts and actions are founded on the intellect, whereas the real determining force is the secret pressure of old and rather disreputable instincts. Unfortunately these instincts do not all press in the same direction and our mental life is a perpetual effort to serve two masters—our ego instincts, which have a strong sexual colouring, and the social instincts fostered by civilization out of the life of the herd. Normally we can solve the conflict with more or less success by diverting the pressure of the opposing forces into less antagonistic channels, so that our ego instincts are satisfied in part by any activity which will make others think well of us. This process is known as sublimation, and the difference between a normal and an abnormal mind is that the former can sublimate successfully when the need arises, whereas the latter cannot. Some fail to satisfy their opposing instincts, or to solve the conflict by sublimation, even in... times of peace, and these seek refuge in day-dreams or alcohol or in the many symptoms of nervous and mental disease. In war-time the difficulties are far greater, and the need for the complete suppression of the self calls for an effort which is beyond the power of many who are able to deal with the minor conflicts of civil life. But the nervous and mental disorders which result from this failure to adapt in war-time have the same mechanism and the same symptoms as those which arise in civil life in the less robust. As in peace-time, the paranoid mind works up an elaborate theory of persecution to account for the world's failure to recognize its greatness, the alcoholic hears the same threatening voices, and the epileptic finds the same temporary relief in his fits of frenzy.

Dr. Read is fortunately not one of those ardent followers of Freud who accept without proof anything Freud says and anything any other psycho-analyst says. For instance, he confesses that he cannot follow the theory that the victim of alcoholic insanity cuts his throat because throat laceration is connected with the birth fantasy and is the only form of sacrifice which will allay the fear of a more terrible mutilation. Yet he is quite enough of a Freudian to write a very interesting book for the limited, but rapidly growing, audience of medical men who study the problem of the insane. In spite of this and of several other books written from the same point of view one cannot help feeling that in mental disorders psycho-analysis is at best an instrument of diagnosis and research rather than of treatment. Naturally it cannot hope to benefit the vast group of mentally defective patients or those whose illness is due to organic disease of the brain, but even in the forms of insanity which arise from the failure to reconcile our opposing instincts the psycho-analyst can only point the way to solve a particular conflict by a normal instead of an abnormal method of adjustment. This may be all that is needed in a mild case, but as a rule the abnormal method will become a fixed habit and only can be cured only to give place to another, unless indeed the psycho-analyst is prepared to devote a lifetime to the process of recasting his patient's mind.

However, the science is still in its infancy, and in the field of psychiatry its first task must be to unravel the mechanism by which mental disorders are produced; a great deal more must be done on these lines before it will be safe to predict its value as a method of treatment.

SOCIETIES

ROYAL.— January 29.—Sir J. J. Thomson, President, in the chair.

The following papers were read: "The Genetics of 'Rogues' among Culinary Peas (Pisum sativum)," by W. Bateson and Caroline Pellae, in continuation of a previous communication (Proc. R.S. 89, 1915); "Studies of Synapsis: I. Oogenesis in the Hymenoptera," by L. T. Hobgen; "On a Periodic Structure in many Insect Stains, and the Cause of their Iriscent Colours," by H. Osmow.

LINNEAN.— February 5.—Dr. A. Smith Woodward, President, in the chair.

Mr. Leonard John Sedgwick was admitted a Fellow. —The President announced the deaths of the following Foreign Members: Professor W. Gilson Farlow, Professor Ernst H. P. A. Haeckel, Professor Gustaf M. Retzius, Professor Simon Schwendener, and Professor Hermann von Vöchting.—The following were elected Fellows: Professor Sahay Ram Bose (Calcutta), Tribhawan Nath Bhan, Dr. T. Robertson Sim, Frank H. Taylor, and Dr. W. Rashdon Parker.

A paper entitled "On the Existence of Two Fundamentally Different Types of Characters in Organisms," was read by Dr. R. Ruggles Gates, who said that the experimentalist point of view regarding evolution, resulting from the work in mutation and Mendelism, was frankly antagonistic to the views of paleontologists, anatomists, and others who deal with orthogenesis and the inheritance of acquired characters. He wished to show that while these factors bore entirely different relations to evolutionary changes, both were necessary to account for evolution as it has taken place. The President, Dr. J. R. Leeson, Professor E. S. Goodrich, Dr. W. Bateson, and others discussed the paper.

FORTHCOMING MEETINGS

Fri. 20. Geological, 3.—Annual Meeting. King's College, 4.—"Ecclesiastical Art," Lecture VI., Professor P. Dearmer.

King's College, 5.30.—"Ecclesiastical Music: The Choirmaster," Dr. E. H. Fellowes.

King's College, 5.30.—"Historical Theories of Space, Time, and Movement: The Vortex—Extension as Substance—Descartes," Professor H. Wildon Carr.

King's College, 6.—"La Dynamique de Madame V: L'Armée byzantine," Dr. L. Gresomos.

University College, 5.30.—"The Private Life of the Greeks," Dr. E. A. Gardner.

Institution of Mechanical Engineers, 6.—Annual Meeting. Resumed Discussion on "Recent Advances, in Utilization of Water-Power.

Egypt Exploration Society (Royal Society's Rooms), 8.30.—"The Historical Value of Greek Papyri," Mr. H. Idris Bell.

Royal Institution, 9.—"British Crop Production," Dr. E. J. Russell.

Mon. 23. King's College, 5.30.—"The History of Learning and Science in Poland," Lecture II., Professor L. Tartakower.

King's College, 5.30.—"Outlines of Greek History: The Revival of Culture, 802-67," Professor A. J. Tychybe.

University College, 5.30.—"Guillaume de Machaut's Literary and Musical Work," Lecture III., Miss Barbara Smythe.

Dr. Williams' Library (41, Gordon Square, W.C.), 6.—"The Analysis of Mind," Lecture XV., Mr. Bertrand Russell.

Royal Society of Arts, 8.—"Recent Researches in the Cellulose Industry," Lecture II., Mr. C. F. Cross. (Cantor Lecture.)

Royal Institute of British Architects, 8.30.—"Greek Design," Mr. Jay Hambidge.

Royal Academy, 4.—"Animal Anatomy," Lecture V., Mr. W. Frank Calhoun.

Institute of Engineers, 5.30.—"Restoration of a Cyclone-Damaged Breakwater End in Madras Harbour," and "Coastal Sand Travel near Madras Harbour;" Sir Francis J. B. Spring.

King's College, 5.30.—"The Philosophy of Kant," Lecture VI., Professor H. Wildon Carr.

University College, 5.30.—"The Golden Age in Danish Literature," Lecture III., Mr. J. H. Helwig.

University College, 5.30.—"Holland and Belgium," Lecture III., Professor P. Goey.

Wed. 25. University College, 3.—"History and Drama in the Divina Commedia," Lecture V., Dr. E. G. Gardner. (Barlow Lectures.)

Royal Society of Arts, 4.30.—"Industrial Training," Mr. J. Carr.

Geological, 5.30.—"The Lower Carboniferous Chert Formations of Derbyshire," Mr. H. C. Sargent.

King's College, 5.30.—"The Reconstruction of Russia," Sir Bernard Pares.

University College, 5.30.—"Wergeland, Welhaven and Collett," Lecture III., Mr. I. C. Gröndahl.

Thurs. 26. Royal Institution, 3.—"Napoleon, the Orientalist of Ancient Greek and Roman Life in the British Museum," Lecture II., Mr. A. H. Smith.

Royal Academy, 4.—"Animal Anatomy," Lecture VI., Mr. W. Frank Calhoun.

King's College, 5.30.—"The Sources for the History of British India in the Seventeenth Century," Lecture II., Dr. S. A. Khan.

King's College, 5.30.—"The Christ of the Fourth Gospel," Bishop Gore.

University College, 5.30.—"Italian Literature," Lecture VI., Professor Antonio Cippico. (In Italian.)

University College, 5.30.—"August Strindberg," Lecture III., Mr. I. Björkhamn.

University College, 5.30.—"The Trend of Architectural Thought in England To-day," Mr. F. M. Simpson.

Fine Arts

RENOIR

Next door to Chelsea Old Church the Chelsea Book Club have opened a small gallery where there now hangs a selection of about thirty Renoirs. Though no single picture could be called important, together they afford a more general view of Renoir's genius than has hitherto been offered to Londoners. In these small landscapes, flower pieces and nude studies, Renoir reveals his more immediate and instinctive reactions.

What a lover of the commonplace Renoir was! It is a rare quality among artists. A theoretically pure artist exists no more than a Euclidean point, but if such a being could exist, every possible actual sight would be equally suitable as a point of departure for his artistic vision. Everything would stir in him the impulse to creation. He would have no predilections, no tastes for this or that kind of thing. In practice every artist is set going by some particular kind of scene in nature, and for the most part artists have to search out some unusual or unexplored aspect of things. Gauguin, for instance, had to go as far as Tahiti. When Renoir heard of this, he said, in a phrase which revealed his own character, "Pourquoi ? On point si bien à Batignolles." But there are plenty of artists who paint more or less well at Batignolles or Bloomsbury and yet are not lovers of the commonplace. Like Walter Sickert, for instance, they find their Tahiti in Mornington Crescent. Though they paint in commonplace surroundings, they generally contrive to catch them at an unexpected angle. Something odd or exotic in their taste for life seems to be normal to artists. The few artists or writers who have shared the tastes of the average man have, as a rule, been like Dickens, to take an obvious case, very imperfect and very impure artists, however great their genius. Among great artists one thinks at once of Rubens as the most remarkable example of a man of common tastes, a lover of all that was rich, exuberant and even florid. Titian, too, comes nearly up to the same standard, except that in youth his whole trend of feeling was distorted by the overpowering influence of Giorgione, whose tastes were recondite and astringent. And Renoir, in the frankness of his colour harmonies, in his feeling for, design and even in the simplicity of his pigment, reminds us of these two. Now it is easier to see how an artist of the sixteenth or seventeenth century could develop commonplace tastes than one of our own times. For with the nineteenth century came a gradual process of differentiation of the artist from the average man. The modern artist finds himself so little understood in his aims and methods that he tends to become distinct in his whole attitude to life.

What, then, is so peculiar about Renoir is that he has this perfectly ordinary taste in things and yet remains so intensely, so purely, an artist. The fact is perhaps that he was so much an artist that he never had to go round the corner to get his inspiration; the immediate, obvious, front view of everything was sufficient to start the creative impulse. He enjoyed instinctively, almost animali, all the common good things of life, and yet he always kept just enough detachment to feel his delight aesthetically— he kept, as it were, just out of reach of appetite.

Let me confess that to me, personally, this makes Renoir a particularly difficult artist. My taste for exotic artists such as Cosima Tura and his kin amounts to a vice. Consequently, I am always in danger of not doing him justice, because at the first approach to one of his pictures I miss the purely accessory delight of an unexpected attitude.

The first approach to a Renoir may indeed remind one of pictures that would be the delight of the servants' hall, so unaccountably simple is his acceptance of the charm of rosy-cheeked girls, of pretty poses and dappled sunlight. Not but what one knows well enough that Renoir was as "artful as one could wish. Though he had not the biting wit of Degas, he had a peculiar love of mischievous humour; he was anything but a harmless or innocent character. All his simplicity is on the surface only. The longer one looks, the deeper does Renoir retire behind veil after veil of subtlety. And yet, compared with some modern artists, he was, after all, easy and instinctively simple. Even his plastic unity was arrived at by what seems a more natural method than, say, Cézanne's. Whereas Cézanne undertook his indefatigable research for the perspective of the receding planes, Renoir seems to have accepted a very simple general plastic formula. Whatever Cézanne may have meant by his celebrated saying about cones and cylinders, Renoir seems to have thought of the sphere and cylinder sufficient for his purpose. The figure presents itself to his eye as an arrangement of more or less hemispherical bosses and cylinders, and he appears generally to arrange the light so that the most prominent part of each boss receives the highest light. From this the planes recede by insensible gradations towards the contour, which generally remains the vaguest, least ascertainable part of the modelling. Whatever lies immediately behind the contour tends to become drawn into its sphere of influence, to form an undefined recession enveloping and receiving the receding planes. As the eye passes away from the contour, new but less marked bosses form themselves and fill the background with repetitions of the general theme. The picture tends thus to take the form of a bas-relief in which the recessions are not into the profound distances of pictorial space, but only back, as it were, to the block out of which the bossed reliefs emerge, though, of course, by means of atmospheric colour the eye may interpret these receding zones into distance. This is clearly in marked contrast to Cézanne's method of suggesting endless recessions of planes with the most complicated interwoven texture.

Renoir's drawing takes on the same fundamental simplicity. An Ingres arrived at the simplified statement necessary for great design by a process of gradual elimination of all the superfluous sinuosities which his hand had recorded in the first drawing from nature. Renoir seems never to have allowed his eye to accept more than the larger elements of mass and direction. His full, rounded curves embrace the form in its most general aspect. With advancing years and continually growing science he was able, at last, to state this essential synthesis with amazing breadth and ease. He continually increased the amplitude of his forms until, in his latest nudes, the whole design is filled with a few perfectly related bosses. Like Titian's, Renoir's power of design increased visibly up to the very end of his life. True, he was capable at all periods of conceiving large and finely co-ordinated compositions, such as "Les Parapluies" and the Charpentier family; but at the end even the smallest studies have structural completeness.

Roger Fry.

NOTES ON ART SALES

The pictures and drawings forming the collection of the late C. Fairfax Murray were sold at Christie's on January 30. The Turner drawings, and drawings and pictures by Rossetti, were the most interesting lots. Eight by the former realized £3,968, the chief item being "The Vale of Ashburnham, Sussex," 14 in. by 22 in., (attributed by C. Stadler), for which Messrs. Agnew paid £1,890. The panel painting "Xysteld," by Rossetti, by 10 in. by 18 in., was bought by Mr. Croal Thomson for £378; and the "Monna Rosa," 10 in. by 8 in., by Messrs. Gooden & Fox for £120 15s. Seven drawings by Rossetti fetched £387. "A Valley Scene," by Gainsborough, 17 in., by 27 in., and "Lincoln," by Peter de Wint, 12 in. by 19 in., each fetched £252.
It is impossible to appreciate properly the merits of the exhibitions at the Royal Society of Painter-Etchers and Gravers, the Seneffelder Club, and the Macrae Gallery, although the level of accomplishment in all three places is high, because these collections of heterogeneous art have a bewitching rather than a stimulating effect on the visitor. To group a number of artists of widely different characters because they happen to use the same medium—etching, lithography, or woodcutting—seems to us quite arbitrary. The practice may have certain commercial advantages and be of some service to students of the several crafts, but it is surely indefensible on aesthetic grounds. The work of any artist of consequence in any given medium has more in common with his other work than with the productions of other artists in the same medium. And the attributes of an artist that matter, his point of view and attitude towards life, his method of appeal and so on, remain unchanged by the accident of the medium beneath his hand. These collective exhibitions of work executed in a special medium have, moreover, conduced to the regrettable conception of pictures as mere moneymaking machinery. They are largely the tradition that lithographs and woodblocks are suitable for hall decoration, and etchings for the waiting-rooms of consulting physicians, and they thus indirectly encourage large numbers of men and women to produce insignificant work for markets which demand nothing more than an imitation of the general effect of a framed work in the appropriate medium. The exhibition of attractive woodcuts at the Macrae Gallery is fortunately small, and we can respond in turn to E. M. O'R. Dickey and Edward Wadsworth, Philip Hagreen and Gustav de Smet (brother of Leon de Smet)—four young artists whose work is worth following. The etchings in Pall Mall are more numerous, and the exhibitors cater largely for the waiting-room market. For this reason the few artists with personality are conspicuous. W. Walcot's "The Stadium, Rome," shows the distinction and knowledge which characterize his water-colours. Miss Molly Campbell's "Washing Up" and "The Broken Jar" are among the Cruise's true etchings very promising. Her technical equipment is, however, not sufficient to enable her to succeed in the more ambitious plate "Armistice Day." M. Steinfeld's war etchings impress us less than his earlier drawings of more genial subjects. This able social cartoonist is quite uninfluenced by the modern feeling for pictorial rhythms, and his work strikes us as intolerably ragged in consequence. His characterization moreover, though versatile, is inferior to that of Forain. There is no lack of personalities among the lithographers at the Leicester Galleries. In fact they are in embarrassing numbers. The mind refuses to react to so many points of view with quick succession. Associated ideas seem to crowd from the walls, where fifty or sixty important artists speak to us at the same time. Here we have Goya, Delacroix, Daumier, Manet (showing the complete composition of "The Execution of the Emperor Maximilian"), Gaugin (with several of the Breton series), Bouvard, Vuillard, Signac and Anquetin. Our own artists are there in equal strength: Muirhead Bone, Walter Bayes, Frank Brangwyn, John Copley, Alvaro Guevara, Wadsworth again, and F. Ernest Jackson, who has initiated many contemporary London artists into the technical mysteries of lithography. It seems ungracious to complain of too many good things, but the Seneffelder Club's exhibition is really very like a sorcerer overworked with notabilities.

The Memorial Exhibition of work by Sir Ernest Waterlow gives a very fair résumé of his achievement. He was most at home in water-colour, and is seen at his best in such a drawing as "The Junction of the Severn and the Wye.

R. H. W.
over to see "The Dynasts" at Oxford. Perhaps on future occasions it might be possible to arrange for special trains; but it would be still more interesting if an actual exchange of companies could be effected, so that the O.U.D.S., for instance, might act not merely in a stereotyped manner of Cambridge enthusiasts, but to a whole Cambridge audience. It is for University and local audiences, rather than for West-End theatre-goers, that such productions are in the first instance designed.

Another suggestion offered is that operatic productions should be made an annual event. Our objection to this is that these productions, if they are to be worth undertaking, require more than a year to prepare. It might also be pointed out that most of the people engaged in these are officially supposed to be occupied with very different studies. Tutors of colleges regard these things with a kindly eye, remembering, in many cases, their own triumphant appearances on the boards twenty or thirty years earlier; but if the same persons are to be giving up most of their time to rehearsals during every term of their period of residence, they might well begin to feel either that some restriction must be placed on these activities or that they must be formalized and a regular academic school of opera and drama created. Why not? There are, I believe, Universities in America which possess a professor of "Dramatics," possibly a professor of "Operatics" as well. One of the objects of our own British Drama League is to get drama recognized as a regular subject of the curriculum in schools, colleges and Universities. If drama, why not opera? From the Isle of Dogs Mr. Charles Smith holds out a hand which Professor Allen and Professor Stanford may be proud to grasp.

Let no reader imagine that I propose to outline a scheme for a University school of opera. That is for the younger generation to organize. Here, I will only go so far as to suggest that if a really national school of opera is to be developed, it must have the closest possible connection with those uniquely English institutions, the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. It must be associated, in some way or other, with scholarly studies in music and with scholarly studies in English. If, as Dryden said, "scenes and machines" are an essential factor in opera, we must have a thorough and academic school of stage designing; and the whole history of opera, especially in Italy, the land of opera par excellence, shows us that scenic designing must be based upon a training that is primarily architectural. In spite of the rather professional tradition of the O.U.D.S., I do not think that either Oxford or Cambridge is the place for the exclusively professional training of actors. It is not the function of those places to give a merely technical education. As in law, medicine and divinity, so in music, and eventually, perhaps, in drama, University education is concerned fundamentally with theory and with principle. To such theory and principle their occasional dramatic and operatic productions must primarily be illustrative diagrams.

Edward J. Dent.

It is proposed to set up a public memorial to Sir Hubert Parry in Gloucester Cathedral, near which he lived, and in which many of his finest works were performed. The scheme has the approval of the Dean and Chapter. Subscriptions may be sent to the Hon. Norah Davenport, 29, Oxford Square, W.

The Governors of the Memorial Theatre, Stratford-upon-Avon, have made arrangements with the Shakespeare Joint Committee for the annual Birthday Festival to be undertaken by the New Shakespeare Company under the direction of Mr. W. Bridges Adams. The Festival this year will extend for three weeks, commencing on Monday, April 19. The programme will include "Cymbeline," "Richard II," "Hamlet," "The Taming of the Shrew," "Much Ado about Nothing" and "The Merchant of Venice."

"THE FAIRY QUEEN" AT CAMBRIDGE

At Oxford, one gathers, Mr. Hardy has come forward with a suggestion or two; at Cambridge the shade of Purcell was less accommodating, and the task of Mr. Clive Carey and his devoted helpers has been one of creation rather than of representation. In such peculiar circumstances it would be quite out of place for a critic to start measuring out twopenn'orth of praise here and a hap'orth of censure there; his first duty is to express to those concerned the deep and sincere gratitude felt by all who care to see Purcell rescued from the oblivion of musty bookshelves. That done, he may perhaps venture on one or two suggestions that might be worth bearing in mind when the time comes—as we all hope it will come, and very shortly—for a repetition of the performance.

First, then, as to Shakespeare. One felt him and Purcell pulling opposite ways the whole time. All that is needed in "The Fairy Queen" is a peg to hang the musical scenes on, and Shakespeare is too big a man, and the "Midsummer Night's Dream" too fine a thing, to serve that purpose. One could even understand the point of view of those who found the music just a series of unwarrantable interruptions of the drama, though that was certainly no reason why all Purcell's most delicate effects should have been drowned in the hubbub of laughter and conversation that invariably broke out as soon as the music started, and continued with little abatement until it stopped. It was regrettable to find that as regards theatrical manners the audience at Cambridge were even below the Covent Garden standard. But, to return—would it not be better to cut out Shakespeare entirely, and have a few scenes specially written for the purpose—no matter how slender, provided they serve to string the musical interludes together? It must be remembered that in its present form, even with a decidedly curtailed Shakespeare, "The Fairy Queen" is of somewhat formidable dimensions, though we were hardly conscious of this until our watches drew our attention to it.

Second, as to the Purcell part of it. The only point on which one felt any doubt was the last scene, a good deal of which hung fire, although the splendid conception and performance of the final Chaconne was about the best thing of the whole evening. Until the Chaconne began, one felt a slight recurrence of the tedium one had experienced earlier at the sight of those eternally sprawling lovers. The reason may be partly that the scene is simply a succession of arias with virtually no action to carry it forward, but may it not be also that to interpret Purcell's directions literally is in this instance to falsify his meaning? Purcell's intention here is to present a scene so strange that it will "banish incredulity," and in 1662 a Chinese transformation, carried out on a lavish scale, with all known mechanical resources, was a natural and effective method of achieving that object. But times have changed: here again it might be better to cut out the Chinese business altogether, and find some modern equivalent: anything will do, so long as it is entirely unreal and fantastic. The words would need little or no alteration. May one conclude with a perverse regret that "The Play" was omitted? The reasons for omitting it are of course obvious and cogent: it is long; it is utterly irrelevant; even without it the scene is, if anything, too drawn out. All of which created, in the mind of one listener at least, an impious and (as he has already admitted) a perverse desire to hear it.

R. O. M.
CONCERTS

The Queen's Hall Symphony concert on February 7 cannot be criticized in detail. It must suffice to say that Sir Henry Wood has a sound and straightforward rendering of Beethoven's First Symphony: that Mr. Elwes' singing seems to lack something of its old fire; that even Mme. Suggia cannot make Schumann's Violoncello Concerto sound anything but an extremely dull work; and that we find it easier to like Dr. Ethel Smyth's music when she conducts it herself than when somebody else does.

A violin and pianoforte recital with no hyphenated transcriptions is a thing for which one can be truly thankful; though unless the programme consist entirely of sonatas there is no choice between those Kreisler arrangements and concerto movements with the pianoforte representing the orchestra. Miss Jellicoe d'Arany and Miss Ethel Hobyday made their programmes (at the Wigmore Hall on February 9) interesting and varied by including the Schumann Violin Sonata in A minor, part of Joachim's Concerto in the Hungarian style, and Mozart's Adagio in E for violin and orchestra. There is always a question as to whether the Schumann Sonatas can ever be brought off successfully. Perhaps Miss Hobyday made the Schumann too much of an accompaniment. In her anxiety not to swamp the violin and not to be too emphatic, she was inclined to blur her part and leave everything to the other instrument. This last movement in particular no contrast or meaning. The Joachim movement showed how the most extravagant fireside can be brought to the highest possible point when they are played with breadth and dignity of style.

It was inevitable that someone should compose a Poem of Victory sooner or later, and there was no reason why that someone should not be Mr. Raymond Roze as well as anybody else. In fact, we are well out of it, for the "Poem of Victory" might have been much worse; it is, in fact, quite a feeble and inoffensive bit of work—so feeble that it has to pause for breath every few bars, so inoffensive that one could not help wondering what it had done to deserve its title. It is hardly likely to survive its first performance.

The orchestra—organized by Mr. Roze from ex-service men—does its conductor credit, and we wish it every success, but we hope it will exercise a little more discretion in the arranging of its programmes. To follow up the "Poem of Victory" with a Symphonic Poem by Mr. Josef Holbrooke is to impose a severe test on the good nature of an audience. The most interesting thing in the evening was the singing of the "Vespro di Joseph"—a technical exhibition of a remarkable order, though too exclusively concerned with the exploitation of unusual effects to rank very high as music.

When two young ladies lay themselves out to show us what can be done with two violins in concert, one is surprised not to find the name of Purcell on their programme. The Misses J'Arany and Pugnat have made a symphonic movement of the Purcell Society's edition, and have some of the parts copied out; they could in this way establish a firm hold upon our gratitude, and at the same time free themselves from the necessity of relying so largely on composers like Spohr, Sammartini and Pugnat for their programmes. It must be said in all fairness, however, that the unaccompanied duet by Spohr is in its way a remarkable achievement, and one could name half-a-dozen eminent composers to-day whose technique might be improved out of all recognition if they would set themselves occasionally to work in the same medium. Miss Fanny Davies is always said to be the repository of the German romantic tradition; we wish that a little more romance would find its way into her finger-tips. Sound, solid, and conscientious her playing is, beyond question, but never for one instant does she arouse enthusiasm or awaken curiosity.

MISS LILIAN GASKEll has got the rare gift of knowing her own limitations. At her recital on February 9 there was nothing she attempted that she did not do with apparent ease; if pianists would only realize that this is an essential requirement of the listener, we should be saved much vexation of spirit. Miss Gaskell is not a star of the first magnitude, but her recital was much more endurable than the majority of present-day piano recitals are. She has taste, tact, and discretion.

MUSICAL NOTES FROM PARIS

The week January 30—February 7 was marked by several musical events of more than usual interest. On the one hand, it might be described as a "Stravinsky week," as, besides the extra performance of "Petrouchka" (redemanded), the Diaghilev troupe produced on February 2, at the Opéra, the new ballet "Le Chant du Rossignol"—music by Igor Stravinsky, choreography by Léonide Massine, curtain, scenery and costumes by Henri Matisse—and on February 7 the Society "Pour la Musique" gave a concert consisting entirely of Stravinsky's latest non-orchestral compositions. These included the "Suite de l'Histoire du Soldat" (1919) for piano, violin and clarinet (first performance), "Piano Rag-Music" (1919, first performance), and the piano transcription of the "Rag-time for eleven instruments" (1918); the String Quartet; three pieces for clarinet solo (first performance); Eight Easy Pieces for Piano (four bars only, 1914—1917); "Priboutouk" (for voice and eight instruments); four Russian songs; and two "Histoires pour Enfants" (first performance).

The "Suite de l'Histoire du Soldat," extremely well played by MM. Beneventi (violin), José Iturbi (piano) and Duqquis (clarinet), was given twice during the afternoon—a good plan when new music is being performed for the first time. It contains some delightful music—a mock-military march, the Devil's dance of triumph, and the soldier's own "petit concert" which he plays on his violin, sitting by the riverside. M. Koubitzky sang the extraordinary "Priboutouk" with expression and animation. Both works are songs "Tribou" and "Les Canaris, les Cygnes, et les Oies..." about which it would be difficult to make any coherent criticism. Indeed, one feels that Stravinsky's music must be accepted as it stands—almost as a natural phenomenon, which you may or may not like, but have to accept.

The subject of "Le Chant du Rossignol" (ballet) is the same as that of the opera "Le Rossignol," but the score is partly new. M. Matisse's curtain and "décors" represent the extreme of simplification. Both consist of a perfectly plain pale blue ground, with here and there a white undulating line or two to suggest a door, etc., and overhead a grinning, white fantastic Chinese Dragon. Mme. Karsavina, all in white, with a little feathered tunic, was the real Nightingale, he, after being ousted by the outrageous mechanical bird, with its great green body and white cockatoos crest (Izidkowsky), magnanimously returns to the languishing Emperor's sick-bed, whence she triumphantly chases the sinistrorse (Gotheby) Solliotree the Emperor to health. The supreme dramatic moment is when the latter (Grigoriev) suddenly rises to his full height from the gloomy, monumental Imperial bed, where he has been reposing in awful isolation, and, letting fall a gorgeous scarlet robe, embroidered with golden dragons, which fills the stage width, borrow piled high with a concert mandarins and mourners who have come to bewail his death.

The choreography is complex and bizarre throughout. It reveals a fresh endeavour to explore all the possibilities of a rhythmic and decorative treatment of human motion, and results in a series of the weirdest contortions and acrobatic posturing, which fall, in the main, to the lot of the male and female "corps de ballet," who acquire themselves of an exceedingly fatiguing task with extraordinary skill.

At a previous concert of "Pour la Musique" (January 30) a number of new French compositions were performed, of which one of the most remarkable is Darius Milhaud's setting of "Les Chœufières" (Eschyleus, translated by Paul Claudel) for orchestra, solo voices and chorus. The music is character-cut and full of a certain rudeness, almost brutality, of texture and of harmony. In one section of the work the composer has carried out, with a very large measure of success, a difficult experiment in the use of noises pure and simple, such as the cracking of whips, hammering, beating on wood, etc, and at one point, the boy play with the rhythm of the part of the chor, to accompany the spoken declamation of the soloist. The effect, combined with the terrible intensity of the most lurid Eschylean choruses, was, it must be admitted, overwhelming, and as the whole thing obeyed a kind of relentless rhythm, it seemed to be much more a mere experiment in cacophony.
THE DYNASTS

THE DYNASTS. By Thomas Hardy. Performed by the O.U.D.S.

The acting version of "The Dynasts" is an interesting, even an absorbing entertainment. It is, however, singularly unlike "The Dynasts" as a whole, and one comes away from the theatre with a very different impression from that which is left upon the mind by that "mental performance" for which, in Mr. Hardy's own words, the play was intended. This difference of quality between the two versions is the result of the almost complete suppression in the acted play of the spirit characters. The elimination of the spirits may have been inevitable; there is no getting over the too solid flesh of living actors and actresses. Still, the slender Chorus of two which actually appears on the stage only very imperfectly takes the place of the Priests and Iromes, the Spirits of Earth and the Years. With their abolition comes a change of focus. The "Dynasts" of the stage is a wholly sublimary affair. The characters act as though they were godlike creatures, weighing motives, choosing good or evil. They act as human beings complacently think they act. The spirits, in the written drama, give the lie to this pathetic self-flattery. They tell us the secret workings of these "flesh-hinged mannikins" and how the jacks click out their reasonings there on earth. The reduction of the spiritual comment to practical insignificance has profoundly altered the whole significance of the play. The stage "Dynasts" is a moving dramatic chronicle of ten of the most extraordinary years in Europe's history. But the written "Dynasts" is also something more; it is a cosmic drama, in which things of more importance than the fate of kings and countries are at stake—the fundamental beliefs of humanity.

We could have wished that the directors of the O.U.D.S. had seen their way to incorporating a little more of the original "Dynasts" into their acting version. As it was, however, they accepted the Kingsway version with only the smallest modifications.

The level of the acting was, on the whole, high, though there were no outstanding brilliant performances. The supernatural machinery was represented, as at the Kingsway, by a Reader and a Chorus of two. Mr. Harris's reading was fairly impressive, and the recitation of Miss Cowie and Mrs. Buckmaster, as Thoerisya and Antistrophe, was adequate, though there were moments when we found Miss Cowie's delivery a little painful, a little too much like the delivery of the regular drawing-room reciter. In the play itself the most remarkable performance was that of Mr. Colbourne as Nelson. He was, at times, perhaps a little too sentimental and stagey; but then, so was the real Nelson. Mr. Colbourne's range of facial expression and the assurance of his gesture and delivery showed him to be one of those in whom the actor is born and not painfully made. Mr. Sich's Wellington had the bouncy life of a caricature. The Duke's coolness, his monumental impassivity, worthy of the English model of a French romantic novel, was exaggerated into a kind of flippancy in the face of mighty happenings. The character of Napoleon, in the acting version of the play, has little chance of developing itself. Mr. Barton did his best with this not very vivid foreshortening of a great rôle.

The comic scenes were excellently done, and there were Second Citizens and Boatmen who gave, within the limits of their parts, what were often remarkable performances.

The scenery, designed by Mr. Denis Markill, was simple; it might have advantage been even simpler. The plain curtains of the Kingsway setting were more satisfactory than the conventionalized landscapes which did service for Wessex or the Peninsula.
Correspondence

SPENSER AND ARCHAISMS

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

DEAR SIR,—Your reviewer’s case against Mr. Doughty’s artificial archaisms (February 13, p. 204) is in general so sound that it seems a pity he should have indulged in one or two statements which can scarcely pass unchallenged. Is it true that “Spenser was not the least an archaist”? He was certainly not a mere archaist, but neither was he a champion of neologisms and “ink-born terms” of the type censured by Wilson, Ascham, and Ben Jonson. Spenser was an inventive archaist, seeking to give his style and diction an old-world air not only by using words from Chaucer (also from Malory and other old authors), but by cherishing words like “ofsoons,” “sithens,” “ywys,” “eki,” and “wight,” which, though used by other Elizabethans, were going out of fashion; and also by manufacturing his own “archaisms,” somewhat as Chatterton did—only, of course, with a much higher skill. Nearly all these words, deliberately coined have an obviously archaic flavour, e.g. “daint” for “dainty,” “jollished” and “derried” for “jolliness” and “dreariness,” “ygoo” for “ago,” “to yeale for “to, go,” and “nigardise” for “neggardiness” (Chaucer has “covetiz,” covetousness, but “nigardye”).

In conclusion, I should like to correct the statement that “phere” (companion) occurs only four times in Spenser. The glossary to the Oxford Spenser gives eight instances of “phere” (also spelt “phere”), and nine of “y-phere,” use for “together” or “in company with,” and I doubt whether this exhausts the list of occurrences.

Yours faithfully, R. W. KING.

University College of North Wales, Bangor.

MYERS’ “HUMAN PERSONALITY”

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

DEAR SIR,—With reference to your interesting article entitled “A Persuasive Spiritualist” on the book “Human Personality and its Survival of Bodily Death” by F. W. H. Myers, in your number of January 16, I note that your reviewer states in the heading that this new abridgment is published at the price of 12s. 6d. Your reviewer was evidently misled by the publishers’ notice at the beginning of the book, which refers to an earlier abridgment considerably less condensed than the edition, just published, which he reviews.

As I am one of the editors of this new abridgment of my father’s book, I should be glad if you could see your way to inserting in your next number a note to let your readers know that this new abridgment costs only 6s. 6d.

Believe me yours truly,

S. BLENNERHASSETT.

THE NEW ART SALON

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

DEAR SIR,—The criticism in your issue of January 30 of the exhibition now being held at the New Art Salon gives the impression that it is written by a musician who, on being forced to write on painting, returns involuntarily to a subject more akin to his intelligence. Such criticisms are easy to write because they do not necessitate a knowledge of painting, but at the same time very harmful, not only for the promoter of the exhibition, but for Art, and the artists, as well. It is for this last reason that I permit myself to request you to correct in your esteemed journal the reproaches contained in the previous criticism.

1. The music referred to does not begin till sunset, that is to say, at a time when the pictures cannot be seen to the best advantage, especially by anyone who intends to write a criticism on them.

2. Only seven or eight pictures on view in the present exhibition, which contains about a hundred and thirty pictures, were exhibited elsewhere, and these were only included because of their importance.

I am, Sir, Yours faithfully,

166, Shaftesbury Avenue, W.C.2.

February 7, 1920.

ART AND THE SCHOOLBOY

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

DEAR SIR,—I have been much interested in late in some letters which have appeared in The Athenæum following upon an article entitled “A New Year Suggestion.” It may interest your readers to know that at this school there is a club in existence devoted solely to the promotion of Art. Its main principles are:

(i.) To purchase all the best Art papers for the use of the members.

(ii.) To hold weekly meetings at which topical artistic events are criticized and discussed.

(iii.) To produce two plays in the winter terms, acted and written (with the help of the members themselves).

(iv.) To hold a terminal exhibition of the works of the members (paintings, poems, essays, etc.).

The idea of forming the club was conceived and carried out last November, entirely owing to the initiative of the boys, several masters being afterwards invited to become honorary members. As yet it has had no Art lecture by any celebrated man, but a leading author and collector has promised to give one.

The whole idea has been a great success, and has already served to improve the artistic feeling of the school.

I remain yours faithfully,

FRED W. MAYOR.

President, Claysmore Fine Arts Club.

Claysmore School, Northwood Park, Winchester.
Foreign Literature

NEW ROME

HISTOIRE DE L'EMPIRE BYZANTIN. Par C. Diehl. (Paris, Picard.)

THIS little sketch of the Byzantine Empire might well be translated into English, for there is not, so far as we know, any work in this language that recounts the principal phases in the history of Christian Constantinople with the same happy combination of conciseness and lucidity. Not unnaturally, M. Diehl is something of a partisan of the Empire about which he has written so much; he objects strongly to the traditional view that it represented nothing better than the decadence of the Empire of Old Rome, and quotes the verdict of Rambaud that it was essentially a new creation, "un état du moyen âge, placé sur les extrémes frontières de l'Europe." In his view that Byzantium was in part (and ought to have been wholly) an Oriental monarchy, with no greater interest than the severance of the cord that bound it to its parent on the Tiber, M. Diehl places himself in sharp contradistinction both to Gibbon and to Gibbon's brilliant disciple, Professor J. B. Bury, who will not even allow it any other title than that of "Later Roman Empire.

This conflict of views as to the true significance and destiny of the Byzantine monarchy is not new; it is as old as the monarchy itself. Although it may be said that the Empire of Byzantium was one of those things that would have had to be invented if its materials had not existed, it lacked a guiding star almost from the first years of its establishment. The imperium Romanum was the product of the conquering energy of the Roman people; it was a national achievement. By the fourth century the Roman Empire was cosmopolitan, and its driving force seemed exhausted. It had become a great machine of administration, the maintenance of which everybody desired, but which could enlist no patriotic or ideal impulse in its service. To find it some better raison d'être than its mere convenience was the problem with which its rules were always struggling and the problem which they never entirely solved. The openings were so various that it was hard to choose from them. Byzantium had always too many iron in the fire.

On the whole, then, it was with true prescience that Constantine I chose a religious cement for his new foundation. In the Christian Church he discerned the sole binding force, outside utility, which could hold together a threatened civilization, and astutely resolved to use it for his purposes. It was an excellent bargain for him, a wretched one for Christianity. But the bishops who thronged to the Council he convoked at Nicea, to find, as Duchesne puts it, the swords that had lately menaced them with martyrdom now forming a ring of protection around them, were pardoned dazzled by the change of scene. They were to learn that the dynasty, forcasting a maxim of Joseph de Maistre's, held it more important that religious strife should be silenced than that any particular truth should emerge from controversy. From this moment questions of dogma are questions of State, and M. Diehl shows with admirable perspicacity the reaction of the one upon the other. From the imperial point of view, the Monophysite question became of peculiar urgency. This heresy, which seemed to glorify Christ by denying His complete humanity, was deeply rooted in Egypt and Syria, and allied itself with nationalistic tendencies that gravely threatened the unity of the Empire. To find some mode of conflict with Monophysism seemed the first dictate of political prudence. They were to follow that line was to renounce the West, which, under the headship of the Popes, held firm to the anti-Monophysite decrees of Chalcedon. The "Henetikon" of Zeno (482) was a measure that seemed to commit Byzantium to this policy, at the price even of schism; but Justinian's ambition to be a Roman Emperor of the old stamp—"le dernier des grands Empereurs de Rome"—M. Diehl calls him—led him to placate the Pope by persecuting his dissident Monophysite subjects. It was, however, beyond the resources of Constantinople to hold West and East permanently beneath its sceptre, and in the seventh century the Emperor Heraclius, who imagined that the definite Graecization of the Empire, proposed a fresh compromise with Monophysism by tolerating the cognate Monothelite doctrine. The change came too late; the problem was destined to solve itself otherwise. Egypt and Syria were lopped from the Empire by the Moslem, and the Emperors were free to return to orthodoxy, which was still done at the second Council of Constantinople. The whole story is a charming object-lesson in the value of State support to religious parties.

"L'orthodoxie," says M. Diehl, writing of the Heraclian régime, "dès ce moment se confond à Byzance avec la nationalité." But "orthodoxy" was already wearing its technical sense of Greek, as opposed to Latin, Christianity. A nationality had been constructed out of a religion, and a religion degraded into a nationality. The disappearance of Monophysism brought no real rapprochement with Rome. The iconoclastic campaign of the Isaurian house cost Byzantium its last suzerainty over the capital of the West, and founded the temporal power of the Papacy. Within another fifty years the Holy Roman Empire of Charlemagne had been proclaimed, after which to the schisms of Photius and Cerularius the road ran straight with no hope of turning aside from it. The Crusades and the outrage of the Latin Empire of Constantinople made the political and religious breach between Eastern and Western Christendom one that could never be healed. Then began the circulation of all sorts of books, like the vision of Macbeth, arose. Among all these claimants to the heritage of the Empire, the Tsarism which was perhaps the nearest by default, it had itself been the protection of Orthodoxy, on which alone New Rome could be rebuilt. In the pages of Dr. Adrian Fortescue's book on "The Orthodox Eastern Church," published not long before the war, we get a graphic picture of this ambition at work. "One has only to look," he wrote, "for the places where the Russian Government wants a sphere of influence, there is the Orthodox Russian faith preached;" it was not easy to blind the eyes of a Latin cleric to the inner meaning of Russian religious policy. To-day all this has suddenly become ancient history—as ancient as the fall of Constantinople. It may even be that 1917 marks the extinction of the Byzantine Empire more accurately than 1453. History is an arch-deceiver, but Islam looks more likely than Orthodoxy to create fresh nationalities. The Constantinian idea at last seems bankrupt.

Messrs. E. Parsons & Sons have issued a very interesting catalogue of fine old illustrated books, a few manuscripts, and a large number of fine bindings, French, English, and Italian. Some of their early woodcut books and incunabula are of the highest value, and the prices, though high, are not unuly so.
A KANTIAN ON HIS CONTEMPORARIES

THE ATHEMENUM FEBRUARY 20, 1920

THE logs sweep down the stream, grinding and crushing. Sometimes one is sunk, held under by the converging pressure of others; sometimes another pushed high above the mass. Then, at a bend, comes a stoppage. From bank to bank the logs are interlocked. A man rushes out across the jam. With an unerring eye he has noted which are the key-logs that hold back the rest. A touch of his pole here and there, and the obstructors are in motion. The logs sweep on once again.

A fascinating rôle is this of the logger in politics and morals and psychology. M. René Gillouin takes it very seriously, and is obviously well content with his prowess, as indeed he has right to be. In this collection of articles written during the course of the war he deals with diverse subjects—the formation of Germanism, the internal problems of Royalism and Socialism, Nationalism and Fascism, Catholicism and Rationalism, with the work of Emile Clermont and M. Paul Claudel, with M. Henri Bergson in a new light, as historian and moralist. And yet, as he claims, these studies are very plainly connected by a continuous current of thought. On all alike he throws a light of reason—and reasonableness. He lives up to the maxims of his preface. The rôle of every thinker who does not feel himself called upon to found a new religion or to lead to the assault some group of ardent ambitions is, he tells us, clear to-day.

Sans s'attarder à de stériles regret d'un passé révolu, au contraire animé d'une ardeur sympathique pour la merveilleuse intensité, richesse et diversité du présent, mais hanté du triste souci de voir tant de trésors sombrer dans l'incohérence et le désordre, il mènera le bon combat de la raison éclairée par l'expérience contre l'erreur, le mensonge et la chimère qui entraînent vers l'alinee cet incomparable torrent de vie.

His paper "The Formation of Germanism" is a model of dispassionate pleading. When one reflects that it saw the light in January, 1915, one acknowledges it to be amazingly restrained and moderate. He shows how since the days of Frederick II, the Prussian State had pressed into its service the three great forces in German life—Christianity, Mysticism and Scientific Rationalism. Religion was the first humble handmaid, and Frederick himself had a good deal to do with her taming. But Mysticism proved an even better servant. In Latin countries mysticism was monopolized to the profit of the Church. In Protestant countries its tendency was partly toward metaphysics, partly toward art, and partly toward the conception of the State. From this last grew the religion of Imperialism that in Germany enveloped and dominated Christianity. From their union was begotten that "old German God" which caused some amusement of late days.

But the structure was not yet built. The bricks were there; good and enduring mortar was wanted. "A self-respecting modern religion," says M. Gillouin, "must be scientific." It is in the science of the modern spiritual guides of Germany that is found the mortar. So we have that conception of the blond race of destiny that snatched the sceptre from the trembling fingers of Rome, and founded a new empire on her ruins. Kant, Hegel, Novalis, Jung-Stilling, Schelling, Nietzsche, each played his part in forming the great conception. And, says M. Gillouin, with his usual honesty, the conception was noble.

En vérité l'Allemagne musicienne, poétique et savante qui enthousiasma nos pères a existé telle ou à peu près telle qu'ils la virent. Même, à vue humaines, elle semblait avoir l'avenir pour elle.

But the State had need of its mortar. From 1870 onwards Prussia was dominant and the noble conception was but part of her armament. Hence "Deutschland über alles," hence arrogance and cruelty and oppression, hence "Kultur."

M. Gillouin cannot here be followed so closely in his dealings with his countrymen, from M. Maurras to M. Bergson, but he is as sane and as stimulating. His study of the Catholic paganism—or is it pagan Catholicism?—of the former is particularly good, and his experiment in literary cookery at this particular is delightfully. Take, he begins, with the air of Mrs. Beeton, the paganisme de M. Charles Maurras, qu'on en déchiffre légèrement l'accent des notions de Raison et d'Ordre vers celle de Beauté et de Volupté, qu'on y ajoute quelques grains de charité baissée de ton, changée de plan, de pitié à base de sensualité, bref d'humanitarisme, et il en est qui ? M. Anatole France.

With M. Barrès he is far less happy. He inclines to beat the air. The critic between M. Barrès and the Church, he points out, is not merely political and philosophical, it is religious. Granted, but there are other departments of thought. The link between M. Barrès and the Church—he has never pretended that it is other than slender—is historical: "La vie militaire et la vie religieuse ont formé l'âme française." And is the doctrine of "la Terre et les Morts" really irreconcilable with the teaching of the Church? We know good Catholics who appear to have no trouble in swallowing them together. M. Barrès the greatest of all the characters whom M. Gillouin discusses, has most reason to complain of his treatment.

This book will be found of particular value to Englishmen interested in French problems and controversies. They fight their battles at such a pace, on the other side of the Channel, that we cannot always follow the movement of the foils or see who has been pinked. M. Gillouin, to put it at the lowest, gives us some exercises in their mode of sword-play which will quicken our eye.

C. F.

THE POETRY OF SENHOR GUERRA JUNQUEIRO

PORTUGAL'S chief poet this year celebrates his seventieth birthday. It is nearly sixty years since he published his first volume of verse, and nearly fifty since "A Morte de Don Joao" (1874), with its thoroughly Portuguese combination of lyricism and satire, placed him in the first rank of Portuguese writers. This naturally indicated a political career, and in 1878 he was duly returned deputy. He has, however, always withdrawn himself from public life, or at least refused to hold office, although for some time after the proclamation of the Republic he occupied the post of Portuguese Minister at Berne. The further great landmarks of his literary fame have been "A Vehicul do Padre Eterno" (1884), "Finis Patris" (1890), "Patria" (1891), and "Os Simples" (1892). Senior Guerra Junqueiro grew up on Victor Hugo, dangerous food for a Southern poet. His satire was directed against the Iusts, against the Braganzas, against England. It is sincere, tremendous and grandiloquent, if often convincing. From Victor Hugo, besides his grandiloquence, he probably derived the great tenderness towards the poor which characterized the author of "Les Misérables" and "Les Pauvres Gens." In "Finis Patria," that celebrated pamphlet of some fifty pages, he hears in the darkness shadows speaking; they are the voices of the miserable dwellings of the poor, peasants, workmen, fishermen, prisoners and hospitals and fallen towers:

THE VOICES OF PEASANTS' HUTS.

Children swarm in the homes of penury
And the land untiled.
No cradle empty: O to see
How God hath shrivelled field and tree
Who the nest doth build!
Wild wind, why dost thou vex us thus,
Whirled, buffeted?
Death's wings o'er cold beds tremulous,
And the empty hearth hath no fire for us,
And the shelf no bread.
The crops are dead and dead the flocks,
Joy is fled away,
The sun or to our labour mocked,
And at our door a spectre mocks
By night and day,
Toothless, squint-eyed, half lives, half dies
A wretched bough;
And famished birds with gleaming eyes:
As in hospitals the patients' cries,
Its walls resound.

The doves are collared, collared, the doves are collared,
Of dead woe ringing;
They bury young, they bury old;
The doves are collared, collared, the doves are collared,
The gravedigger is singing,
Sings the gravedigger, sings the priest,
Sepulchral song:

Sleep on, ye poor, from life released,
In the graveyard soft beds at least
To you belong.

Sleep on, sleep on, most light your sleep
Rest to your bring;
Ye need no linen sheets to keep
For the good beds of pine planks deep,
Nor covering.

Sleep, ye who worn out sink and died,
In the new beds you have;
The stars weep in the heavens wide,
But blessing man and arm beside
Who for the deliver dug a grave.

Look, look, the emigrants where they go;
In troops they go, and from their lips
Along the roads sound wails of woes,
On quays and on decks where they slow
The enter the ships in the ships.

Brides, children, aged mothers there —Heaven send relief!—

Seeing their sorrow past repair,
Hands clenched, locks bitten in despair,
Distracted with grief.

See where they go, in great ships pent,
Across the sea.

Ah, nights in threshing-floors oft spent,
Kisses with August's perfume blend
That the moon no more will see!

Farewell, horizons heavenly,
That on their eyes have cast a spell,
Hills gold in the morrow's ecstasy,
Meadows and fountains fair to see.

For evermore farewell!
Look where they go, sea fathomless,
Their fathers and their true loves mourn.
What far lands seek they in distress?
Return! But when, sea fathomless?
Never will they return.

The vines are dead, no grapes they give,
And the old peasant too is dead;
In rain-veved hovels where they live
Ropeless the widows and orphans grieve,
In want unfortomated.

It is a concern wholly materialistic. Yet in a hot and excellent climate, a fertile and beautiful land, the peasant who has the art to manage and the education to enjoy should be as happy as a king. One can, however, hardly expect a lyric poet to harp on the themes of cleanliness and economy.

There is often a touch of morbidity in Senhor Guerra Junqueiro's work, but when this sincere lover of his country turns to the soil of Portugal and to the peasants his inspiration is genuine and original. It is not the poet's morbidity imaginings, but the use made of the popular quatrains which give charm to the following poem from "Os Simples," the small volume of exquisite lyrics which crowned the poet's work nearly thirty years ago, and made 1892 famous in the annals of Portuguese literature:

A PASSING SONG.

A mist of lilac, opal, violet,
Red streaks of sufferings and agonies,
At nightfall hushed asleep the fields begot,
And sadly sings a voice as the day dies:
Someone no longer remembers
In a land beyond the sea,
O Death, I would give thee my life
If thou camest to ask it of me;
O Death, I would give thee my life
If thou camest to ask it of me.

Now with the sun's kiss on her deathlike face,
A kiss of blighting pale as kiss of death,
In fly: ...soon更强 in her sleep through space.
And in soft song a sad voice murmureth:

I hid my love away
In a pit beside the sea.
Love dies as the sun, regret lives on
As the moonlight lingeringly;

Love dies, regret lives on
As the moonlight lingeringly.

The opal cloud drifts onward silently,
Melting the granite mountains into mist,
Giants asleep in the moon's ecstasy.
And a voice weeps as all things sink to rest:

Who weeps, O nightingale?
Yonder along the sea?
It is my buried love
Who weeps through the night for me.
My love, my buried love,
Who weeps all night for me.
The huge, the silver moon, the moon serene,
All Nature has dissolved, borne along
As insubstantial spirit of what hath been,
And sadly dies a voice in a last song:

Sleep on, sleep on, my love,
In the soft sand by the sea:
Ere rise the morning star
I will lay me down with thee,
Ere rise the morning star
I will lay me down with thee.

And it is the pilgrim, peasant, emigrant, the shepherd, the tiller of the soil ("O Cavador," translated by Edgar Prefaste in the Yellow Book, July, 1889), the hermitages, the moonlit threshing-floors, that give an eternal magic to "Os Simples," a magic most visible in "A Caminho."

An old man of ninety in his shirtsleeves, ploughing:

Child whose eyes reflect the depth and colour of hope's dreaming,
Is it to some neighbouring town that thou wanderest?
Pilgrim: Through the world I wander.

Old man:

Without lance or armour gleaming?
Child whose eyes reflect the depth and colour of hope's dreaming,
With sorrows and afflictions wilt thou find thy way oppressed.

An old peasant woman (further on):

Sir, young Sir whose eyes reflect the light of innocence,
What sad thoughts are they that thus accompany thy quest?
Pilgrim: With serpents to do battle, capture monsters go hence.
Old woman:

Sir, young Sir whose eyes reflect the light of innocence,
The dragons fierce will surely tear thy heart from out thy breast.

A peasant girl (further on):

Sir, young Sir whose eyes with a strange magic are enchanted,
Go you to some orchestra in the coming heat to rest?
Pilgrim: I go to read new destinies and scan the fates unalloyed.
Peasant girl:

Sir, young Sir whose eyes with a strange magic are enchanted,
The wizards black will hold you at their wizardry's behest.

A little shepherdess (further on):

Sir, young Sir whose eyes with a keen light are brightly glowing,
To your wedding you are bound, your gleaming eyes attest.
Pilgrim: For diamonds and treasures, yea new treasures I am going.
Shepherdess:

Sir, young Sir whose eyes with a keen light are brightly glowing,
You will fall a prey to brigands who the woods infest.

A beggar (further on):

Sir, young Sir whose eyes in hue are as the flame of fire,
Your eyes are burning, burning like the sun's rays in the west.
Pilgrim: Now worlds to discover, fame and glory my desire.
Beggar:

Sir, young Sir whose eyes in hue are as the flame of fire,
The dust along the highways mounts steep as a wave's crest.
The Star of Dawn:

Child whose eyes are heavenly blue as flax in flower upspringing.
For a distant hell thou leav'st thy home and shelter blest.
Pilgrim: All the stones shall flower as along the rough ways winging.

Go my thoughts, with gleam of stars and music of birds' singing
Trembling in my eyes and on my smiling lips expressed.

Even a poor version must show something of the very haunting fascination of this poem.

Audrey F. Bell.
List of New Books

Prepared in co-operation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding with the Dewey Decimal System, the sub-classes being indicated, for the benefit of librarians and others familiar with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. The first numeral in these represents the main class, the second one of the subdivisions, and so on.

Those works in the List which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

200 RELIGION.

The eighty-third annual issue of this useful work of reference, carefully corrected to the latest possible date, and provided with a clear map of the Roman Catholic provinces and dioceses of England and Wales.

An overwhelming case is here made out showing that the Church of England clergy do not, on an average, receive a living wage. This investigation points to a degree of poverty on the part of a (usually) hardworking section of the community which is truly scandalous. The nation may decide, conceivably, that the Church has outlived its usefulness, and agree to abolish the whole clerical class; but until it does so it should at least enable its religious teachers to live in ordinary comfort. The present policy of maintaining a State religion and heavily penalising its officials is unworthy.

300 SOCIOLOGY.

See review, p. 238.

An elementary account of the least attractive parts of arithmetic, with their applications to the elementary problems encountered in business and commerce. That boy would be indeed dull who could not master these subjects after reading through the detailed examples given in the text.

Long hours of ploughing, hoeing, cleaning stables and byres, driving tractors, and doing other exacting and never-ending tasks, with the absence of most opportunities for the life of the mind and spirit, were the lot of the land girl during the war; and the stock girl could not even take a holiday, so relentless were the calls upon her time. Miss Dart relates her own experiences, and makes one realize the loneliness, the hardship, and the monotony of the life endured by so many patriotic women.

Proposals for a supplement to the Education Act of 1917 are put forward here, to provide nursery schools for children between two and five years old—or some later age. The children would have close personal care and medical supervision, and a definite training, bodily, mental, and social. A complete scheme, including equipment, personnel, and provision for inspection and giants, has been worked out in detail. At present schools are not called upon to make special arrangements for very young children.

Parkin (George R.). Round the Empire: for the use of schools in the British Commonwealth. Cassell [1919]. 7 in. 286 pp. il. maps, index, 2½ n. 372.8

A revised edition of Dr. Parkin's notable epito me relating to the British Empire.

Few things are more desirable for young students of both sexes than that they should at an early stage learn something of their coming duties, privileges, and rights as citizens. Mr. Peddie's book will be helpful in this direction. The explanations are notably clear, and the subject is dealt with attractively.

In the notice of this book last week (p. 224) the price was wrongly given as 6½ n. It should have been 4½ n., as above.

400 PHILOLOGY.

The main facts of sentence structure are set forth at considerable length in this book, which deals with syntax as distinguished from accidence, and is primarily intended for the teacher. A new method of sentence analysis is offered by the author.

An exercise book to the author's "English Composition." The examples are chosen from a variety of sources, and are likely to arouse the pupils' interest. The sections dealing with punctuation and sentence construction are especially workmanlike.

Exercises for use in conjunction with the author's "New English Grammar for Junior Forms." These exercises, many of which are bright and interesting, are upon the same plan as those in the parent book, and are drawn from similar sources. They are for class use and homework.

Shuckburgh (E. S.). Passages from Latin Authors for Translation into English: selected with a view to the needs of candidates for the Cambridge Examinations. Cambridge, Bowes & Bowes, 1919. 7½ in. 110 pp. paper, 3 n. 478.7

A second reprint of the fourth edition of Dr. Shuckburgh's valuable selection of passages for "unseen" work.

Williams (Randall) and Ripman (Walter). Continuation School French: Part 1 ("Dent's Modern Language Series"). Dent, 1919. 7½ in. 121 pp. il. index, 2½ n. 448

A well-arranged and practical introduction to elementary French, likely to be of considerable service in day continuation schools.

500 NATURAL SCIENCE.

Baird (David). A First Course of Laboratory Exercises in Physics. Blackie, 1919. 7 in. 88 pp. 1½ n. 530.7

These are useful exercises for young students. Questions are set in the different sections, and answers will be found at the end of the book, which includes also several tables of physical constants.

See review, p. 240.

The revised ninth edition of this work. New matter has been added to bring the book thoroughly up to date.
600 USEFUL ARTS.

Throughout the book the author lays stress upon the capital importance of geology among the studies which help to explain the development of civilization and the localization of industries. In the course of the argument the natural structure of the island, the sources and applications of raw materials, and the grouping of men according to their occupations, are adequately discussed.

The Everyday Cake Book. By G. P. Stanley Paul [1919]. 7 in. 100 pp. boards. 1/6 n. 642

A useful cookery book containing 366 recipes for making cakes, one for every day in the year.

800 LITERATURE.

The author passes in review the various literary forms, giving examples from standard works and adding historical comments. The book should prove useful to beginners. There are minor inaccuracies, however, and the author's literary taste is not impeccable.

For purposes of quick reference and for its avowed aim as a "cram" book, this is a handy and excellent compendium. Mr. Edn. nds is an experienced teacher, and understands the mentality of students. The mnemonic value of his methodical arrangement, well displayed by differences of type, is great, and it will be helpful to those also who can afford the time to read prettily wide, in attaining a bird's-eye view and seeing the wood as well as the trees. Criticism, in the sense of evaluation, is generally avoided, and the laboured and affected patios of the death of Le Fovre should not have been cited as an example of Sterne's best passages.

Gillouin (René). JOURS ET FIGURES D'AUJOURD'HUI. Paris, Grasset, 1919. 7½ in. 271 pp. paper. 5fr. 844.9

See review, p. 254.

In the first two chapters of this enlarged edition Mr. Macpherson lays stress on the need for keeping two points of view—the formal and the psychological—that is, the teacher must not only formulate his material well, but also study it "as a factor in the pupil's growing experience." In the practical chapters that follow he is not so good as here; and surely the statistical method of classifying vowel-sounds in a poem is sheer waste of time.

The novels of Dickens, Reade, and Wilkie Collins are considered, in a thorough and painstaking way, by Dr. Phillips, as the lineal successors of the novels of mystery and terror known at the end of the eighteenth century as Gothic. Bill Sikes and Fagan, with their sensational histories, represent the same melodramatic elements, which were in perennial demand by the multitudinous readers who are the audience—taste, that is, the circulating-library novelists. The relations of demand and supply are studied in the light of statistics of the prices paid to the writers and the circulation attained.

Van Vechten (Carl). In the Garret. New York, Knopf, 1920. 7½ in. 347 pp. 82. 814.5

Music and musicians, painters and their works, the folk-songs of Iowa, Philip Thicknesse the eighteenth-century virtuoso, Oscar Hammerstein, and the Holy Jumpers, an evangelical sect in the Bahamas, are Mr. Van Vechten's subjects, and he handles them lightly, yet critically and not without humor. His account of a religious meeting of the Jumpers is very weird; and there is a really thrilling interest in his chapter entitled "La Tigrasse," on that romantic city New York.

POETRY.

See review, p. 239.

Jones (Frank), ed. THE GOLDEN BOOKS OF ENGLISH VERSE: a graduated course for class study: Book 2. Blackie [1919]. 7 in. 160 pp. index. 2/6 n. 821.08

This, the second of a series of three volumes, contains a selection of poems by Dekker, Herrick, Shakespeare, Wordsworth, Campbell, Hood, Clough, and others. Each poem is followed by explanatory notes and useful questions.

*Lawson (Mrs. Alexander and Alexander), ed. A ST. ANDREWS TREASURY OF SCOTTISH VERSE. Black, 1920. 8½ in. 255 pp. notes, gloss. indexes. 7/6 n. 821.08

Among the poems included in this scholarly collection are a goodly number by poets of this generation—one, "The Tinker," by Mr. Charles Murray, appearing for the first time. Not only poems in Scottish dialect, but also interpreting the Scottish spirit, have been the object of the selectors' choice. They give a number of anonymous ballads, but omit many that might be looked for; and among the poets omitted we note Fergusson, Motherwell, William Tennant, and the inimitable James Outram.

*Rootham (Helen), trans. KOSOVO: heroic songs of the Serbs. Introduction by Maurice Baring. Historical preface by Janko Lavrin, Oxford, Blackwell, 1920. 7½ in. 99 pp. front. boards. 4/6 n. 891.821. Mr. Lavrin's historical preface describes the origin of these ballads central in the tragic defeat of Kosovo, and their living influence on Serbian national life for the past five hundred years. Miss Rootham's simple and dignified translation makes it possible for English readers to appreciate the heroic quality of the originals. Students of the language should find the parallel texts in Serbian and English extremely useful.

Sappho.

Mr. Stacpoole's rhymed versions of the fragments of Sappho are pretty and accomplished; but they are not wholly satisfactory. For example, his rendering of contains enfeebling expansions of the simplicity and brevity of the original.

Seymour (Alan). SCENES FROM THE MORTE D'ARTHUR. Macdonald [1920]. 6 in. 200 pp. 6/7 n. 821.9

These versions (in couplets and in stanzas) of episodes from the Arthurian legends are remarkable for their high level of accomplishment, originality and elegance. There are no great heights of overwhelming poetry, but there are equally no depths. Mr. Seymour pursues the even tenor of good narrative verse.

Singularly immune, as a whole, from contemporary American influences, the verse contained in this volume derives from the most respectable, the best accredited sources. Browning presides over Mr. Stephen Benét's accomplished laudations, the most advanced in the anthology; but for the greater part we move in the vague poetic atmosphere of a diction and a habit of thought formed by the reading of all the hundred best poems.
FICTION.

De Boleyn (Mrs. N. M. Chastel), THE SONS OF THE SETTLERS. Hurst & Blackett, 1920. 7½ in. 284 pp., 7s 6d. The different members of a family of Natal farmers named Bland, originally from Yorkshire, have prospered in the rich pasture country beyond Greytown, and have become permanent settlers. Their peace and happiness are in great measure destroyed by the advent of a fascinating Irish squire and his adventurers-wives. But the dawn of a happier period comes before the ending of the book.

Frankau (Gilbert). Peter Jackson, CIGAR MERCHANT. Hutchinson, 1920. 7½ in. 400 pp., 7s 6d. See review, p. 241.

*Grossmith (George and Weedon). THE DIARY OF A NOBOD; with illustrations by Weedon Grossmith, and a memoir of the two brothers by B. W. Findon. Bristol, Arrowsmith [1920]. 8 in. 320 pp. pors. ill., 7s n. It is a pity that an otherwise presentable reprint of what Lord Rosebery well terms “that small classic” should be disfigured by plates that show bad signs of resurrection.

Kaye (Michael). THE KING'S INDISCRETION. Stanley Paul [1920]. 7½ in. 256 pp., 7s n. A capital story of the days of Louis le Bien-Aimé, whose conscience at "l'affaire Broglie," a wild-cat scheme for invading England under a dag of truce, has been followed by the detention of incriminatory papers in dangerous and disreputable hands. The documents are recovered by the gallant Etienne de Lavanne, the hero. His affection for an English girl is a pleasant foil to the more exciting passages of a narrative which from beginning to end has verve and interest.

Macnamara (Brisley). THE CLANKING OF CHAINS. Muthes, 1920. 7½ in. 241 pp., 6s n. Obscure towards ideas, but carried away en masse by the flowing tide—the Volunteer Movement, the Dublin rebellion, and the excitement that followed the election of Count Plunkett—the people of Ballycullen in this Sinn Fein novel bring their would-be leader, the young patriot who would emulate Robert Emmet, to despair. He resists distrust and unpopularity by his enthusiasm, and at the end there is nothing for him but to leave the country.

Nichols (Beverley). PRELUDE. Chatto & Windus, 1920. 7½ in. 303 pp., 7s n. Mr. Nichols gives us an able study of the inner life of a public school, as well as some admirable psychological analysis, in the characterization of Paul Trevelyan, the hero. The boy’s aestheticism, hypersensitive nature, and adoration for his beautiful mother are extremely well depicted. Less finished, but striking, are the portraits of some of Paul’s school friends; and the impression of the head of the House, “one of those muscular Christians in whom the muscles are so highly developed that they almost obscure the Christianity,” is actual to the reader. Paul’s unhappiness and difficulties until he finds friends are drawn as if from life. The scene of the breaking down of the barrier of reserve between Jack and Paul, whose mutual love has so long been stifled, is good work, and really moving. Mr. Nichols has no difficulty in showing that some of the arrows of criticism which are shot at public schools might be directed also, or instead, at society in general. In the end, Paul Trevelyan learns that what matters is life: not “art for art’s sake,” but “art for life’s sake.” The book shows freshness of treatment and view.

Paine (Ralph D.). THE CALL OF THE OFF-SHORE WIND. Constable [1920]. 8 in. 373 pp., 7s 6d n. 813.5

In his tale of the latter days of the Maine schooners and shipbuilding yards Mr. Paine describes the gallant fight put up by the hardy old captains against the steamships that were outwisting them. The usual love-affairs are combined with adventures afloat.

Patrick (Diana). THE WIDER WAY. Hutchinson [1920]. 7½ in. 304 pp., 7s 6d n.

Miss Diana Patrick is a new aspirant to the chorus of young authors who live in the hope of writing their way into the great heart of the public. Whether she has any original talent, whether she will one day find herself playing a small part, remains to be seen. In The Wider Way her behaviour during the moment of departure from the accepted behaviour of all the other young aspirants: it is harmless and pretty and silly.

Walton (George Lincoln). OSCAR MONTAGUE, PARANOIC. Lippincott, 1919. 8 in. 304 pp., 6s n. 813.5

Dictionaries inform us that a “paranoiac” is a person suffering from mental derangement in the form of chronic hallucination. In short, this is an attempt by Dr. Walton to portray a narrative form some of the mental traits he has previously dealt with in a more professional way. There is the paranoiac himself, “a victim of environmental dislocation,” who “cannot find his place in the band; but wants to play trombone on the drum”; his mother, “a worrier”; his father, “a degenerate scion”; and so on. They are clearly drawn, and are thoroughly lifelike people, whose lives, without anything brilliant or startling, are full of quiet interest, humorous or pathetic. The author considers also the question of their mental improvement and of the legal aspects of their foibles.

920 BIOGRAPHY.

Acceptable biographical and other notes are appended to this convenient abridgment of “Boswell.” There is also a useful introduction.

Rye (Walter). THE FALSE PEDIGREE AND ARMS OF THE FAMILY OF BACON OF SUFFOLK, THE ANCESTORS OF Sir NICHOLAS BACON; OF Francis Bacon (Lord Verulam), and of the present Premier Baronet; critically examined and approved by Walter Rye, Norris, Roberts & Co., Ten Bell Lane, 1919. 8 in. 58 pp. apps., indexes, paper, to subscribers 5s n. 929

The author’s thesis is that the Bacons of Bacoithorpe and the family of the Lord Keeper, Sir Nicholas Bacon, are quite distinct. None of the lands which the Bacoithorpe family held can be traced to the Lord Keeper’s Suffolk ancestors. The father of Sir Nicholas, says Mr. Rye, was only the sheep reeve to the Abbot of Bury; and it was not until Nicholas “had become a very big man indeed” that he thought of tacking on to the old Norfolk family, and getting a grant of their arms under cover of a fictitious pedigree.

An acceptable sketch of Washington as a private gentleman, a leader of men, a victorious commander, and President of a new republic. Washington’s mental attitude at the outset of the colonists’ revolt is clearly portrayed.

930-990 HISTORY.

Buxton (Noel) and Leese (C. Leonard). BALKAN PROBLEMS AND EUROPEAN PEACE. Allen & Unwin [1920]. 7½ in. 135 pp. index, 4s 6d n. 949.7

This clear and interesting little book on Balkan political problems falls into three parts: (1) a history of pre-war European politics in the Balkans; (2) the policies pursued during the war by the Entente and Allied Powers, with particular reference to Bulgaria; and (3) the probable future of the Balkans. The book displays considerable knowledge, and the matter is well arranged.

*Petrie (William Matthew Flinders). SOME SOURCES OF HUMAN HISTORY. S.P.C.K., 1919. 8 in. 128 pp. biblog. index, 8s n. 900

"Unwritten History," that is to say, the vestiges of primordial life: “Byways of Written History," that is, Egyptian and Mesopotamian checks upon chronology, records of life in distant epochs in India and China, and coins and other objects shedding light on customs and manners; and, finally, Habit, Custom and Law," the historical data to be found by analysis of social systems at different epochs—these are the three groups of materials recommended and displayed for study by Professor Petrie.

In these portraits of Dante, the precursor, and Leonardo, Raphael, Michael Angelo, and Correggio, the great artists of the Renaissance, M. Schuré contemplates that event as the temporary union of Hellenism and Christianity from which two immortal daughters were born, Italian Sculpture and Painting. Leonardo, the universal genius, was the forerunner of the modern world and modern science; Raphael realized the fusion of the two hostile worlds by joining them under the symbol of beauty; Michael Angelo tried to reconcile the two worlds by the force of intellect; Correggio lifts to celestial spheres by the strength of love. "Ce que la Science, la Beauté, et la Force ont commencé, l'Amour seul peut l'achever." To-day, says M. Schuré, another Renaissance is in preparation, which will be a veritable resurrection, for it is in vain that the gaolers of the human soul, cleverly camouflaged, take pride in their shortsightedness and scepticism, and organize a conspiracy of silence round the idées-mères of the Renaissance. It will be seen that he treats his subject less as a historian than as a philosopher, seeking deep analogies between that time and this.

Booksellers & Catalogues

The POEMS of JOHN DONNE, D.D., DEAN OF ST. PAUL'S.

Full particulars of
L. CHAUNDY OF OXFORD LTD.
2 ALBEMARLE STREET, LONDON, W.1

SECONDHAND BOOKS.

SCIENTIFIC BOOKS & SERIALS.
JOHN WHELDON & CO. have the largest stock in the country of Books in all departments of Science and Natural History, also Transactions and Journals of Learned Societies, etc., in sets, runs, and single volumes or numbers.

LITERATURE OF SMALL PARCELS PURCHASED.
SEPARATE CATALOGUES ON ALL SUBJECTS.
Twopenny each, post free.
38 GREAT QUEEN STREET, KINGSWAY, LONDON, W.C.2.

Telephone: Gerrard 1412.

W. & G. FOYLE, LTD., 121-125, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.2

EGYPT, PALESTINE, and the FAR EAST; Travel; Arabian Nights; and Napoleon Era. New Catalogue post free on application.—J. A. ALLEN & Co., 10, Grenville Street, London, W.C.1.

Authors' Agents, etc.

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE are prepared to consider and place MSS. for early publication. 'Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interests first. Twenty years' experience. Please note new address: 99 and 94, CHANCERY LANE, LONDON, W.C.2.

AUTHORS'
MSS. placed at highest prices; free monthly prizes; terms for stamp.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 8, Henrietta-St., W.C.2

PLEASE HELP
THE CHURCH ARMY
TO HELP OTHERS.

Its EVANGELISTIC BRANCHES include TRAINING COLLEGES for evangelists and sisters; evangelists and sisters working in hundreds of town and country parishes; 70 MISSION-VANS itinerating the country districts; Missions of many kinds, including those in PRISONS, WORKHOUSES, and SLUMS; and many others.

For Men still serving it has RECREATION CENTRES in Rhineland, and in France and Belgium.

FOR EX-SERVICE MEN it has a flourishing EMPLOYMENT BUREAU, HOSTELS for the LIMBLESS AND DISABLED, and for men learning trades or seeking work; care of SOLDIERS' MOTHERLESS CHILDREN, &c., &c.

Its SOCIAL BRANCHES include Hostels, Homes, Clubs, &c., of many sorts for men and women, boys and girls, relief of DISTRESS by non-pauperising methods; uplifting DISCHARGED PRISONERS; OVERSEAS SETTLEMENT, and many others.

Prebendary Carlile, D.D., Hon. Chief Secretary, Headquarters, Bryanston Street, Marble Arch, London, W.1, will gladly give all information and gratefully receive gifts towards the heavy expenses, cheques being crossed "Barclays, % Church Army," payable to Prebendary Carlile.
MACMILLAN’S LIST

Life of William Booth, the Founder of the Salvation Army.
By HAROLD BEGBIE. With three Photogravures and numerous other Portraits and Illustrations. 2 vols 8vo. £2 2s. net.
The Times: “A book of extraordinary interest, and the picture which he draws is a faithful and living portrait of one of the most remarkable personalities of the reigns of Victoria and Edward VII.”

Through Deserts and Oases of Central Asia.

The Handbook of Cyprus.

The Economic Consequences of the Peace.
By JOHN MAYNARD KEYNES, C.B. 8vo. 8s. 6d. net.

An Essay by Sir EDWARD COOK, K.B.E., Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.
The Times: “The general public may read with curiosity the particulars of an organization which they never liked, but the chief interest of this book lies in the exposition of the principles which governed censorship.”

College Addresses. Delivered to Pupils of the Royal College of Music.
By Sir C. HUBERT H. PARRY, Bart., Mus. Doc., Director, 1895-1918. Edited, with a Recollection of the Author, by H. C. COLLES. Crown 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.
The Daily Chronicle: “These addresses should prove of the greatest service to all who are battling to achieve the only success worth striving for—what Emerson called the triumph of principle.”

THOMAS HARDY.

The Dynasts.
A Drama of the Napoleonic Wars. Crown 8vo. 8s. 6d.

Lord Tennyson’s Works.
Messrs. MACMILLAN & Co.’s Editions of Tennyson’s Works are the only complete Editions, and contain all the poems still in copyright. Poems. Globe Edition. 6s. net. Complete Works. Crown 8vo. 8s. 6d. net. Catalogue containing complete list of editions of Lord Tennyson’s works post free on application.

Sappho and The Vigil of Venus.
Translated by ARTHUR S. WAY, D.Litt. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

MACMILLAN & Co., Ltd., LONDON, W.C.2

THE NOVEL OF THE SEASON

THE HOUSE OF BALTAZAR
By W. J. LOCKE
Ready Feb. 24. 7s. net.

THE PREVENTIVE MAN.
By G. V. MCAFadden. 7s. net.

IN PAWN TO A THRONE.
By DEMETRA VAKA and KENNETH BROWN. 7s. net.

TALES RETAILED OF CELEBRITIES.
By Sir WARREN HASTINGS D’OYLY. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

Sir W. H. D’Oyly, who has spent a great many years in the Indian Civil Service, retails in this volume a series of amusing stories of men and things. Always bright and witty he makes what he has seen and heard live again for us, and the book forms an admirable anecdotic history of life in India during the latter part of last century.

THE IDOLATRY OF SCIENCE.
By the Hon. STEPHEN COLERIDGE, author of “Vivisection,” “Memories,” etc. Cr. 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

In this book Mr. Coleridge claims it as an axiom that conduct is the supreme consideration in human affairs, and that inasmuch as science has no connexion with conduct, the study of it can confer but little benefit upon mankind.

THE WELL OF BEING.
Poems by HERBERT JONES. 5s. net.

THE SPACIOUS TIMES.
Poems by FRANCIS COUTTS. 5s. net.

J. H. LANE.

VIGO STREET.

LONDON W.1.

A 20TH CENTURY BOOK For 20TH CENTURY NEEDS

THE NEW TESTAMENT
is now translated into the Modern English in everyday use.

It is known as

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY NEW TESTAMENT

A Translation into Modern English from the Original Greek (Westcott and Hort’s Text).

In response to a large demand a POCKET EDITION has been prepared and is NOW READY.

Printed on thin paper, cloth boards. Price 3s. 6d. net.

Prices of other Editions:

Popular Edition. Crown 8vo, Cloth Boards. 2s. 6d. net.
Ordinary “ Large 8vo,” Leather 3s. 6d. net.
Ordinary Large 8vo, Leather 4s. 6d. net.
Presentation “ On India Paper, Calif 6s. 6d. net.
Large Type “ Royal 8vo, Cloth Boards. 5s. 0d. net.
Postage extra in all cases.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION
And of all Booksellers.
Appointments Vacant

ROYAL NAVY.

Applications are invited for appointments as INSTRUCTOR LIEUTENANTS in the Royal Navy. Candidates must be under 30 years of age, have had University Training and have taken an Honours Degree in Mathematics, Science or Engineering; they should also have had some teaching experience.

The rates of pay are from £265 per annum on entry to a maximum of £400 per annum as Instructor Commander. Promotion, by selection, to Instructor Captain is also open, with a maximum of £1,277 per annum.

Retired pay to officers over 40 years of age, after 12 years' service, ranges from £200 per annum for an Instructor Lieutenant to a maximum of £900 for an Instructor Captain, according to length of service. Service pension is also allowed to officers if invalided before becoming eligible for retired pay.

For further particulars apply in the first instance to the Secretary of the Admiralty, Whitehall, S.W.1.

UNIVERSITY OF LIVERPOOL.

Applications are invited at once for the POST OF ASSISTANT-LIBRARIAN in the University Library. Apply, stating previous experience and knowledge of languages together with testimonials, to the Registrar.

COUNTY BOROUGH OF WEST HAM PUBLIC LIBRARIES.

A SISTANT ASSISTANT.

Applications are invited for the position of SENIOR ASSISTANT at Canning Town Library (open access) at a commencing salary of £91 per annum, rising by annual increments of £5 for the first year, and £6 thereafter to £190, but the maximum not to exceed £220 per annum unless two of the higher certificates of the Library Association be obtained (viz. Classification, Bibliography or Literary History). In the event of one or more of these three certificates being obtained, the maximum salary to be reached by further increments of £5 for each certificate but not exceeding £210 in all.

In addition to the above, a War Bonus on the scale of the Civil Service Awards Nos. 84 and 101, equivalent to an additional £89 14s. on the initial salary will be paid.

Applicants must be not less than 21 years of age, and must possess four of the Library Association certificates.

Applications, stating age, and qualifications, and accompanied by copies of not more than three recent testimonials, must be enclosed in an envelope endorsed "Library Assistant" and reach the Postmaster not later than the first post on Tuesday morning, March 2, 1920, and will be disqualified.

Town Hall,
West Ham, E.15.
February 16, 1920.

MUNICIPAL TECHNICAL COLLEGE,
GUILDHALL, BATH.

A SSISTANT MASTER is required at once in School of Art with knowledge of draughtsmanship for woodworking trades or architectural design. Salary (scale under revision) according to qualifications and experience. Apply to A. GODFREY DAY, Principal.

Appointments Vacant

CITY OF SHEFFIELD EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

Applications are invited for appointment as Certificated ASSISTANT MISTRESSES for service in the Elementary Schools of the Authority.

SALARIES,£150.

MAXIMUM £275.

ANNUAL INCREMENTS £360.

In the case of Trained Certificated Teachers each year spent within the City limits, commencing salary of a Teacher as a year of service with the Sheffield Education Committee.

In fixing the commencing salary of a Teacher, certain previous experience in a like capacity by other Authorities may be counted as service with the Sheffield Education Committee.

Forms of application, which must be returned to the undersigned as soon as possible, may be had on receipt of a stamped addressed envelope. No applications will be entertained after the 1st April, 1920.

PERCIVAL SHARP,
Director of Education.

COUNTY BOROUGH OF STOKE-ON-TRENT EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

THE above Committee invite APPLICATIONS for the POST OF JOINT DRILL AND GAMES MISTRESS for the Hanley Secondary School and the Longton High School, commencing salary £180 per annum.

Forms of application, which should duly be filled up and returned as soon as possible, may be obtained on receipt of a stamped addressed envelope from:

Dr. W. LUDFORD FREEMAN,
Director of Education.
Education Office, Town Hall, Hanley, Stoke-on-Trent.
18 February, 1920.

PLYMOUTH EDUCATION AUTHORITY.

HIGH SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Head Mistress: Miss M. P. POFFER, M.A.

Applications are invited for the POST OF ASSISTANT MISTRESS, qualified to teach Geography (Graduate). Present salary scale £120 to £280 per annum. Previous teaching experience taken into consideration in fixing the initial salary. Application forms and scale of salary may be obtained from the undersigned. Last day for receiving applications March 6, 1920.

E. CHANDLER COOK,
Director of Education.

COUNTY HIGH SCHOOL, ILFORD.

Applications are invited for the following APPOINTMENTS:-

(a) MASTER to teach Economics (Advanced Course) and History (Boys' School). Commencing salary £200 to £275 per annum according to qualifications and experience. Increments and maximum according to County Council scale.

(b) SPANISH MASTER for three days per week—Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. Salary £180 per annum.

Applications to be made on forms to be obtained by sending stamped addressed envelope to the Clerk to the Governors.
Appointments Vacant

COUNTY BOROUGH OF SOUTHPORT.
EDUCATION COMMITTEE.
NEW SECONDARY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.
HEADMastership.

THE Governors of the above school invite applications for the POSITION of HEADMASTER.

The school will be commenced in temporary premises at the "Woodlands," Lord Street, pending the erection of a new school with accommodation for 500 boys, which is to be proceeded with immediately on a site of 15 acres on the sea front.

Comencing salary, not less than £200 per annum.

1. It is intended that the school shall be conducted as far as possible after the manner of a Public School for Day Boarders, for which purpose the new school buildings are being specially designed, and it is therefore desirable that candidates should have had some Public School experience.

2. An Honours Degree of a British University will be looked for. The School will be grant-winning and be conducted under Articles of Government formulated in accordance with the Board of Education's Regulations.

Applications, endorsed "Headmaster, Secondary School," accompanied by copies of three recent testimonials should reach the undersigned on or before Tuesday, March 9, 1920.

WM. A. ALLANACH,
Correspondent and Director of Education.
Education Offices, 5, Church Street, Southport.
February, 1920.

MALVERN GIRLS' COLLEGE, WORCESTERSHIRE.

1. WANTED, after Easter, an experienced MISTRESS to teach Botany to the Middle and Senior Schools. Churchwoman essential. The post is a resident one, and a good salary is offered to a suitable candidate.

2. A BOTANY SPECIALIST to teach Botany from Form III. upwards. Geography subsidiary a recommendation.

3. WANTED, in September, an ASSISTANT MISTRESS to teach Geography on modern lines. Good qualifications and experience essential.

Initial salaries £150-£250 according to qualifications and experience rising £10 per annum to a maximum of £350. If resident a deduction of £50 is made for board and residence. Apply, with full particulars to the Vice-Principal, Ivydene Hall, Malvern Girls' College.

PINNER ROYAL COMMERCIAL TRAVELLERS' SCHOOLS.

REQUIRED, as soon as possible, a Resident ASSISTANT MASTER for general form subjects, good junior French, and, if possible, History. A recommendation. Comencing salary not less than £180, with board and residence. Applications, with full particulars, to the Headmaster, F. Adshead, M.A., at the Schools, Hatch End, Middlesex.

BOROUGH OF FOLKESTONE.
PUBLIC LIBRARY AND MUSEUM.

THE COMMITTEE invite Applications for the POSITION of THIRD LADY ASSISTANT. Public Library experience essential, preferably with a knowledge of the Dewey Decimal Classification and Open Access charging. Comencing salary £100 per annum. Applications with not more than three recent testimonials to be sent to the undersigned on or before Monday, March 1, 1920.

(By Order) A. F. KIDSON, Town Clerk's Office, Folkestone.
February 23, 1920.

REQUIRED for next Term, by Leyland Motors, Limited, Leyland, Lancashire, an experienced TEACHER to start and be responsible for their Pupils' Engineering Residential College. Applicants must have had successful University teaching experience and capable of taking students up to the degrees standard. A good salary for a suitable man.—Apply with photograph and full particulars.

Appointments Wanted

LIBRARIAN AND SECRETARY (Fellow of Library Association), about to be demobilised, seeks re-employment. Over 20 years' municipal Library experience. Highest credentials. Apply Box 668, ATHENæUM Advertisement Office, 170, Fleet St., London E.C.4.

The Athenæum [Advertisements] February 27, 1920

Art Exhibitions

NEW ART SALON
160, Shaftesbury Avenue (First Floor)

EXHIBITION OF PAINTINGS by BACQUE, DUFAY, L'HOTTE, MARCHAND, MODIGLIANI, PICASSO, SIGMUND, VLAMINCK.

Daily 10-6

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTER ETCHERS AND ENGRAVERS, 5a, Pall Mall East, S.W.
38th Annual Exhibition. Daily 10 to 5.

WALKER'S GALLERIES, 118, New Bond Street, W.
Exhibition of Rare Old Coloured Aquatints of Places of Interest. February 19 to March 6, 1920.

MONARRO GROUP (First Exhibition) of Impressionist Paintings at THE GOUPIIL GALLERY, 5, Regent Street. 1s. 6d. (with Tax). 10-5.30.

Sales by Auction

VALUABLE PRINTED BOOKS AND MANUSCRIPTS.
Messrs. SOTHEY, WILKINSON & HODGE.

WILL SELL by AUCTION, at their Large Galleries, 34 and 35 New Bond Street, W.1, on Thursday, March 4, and following day, at one o'clock precisely, VALUABLE PRINTED BOOKS and important Illuminated and other Manuscripts, comprising the property of the estate of the late W. de Rodes, Esq., including Fine Books with Coloured Plates; a large collection of Caricatures by Gilray, Bunbury, the Cruikshanks, Rowlandson, &c. Books illustrated by Kate Greenaway; the property of T. F. Barratt, Esq., productions of the Kelmscott, Vale, Dolos and other modern private presses, the property of Capt. Charles Home MacCall, C.B.E., and the Rev. Stephford A. Brooke (deceased). Books from the Rowland Library, including Presentation Copies of Works of Matthew Arnold, Browning, Dickens, William Morris, D. G. Rosetti, Swinburne, Thackeray, &c. Early Editions of Robinon Crusoe, the property of the late Dr. W. Laidlaw Purves. Vincent de Beauvais, The Myrour of the World, printed by W. Caxton, the property of Sir Richard A. S. Paget, Bt. And other properties, including European and Oriental Illuminated Manuscripts; a collection of Books in Fine Bindings; Early Printed Books; Shakespeare's Poems 1640; Tanneguy and Portraits and other important Shakespeareana: Plays by the Dramatists of the Restoration Period, from the Kemble-Deshonville Collection; an Indenture signed by William Davenant relating to his Theatre; a collection of Books by John Bunyan. May be viewed two days prior. Catalogues may be had. Illustrated catalogues with 5 plates (four in colours) may be had, price 2s. 6d. each.

SUITABLE FOR INSTITUTION OR SCHOOL.

WINDSOR FOREST.

Twenty miles from London.

An Exceptionally Commodious and Well-Built HOUSE, NEW LODGE. Seated in a Park, and containing over 35 bedrooms, 7 large lofty entertaining rooms, numerous offices, the whole being ranged round a quadrangle, and forming an imposing and picturesque pile. The House has great capabilities of adaption for the purposes of a School, Institution, or other such purpose in addition to being suitable for a very fine Residence.

FARMHOUSES, NUMEROUS COTTAGES, Stabling, Garage and very numerous outbuildings, the whole seated in Park-like meadows facing East and West, and commanding beautiful views.

FOR SALE privately or by AUCTION, Winchester House, E.C., June 2. Ralph Pay & Taylor, 24, Davies Street, Berkeley Square, W.

GENTLEMAN, Honours Graduate, 4½ years Academic training, Philosophy, Psychology, English Language and Literature, special knowledge of German, some knowledge of French and Italian, interested in Art, Letters and Affairs, seeks Poet as SECRETARY to Prominent Man (or similar appointment). Highest References.—Please apply, Box 456, ATHENæUM Advt. Office, 170, Fleet Street, London, E.C.4.
BOOKSELLERS & CATALOGUES

RERUM ITALICARUM SCRIPTORES

ab Annio Aeneae Christianiae Quingentesimo, Milleniumquingentesimum, quorum Pisthima parum primum in Lucem Prodit Ex Ambrosiani, Extensis, Allarumque Insignium Bibliothecarum Codicibus Ludovicus Antonio Muratorius
A very rare set. Milan 1723, etc.

PRICE £40

L. CHAUNDY OF OXFORD LTD.
3 ALBEMARLE STREET, LONDON, W.

EGYPT, PALESTINE, and the FAR EAST: Travel: Arabian Nights; and Napoleon Era. New Catalogue post free on application.—J. A. ALLEN & Co., 16, Grenville Street, London, W.C.

BOOKS AND AUTOGRAPHS.
CATALOGUES FREE.

AUTHORS'

THE AUTHORS' ALLIANCE are prepared to consider and place MSS. for early publication. Literary work of all different kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interests first.
Twenty years' experience. Please note new address: 93 and 94,
CHANCERY LANE, LONDON, W.C.2.

PROOF READING, INDEXING, RESEARCHES, REVISION
Linguist, good experience.—Mr. F. A. HADLAND, 15, Bellevue
Villas, Forest Hill, S.E.22.

Typewriting &c.

TYPEWRITING OF EVERY DESCRIPTION carefully and promptly executed at home, 1s. per 1,000 words; carbon copy, 3d. per 1,000 words. Duplicating, Cambridge Local,— Miss NANCY McFarlane, 11, Palmira Avenue, Westcliff Essex.

TYPEWRITING. — Authors' MSS., Examination Papers, Letters, Circulars, Testimonials, General Copying, Duplicating, etc. — J. TRIMNELL, 8, Moira Terrace, Cardiff.

TYPEWRITING accurately and promptly executed, 10d.
1,000 words; carbide copy, 3d. 1,000.—Miss L. MITCHELL, 85, Willow Vale, Shepherd's Bush, W.12.

Entertainments

HOLBORN EMPIRE
Holborn Tube Station.
LEWIS CASSON AND BRUCE WINSTON'S SEASON OF MATINEES
DAILY at 3.30. This Week.

TROJAN WOMEN
Next Week, "CANDIDA." Mar. 6, "MEDEA." Mar. 15, "Tom Trouble."

Charities

BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION

A Registered Friendly Society founded in the year 1837 for the assistance of members and their widows and children when in necessitous circumstances.

Patron: HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.
President: CHARLES JAMES LONGMAN, Esq.

An Annual Subscription of One Guinea, or a Donation of Ten Guineas, entitles the donor to Honorary Membership with the privilege of voting at General Meetings; whilst a bequest of Twenty Guineas constitutes the, executor an Honorary Member for life, with power to vote.

Subscriptions or Donations will be thankfully received by the Secretary, Mr. WILLIAM FOULTON, Stationers' Hall Court, London, E.C., who will gladly furnish any further particulars that may be desired.

The Athenæum Literature Dept.,
10, Adelphi Terrace, W.C.2.

A VERY BAD WOMAN.
By GERTIE DE S. WENTWORTH-JAMES. 6s. net.
The best and most startling novel that Mrs. Gertie de S. Wentworth-James has ever written.

THE SURRENDER AND OTHER HAPPENINGS.
By MARY GAUNT. 7s. net.
Author of many delightful novels and books of travel.

DESERT LOVE.
By JOHN CONQUEST. 7s. net.
The most thrilling tale of passion and romance that has appeared for years.

WOMAN'S WILD OATS.
By C. GASQUOINE HARTLEY.
Essays on the rebuilding of moral standards. 6s. net.

THE MENACE OF SPIRITUALISM.
By ELLIOT O'DONNELL. Foreword by FATHER
BERNARD VAUGHAN, S.J.
A spirited exposure of the follies and dangers of the crass of the moment.

CONTACT WITH THE OTHER WORLD.
By JAMES H. HYSLOP, LL.D.
An impartial survey of the problems presented by the two questions—"Do we die? Can we talk to the dead?"

THE TRUTH OF SPIRITUALISM.
By "RITA." (Mrs. Desmond Humphries).
A book by one who believes—a book that a believer has felt impelled to write.

SPOON RIVER ANTHOLOGY.
By EDGAR LEE MASTERS.
A popular edition of one of the most fascinating books of verse ever written.
"One of the greatest books of the present century." — The Nation.

T. WERNER LAURIE, LTD.,
30 New Bridge Street, E.C.4.
The Cries of London

being 13 Plates after
FRANCIS WHEATLEY, R.A.

Engraved in Mezzotint by EDWARD STODART

We are fortunate in announcing a new series of Mezzotint reproductions of Francis Wheatley's famous "Cries of London."

Never have these popular subjects been treated in so masterly a manner for reproduction as is evidenced in this, Mr. Stodart's latest work.

We are confident in believing that the present issue of the series in a small size (viz., 6 by 4½ inches) suited so well to the present day, will be greatly appreciated. The work has been engraved by Mr. Edward Stodart, who has given several years to their production. There are thirteen plates, engraved in Mezzotint. The editions will be limited to 350 Artist's Proofs printed in Colour, and 25 sets in Monochrome. The proofs will be published at the very low price of £2 1s. the set.

Full particulars and miniature reproductions of the 13 subjects will be gladly sent upon application.

"Old Chairs to Mend." "Sweet China Oranges, sweet China."
"Knives, Scissors and Razors to Grind." "Turnips and Carrots, two bunches a penny."
"Hot Spiced Gingerbread, Smoking Hot." "Do you want any Matches?"
"Strawberries, scarlet Strawberries."
"A new Love-Song, only a halfpenny apiece."
"Two Bunches a penny, Primroses, two bunches a penny."
"Round and Sound, Fivepence a Pound, Duke Cherries."
"Milk Below, Maids." "New Mackerel, New Mackerel."
"Fresh Gathered Peas, young Hastings."

The Hours

being 4 Plates after
WILLIAM HAMILTON, R.A.

Engraved in Pure Stipple by WILLIAM J. ALLINGHAM

The Publishers have pleasure in announcing that they have completed arrangements for the issue of the series of Four Stipple Engravings by William J. Allingham, to be printed in colour, after Hamilton's famous pastoral subjects entitled "The Hours"—"Morning," "Noon," "Evening," and "Night."

Mr. Allingham is without dispute the finest engraver in stipple of the present day, and this, his forthcoming work, will prove a worthy equal to his excellent stipple engravings of "The Months," now completely subscribed and quite unobtainable.

A delightful Art Brochure, giving a résumé of the Artist's Life and Work, and full particulars of the four charming subjects which constitute his latest contribution to art, is now available, and a free presentation copy is at the disposal of collectors and others upon application to the Museum Galleries.

THE MUSEUM GALLERIES

26 Museum Street
London  W.C.1
UNORIGINAL SIN

A certain section of the press is, at the present time, full of demands for the punishment—aggravated by the face of a predetermined trial—of various German generals who failed to realize the journalist's touching belief that War is a beautiful and Christian practice, calculated to bring out all that is best and noblest in mankind. These demands are usually padded out with high-flown references to the chivalrous traditions of the past. But what is surprising is that even among those who might be expected to know something of History, this pathetic belief in the beauty of bygone warfare should survive.

Listening recently to a debate at the Cambridge Union, I was slightly surprised to hear the Duke of Northumberland refer to the war as having been "waged with a savagery unparalleled in history.

If a nobleman whose title and political ideas alike date from the Middle Ages is so little conversant with the facts of military history, it is to be presumed that many who cannot claim descent, even on the distaff side, from a long line of pugnacious barons, may be equally ignorant. Memories are short in England—which is one reason why no Englishman can understand the Irish—and the horrors and other circumstances of war have come to most with a shock of novelty. As a fact, in no department does history repeat itself with more depressing lack of originality than in war; and in the late war there was practically no novelty, except in the medical arrangements (and even those showed grimly medieval features in Mesopotamia) and in the scale of operations. Grenades, bombs and the machinery for throwing them were admittedly reversions; and shrapnel helmets can be seen in scores of early manuscripts. Inventors of "tanks" were as numerous in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries as now; and even "gas" was anticipated by stick-bombs and by such devices as were employed at Maestricht in 1579, when the defenders rendered the Spanish mines untenable by filling them with smoke from burning faggots, driven in with the organ-bells from the church. It may be noted in passing that many of the Maestricht sappers were women—though none of them seem to have anticipated modern precedent by writing a book on their adventures; while at Haarlem there was a corps of women as fully organized for fighting as the famous Russian battalion.

Aeroplanes have the most obvious claims to be considered novelties, but the same fourteenth-century manuscript that contains the earliest picture of a cannon contains also a sketch of a method of bombing towns by means of kites. An even earlier example of aerial warfare, of a kind, was the exploit of King Germund, who burnt Cirencester by means of sparrows with lighted brands tied to their feet. It must have been the memory of this legendary exploit that led the sheriff of Essex in 1267 to collect all the cocks he could lay hands on to use in the same way for an attack on London, though Simon de Montfort does not seem to have adopted the ingenious suggestion.

There are a number of points in which, mutatis mutandis, extraordinarily close parallels to the Great War can be drawn from the sixteenth century. In 1554, when the French were ravaging round Brussels, burning the villages, capturing the men of wealth and destroying the harvest, they carefully refrained from entering Flanders for fear of war with England, as, by a treaty of 1542, the English were bound to help the Emperor if these provinces were invaded. Still more remarkable parallels occur in connection with the war between the Pope and the Emperor in 1556, of the responsibility for which the Pope declared: "Those accursed of God, who were seeking an opportunity, armed on the borders and increased their forces constantly, with the intention of doing what they have done. It is manifest to everybody, who will the war and who commenced it. They now talk of peace to put to sleep those who are interested in the matter and in the meanwhile to play their own game." In this campaign Cardinal Caraffa was appointed controller of grain and fats, which were found to be short; and we also hear that large numbers of "Knighthoods of the Lily" were distributed to merchants and others in return for gifts of corn. Even more familiar is the sound of the Venetian ambassador's remarks on the Pope's mercenary soldiers: "The Germans live according to their detestable custom," though it is an antichlimax to find that his only accusation against them is "eating meat every day without distinction."—instead of fasting like good Catholics; while of the Gascons he reports that they "do not cease from acts of larceny, stripping people of their cloaks, taking bread and wine by force, and choosing to be masters of the women." It was, however, a German army that forty years earlier had laid waste the Friuli, torturing and slaying, and at Mozana, by command of Count Christopher Frangipani—who bore more of Christ in his name than in his nature—had gouged out the eyes of a hundred innocent maidens and peasants.

In nothing, unhappily, does the history of war repeat itself with more unflagging regularity than in tales of cruelty and suffering. From the days when William the Conqueror so ravaged Yorkshire that the scanty survivors were fain to eat the bodies of the dead, to 1739, when the wars in Prussia had "turned Christians into cannibals" and General Arnehem reported that the boors of Brandenburg had killed and eaten a justice of the peace, the peoples writhe in the dust and the warriors ride over them—and ride unrebuked. At the banquet at which Edward III. decided to claim the throne of France, Sir John de Faukemont declared: "If the English king enters the district of Cambrai, I will go and set fire before him, and I will neither spare church nor altar, neither woman nor child that I can find, who shall will to grieve King Edward." And those who heard this bloodthirsty ruffian calmly observed, "Such a man is to be loved, who would increase the honour of his lord." So also the poet says of "gude Wallace" that when he had burned and harried all the English border he came home again

With his triumph with honour and great gloir,
And great loving of ilk man, less and moir—one of the exploits with which he is credited by some writers being the burning of a church full of schoolchildren.

Often the cruelty was a definite policy of frightfulness, as the French in 1389, when at war with Ghent, mutilated all their prisoners, gouging out their eyes and cutting off limbs, and sent them back to Ghent; or as that mirror of chivalry, the Black Prince, in 1355 ravaged the district round Narbonne, unscreened, for eight weeks, successfully terrifying many nobles into joining his party. But quite as often it was the savagery of revenge, as in the Black Prince's massacre at Limoges, where "was no pytrie taken of the poore people who wrought never no maner of treason, yet they bought it derer than the great personages, suche as had done the yvell and trespace." Terrible as it is the story of the German atrocities, there is nothing in it equal to the sack of St. Quentin in 1557, of Zutphen in 1572 or of Maestricht in 1579; and few incidents worse than the sacking of Badajos in the Peninsular War, of which the soldier historian, Hamilton, can only say that such things always have been and always will happen in similar cases—in which he echoes the words of another historian four hundred years earlier, recording the capture of Pontoise by the English in 1418, "where, according to the usual custom in conquered cities, they committed innumerable injuries."

No! Atrocities and frightfulness are no new things. What is new is the almost universal spirit of condemnation with which they are regarded, so that even their perpetrators are forced to disown them. Thanks to the press, the world at large has now supped full of the horrors of war which were formerly known only to the student of history; and we may hope that the time is coming when men will say that history shall not repeat itself on these lines ever again.

L. F. SALZMAN.

THE WINDS OF CARNE

Soft are the winds of Carne that fill the elms
On Lamarth height with sound of waveless seas,
Manaccan a near voice, till Silence whelmns
The silver fields, the hill of mysteries,
Her birthplace; of her realms the first and fairest these.

O voice, by my lull'd sense so breath'd on, so Remembered, even as the rose-crimson there
In thy dark alley'd path; when shall I go
Thy way again? till the last shadow wear
My day of life to no darkness—if thee I hear,

One of tumultuous voices from the lawn
Of mirag'd harvest; gold in heaven appears
The sign of Ceres' virgin marriage, dawn
Chilling the seas. Are these her bright comperees
In sullen pageant drawn, with the unchielded years?

But not for Beauty's requiem dimmed these eyes
Looking for news of earth, when Love's last word
Fell like his earliest-spoken symphonies.
Fair Land! how near unbirthing I heard
That branch of paradise and nest of singing bird!

How fares the moon of Carne to-night, that fills
His glade with stars, his valley with sea-streams,
With ghoesty reapers all his harvest hills?
The tide is out, and on the shore messeems
A stumbling reaper spills the harvest of his dreams.

V. LOCKE ELLIS.
THE CRY IN THE WILDERNESS

ROUSSEAU AND ROMANTICISM. By Irving Babbitt. (Boston, Mass., Houghton, Mifflin; London, Constable. 17s. net.)

W e have, in this remarkable book by Professor Irving Babbitt, to deal with a closely argued and copiously documented indictment of the modern mind. We gather that "Rousseau and Romanticism" is but the latest of several books in which the author has gradually developed his theme; and we regret exceedingly that the preceding volumes have not fallen into our hands, because whatever may be our final attitude towards the author's conclusions, we cannot but regard "Rousseau and Romanticism" as masterly. Its style is, we admit, at times rather harsh and crabbed, but the critical thought which animates it is of a kind so rare that we are almost impelled to declare that it is the only book of criticism worthy the name which has appeared in English in the twentieth century.

By endeavouring to explain the justice of that verdict we shall more easily give an indication of the nature and scope of Professor Babbitt's achievement. We think that it would be easy to show that in the last generation—we will go no further back for the moment, though our author's indictment reaches at least a century earlier—criticism has imperceptibly adopted a way of thinking which we may call appreciation. The emphasis has been laid upon the uniqueness of the individual, and the unconscious or avowed aim of the modern "critic" has been to persuade us to understand, to sympathize with, and in the last resort to enter into the whole psychological process which culminated in the artistic creation of the author examined. And there modern criticism has stopped. There has been no indication that it was aware of the necessity of going further. Many influences went to shape the general conviction that mere presentation was the final function of criticism, but perhaps the chief of these was the curious contagion of a scientific age. The word "objectivity" had a great vogue; it was felt that the spiritual world was analogous to the physical; the critic was faced, like the man of science, with a mass of hard, irreducible facts, and his function was, like the scientist's, that of recording them as comprehensively as possible and without prejudice. The unconscious programme was, indeed, impossible of fulfilment. All facts may be of equal importance to the scientist, but they are not to the literary critic. He chose those which interested him most for the exercise of his talent for demonstration. But that choice was, as a general rule, the only specifically critical act which he performed, and, since it was usually unmotivated, it was difficult to attach even to that more than a "scientific" importance. Reasoned judgments of value were rigorously eschewed, and even though we may presume that the modern critic is at times vexed by the problem why (or whether) one work of art is better than another, when each seems perfectly expressive of the artist's intention, the preoccupation is seldom betrayed in the language of his appreciation. Tacitly and insensibly we have reached a point at which all works of art are equally good if they are equally expressive. What every artist seeks to express is his own unique consciousness, as between things unique there is no possibility of subordination or comparison.

That does not seem to us an unduly severe diagnosis of modern criticism, although it needs perhaps to be balanced by an acknowledgment that the impulse towards the penetration of an artist's consciousness is in itself salutary, as a valuable adjunct to the methods of criticism, provided that it is definitely subordinated to the final critical judgment, before which uniqueness is an impossible plea.

Such a diagnosis will no doubt be welcomed by those who belong to an older generation than that to which it is applied. But they should not rejoice prematurely. We require of them an answer to the question whether they were really in better case—whether they were not the fathers whose sins are visited upon the children. Professor Babbitt, at least, has no doubt of their responsibility. From his angle of approach we might take their ranks with a cross-fire of questions such as these: When you invoked the sanction of criticism were you more than merely destructive? When you riddled religion with your scientific objections, did you not forget that religion is something more, far more than a nexus of historical facts or a cosmogony? When you questioned everything in the name of truth and science, why did you not dream of asking whether the conclusions of men's minds were capax improrti in man's universe? What right had you to suppose that a man disarmed of tradition is stronger for his nakedness? Why did you not examine in the name of that same truth and science the moral nature of man, and see whether it was fit to bear the burden of intolerable knowledge which you put upon it? Why did you, the truth-seekers and the scientists, indulge yourselves in the most romantic dream of a natural man who followed instinctively the greatest good of the greatest number, which you yourselves never for one moment pursued? What hypocrisy or self-deception enabled you to clothe your statements of fact in a moral aura, and to blind yourselves and the world to the truth that you were killing a dragon and feeding the care of a portentous hydra, whom you benevolently loosed? Why did you not see that the end of all your devotion was to shift man's responsibility for himself from his shoulders? Do you, because you clothed yourselves in the shreds of a moral respectability which you had not the time (or was it the courage?) to analyse, dare to denounce us because our teeth are set on edge by the sour grapes which you enjoyed?

But this procès-verbal, it may be said by a modern critic, deals with morals, and we are discussing art and criticism. That the objection is conceivable is precisely the measure of our decadence. For the vital centre of our ethics is also the vital centre of our art. Moral nihilism inevitably involves an aesthetic nihilism which can be observed only temporarily by an insinuation upon technical perfection. Neither the art of religion nor the art of religion is an adequate statement of the possibilities and purpose of art, but there is no doubt that the religion of art is by far the more vacuous of the two. The values of literature, the standards by which it must be criticized and the scheme according to which it must be arranged, are in the last resort moral. The sense that they should be more moral than morality affords no excuse for accepting them when they are less so. Literature should be a kingdom where a stern morality, a more strenuous liberty prevail—where the artist may disgrace if he will with the ethics of the society in which he lives, but only on condition of revealing a deeper insight into the moral law to whose allegiance man, in so far as he is man and not a beast, inevitably tends. Never, we suppose, was an age in which art stood in greater need of the true law of decorum than this. Its philosophy has played it false. It has passed from the nebulous Hegelian adulation of the accomplished fact (though one would have thought that to a generation with even a vague memory of Aristotle's"Poetics;" "The Philosophy of History" would have been an evident danger signal) to an adulation of a science and of instinct. From one side comes the cry "Man is a beast;" from the other, "Trust your instincts." The sole manifest employment of reason is to overthrow itself. Yet it shall be, in conjunction with the imagination, the vital principle of control.

Professor Babbitt would have us back to Aristotle, or back to our senses, which is roughly the same thing. At all events, it is certain that in Aristotle the present generation would find the beginnings of a remedy for that fatal confusion of categories which they would call the "reckon." It is the confusion between existence and value. That strange malady of the mind by which in the nineteenth century material progress was supposed to create, _ipso facto_, a concomitant moral progress, and which so plunged the world into catastrophe, has its counterpart in a literature of objective realism. One of the most admired of contemporary works of fiction opens with an infant's memory of a mackintosh sheet, pleasantly warmed with its own water; another, of almost equal popularity among the cultivated, is filled with such reminiscences of the heroine as the paste of bread with which she filled her decaying teeth while she ate her breakfast. Yet the young writers who first sat at the nest of an anarchic moral proponent of the present day consider Professor Babbitt's indictment of themselves and decide whether they have no sin:

"If I am to judge by myself," said an eighteenth-century Frenchman, "a man is a stupid animal." Man is not only a stupid animal, in spite of his conceit of his own cleverness, but we are here at the source of his stupidity. The source is the more evident, the Buddhists, with his almost infallible sagacity, defined long ago. In spite of the fact that his spiritual and, in the long run, his material success, hinge on his ethical effort, man persists in dodging this effort, in seeking to follow the line of least or lesser resistance. An energetic material working does not mend, but aggravate the failure to work ethnically, and is therefore especially stupid. Just this combination has in fact led to the crowning stupidity of the ages—the Great War. No more delusive spectacle has ever been witnessed than that of hundreds of millions of human beings using a vast machinery of scientific efficiency to turn life into a hell for one another. It is hard to avoid concluding that we are living in a world which has gone wrong on first principles, so that, in spite of all the warnings of the past, has allowed itself to be caught once more in the terrible naturalistic trap. The dissolution of civilisation with which we are threatened is likely to be worse than some romances of that century or those to come. More, indeed, the success which has been obtained in "perfecting the mystery of murder." Various traditional agencies are indeed still doing much to chain up the beast in man. Of these the chief is no doubt the Church. But the leadership of the Occident is no less a problem here. The leaders have succumbed in greater or less degree to naturalism, and so have been tampering with the moral law. That the brutal imperialist who brooks no obstacle to his lust for domination has been tampering with this law goes without saying, but the humanitarian, adrift with brotherhood and profoundly convinced of the loveliness of his own soul, has been tampering with it also, and in a more dangerous way, for the very reason that it is less obvious. This tampering with the moral law began at that moment when man conceived the idea that the veto power in man, has been largely a result, though not a necessary result, of the rupture with the traditional forms of wisdom. The Baconian naturalist repudiated the past because he wished to be more positive and critical, to plant himself on the facts. But the veto power is itself a fact—the weightiest with which man has to reckon. The Rousseauistic materialist threw off traditional control because he wished to be more imaginative. Yet without the veto power imagination fails to sheer anarchy. Both Baconian and Rousseauist were very impatient of any outer authority that seemed to stand between them and their own perceptions. Yet, the veto power is nothing abstract, nothing that one needs to take on hesitantly, but is very immediate. The naturalistic leaders may be proved wrong without going beyond their own principles, and their wrongness is of a kind to wreck communities.

We find it impossible to refuse our assent to the main counts of this indictment. The deanthropocentrized universe of science is not the universe in which man has to live. That universe is at once smaller and larger than the universe of science: smaller in material extent, larger in spiritual possibility. Therefore to allow the perspective of science seriously to influence, much less control, our human values, is an invitation to disaster. Humanism must reassess itself, for even we can see that Shakespeares are better than Hamlets. The reassessment of humanism involves the re-creation of a practical ideal of human life and conduct, and a strict subordination of the impulses of the individual to this ideal. There must now be a period of critical and humanistic positivism in regard to ethics and to art. We may say frankly that it is not to our elders that we think of applying for its rudiments. We regard them as no less misguided and a good deal less honest than ourselves. Of is among our anarchists that we shall look most hopefully for our new traditionalists, if only because, in literature at least, they are more keenly aware of the nature of the abyss on the brink of which they are trembling.

J. M. M.

DIPSYCHUS

ARTHUR HUGH CLOUGH. By James Ingsley Osborne. (Constable: 8s. 6d. net.)

A CONSPICUOUS failure invites our attention until it is explained; after that it becomes instructive, and, quite properly, we tend to lose interest in it; for are not the tigers of wrath wiser than the horses of instruction? It may be surmised that Arthur Hugh Clough will continue for some time to come to provide a strong irritant of this nature. It is, with one certain and a few doubtful exceptions, his only claim to remembrance; his literary output, save for these, is interesting chiefly in its reference to the personal problem. The doubtful exceptions are the well-known lyrics—doubtful, for they are much more reflective than passionate, much more generally pathetic than individually poignant. The certain and very notable exception is the delectable "Bothie of Tober-na-Volich"; it is not the least of Clough's manifold contradictions that one of the most disastrously introspective of men should have written one of the most buoyant veined imaginatively in the language.

Introspection restores its sway in the next poem, with its misleadingly frivolous title, "Amours de Voyage"; and in "Dipsyclus" rages in all its destructive fury. At a length of some 1,500 lines Dipsyclus and the Spirit converse in their heavy yet jerky way, with lyrical interludes of slight merit. Dipsyclus has an itch—he names it a burning thirst—for action; he has, too, a notion that it is his duty to act; but, curiously enough, is obsessed by the impunity which, he conceives, must cling to anyone who stirs in a muddly world. The Spirit encourages him to action by diluting on the pleasantness of mud.

It is dreadful for a refined person to contemplate the necessity of losing his Virgin, and none the less dreadful for him because the dread is ridiculous. If, as in the case of Dipsyclus, he should have the misfortune to identify refinement with moral integrity, the absurdity verges on the tragic. But the hero of a tragic theme is the last person to handle it successfully as a work of art, until he has mastered the situation, or, at least, escaped from it. And in "Dipsyclus" we have Clough thinking aloud as he writes in the clutch of his particular fiend—not, to be sure, the Spirit who talks to Dipsyclus, and has so much more of the goose than of the devil in him.

Mr. Osborne deals acutely and searchingly with "Dipsyclus"; incidentally he disposed, though perhaps rather too concisely, of the claim of "Dipsyclus" to be the "English Faust." Of course, Clough borrowed from "Faust," and Mr. Osborne might have pointed out to what extent he has spoiled in the borrowing: we refer particularly to the annoying Spirit, who answers to the name of Mephistophiles.

It is surprising that Mr. Osborne, having sought in "Dipsychus" for an answer to some of the perplexities that beset the study of Clough, should not have availed himself of the further, perhaps much fuller, self-revelation Clough has given us in "The Mystery of the Fall"; he does not, unless we are mistaken, even refer to this interesting fragment, which is pregnant with suggestion of Clough's later development. We are assuming that it was written after "Dipsychus." Waddington, in his monograph, is unable to date the poem; but internal evidence strongly suggests that it was written towards the end of Clough's life. In any case, it represents an approach to the problems of existence in a bolder spirit, a spirit less preoccupied with its immutability. Adam's curiously iterated admonition to Cain: "Be not over scrupulous, my son," is a comprehensive criticism of the pangs of Dipsychus: the treatment of the murder episode gives one a sense of three-dimensional solidity and freedom, compared with the plane, the mere surface-tension, on which Dipsychus skates so dreamily. The sex-problem, balefully implicit in the other poem, is attacked more directly here; and though still treated chiefly with the narrowest personal preoccupation, it has a braver and more human aspect.

Clough troubles us with his contradictions. He cast off deliberately and courageously so many trammels without winning freedom of spirit; he is so large and bold in intention, somehow so cramped in effect; he went so far, and failed so egregiously to get anywhere. The fact that the "Bottles" believes the above assertions only makes him a little more contradictory. And it is reasonable to ask, on being confronted with a new study of him, whether it brings us nearer to a solution of the problem he presents. Mr. Osborne has the problem in mind, and analyses his works and life with discrimination and acuteness with a view to answering it. The investigation has not, perhaps, been as thorough as it is clear-headed. He concludes that Clough had many elements of success: "a strong and steady will, the best of training and friends, and a wealth of good sense"; but that the training was not suited to Clough's particular temperament (at Rugby, Clough was exposed to the utmost intensity of Arnold's principles of influence): that he had, moreover, "a nervous system that had not simply not enough organized, not delicate enough, to delight and gloriously to succeed in creative effort"; that "a disproportionate share of the good sense rested on merely vicious experience"; and that "the determination was too contempt to remain determination, instead of removing the need for itself." While agreeing in the main with the first two counts, we may point out that the last states, but does not explain the real difficulty: why did his determination fail just where determination becomes effective, at the brink of action? That it was "content" to do so is presumably but a figure of speech, for there is little contentment in "Dipsychus." The inadequacy of his nervous organization for creative work accounts for his failures as a poet, but leaves the personal problem, which looms so hugely in his writings, unsolved. Perhaps it must remain so, unless some rare blend of the literary critic and the psychologist (preferably Freudian) should be attracted to the task of unravelling this tangled web of repressed complexes.

F. W. S.

Steps are being taken to provide reproductions in collotype, postcard size, of objects in the Victoria and Albert Museum. Fifty subjects are at present available, selected from the collections of Italian sculpture, ceramics, metalwork, textiles and woodwork. It is proposed to increase the number of subjects early in the spring, and to make additions to the series from time to time. The postcards are Id. each, and may be obtained at the Museum or through the post.

RESTFULNESS

Serenity: Essays and Reflections. By the author of "Peace of Mind." (Melrose. 4s. 6d. net.)

To that large class of people which is tormented by the desire to write, just to write, the rambling essay must provide the most convenient outlet. The desire to write, when it exists in the pure form, is unmixed with any desire to say anything that is pertinent to some other interest. The activity is a self-satisfying activity; the subject-matter is indifferent, since anything, it is found in practice, will start the pen on its course of tracing sentences on the page. One is reminded, in reading such essays, of the "associations" examined by the psycho-analysts. "Bottle—Gin—Alcoholism—Lower Classes—Labour Unrest," and behold, a quaint and amusing essay on "Bottles and Sociology." The great pre-requisite is to do as one is told to do in the thought-reading games at Christmas parties: "make your mind a complete blank." Then any object which swins within the field of a mind so prepared, a bluebottle, the leg of a chair, Jones' moustache, will start a train of associations which can be made into an essay. Such writers rely on what they call the charm of their personality to lure the reader through these meaningless mazes. Unfortunately it is only at these moments when one's own mind is a "complete blank" that one can succumb to the charm. There is another type of essay whose genesis is essentially the same, but where the point of departure is not chosen at random. The objects of discussion are chosen from the common store: Friendship, the Decline in Literary Taste, etc., subjects which, like lamp-posts, belong to the community as a whole. The reflections awakened by the object may also be common to the whole community; they may consist, in fact, of commonplace ideas. Such essays convey a feeling of restfulness. Their physical equivalent is a hammock on a warm summer afternoon; the function of both is the same—to make the passage from wakefulness to sleep pleasant and imperceptible.

The present collection of essays has all this drowsy charm. The hammock swings gently, one notices no cracking of the ropes, and presently, idyllically content, one lets the volume slip from one's nerveless fingers. Something of this soothing effect can be experienced from a short extract:

It is sometimes forgotten that the highest kind of criticism is constructive, creative. Like the mechanical, theoretical critic, the creative critic has his likes and dislikes; but whereas the former responds as a stage of a picture of the book, it goes without saying to certain critics that he has been taught and has accepted, the creative critic can, does, make the work he approves or condemns an opportunity for a statement of basic principles which the highest art has taught him. And so creative criticism, in its highest examples, is illuminating and educative, and has claims to be considered literature, whether it be the criticism of pictures or of books. Any other criticism is of value only in the elementary stages of art.

It can be seen that, as we read on, this pleasant murmur will become fainter and fainter, until at last we reach the condition which is perhaps the nearest approach to serenity this troubled age allows.

Lord Rosebery has presented to the British Museum two unique books of drawings. The one is a velum book of 30 leaves, of which 28 are covered on both sides with drawings in pen and ink made c. 1490 by an artist probably influenced by Mantegna, to whom the book was attributed by Francesco Novelli, who engraved the drawings in 1795. The technique suggests an engraver standing in a relation to Mantegna similar to that of Mocatto or Nicoletto da Modena. The other is a little oblong sketchbook by Nicolas Berghem filled with studies of animals in red and black chalk, with a few pages of landscape. Both books were discussed at some length in a scholarly article in the Times of February 17.
WHERE THERE IS NOTHING

THE STRONGEST. By Georges Clemenceau. (Eveloeigh Nash, 7s. net.)

TRUE happiness consists in giving rather than in receiving. Riches are useless without love, and those who acquire them suddenly often spend them ostentatiously. Jews are very rich and very cynical, and cannot be trusted owing to their Oriental origin. The poor, ground down by captains of industry, must not expect help from the Church, which has greatly deteriorated since the days of her Founder. Much the same is true about Art. Art should be simple, even in a woman's dress. Imagine if the masterpieces in the Louvre were overloaded with ornaments! Old age approaches despite powder and rouge. Then what is our duty? Not to be faint-hearted. Every cloud has a silver lining, and life will lead us back through suffering to love. The battle is indeed to the strongest, but "strength" does not necessarily mean "material strength," indeed, rather the contrary.

Not Martin Tupper, not Mrs. Markham, not even the late Lord Avebury, is taking the field. We are in unmedian valley. The sentence is at twenty, the shafts of the afternoon sun fall upon a little tea-table, but in the tremendous council chamber of one who has known the world, and shaken it to its foundations, and who is certain of his place in history. Unborn generations will remember the name of Georges Clemenceau, nor can his contemporaries pronounce it without awe. His immortality is assured, whether in paradise or in the infernal ice, and he won it by his own efforts, not by the complacency of circumstance. At the Last Judgment vast and solid is the material that such a man will provide. The triumph of France and the misery of Europe will be piled—into which scale we know not, but with the sound of thunder the opposing scale will kick the Heavenly Hosts stand attentive. But at the last moment one of the subordinate angels—she who looks after art—will come up with "The Strongest" and one or two other novels in her lap, and Michael will raise them to his starry forehead, rapidly to absorb their contents. He will apprehend the foregoing maxims and the following plot:

Henri au Grand Sérieux (the name is not printed thus, but Michael naturally knows characters by their real names)—Henri au Grand Sérieux, after a turbulent and aristocratic youth, falls in love with the wife of Monsieur Parvenu, his friend. That love is returned and a girl born, whom Parvenu, immersed in his commercial schemes, is deceived by the Doctor into accepting as his own, although at first he exclaimed "Impossible!" Madame Parvenu dies, and imagine the pathos of Grand Sérieux's position now! A father and a Frenchman, he has to watch his own daughter growing up in surroundings that he cannot approve, for it is terrible, the condition of the workpeople in Parvenu's paper factory, and his taste is bad and his ideals coarse, and worst of all, he destines his supposed child for a brilliant marriage which shall consolidate his position in society. Things come to a crisis with the arrival of the fascinating but corrupt Comtesse des Intrigues, whom Grand Sérieux has known in his unregenerate days and whom Parvenu hopes to wed. She interests herself in finding a mate for the Doctor and for the rich merchant, and is transferred to Paris and conducted with the heartlessness so characteristic of that capital. The countess is surrounded by her allies—Baron Cynico, the international financier, Quai d'Orsay, the gilded diplomat; Madame de Mimonde, the Abbé Tartuffe, and a host of others; and she leads the rout until the inexperienced girl is intoxicated. In vain does Grand Sérieux put forth his own candidate, an honourable Frenchman who has travelled in India, but seldom speaks. He is outmanoeuvred, and his daughter decides at the same moment that she will marry the diplomat and that strikes must be put down by force. She reaches these decisions against her better judgment, which she stills by injecting morphia, so that at the final scene she is a trifle dazed. That scene, like the rest of the book, does not repay quotation, but "I, not you, am her father" is its theme, and its concluding sentence is "Now I will live for forgiveness." The Archangel Michael, and tosses the volume into the appropriate scale. But while it lasts, we who have not the sense of eternal values, may with propriety ask ourselves another question. Was the volume written sincerely? Say "no," and nothing else need be said; the Tiger in 1898 was off his feed, so he turned out a novel. But say "yes," and some interesting considerations ensue. The great and successful statesman whose iron will has modified history is giving us his impressions of the world where he was so active. The book now becomes as precious as the Confessions of Aurelius or the poems of Frederick the Great. France, Clemenceau's lodestar, for whom he would have died, for whom he has urged millions to die; France, for whose sake he has outwitted humanitarians and capitalists, and ruined Europe—France is about to re-emerge from his ashes; the ends of the world are in question. One reads with an awe which seems to have sustained most critics to the end. But at last a new emotion asserts itself: boredom; France and its contents appear to be dead. Pinch the book where you will, and it does not move. Not only are the characters "dead" in the technical sense, being mere bundles of qualities, but the scenery, the social face of Paris, is also defunct, which is most surprising, considering the writer's career. He, to whom all sections of society must have been open, reads as if he had never been anywhere or seen anything. Compare his account of a costly evening party with Miss Daisy Ashford's, or, if this test be too severe, with anything out of Alphonse Daudet or Thackeray. His writing transmits neither vague rhetoric and clumsy satire are all that he achieves, until one cannot believe that Georges Clemenceau was ever invited to any evening party, costly or cheap. The chapters about the factory and the modiste's are equally extinct, and the pall is provided by the cloud of sentimental morality of which specimens have already been given, and which envelops the whole affair. Is it thus that he conceives our civilization?

The obvious reply is "No. He conceives it otherwise, as his actions prove. Do not make so much fuss. He happens not to be a good novelist, and there the mystery ends." But does it end? May not Clemenceau have correctly transcended his limitations, and his books and his life be one? Human nature is so eerie that the possibility must be contemplated. The Paris he sought for may be the Paris he depicts. The Justice he talks about may, like the Justice he writes about, be nothing but the moral perspiration that is incidental to an elderly man. His acts, like his art, may be built round a void, and if we could enter his mind, we might find in it only the feeblest image of the world that we love. Little is known about the psychology of "greatness," for, naturally impressed by the men who rule our fortunes, we adopt in all ranks a modest attitude towards them. We assume that a statesman who feels strongly about France feels a France that is fine, and that his sensations are more vivid than our own, although he may not be able to express them artistically. Yet hints to the contrary occur, and "The Strongest" confirms them. Its mediocrity is so complete as to suggest that Clemenceau sees our lovely and tragic earth as a half-lit picture where youths kill one another and emperors fall and boundaries are readjusted in terms of universal insipidity. All is relative, and of course his Germany is less valuable than his France. But is his France as valuable as one's own Germany? And at the last Judgment a strange miracle may occur.
"The Strongest," though thrown by an angelic hand, may fail to reach either pan of the scales for which it is destined. It will be too light, lighter than air; it will float in the final sand and be blown into the dunes of the sea. The deeds of the novelist, the blood and the tears that he caused, the victories that he won for his country—they will remain, and by them he will be judged and assigned to his appropriate eternity. But when the search is extended to the central sanctum where he says to himself, "I did this," and also "I am I," nothing may be found in it except a pinch of dust.

E. M. F.

FEEBLE-MINDED AND OTHERS

Psychology of the Normal and the Abnormal. By Henry Herbert Goddard, Ph.D. (Kegan Paul. 25s. net.)

Dr. Goddard's book mingles two different elements. On the one hand, it is a very excellent text-book for those who wish to know the most prevalent modern view with regard to thought, feeling and their physiological conditions; on the other hand, the book embodies Dr. Goddard's extensive experience of the feeble-minded, and uses this experience to throw light upon the mental processes of those who have not yet been convicted of feeble-mindedness. The writer is modern in all things. For example, he has two chapters on "Thot"—not, as we at first supposed, an Egyptian deity, but the American phonetic spelling of "thought," the spelling being presumably adopted to economize "thot."

The author places himself frankly at the standpoint of observation rather than introspection as the method of obtaining psychological data. He points out that so long as introspection is the method employed, it is necessary to begin the study of mind with an exceedingly complex and advanced instance, namely, the mind of the psychologist, whom by the method of external observation it is possible to adopt the procedure of every other science, and begin by studying the simplest cases. From this point of view, of course, the study of animal psychology should precede that of human beings, and the careful investigations which have been made of the amoeba's behaviour should be put at the basis of the science. In the study of specially human psychology, idiots and the feeble-minded have many advantages (as subjects) over people of normal intelligence, because their mental processes are simpler.

There is one respect in which Dr. Goddard does not go so far as some others of the school to which he belongs. He continues, that is to say, to speak of "consciousness." We find statements such as the following: "Just how consciousness results from nervous action—whether that action be in the cortex or elsewhere—is not known." So long as consciousness is not analysed to the point of being analysed away, there will remain an appearance of mystery in the supposed transition from neural to mental processes. The extrusion of "consciousness" as one of the fundamentals of psychology was begun by William James, and has been carried further by his successors, with great profit for the unification of science. But Dr. Goddard has, we feel, a certain desire to avoid whatever is still very startling and polemical, especially in the region of pure theory. To have adopted a revolutionary view of consciousness would no doubt have distracted his readers' attention from less doubtful matters which he is more anxious to emphasize.

Dr. Goddard is exceedingly interesting on the subject of the emotions, in regard to which he, in the main, follows Angelo Mosso, while taking full account of the epoch-making researches of Cannon. The nervous system is twofold, being divided into what is called the central nervous system and the sympathetic nervous system. Mosso's view, as quoted by Dr. Goddard, is that "the seat of the emotions lies in the sympathetic nervous system." Cannon and others have shown that the emotions are likewise intimately connected with the ductless glands, secretions from which appear to be the causes of rage and fear, and probably of many other emotions. Large extracts are quoted from Cannon's observations on the adrenal gland, and on the effects of its secretion, which is called adrenalin. The James-Lange theory of the emotions was a step towards such observations and theories. It is interesting to find that the part of it which was at the time most objected to, namely, the physiological causation of emotion, is the very part which has proved most solid. It is also interesting to find that, as regards physiological causation, it may be possible to make a real distinction between the emotional and cognitive parts of our mental life, since the former is connected, if Mosso is to be believed, with the sympathetic nervous system, while the latter finds its physiological antecedents in the central nervous system.

The other aspect of Dr. Goddard's book is his use of material derived from the feeble-minded. He regards feeble-mindedness as merely arrested development, and classifies the feeble-minded according to their "mental age." That is to say, he regards the mentality of a feeble-minded adult as essentially the same as that of a child, younger or older, according to the degree of feeble-mindedness. Above those who are technically classified as feeble-minded there is a very large class of persons called "morons," of less than the normal mentality, but yet able to cope with life in fairly easy circumstances. Various tests are given by which the degree of feeble-mindedness can be measured, and brought into relation with the development of normal mentality. It is shown that our mental capacity (as opposed to attainments) ought to increase up to about the age of twenty. But as we read a horrible suspicion grows upon us, just as it does when reading Swift's "Voyage among the Houyhnhmns." Just as there we began by regarding the Yahoos as quite distinct from ordinary human beings, and gradually find this belief being undermined, so Dr. Goddard allows us to suppose at first that the feeble-minded are a comparatively small section of the human race, while as we read we find that they grow gradually more and more numerous, until at last hardly anybody is excluded, except the directors of institutions and captains of industry. The present reviewer must confess to having many of the characteristics distinctive of the feeble-minded, such, for example, as forgetting the day of the month, and being incompetent in the manipulation of mechanical models. We gather (though this, of course, is not said explicitly) that a wage-earner must be feeble-minded, since otherwise he would have had enough skill to become a capitalist. It follows, of course, that the wage-earners ought to be willing to accept the guidance of the capitalists in all those higher questions of politics which they cannot hope to understand. We see in this suggestion a most hopeful line of inquiry, which no doubt our millionaires will perceive the wisdom of endowing.

Apart, however, from this very natural enthusiasm of the specialist, Dr. Goddard's book is to be highly recommended. Psychology in its highest reaches has hitherto been a matter of very few books, and Dr. Goddard's book is, we think, one of the very best and most readable. If we do not agree with his views, we feel the book has done us a great service in bringing this branch of science within the reach of a larger circle. We see in this the first step towards the unification of science in a large sense.

There is likely to be another increase in the price of new novels shortly, says the Booksman's Journal. The general price of new novels to-day is 7s., and this, it is stated, is insufficient, owing to the high cost of production. The new price may be 8s. or 9s. for the novel of average length.
Through a Glass Darkly

REALITIES OF WAR. By Philip Gibbs. (Heinemann. 15s. net.)

The war writing of Mr. Gibbs presents an interesting problem. He appears to be a reasonably sensitive observer, he has had exceptional opportunities for observing, and he writes with considerable fluency. Why, then, does his writing affect us so little? Why is it that when his narrative paddles in blood and viscera we feel so little horror, and that when he describes the heroic gaiety of the fighting man we listen, puzzled and without understanding? We are unmoved, as at the performance of a bad actor; the analogy is not a good one, however, for we feel no discrepancy between Mr. Gibbs’ intention and his achievement. His writing, which, while not particularly rich in clichés, does usually follow the line of least resistance, is nevertheless adequate, we feel, to what he has to say. It is in this direction that we find the solution of our problem. Mr. Gibbs’ style has no definite and unique outline; it is, as it were, a composite style, his voice has the indistinctness of the voice of a crowd. The style is adequate to his purpose because his sentiments have something of the same quality. They furnish, as it were, the Greatest Common Measure of the more intelligent opinion and the more decent feeling about the war. It is for this reason that Mr. Gibbs does not move us. He is at the temperature of the surrounding atmosphere; we have no shock either of heat or cold. It is doubtless for the same reason that he was so successful a war correspondent; his pictures were always within the focus of the average intelligence and imagination. But all this is now amongst our “et cetera.” We accept it as we accept the statement that Great Britain is an island. In each of Mr. Gibbs’ war books he seems to perform a fresh circumnavigation, and comes back with the information that—Great Britain is an island. We do not deny that Mr. Gibbs has been prominent amongst those who have given us our elementary education in these matters; we are prepared now, however, for a larger measure of the truth. Mr. Gibbs makes it clear that he intends to hide nothing of the truth in his present book. But as we read on we find nothing that is not perfectly familiar to us; on many points, indeed, we feel that Mr. Gibbs’ perception of reality, as revealed by the war, lags behind our own. How else are we to account for a passage such as the following?

My own belief is that the war was no proof against the Christian faith, but rather is a revelation that we are as desperately in need of the spirit of Christ as at any time in the history of mankind. But I think the clergy of all nations, apart from a heroic and saintly few, were discredited their faith, which is a gospel of charity, to national limitations . . . . The Archbishop of Canterbury, the Archbishop of Cologne, and the clergy who spoke from many pulpits, in many nations, under the Cross of Christ, still stoked up the fires of hatred, and urged the armies on fighting “in the cause of justice,” “for the defence of the Fatherland,” “for Christian righteousness,” to the bitter end. Those words are painful to write, but, as I am writing this book for truth’s sake, at all cost, I let them stand . . . .

“At all cost.” Surely this note of tragic resolution is a little unnecessary. That the clergy were as undistinguishingly “patriotic” as the purely worldly leaders of the people is surely a commonplace. Mr. Gibbs’ dismay points to an unattractive innocence that does not inspire confidence in his grasp of the “realities of the war.” We have supped full of worse horrors than this.

We suppose it is due to the same innocence that certain feelings are described in a way which seems to us—well, unnecessary.

The Commander-in-Chief read out a speech to us, thanking us for our services, which, he said, had helped him to victory, because we had heartened the troops and the people by our work. It was a recognition by the leader of our armies that, as chroniclers of war, we had been a spiritual force behind his arms. It was a reward for many mournful days, for much agony of spirit, for hours of danger—some of us had walked often in the ways of death—and for exhausting labours, which we did so that the world might know what British soldiers had been doing.

Mr. Gibbs is curiously averse to letting things be taken for granted, even when they are well within any reader’s imagination:

Curses and prayers surged up in my heart. How long was this to go on—this massacre of youth, this agony of men?

As an onlooker, I was overwhelmed by the full measure of all this tragic drama. The vastness of the horror appalled me. I went to my billet in an old monastery, and sat there in the darkness, my window glimmering with the faint glow of distant shell-flashes, and said, “O God, give us victory to-morrow, if that may help us to the end. O Christ, have pity on our boys!” Then to bed, without undressing.

I hated it all, with a cold hatred; and I went on hating it for years that seem a lifetime. I was not alone in that hatred, and other men had greater cause, though it was for their sake that I suffered most, as an observer of their drama of death . . . . As observers, we saw most of the grisly game.

Mr. Gibbs leaves us in no doubt as to his personal sensitiveness. Doubtless there were some who did not appreciate the tragedy of the war; it is evident that Mr. Gibbs was not one of these. And yet, as we have said, his narrative moves us but little. His descriptions of the initiation of the new armies, of the terrible winter of 1915, of the battles of the Somme, of the last great German assault, are all, in a curious way, vague. Specific incidents are described briskly enough; it is the accompanying reflections, the emotional nexus, which blurs the effect. Whether he is writing about a battle, a hospital, or a conversation in the trenches, we have the same odd expression of unreality, of inadequacy, of indistinctness. We cannot see the trees for the wood. Mr. Gibbs deals in massed effects, and uses a vocabulary of general terms, with the result that we are merely confused. He is like a poet who uses the poetic vocabulary and deals in “poetic” emotions. “Horror,” for instance, cannot be communicated, but only a particular emotion which may be horrible. Thus, in describing the despair which attacked some individuals during the battles of the Somme, Mr. Gibbs says this despair was “deep as the wells of human tragedy in many hearts,” a phrase which conveys nothing whatever.

But it is for his descriptions of actual “events” that Mr. Gibbs’ book will be read. There are plenty of these, both grave and gay, for, as he says, he wishes to illustrate all sides of the war. As a guide to the inner “events” of the war, those that happened in the minds and hearts of men, their hopes and their sufferings, we find Mr. Gibbs less satisfactory. But it is in these inner events that we find the realities of the war.

J. W. N. S.

ANYTE

“Why in the leafy Greenwood lone
Sit you, rustic Pan, and drone
On a dulcet resonant reed?”

“So that yonder cows may feed
Up the dewy mountain passes,
Gathering the feathered grasses.”

Flansdean Anthology, 231 (Didot).

ISIDORUS /ÆGEATES

This mound’s a grave; pull up your pair
Of oxen, you, and lift your shafts:—
The earth you turn is ashes; here
Scatter no seed, but shed a tear.

Palatine Anthology, vii. 289.

MNASALCAS

Where the low land is wet with salt sea sprays
We’ll stand, to gaze
Upon the close of Cyprus of the Sea,
The poplar-tree
Shading the fount, and russet halcyons dipping
Their bills, and sipping.

Palatine Anthology, ix. 333.

R. A. Furness.
DIVERSIONS OF A FOLK-LORIST

SIR ROGER DE COVERLEY; AND OTHER LITERARY PIECES. By Sir James George Frazer. (Macmillan. 8s. 6d. net.)

ONE of Browning's best-known passages celebrates the attraction of pieces of work done out of the usual vocation of the worker; and this would of itself recommend any volume of purely literary essays by the author of "The Golden Bough." Not, indeed, that Sir James Frazer has managed to keep anthropology and comparative religion out altogether. The "Biographical Sketches" which occupy just half the volume show the dyer's hand most. If the motto Tantum religio potuit suadere malorum " is not actually inscribed on the longest—that on Cowper—one reads it at least constantly between the lines. That on Robertson Smith is positively disappointing, for Sir James's personal reminiscences of that most interesting and many-sided scholar would have been much more welcome than fresh incantations of the undoubted fact that "sacramental conceptions are not confined to Christianity." The third paper, devoted to the Australian anthropologists Fison and Howitt, is lighter and more varied.

But there is nothing, even in this part of the book, that detracts from its general pleasantness; and the whole of the rest of its contents deserves to be called very pleasant indeed. To some of us the Latin dedication to Mr. Wiseman, "still more the Latin postscript Ad Libellum Suum," have and will have by no means the least pleasing effect. One may clear one's mind of all mere prejudice to the uttermost; but the fact remains that, for what may be widely called epigraphy, there is nothing like Latin. However, only three or four pages thus insult the pure modernist; and he may browse, unhindered by learned languages, on all the rest. The first sixty pages, generally headed "Sir Roger de Coverley," may perhaps require, to some very "pernickity" readers, a slight preparation. Neither in the initial "Visit to Coverley Hall"—a supposed reconstitution of Sir Roger's home as it appears to-day—nor in the following pseudo-quaint or literary papers, does the writer make the least attempt to write in the manner of his model. It is Washington Irving, and good Washington Irving. And if the others have any, it is certainly not the famous paper with which Henry Esmond half deceived Beatrix. They are all very good reading, especially Sir Roger's visit to Bentley (though hypercritics may object that that formidable Master, though he used to act in tyrant's vein, spoke and wrote rather in a bantering vernacular) and his rescue of a woman from the Mohocks. "Much might be said on both sides" as to Sir James's version of the Perseus story, under the title of "The Quest of the Gorgon's Head." So distinguished a folklorist ought to know the good points of a good story; and there are few better stories than this. Perhaps he should take the judgment of some reader who does not know either Ovid or William Morris; for here Perseus has no wings and no Andromeda, and the fates of Atlas, Phineus and Polydectes jointly furnish forth the death of the last-named only. But "unobtrusive, unmissed."

The "Miscellaneous" at the end of the volume include, among other things, some verse: a translation of Mérimée's little masterpiece "The Taking of the Redoubt"; and a noteworthy "Contrast of Italy and Modern Greece," in which the lamentable breach of continuity in the Greek case, caused by the absence of any worthy memorials of medieval and earlier modern existence, is strikingly brought out, though perhaps Sir James's condemnation of the Byzantines might have been a little relieved by mentioning what they did for the novel.

Last of all comes a group of the shortest, but not the least interesting papers of all. "My Old Study" is a record—happier in prose than Tennyson's much laughed-at and soon cancelled rapture in verse—of that curious affection for a "room" in which one has thought and felt and dreamed. "A Dream of Cambridge" announces itself, and justifies the announcement; while "Life's Fitful Fever" and "Beyond the Shadows" are two little passages of what one may perhaps, without offence, call agnostic bibliolatry, which are at least not too far below Newman's famous avowal of homesickness on the same subject.

It is a great thing to say that the attraction of the book is enough to make us forgive one appalling statement—that "the memory of John Donne, Dean of St. Paul's, even if its frigid conceits and harsh numbers of his verses were forgotten, would live in the book and the book in us." For I think that this year we can not be angry—only sad. That pure fire should seem cold, and pure nectar harsh, to a deserving human fellow-creature is very sad; but, after all, it is no such uncommon experience.

GEORGE SAINTSBURY.

JAPANESE NAMES

JAPANESE NAMES AND HOW TO READ THEM: A MANUAL FOR ART COLLECTORS AND STUDENTS. By Albert J. Koop and Higotaro Inada. Part I. (Eastern Press. 6s. complete.)

The Chinese say "a good critic does not look at seals and signatures till he has examined every other part of the picture; a great critic will have no need to look at seals and signatures at all." But the Western study of Far Eastern art has not yet reached a stage where it can dispense with subsidiary clues. Signatures have at any rate a historical value. A painting that bears a third-rate nineteenth-century artist's name is not likely to be of earlier date. In the case of European works of art such questions only arise in connection with deliberate forgeries: critics do not in general discuss whether a picture belongs to the eight or fifteenth century. Very few disputations are there of the kind of "signanisseurs." Frequently paintings, Japanese or Chinese, which have been sold as originals, are found to be actually labelled and inscribed as late copies.

Against these and other impositions the collector (where instinct fails) must arm himself by a study of native writing; and for the deciphering of Japanese inscriptions no better aid than "Japanese Names" could possibly have been devised.

The dictionary of "characters used in names" (which forms the central feature of the book) is arranged on a novel plan, designed (we quote the author's Preface) to make reference to them a matter of the utmost ease and dispatch. Many other new and original features distinguish the work, among which may be mentioned the giving of the "Kanji" or Japanese "General Names," the handy lists of Japanese characters and dates, and the articles on the formation of Personal Names and Titles, particularly the "ninari" and "zoka miko." The beginner is specially catered for in a chapter on Typical Signatures and a list of the commoner characters with their chief readings in names, dates and the like.

In many ways it is more difficult to read Japanese than Chinese. In the case of each character it must be decided whether it is to be read with its native Japanese pronunciation or in the Sinico-Japanese way, i.e., as a Chinese loan-word; and if as a loan-word, which of the three Sinico-Japanese readings is to be preferred?

It will be seen that the meaning of a Japanese sentence may be understood by one who could neither read it correctly out loud nor properly transcribe the personal and place-names occurring in it. But Japanese poetry abounds in proper names, using them decoratively as the Greeks did; and it cannot be read with pleasure, or even scanned properly, unless the collector is prepared to know the value of this book to students of Japanese literature.

As for the collector—it may not be true that "collecting" is (as has been suggested) the last resource of feeble intelligences; but the authors have taken especial pains to convey their information in the easiest manner possible. Henceforward many who have regarded the deciphering of Japanese inscriptions as a kind of miracle will have less respect for the thumaturge.

A. D. W.
MYSTERY AND ADVENTURE

THE DEATH OF MAURICE. By Barry Pain. (Skeffington. 7s. 6d. net.)

THE ANCIENT ALLAN. By H. Rider Haggard. (Cassell. 8s. 6d. net.)

I

n the publishers' announcement which accompanies "The Death of Maurice" there is a suggestion that the reader may well be surprised to find that a humorist is capable of writing a really well-designed and cleverly worked-out mystery novel. But we should have thought that humorous writing depended almost entirely for its success upon the author's sense of design, and his ability to give adequate expansion of all with whom he cannot afford to leave anything en l'air, anything to the imagination, for it is not to the imagination that he makes his appeal, but to the reader's sense of fancy and delight in invention. With all due respect we might liken him in the world of letters to the music-hall artist in the theatrical world, whose performances appear to be spontaneous, accidental almost, whereas there is not an action, movement, glance which is unrelated to the expert whole. "The Death of Maurice" is a very good example of the high level of Mr. Barry Pain's technical accomplishment. From the opening chapter it might almost be said to "play itself," so easy and sure is the author's touch, and yet he has guarded against monotony by giving us a great deal more of real characterisation than is usual in light stories. Who killed Maurice Carteret is never a tragic question; it is not even a startling one. A moment or two after his death, his friend, while he waited for the man-servant to fetch the police, heard, beyond the garden, someone playing the flute—a fragment of "Solveig's Song." It was a still, clear night. Maurice lay dead on the garden path, and then there came the sound of the flute. Who killed Maurice Carteret? Who could it be playing the flute? It is not that these questions seem to fall hard on one another in the mind of the reader; but they seem to be of precisely equal importance and interest. They suggest that there is, in either case, a little problem to be solved, and, if you are sufficiently interested in human nature to care to study the widely different reactions of a certain circle of people to either of these questions... "come with me, dear reader," says Mr. Barry Pain.

Thus, very cleverly, the author keeps us in two minds. While we accompany him on his search he presents each character in so intriguing a way that we forget what we are after until, the moment our curiosity is fully roused, we are made aware that, after all, our real business is to find the murderer. Is the murderer ever really found? And who was it, finally, who played the flute? Some readers will find a perfectly satisfactory answer to both these questions, but others will be left wondering.

"The Ancient Allan," Sir Rider Haggard's new novel, is a far simpler variety of the pastime novel. It opens on a familiar note:

Now I, Allan Quatermain, come to the weirdest (with one or two exceptions perhaps) of all the experiences which it has amused me to employ my idle hours in recording here in a strange land, for after all England is strange to me.

This is the kind of thing to settle down to when the destination is Devonshire, if it is not Cornwall; but, alas! it needs—it dreadfully needs—the flying interruptions outside the carriage window—the mysterious interruptions of people's sandwiches—the indignant emotion aroused by the tea-basket, and the blissful sight of the train making a great tcplop round the blue edge of the sea—to enable us to swallow such a very dusty dose of ancient Egypt.

There is battle, murder and sudden death, wheels within chariot wheels, villains and heroes and black slaves, who in their land were kings; here is the mighty battle with the crocodile, the torture of the boat—all the ingredients that once upon a time, only to get a whiff of, knew us hungry. But nowadays, to read of how one was placed in an open boat and another boat put on top, so that only the head and hands remained outside—to be launched on a river and allowed to linger—awakes no response in us at all.

K. M.

A PARTY

UNCLE LIONEL. By S. P. B. Mais. (Grant Richards. 7s. 6d. net.)

H

as it ever happened to the reader to be ushered into a room where there are a large number of persons who know one another so well, so incredibly well, who are upon such charming, familiar terms that he would imagine they had been at one golden time all babies together in a common nursery, leaping about in the firelight while good Nanny prepared their baths? It is not the most comfortable experience for the stranger. Man may be an adaptable creature, but to slough off a skin, acquire a protective colouring, equip himself with a hood and sling or velvet paws, is not an affair of five minutes. The only possible adjustment in the circumstances is to adopt an air of keen animation and plunge—listening, taking in all, turning it all inside out. The reader to whom this has happened will remember, perhaps, how he smiled until he felt himself in yellow stockings cross-gartered; how, finally, he was conscious of that air of animation withdrawing from him, beam by beam, until it set in his bosom like a declining sun.

"Uncle Lionel!" puts us in mind of this experience, but with the difference that this time we are buttonholed by the person who really does know more about everybody else than they could know about themselves, though he is for ever telling us in the same breath that this world is not his world any more than it is ours. This estrangement is valuable because it frees him from the necessity of explaining why. These are the facts of their affection to which you please—and if you must have a Kaiser to hang, there is always the modern spirit lurking over there in the corner and calling the tune.

So we find ourselves in the midst of Patricia and Michael and Joan and Renton and Phyllis and Wreford and Helene and Trefusis, and where they met each other or how long they have known each other we cannot make out. Suffice it that they are all talking at once and squabbling and going off with one another, and falling in and out of love for no earthly reason we can discover. There is no plan, and Michael and Patricia are only more prominent than the others because they are more extravagant. Who is Patricia?—A collection of ugly, shrewish, slangy remarks delivered at Michael, who adores her, and has the habit of disappearing—to be discovered by Uncle Lionel in surroundings that are of a decidedly Russian blend. But they have no more body or soul than the rest of their "set." Again we find ourselves wondering at the author's patience—nay, it is more than that—at the ease with which he can amuse himself, for that he is roundly, soundly amused from cover to cover is plain to see. For him there are still traces of dew upon the old story of innocent little Phyllis taken to Brighton by the villain, only to find out at the last possible moment that his bedroom key is the same as her bedroom key. It is sorry fun to watch Mr. Mais gathering thisショップ with old and new and putting it in his pages. But we should have been prepared by the remark of a minor heroine a little earlier:

"Helene," snotred Beatrice, "do preserve some sense of decency."

"But I shall. We've threshed it all out. We're going to have strings and strings of babies..."

It is a nice question which of these two emotional moments is the more faded.

But come, let us slip away. The party is still going on. The party is going on for ever; but so, thank God, are the sky and the moving sea.

K. M.
MARGINALIA

O

f all the peculiar phenomena observable in recent French literature the plays of M. François de Curel are probably the most peculiar. M. de Curel, who in private life is a millionaire and a mighty hunter of wild boars, first loomed on the dramatic horizon in the nineties of last century. Since then he has proceeded from triumph to triumph, until now he has his place on the repertory of the Comédie Française and his name is in the Academy. But his success is not merely one of academic esteem. M. de Curel is popular. In Paris, a week or two ago, no fewer than three of his pieces were being given simultaneously. “La Nouvelle Idole” was playing at the Comédie Française; “La Fille Sauvage” had been revived at one of the theatres on the Boulevards, and a new piece, “L’Amé en Folie,” was drawing unprecedented crowds to the Théâtre des Arts.

What is the secret of this drama which enraptures equally the professors and the great public? We ask in some bewilderment, and, like an oracle, a voice out of the past replies:

The first that broke silence was good old Ben, prepared before with Canary wine.

And he told them plainly he deserved the bays,

For his were called works, where others were but plays.

M. de Curel’s secret is revealed: “His were called works, where others were but plays.” One had only to listen to the remarks of the audience in the ent’actes of “L’Amé en Folie” to be made certain that this was the correct answer. “C’est bien, n’est-ce pas? Ça vous fait penser,” M. de Curel makes you think; that is why he is in the Academy.

M. de Curel has been wittily described as an “aristocrat autodacte”; and on reading or seeing one of his plays one does distinctly get the impression of a man who has suddenly found out that there exists a world of ideas and is intoxicated by his discovery. Like those Sunday speakers in Hyde Park who tell one such wonderful things about Hebrew and Herbert Spencer, M. de Curel is chiefly preoccupied by the conflict between science and religion. In endless dialogues, in set speeches of prodigious length and couched in Swellingly noble language, he thrashes out the Problems of the Universe, “Ca vous fait penser!”

The audience listens earnestly. At the most sublime moments people feel as though they were in church. The plays—no, we apologize, the works—of M. de Curel are the Parisian’s substitute for Sunday service. Everybody is satisﬁed: the actors feel themselves honoured and uplifted at having been made the mouthpieces of Thought; the public is equally proud and pleased at being taken seriously by a Thinker and at being able to understand every word he says.

Let us look at “L’Amé en Folie,” M. de Curel’s last work. The hero and principal mouthpiece of Thought is a rough and rugged country gentleman living in complete seclusion on the fringes of a vast forest. He divides his time between country sports and meditation. His wife is a good simple soul, incapable of following her husband’s mental flights, content with her housekeeping and her religion. Their sylvan quietude is disturbed by the arrival of an actress niece, the budding Bernhardt of the day, and a young dramatist of genius. The niece has fled from Paris in order to escape from the dramatist; the dramatist, who is in love, pursues. Now comes the hero’s opportunity; he begins to talk, at immense length, about love. Period after period of eloquence rolls forth. Love is fundamentally a physical passion. Horrifying discovery! Darwin tells us that we are related to the animals. The conduct of the niece and the dramatist may be precisely paralleled by the conduct of the hinds and stags of the autumnal forest. Nature drives them irresistibly together. The niece, it seems, has Platonie feelings towards a middle-aged man of genius; she doesn’t want to yield to the dramatist. But nature will be too strong, she won’t be able to help it. And sure enough the hero’s prophecy comes true; nature is too strong, she can’t help it, and in the end they go back to Paris together. Meanwhile the huge and formidable Venus of Lucretius has even assailed the hero’s wife. Without being in love with the young dramatist, she feels violently attracted towards him. But the hero had foreseen it all, and pursues his stag-on-the-mountain analogies unperturbed. However, the play could not be allowed to finish on this low Darwinian level. And so, in the last act, M. de Curel gives his plot a slight tilt upwards and the arguments suddenly shoot off into higher, mystical realms. The wife, whose âme we had left very much en folie, succumbs to heart failure. But she takes half-an-hour to die—time enough for a new and unexpected mouthpiece to take up the thread of the argument. A skeleton, illuminated by green light, appears before the dying woman’s eyes, and in a blood-curdling stage whisper imparts to her the revelation of a higher truth than ever her husband, with his deplorable stag-complex, has guessed at. We human beings are nearer to the angel than to the stag. For there are angels, there is a soul and a future life. The mad soul recovers its sobriety in time to take wing towards the better worlds of the skeleton’s revelation. And the curtain comes down upon tumultuous applause.

We do not remember ever having witnessed a more fantastic entertainment. For all its oddities, however, it was extremely enjoyable. For there was something so sincere about the whole thing, the mouthpieces methoded in such simple good faith, that we were completely conquered. M. de Curel obviously believes with passion in his Great Thoughts. His faith is infectious; that is why he “makes you think” and why his plays succeed.

As plays they are grotesque. There probably never was a successful dramatist so totally incapable of constructing a play. Most of his works exist in two version, an original and a revised, and his incapacity is proved by the fact that the revisions are quite as unstitched as the first drafts. M. de Curel has enough lack of cleverness to make it possible to believe him a great man.

M. Cocteau, on the other hand, has so much cleverness that we can be perfectly certain that he is not a great man. His new play, “Le Bouc sur le Toit,” which is to appear at the Théâtre Femina, promises to be the usual mixture of the amusing and the tiresome which we have learned to expect from him and from the members of his school. The principal rôles in “Le Bouc sur le Toit” are to be played by the three Italian clowns who act under the name of the Fratellini. At the Cirque Medrano, the original home of our exquisite Grock, the Fratellini are admirable. Will they, we wonder, retain their charm in the surroundings of extreme sophistication and of “snobisme” into which M. Cocteau is introducing them? M. Cocteau further intends to produce a version of “Romeo and Juliet,” entirely revised by himself, with, we suppose, the Fratellini playing the principal parts.

It is a nice point to decide whether this should be more amusing than tiresome or more tiresome than amusing.

AUTOLYCUS.

The remaining works of Walter Crane, who died about four years ago, will be exhibited at Messrs. Bromhead & Cutts’s art galleries in Cork Street, during April and May. The exhibition will include about 150 pictures in oils and tempera and a number of drawings; among them will be a highly finished picture in tempera of “The Sleeping Beauty,” and Crane’s last work, which shows St. George attacking the combined monsters typical of Germany and Austria.
OXFORD NOTES

On Tuesday next the final stage of the Statute for the reform of Responsions is taken. The opponents of the Statute have seen fit to summon the non-resident members of Convocation to a meeting of Emergency. Though they have issued a moderately worded manifesto to members of Convocation presenting their case. Perhaps the most noteworthy feature of these documents is the fact that, whereas of the 179 members who have lent the support of their name to the Statute almost all are actively engaged in teaching in the University, and are in touch with the students, at a time when Greek has ceased to form part of the normal curriculum even at the large public schools. If they do not have to prepare the best men go increasing numbers to a University which has adjusted its curriculum to that of the schools. Those who do not wish that contemporary to come to Oxford to support the Statute on Tuesday, at 2 o'clock.

It is possible that some may not think it important to record their votes, since the signatories of the opposition manifesto have pledged themselves to press for the introduction at the earliest possible date of a Statute which will give relief to passmen and honours students as well as to the academic teaching-staff, to retain Greek as a compulsory subject for the first part of the mathematics, and to make the students and pass-men at a time when Greek has ceased to form part of the normal curriculum even at the large public schools. If they do not have to prepare the best men go increasing numbers to a University which has adjusted its curriculum to that of the schools. Those who do not wish that contemporary to come to Oxford to support the Statute on Tuesday, at 2 o'clock.

It is possible that some may not think it important to record their votes, since the signatories of the opposition manifesto have pledged themselves to press for the introduction at the earliest possible date of a Statute which will give relief to passmen and honours students as well as to the academic teaching-staff, to retain Greek as a compulsory subject for the first part of the mathematics, and to make the students and pass-men at a time when Greek has ceased to form part of the normal curriculum even at the large public schools. If they do not have to prepare the best men go increasing numbers to a University which has adjusted its curriculum to that of the schools. Those who do not wish that contemporary to come to Oxford to support the Statute on Tuesday, at 2 o'clock.

It is possible that some may not think it important to record their votes, since the signatories of the opposition manifesto have pledged themselves to press for the introduction at the earliest possible date of a Statute which will give relief to passmen and honours students as well as to the academic teaching-staff, to retain Greek as a compulsory subject for the first part of the mathematics, and to make the students and pass-men at a time when Greek has ceased to form part of the normal curriculum even at the large public schools. If they do not have to prepare the best men go increasing numbers to a University which has adjusted its curriculum to that of the schools. Those who do not wish that contemporary to come to Oxford to support the Statute on Tuesday, at 2 o'clock.

It is possible that some may not think it important to record their votes, since the signatories of the opposition manifesto have pledged themselves to press for the introduction at the earliest possible date of a Statute which will give relief to passmen and honours students as well as to the academic teaching-staff, to retain Greek as a compulsory subject for the first part of the mathematics, and to make the students and pass-men at a time when Greek has ceased to form part of the normal curriculum even at the large public schools. If they do not have to prepare the best men go increasing numbers to a University which has adjusted its curriculum to that of the schools. Those who do not wish that contemporary to come to Oxford to support the Statute on Tuesday, at 2 o'clock.

It is possible that some may not think it important to record their votes, since the signatories of the opposition manifesto have pledged themselves to press for the introduction at the earliest possible date of a Statute which will give relief to passmen and honours students as well as to the academic teaching-staff, to retain Greek as a compulsory subject for the first part of the mathematics, and to make the students and pass-men at a time when Greek has ceased to form part of the normal curriculum even at the large public schools. If they do not have to prepare the best men go increasing numbers to a University which has adjusted its curriculum to that of the schools. Those who do not wish that contemporary to come to Oxford to support the Statute on Tuesday, at 2 o'clock.

It is possible that some may not think it important to record their votes, since the signatories of the opposition manifesto have pledged themselves to press for the introduction at the earliest possible date of a Statute which will give relief to passmen and honours students as well as to the academic teaching-staff, to retain Greek as a compulsory subject for the first part of the mathematics, and to make the students and pass-men at a time when Greek has ceased to form part of the normal curriculum even at the large public schools. If they do not have to prepare the best men go increasing numbers to a University which has adjusted its curriculum to that of the schools. Those who do not wish that contemporary to come to Oxford to support the Statute on Tuesday, at 2 o'clock.

It is possible that some may not think it important to record their votes, since the signatories of the opposition manifesto have pledged themselves to press for the introduction at the earliest possible date of a Statute which will give relief to passmen and honours students as well as to the academic teaching-staff, to retain Greek as a compulsory subject for the first part of the mathematics, and to make the students and pass-men at a time when Greek has ceased to form part of the normal curriculum even at the large public schools. If they do not have to prepare the best men go increasing numbers to a University which has adjusted its curriculum to that of the schools. Those who do not wish that contemporary to come to Oxford to support the Statute on Tuesday, at 2 o'clock.

It is possible that some may not think it important to record their votes, since the signatories of the opposition manifesto have pledged themselves to press for the introduction at the earliest possible date of a Statute which will give relief to passmen and honours students as well as to the academic teaching-staff, to retain Greek as a compulsory subject for the first part of the mathematics, and to make the students and pass-men at a time when Greek has ceased to form part of the normal curriculum even at the large public schools. If they do not have to prepare the best men go increasing numbers to a University which has adjusted its curriculum to that of the schools. Those who do not wish that contemporary to come to Oxford to support the Statute on Tuesday, at 2 o'clock.

It is possible that some may not think it important to record their votes, since the signatories of the opposition manifesto have pledged themselves to press for the introduction at the earliest possible date of a Statute which will give relief to passmen and honours students as well as to the academic teaching-staff, to retain Greek as a compulsory subject for the first part of the mathematics, and to make the students and pass-men at a time when Greek has ceased to form part of the normal curriculum even at the large public schools. If they do not have to prepare the best men go increasing numbers to a University which has adjusted its curriculum to that of the schools. Those who do not wish that contemporary to come to Oxford to support the Statute on Tuesday, at 2 o'clock.

It is possible that some may not think it important to record their votes, since the signatories of the opposition manifesto have pledged themselves to press for the introduction at the earliest possible date of a Statute which will give relief to passmen and honours students as well as to the academic teaching-staff, to retain Greek as a compulsory subject for the first part of the mathematics, and to make the students and pass-men at a time when Greek has ceased to form part of the normal curriculum even at the large public schools. If they do not have to prepare the best men go increasing numbers to a University which has adjusted its curriculum to that of the schools. Those who do not wish that contemporary to come to Oxford to support the Statute on Tuesday, at 2 o'clock.
Michael MacDonagh: Mr. Forrest Reid's new novel, "Pirates of the Spring," and "Eight Short Stories," by Mr. Lennox Robinson. The selection of a professor of Queen's University, Belfast, to write a history of the rise and growth of Sinn Fein, was an experiment worth making. I shall be surprised if 'The Evolution of Sinn Fein' does not attract some attention in England. The book is just what one would not expect from North-East Ulster, and what one could not expect from any shade of Nationalist south of the Boyne.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTES

The chief interest of Messrs. Sotheby's sale on the 4th and 5th of March is as much literary as bibliographical, being a number of rare and valuable books from various libraries. One of them is the copy of "The Life of Sir Daniel (Garrick's Myrrour of the Theatre)," which was originally purchased by Lord Bannatyne; and one of the most interesting is the 1767 copy of "The Travels of Robinson Crusoe," which has been in the library of Sir Charles Dickens. The sale also includes a number of rare and valuable books from various libraries.

THE early history of the plant groups which now cover the world with vegetation is the province of a science but little known to the general public, namely, Paleobotany, or Fossil Botany. To many the subject might seem drearily dry, the impressions of fern-like leaves broken and fractured on the shales and limestones appearing to be of less interest than the dried specimens in a herbarium. Nevertheless, the trained scientist has, from material often fragmentary, reconstructed the history of many of the most important plant groups of to-day in such a way as to throw a flood of light on their distribution and origin. Furthermore, the material on which he works is sometimes much less obscure and fragmentary than it at first appears. Owing to the subtleties of chemical deposition, the cell-walls even of the finer tissues of plants are often replaced by permeating mineral matter, silica or carbonates of various sorts. The plant is thus embalmed in stone, when thin slices of it reveal its microscopic structure and hence its affinities. Extinct forms thus come to light, and details of their cell structure can be studied almost as completely as those of living material handled to-day in a laboratory. And what is quite as interesting as the extinct forms, it is found that species the same as or closely allied to those now living are discovered in places remote from those which they to-day inhabit. For instance, the unique genus Cryptomeria, to-day only endemic in Japan, was in the Tertiary epoch an inhabitant of Europe, and the world-famed Ginkgo, now native only in the Far East, in the Mesozoic epoch lived all over Europe and has been found far north in Scotland in considerable abundance; while Araucaria, the typical Australian form, was one of the most prolific and widespread of the plant genera forming the Upper Mesozoic and Tertiary vegetations of these islands.

Problems of distribution in space, the wanderings of plants and animals, derive their best and most reliable data from the palaeontological records. It is important, therefore, for all who are interested in the wider problems of evolution, as well as for those who study in particular botany and geology, to have available a reliable text-book of the science of Paleobotany. Such a text-book is afforded by Professor Seward's "Fossil Plants," which, begun many years ago, has now reached its fourth and final volume.

The present volume deals with the Ginkgoales and the horsetails, Gnernosperms. In the book are the descriptions of all reputable species and genera, some few of them new, but in a text-book covering the whole science most of the data naturally are based on facts already presented in various memoirs in many languages. The advantage of having even a short précis of all this scattered information brought together is very great, and the fact that a volume of this size is required to deal even so briefly in each instance with what is known of the fossil Gninomospermas alone is an indication of the extent of the material for the expert student.

Sometimes the material is in the form of foliage impressions which are often very difficult to identify satisfactorily, owing to the tendency which isolated species of one family may have to mimic another and quite remote species. Some things, however, like the seed scales of the Araucaria, are unmistakable. The best remains of the fossils of these groups are portions which have been permeated by mineral and of which the cell tissues are destroyed. These three greater bulk are woods, and the detailed study of petrified wood is a highly technical branch of science, which is well handled in this volume.
THE ATHENÆUM

February 27, 1920

Some of the illustrations give a hint of the marvellous perfection of the petrifactions, but for the general public more might have been made of the illustrations. They suffice, however, for the expert, who, knowing the beauty of the material available, is content with illustrations of specific details.

For the help of those who would study the subject still further the volume contains a comprehensive list of the literature, with references to nearly all memoirs of any importance bearing on fossil Gymnosperms of every age.

The flora of the world to-day consists very largely of flowering plants, and in our modern landscape these bulk preponderantly. It may seem strange, therefore, that the early history of vegetation, which these four volumes completed by Professor Seward give us, is concluded without any reference to the flowering plants. The reason for this is that though the flowering plants, like man himself, are comparatively recent denizens of this world, their fossil records are very incomplete. Flowering plants only become conspicuous as fossils in the Middle Cretaceous, and are most numerous in the Upper Cretaceous and Tertiary, deposits in which it chances that well-preserved and favourable material is rare. The identifications of the fragmentary dicotyledonous leaves which are very numerous a'lord but problematical results. Professor Seward has therefore decided to complete his text-book, which is based on comparatively recent investigations, by this great field of exploration into the early history of the Angiosperms. One cannot wonder at it, although one greatly regrets that the world is still without a general account of the history of flowering plants, which would be most useful from several points of view.

SOCIETIES

ROYAL.—February 12.—Sir J. J. Thomson, President, in the chair.

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL.—February 16.—Mr. Falconer Madan, President, in the chair.

Dr. Henry Thomas read a paper on "The Output of Spanish Books in the Sixteenth Century." He pointed out that Spain was at the beginning of the period not yet a political whole and that five languages (including Latin) were catered for by the book-trade in the Iberian Peninsula. The strong regionalism which survives in Spain to this day has led, in the production of a number of local bibliographies, which form some kind of basis for estimates of output, while the ancient kingdoms of Castile and Aragon may be taken as convenient divisions. In Castile, Madrid, Alcalá de Henares and Seville head the list with over 750 books each; probably Seville should really rank above Madrid, where printing did not start until 1566. Salamanca (about 700 editions, with a large proportion of theology) comes next; then, at a great interval, Valladolid and Logroño. The number of books attributed to Granada was 360. Of the output of the chief centres the British Museum possesses from 25 to 30 per cent., a very good average. The grand total for Castile was estimated by the lecturer at upwards of 5,000 editions. In Aragon, Barcelona (350 books, 360 in Valencia, and Barcelona (650) are the outstanding centres, the grand total being about 2,500. Allowing for omissions and lost editions, the probable figure for all Spain is about 10,000. To these Portugal adds about 200, Sardinia and other islands about 250 Spanish editions, Italy another 200, Antwerp and the Netherlands about 300, France about 600, the number of books printed abroad being far greater in the case of Spanish than in that of any other language. The quality of Spanish printing remained high until about 1525. The paper was followed by an animated discussion.

GEOLOGICAL.—February 4.—Mr. G. W. Lamplugh, President, in the chair.

Mr. F. Alleyne Marr and the Rev. Benjamin Oriel were elected Fellows.

The following communication was read:—"Geological Sections through the Andes of Peru," by H. II. Swift and J. H. Mollendo to the Inambari River," by Mr. J. Archibald Douglas. The paper gave a description of a geological section across the Andes of Southern Peru, from the port of Mollendo to the Inambari river. From the Memoirs of the Society. Mr. J. W. Evans, Professor G. S. Boulger, Mr. W. Campbell Smith and Professor W. J. Solas took part in the discussion of the paper.

SOCIETY OF ANTIQUARIES.—February 12.—Col. Crotty Lyons, Vice-President, in the chair.

Mr. G. S. Crawford exhibited a collection of flint implements and Bronze Age and other antiquities. These included a peahole from high ground between the Emborone and Kennett valleys, a stone Celt which might be assigned to the Dolmen period, and some comments on the latter. The discussion of the bronze barrow. Among the Bronze Age antiquities were a bronze dagger, some celts, a razor, and the remains of a bowl, possibly used as a water-clock. Mr. Crawford also exhibited a bronze surgical instrument of Roman date and some finds of early Christian. February 19.—Sir Hercules Read, President, in the chair.

The Rev. F. H. Hodgson exhibited the silver chalice and paten belonging to Clifford Chambers Church, Gloucestershire, both of which were bore the London date-letter for 1491.

Mr. R. A. Smith described two bracelets of the Bronze Age from Cornwall, exhibited by Mr. G. Penrose on behalf of the Royal Institution of Cornwall. The bracelets, which would appear to belong to the first period of the Bronte Age, are ornamented with incised markings, done after casting. No exact parallel to them has so far been noticed.

Mr. Somers Clarke communicated a paper on the excavations at Sharps Lane, which were brought to light mainly in the early Moslem occupation of Cairo, including house-plans of a type different from that usual in the Moslem East. He also drew attention to the danger to which the remains at Fostat and the tombs of the Caliphs were liable, owing to town planning schemes.

ZOOLOGICAL.—February 10.—Prof. E. W. MacBride, Vice-President, in the chair.

Mr. R. I. Pocock read a report on the additions to the Society's menagerie during November and December, 1919.—Mr. A. J. Elwes recorded a letter received from the collections of the British Museum in Yellowstone Park.—Mr. D. Seth-Smith read a letter from Messrs. Tullis, Russell & Co., drawing attention to an interesting case of response of sparrow to colour.—Mr. R. I. Pocock exhibited and made remarks on two photographs of a Chinese serow (Capreolus argyrochetos).

Mr. E. G. Boulenger, Curator of Reptiles, exhibited living specimens of a remarkable new land-tortoise, Testudo levisjecta recently discovered by Dr. G. H. Evans, of the British Museum, of the Eocene period, of Dodoma, East Africa, and described by Dr. G. A. Boulenger. This tortoise differs from all previously described land-tortoises in the carapace being quite flat, in the so-called "shell" being perfectly soft, and in the complete absence of ribs, costal, and neural bony plates. Mr. Boulenger stated that quite young examples differed from the specimens exhibited, their carapace being dome-shaped and possessing ribs and all other bones present in previously described tortoises. In reference to its habits, it was stated that the animal, having been deprived of the protection of a bony "shell," had taken to living much after the manner of a lizard, inhabiting holes in the rocks, and that, according to a report brought by a local inhabitant, was caught in the ground whilst feeding. He mentioned that tortoises of this type are common at all levels, owing to its habit of distending itself, and thereby wedging itself firmly in the rock-cavity.

Mr. F. Martin exhibited some remarkable micrographs of Acari from the lungs of Macacus rhesus, illustrating the larval, nymph, and adult stage of the Acari. He stated that both young and adult Rhesus monkeys appeared to be infected, but so far as his observations had gone, the presence of the mites in the human host in no case had been the cause of death.—Mr. H. R. Burne exhibited some skeletons of feral mammals prepared by taphodous, and drew attention to the possible advantage of such a method over the laborious preparation by hand.—Dr. F. S. Sowerby exhibited and made remarks on a series of blackboard drawings and lantern-slides illustrating several unusual features in the peritoneum of a raccoon.

Mr. H. H. R. Hogg read a paper entitled "On Some Australian Opinions," and pointed out that the genera and species described belonged to the suborders Palpatores and Laniatores.—Dr. C. F. Sonntag communicated a paper on the "Larynx and Geosphenus of a Common Macaque, exhibiting several Unusual Features."
THE CASE FOR QUEEN VICTORIA

O

F all the bugbears of enthusiastic youth the worst is, perhaps, the bourgeois mind. Sleepy, smug, complacent, suffocating, it hems us in like the Boyg.

"Go roundabout," it says; "don't be in such a hurry; take your time: your father thought quite differently: what would your poor mother have said?" And to our violent minds the thing seems purely evil. It is constantly in the way. Although it moves, it is so slowly that we hardly perceive the motion, and our pricks and insults cannot stir its vastness. It is a very long time before we can recognize any good in it, or acknowledge that its restraint may possibly have saved us from some extravagances.

The bourgeois mind may be seen at this moment at its work of unconscious benevolence. At the Ideal Home Exhibition the battle is even now being waged between habit and tradition on the one side, and novelty and innovation on the other. The shouts of the combatants—metaphorically speaking—are so deafening that it is difficult, except from a distance, to see how the fight is going. One's first impression is of colour and pattern run mad. This turns out, on second thoughts, to be a little unjust. It is hardly fair to judge show-rooms by the standards of daily life. But, with all allowances made, a more unrestful and wearying effect than that of most of the furnishing shown can hardly be imagined. And the better things are ridiculed by their imitations. Eccentricities that have a charm and grace of their own are belayed by their caricatures; every fault is italized and underlined till the original beauty is lost. The makers of furniture are the worst sinners. And it is appalling to find that that dreadful creation of the late nineties, L'Art Nouveau, did not, as one had confidently believed, die barren like a mule, but has left a multitude of descendants, differing certainly from their parent, but recognizable of th family. Some of the furniture, indeed, might have been made from prize designs in the great days of the Studio competitions, although disguised in the blues, oranges and blacks of to-day. Lampshades, too, seem to be difficult to be either original or satisfactory.

But it is not these which attract the crowds. Good or bad, they are mostly left with a glance, and one can almost pick out by face or dress from among the others the one or two who will stop and show some interest in them. The exhibits which draw are the practical ones, and the suites of rooms, furnished in styles familiar, but with just that stimulating hint of novelty.

Here we may profitably consider for a moment what happens in the bourgeois mind. Slow it is, and stupid it is, but it has the power of resistance and of selection. One would say off-hand that as it ignored the Art Nouveau movement, so it had ignored other and healthier influences which have been turned upon it; as it is, to all appearance, engaging the attacks of the Futurists to-day. Yet it is impossible to deny that the general standard of taste in the homes of the middle classes has risen enormously within one's own memory, while the extravagances have had their little day and left no mark. Vigorous resistance kills all but the really vital things about a new movement, retaining only those elements which are suited to their soil—the tastes and instincts of the race. And who is there to resist and select? The artistic mind is a weathercock, sensitive to every change of wind; the literary mind lives in an unreal world of its own. There remains for our protection the blind, intuitive mind of the herd, obeying the law of slow growth and development along lines suited to it.
We may see an instance of the same thing in the galleries upstairs, mainly devoted to the household and to "labour-saving devices." Here we find the British Matron in mass-formation—interested, bored, envious, dimly desirous; sometimes gazing, sometimes gazing elsewhere, with one eye on the Real. Vacuum Cleaners, for instance, which thrill one by the ease with which they pick up "vegetable down, very adherent, madam," from the carpet; how discouraging that the demonstration should end with "Sixteen pounds ten!"

But the really instructive feature is the selection our Matrons make. It is not, as one would at first suppose, the real novelties that attract them. These are too remote—too far from the world of every day. What interests housewives is an improvement of an existing method, an easier and better way of doing a traditional thing. It is an improved Washer; an economical kitchen-range; a simpler way of sweeping the carpet. You cannot look at the crowd—and a more typical one was surely never collected—and picture any one of them living in that charming invention, "Touchebution House," sitting by its Magicoal fire. Nor, if it comes to that, could you live in it yourself. Be frank with yourself, and you will acknowledge that you could never be easy in a room full of this electric, hygienic, labour-saving apparatus—in a perfectly sanitary, Wellsian super-house, like a hybrid between a swimming-bath and a surgery. Mr. Mandragon the Millionaire lived, you will remember, this kind of Simple Life. Our wives and mothers with a sound instinct reject it. It will take a long time for them to bridge the interval between the open fire and the electric cooker. The Red Indian of the story books wonders, no answer to a message of importance till he had eaten, slept, and eaten again. The primitive in us still keeps a touch of the Noble Savage.

But let us leave these middle-class mothers to their labour-saving. Here are the Royal Nurseries. Here, if anywhere, we shall find again poetry, romance, detachment from vulgar cares. Royal children belong of their very nature to fairyland and the society of elves, and who but their mothers should know the right setting to provide for them?

Disappointment at the very outset. Surely the Dutch child for whom the Queen of Holland designed her nursery was either blind or had nerves of iron. No normally constructed child could stand that riot of pattern. Not an inch of the room but shouts or chatters; not a foot of plain space gives the harassed eye a rest. Get out of it quickly and try again.

Belgium: characterless and dull. A blend of New Art detail and Old Ark animals.—Norway: very good up to a point. Bold and pleasant in colour, but decorated with people of so dominant a personality that no child could forget them for an instant night or day.—Sweden: the best too far. Very cool and light and simple; a good background for a child's mind. Alice: much the best of the set, largely for its negative qualities. To judge by this design, we in England have the rare privilege of being truly represented by our Royal Family. Amusing and comfortable; and not fussy, not affected, not "arty" and not visibly "hygienic." Odd that this should be the highest praise one can fairly give. And yet it confirms the theory of the protective value of inertia. Set this room against the best nursery of the new school of furnishing, and decide which you find really more appropriate as surroundings for a child in the most impressionable years of its life. One would hardly hesitate. Surely one should avoid prejudicing a child's eye as one would avoid prejudicing its mind. The more broad-minded its mental environment and the less "pose-y" its visual environment, the better.

Out of the nurseries again, and back to the searchers for the Ideal. Many of them have given it up, and sit simply in the big armchairs in the Paris Lounge. You're queer to look at them; and to realize that most of them are slaves to some Home or other; that they have come here to look for some charm, some magic that will lighten their task; some Tom-Tit-Tot to spin their skeins of flax. They look dull enough as they sit there, and in the half light they take on a look of that Boyg again. "Go roundabout: you can't convince me: what do we want with your ideas? It was good enough for your father, and it's good enough for me."

Is it a bad beast, or a benevolent? Who shall say?

Winifred Roberts.

THE NEW ART SALON

ANYONE, caring for art, who neglects to visit once a month or so the New Art Salon (160, Shaftesbury Avenue) makes a great mistake; for here is to be seen a periodically changing collection of modern French pictures, amongst which one may be sure of finding works by the best of the contemporary painting. The exhibition of the moment is particularly interesting because, besides the work of such well-known people as Derain, Picasso, Braque, Marchand, Friesz, Lhote, Modigliani and Kisling, it contains good and characteristic things by some of the more interesting of the less-known men. But, to begin with, there are six Derains, of which two at any rate are important. I do not know where I last saw them; but, as works together, as many works by this almost unprociable master—certainly not in his studio. Derain amazes me more and more: his power, his fertility, his delicacy, the desperate energy of his research and the cunning of his hand seem to increase daily. It will be many years, I fancy, before he has said his last word. Here we catch him at an interesting moment in his career.

Picasso is not so well treated: all that we are shown belongs to the blue period or thereabouts: it is the sentimental period—the one that pleases me least. Marchand, on the other hand, appears to great advantage, and his flower piece is one of the finest things in the room. What a satisfactory artist Marchand is! His solidity, his serenity, his high seriousness all give one an extraordinary sense of security. Several living painters possess greater gifts; but does anyone know better how to make the most of what he has? There are here works of pictures that can be treasured; and it is the way between the starter's flag and the winning-post, and when they win they are said to win "all out." I often think of that expression when I look at a picture by Marchand.

Braque contributes one really fine picture—better, I daresay, than any of the Picassos; and the rather Cézannesque landscape by Friesz is also first-rate. Like Marchand, Friesz is a thoroughly satisfactory artist; and the patent sincerity of his work may seem to cast a shadow of doubt over the two very brilliant things by Corneau that were hanging beside it. (The exhibition, I understand, has been rehung since I was there.) I have praised Vlaminck in my time, and he deserved it; but Vlaminck is some danger of becoming a bore. A cook who could do an omelette to a turn would be a treasure; but should he take to serving up omelettes daily, for breakfast, lunch, dinner and tea, and between whiles into the bargain, one might easily begin to wish that he had never attained to such self-satisfying perfection.

I am glad to see that interesting painter Kisling better represented in this show than the last. To my mind his bouquet is the best of his pictures; but all are worth looking at. In his figures it is curious to notice, concealed beneath a more thorough treatment and robust painting, the influence of Modigliani. About the latter I have always been a bit fussy; I have really no regret it not seeing his untimely death, his prices, they tell me, are what the newspapers call "soaring": which notwithstanding, I adhere to my original opinion that he is a fine draughtsman, but no great painter. And, having begun to think commercially, I naturally go on to speculate as to which pictures by the younger, and cheaper, men might be suitable for "laying down."
I suppose, is quite unknown in England: he must be under thirty, has been influenced by Modigliani and Derain, and is now gone, at the instigation of Lhote I surmise, to school with the painters of the late Renaissance. He is most attractive. Durey is still terribly imitative; but Feder seems to be getting something of his own—the sense of a curious, romantic temperament—into his landscapes. Lhote, by the way, who is certainly anything but unknown, remains admirable as ever. His Harbour" is charming, his "Tulips" remarkable, and some of his water-colours are delicious. Marquissé Fournier, Favory, and Halleux were four young artists who took my fancy last summer, and their sendings to this exhibition agreeably confirm my first impressions. Guerin, on the other hand, for all his reputation, I have always thought a poor painter, and I think it still. Krog won't do.

C. B.

EXHIBITIONS OF THE WEEK

THOMAS AGNEW & SONS.—Water-Colour Drawings by Artists of the Early English School.

GOUPIL GALLERY.—The Monarro Group.

HAMPSTEAD ART GALLERY.—Water-Colour Drawings by Frances Hodgkins.

MANSARD GALLERY.—Decorative Wood Panels by A. J. Rowley.

MCELAN'S GALLERIES.—Water-Colour Drawings by Helen Donald-Smith.

TWENTY-ONE GALLERY.—Paintings by Darvie Japp.

ADELPHI GALLERY.—Etchings by Ruby M. Hare.

The outstanding feature of Messrs. Agnew's exhibition is the set of some thirty-five drawings by J. M. W. Turner. The name of Turner is still, unfortunately, associated in our minds with Ruskin. Between us and the artist there stands the coarse and pompous figure of the impresario beating the big drum and calling upon us to "Walk up, walk up, and see the Wonder of the World." Those of us who take no pleasure in this kind of oratory have been tempted to hurry past the booth and keep our sixpences in our pockets. Turner's reputation has, in fact, suffered from Ruskin's chauvinism; but it cannot suffer permanent eclipse from so accidental a cause. For he was, after all, a most original artist and one of great historical importance. His earliest drawing in this exhibition, "Bishop Islip's Chapel, Westminster Abbey" (1796), is a link between the serene and beautiful art of Malton (represented here by two drawings of Bath and "Old Palace Yard, Westminster") and the work of his own middle period (1820-1835). The Abbotsford series are characteristic of the first part of the middle period, and "Yarmouth, Nelson's Monument" (1827), already absorbed in the history of the British Navy, has a decided interest in form in favour of light. "Lucerne: Moonlight" (1843), "Zurich: Brilliant morning light" (1842), "Lake of Lucerne: The Red Rigi: Sunset" (1841) and the famous "Dawn after Wreck" (1841)—with the dog barking at the sea—are all first-rate examples of Turner's mature art. We have but to compare them with the drawings by other artists in the exhibition to realize that the man who painted them stands in the main stream of development. Rossetti and Millais stand palpably in a backwater. Turner, with all his faults, was capable of inspiring his successors to achievement. Such a sketch as A. W. N. Pugin's "Elvaston Lodge, Durnham: a Grey Day," would have been impossible without him. And we must not forget that Impressionism, which absorbed the most vital art of the half-century which followed Turner's death, was primarily interested in the very problems which fascinated him in the last years of his life.

Impressionism, the school of the day, is reflected in the first exhibition of the Monarro Group. The artists who compose this group acknowledge a debt to Claude Monet and Camille Pissarro, and enshrine works by these masters—together with a portrait by Degas—in the place of honour on the walls. The principal members of the group are Siganco, Lucien and Paul Emile Pissarro, Léon de Smeter and Andre Bonnard, whose "Prairie avec Chevaux" is the most satisfying picture in the exhibition. It is not unpleasant to contemplate the work of these artists who still daily in the green fields of Impressionism. Modern Art demands a stern discipline of its devotees, and we often miss the Impressionists' light-hearted approach in the products of the younger painters. But as we study the exhibits at the Goupil Gallery, we feel convinced that the sterner discipline is worth while. Possibly this is why Boudard and Signac are so susceptible to the new influences, move us more than their fellows.

There is evidence of the new discipline in Miss Frances Hodgkins' water-colours at the Hampstead Art Gallery, which are far above the average of women's work. For Miss Hodgkins has unusual enthusiasm, a sense of two-dimensional composition, and considerable skill in synthetic drawing. Her brush moves with great rapidity, but it rarely fails to suggest form. Occasionally Miss Hodgkins falls into the favourite vice of the water-colour painter; she allows the colour to run and achieve accidental effects behind her back. But the passages which appear to have happened while the artist was slacking her interest are the exceptions. The majority of the lines and colours are the result of definite and intelligent intention. Mr. Frank Rutter, in a foreword to the catalogue, refers to the "virility" of Miss Hodgkins' work. The application of the term to a woman's work gives food for thought. Space forbids a consideration of its aptness in the case of this particular lady artist, but we hope to be able to return to the subject after visiting the exhibitions of the Society of Women Artists and the Women's International Art Club. At any rate, the newly founded Hampstead Art Gallery is to be congratulated on this exhibition, which maintains the standard of the Wolmark and Bayes collections which have preceded it.

At the Grafton Galleries the British School at Rome are exhibiting the works selected for the final competition for the Rome Scholarships, together with works by a certain number of the rejected candidates. The task of awarding these scholarships is not an easy one. It raises the question of what constitutes a "promise" in a student. Are the grandiose dreams of the school really more promising than the bad boys? Is the student who makes patient drawings from nature in a traditional technique more promising than the student who shows imagination, but is evidently impatient of routine work? Is the student who appears to admire Pierre della Francesca more promising than the student who shows an aptitude for Maurice Rovandson? The question has the fascination of the problem of the chicken and the egg. Even if this general principle be decided one way or the other, the judges of these Rome Scholarships are still not out of their difficulties. For the selected candidates are to be introduced forthwith to the aristocracy of art. They are to meet all the giants in quick succession. The judges must decide which students are most likely to profit by such an experience at an early age. And here the vicious circle reappears. If the student has originality, is he likely to be killed by this plunge into the society of the old masters? If he has none, will he not inevitably be drowned in the tumult of his superior? As for the other hand, he never meets the giants, how can he acquire his standards? Truly, the judges have a heavy responsibility.

Mr. A. J. Rowley has been experimenting in marquetry for some years. He uses a great variety of woods and does not hesitate to dye them. He has thus a large range of material, and shows intelligence and enterprise in the utilization of the various grains. He has, however, not yet discovered the right designer. At present the artists who work with him set out to design decorative pictures, which Mr. Rowley executes as best he can in his coloured woods. This is, of course, simply putting the cart before the horse: it is not in himself distinctively true that such a craft should have ideals of its own, quite disconnected with pictorial ideals. The most successful exhibit is Mr. W. A. Chase's large basket of flowers. There is no competition with painting in this work, and there is considerable appreciation of the medium.

Mr. Holtz's Diorama, well exhibited in the framing of her water-colour drawings. She favours a heavy black frame and discards the conventional mounts. This may be an advantage for dramatic drawings of the type of Ticcoldy Circus:—"Night," but the frames are certainly too heavy for the drawings executed in a lighter key. Mr. Darvie Japp's paintings are admirable, of course. He has a keen eye, courage, and a genuine feeling for the sea. In "Gull Rock," "Sea Pinks" and "Gala Cove" he has given—by sheer moral determination—the basic contrast between moving water and the solid rocks. All three sketches are very good indeed.

K. H. W.
Music
THE SECOND PERIOD

A_n intelligent foreigner who, in a hurried visit to London, desired to obtain some representative acquaintance with English music and English musical taste, could not have done better than to go to the Queen’s Hall concert last Saturday afternoon. He would have seen the most representative of English conductors, he would have heard one of the finest of English singers, he would have heard three native works and three foreign classics which appeal perhaps more to English audiences than to those of any other country. Mme. Kirkby had, for instance, evidently suffered from severance in her heart, gave a noble rendering of "La Fiancée du Timbalier." Yet it was not the rendering of a Frenchwoman, in spite of her admirable diction. It was too deliberately dignified, too impersonal for that, too much preoccupied with the pageantry of the spectacle, with the constructive beauty of the music itself. For an English concert-room it was probably the right interpretation, for it presented with conscious and restrained art just what a Frenchwoman, singing to a French audience, would have taken for granted and almost ignored. The other two items were in themselves appropriate to the programme. Dvořák has always enjoyed a notable popularity in England, and the "New World" is the most popular of his works. It has exercised a remarkable influence on English composers for the last twenty years. As for "Parsifal," it might almost be ascribed to an English composer. If English composers have been indebted to Wagner, it is pre-eminently to the creator of "Parsifal," "Meistersinger.",

The three English names in the programme belonged neither to the definitely old nor to the still young. Delius, Bantock and Vaughan Williams are all in what Beethoven's biographers would have called "the second period." Perhaps a later generation will say that the two novelties heard on Saturday marked a transition to the third period; but such distinctions are hardly for a contemporary listener to make, at any rate, before the first hearing. It is also interesting and gratifying sign of the times that an ordinary symphony concert programme in London should include as many as three English works on a large scale, two of them being performed for the first time. To attempt to find any specifically English quality common to all three is unprofitable. There are certain qualities common to each, but the analysis of them would be too technical for these pages, and it may be doubted whether the common element be not the expression of the composers' age rather than of their nationality.

Professor Bantock has been a revolutionary in his day, but he is fast settling down into a classic. He has all his life set forth in quest of poetical adventure, yet he has seldom found it, for it was at his own door all the time. Persistently he has tried to forget that he was a musician, yet a musician he always remains, and he has only achieved beauty and poetry when he was content to be a musician and nothing more. He should have written symphonies in the pure academic tradition, for his technical accomplishment as a composer is unequalled among his contemporaries. He has prostrated himself before Juggernaut and all the idols of the East, but at the bottom of his heart he has hearkened to the still small voice of Mendelssohn. He has followed the alluring note of the Hebridean siren, but her language is as unintelligible to him as it is to all other Saxons, and what he has written is just music, and very good music at that. Goeson is a descriptive. His new "Hebridean Sea-Poem," as it is called, "The Sea-Reivers," is a well-made and thoroughly effective piece of music. It has nothing of that Celtic atmosphere which Mr. Bax so successfully standardizes. What stood out conspicuously from its woful of sound were recollections of Rimsky-Korsakov and Beethoven. They were not the ordinary reminiscences of the forgetful and uncritical writer, but real points, absorbed into the composer's mind and woven consistently into the texture. That is not plagiarism, but the development of the Russian tradition. They brought the listener into contact not with a Hebridean sea, but with the great ocean of music. Professor Bantock's "Hebridean Symphony" had the same characteristics on a larger scale. What was impressive about it was not the wild poetry of its folk-song themes, but its massive construction, its deliberate and determined working-out of purely musical ideas in a purely musical way. Perhaps, after all, Professor Bantock is merely amusing himself at the expense of his audiences when he gives his works these fantastic titles. They call up no pictures, and there is no reason why they should. Yet, if there is any picturesque value in such music, it is in the hope not that it should bring the scene before us, but that the scene itself should recall the music.

Dr. Vaughan Williams, too, has gone to the East for inspiration, but to that east which is utterly unromantic. He shows us what the real poet can see in the despised fen country. He has not the technical skill of Professor Bantock, but he can give us more to remember. His folk-song rhapsodies owe a great deal to Stanford's Irish models, but as Stanford absorbed Irish music into his own blood, so Vaughan Williams has absorbed that of East Anglia. He is the one living English composer for whom the folk-song idiom is a natural language that can be extended indefinitely for the expression of ideas that are not local but universal.

Mr. Delius has experimented with folk-song in his early days, but one cannot help feeling that he did so not so much from a love of folk-song as from an admiration for Grieg. It was not the nature themes that were important, but what Grieg did with them. As time goes on Mr. Delius clarifies his style and becomes, in the best sense, more and more classical. His new concerto for violin and violoncello may have produced on some listeners the impression that it was as essentially harmonic and non-melodic as Bantock's "Sea-Reivers." If so, it was not the composer's fault, nor yet the conductor's. Our intelligent but hurried foreigner, if he noted nothing else, would certainly have remarked the two ladies who played the two instruments. How intensely English he might have murmured to himself, that graceful nonchalance, that lily-like reticence, that serene indifference either to passion or to thought! Was it possible in any other country for two solo players to efface themselves so completely in a work whose every phrase breathed poetry and beauty, accompanied by an orchestra in which every player from the flute to the harp delivered his fleeting messages with phrasing and expressiveness that was at once a lesson and a reproach?

Edward J. Dent.

The twenty-third number of the Journal of the Folk-Song Society (Third Part of Vol. VI.) is devoted to Irish folk-song, and contains the first part of the large collection in the possession of Mr. A. M. Freeman. The second part will be issued as Journal No. 24. It was hoped to publish these in 1916, but, owing to the collector's absence on service, publication had to be postponed until now. In each case the Irish words are given, together with a translation by Mr. Freeman, who explains the principles on which the editing has been carried out, and also gives an interesting account of the Irish singers "at home." The number, like its predecessors, is printed privately for members of the Society, whose offices are at 19, Berners Street, W.1.
PARRY THE MAN

MUSICAL NOTES FROM PARIS

M. Jean Cocteau, author of the Ballet "Parade," introduced last year to London audiences by the Diaghilev company at the Empire, is entering in his efforts to find a new and completely satisfactory artistic formula, which, by the nature of its style or "stylization" of natural gestures and language, is to go as far as possible from mere "repetition" and "imitation," and as far from "impressionism." His latest "manifestation," in which he has been aided by the advanced group of young composers who share his artistic theories and aspirations, has taken the form of a series of "Spectacles-Concerts," the first of which took place on February 21 at the Comédie des Champs Elysées. The composers who have collaborated with him in the production of this "spectacle" are the following: Erik Satie, Darius Milhaud, Francis Poulenc, and Georges Auric. The "modernism" of this group may be said, roughly speaking, to consist in a reaction against the excessive impressionism which, since Debussy, has tended to dominate French music, in favour of the cruder realism of the music-hall, with its clowns, acrobats, and American Ragtime melodies. Refinement is now abandoned for the more esoteric emotions to be got from what is intentionally crude and gross, but the success of such methods, one feels, must depend on a higher degree of suggestiveness being attained than would be possible by the plain, unvarnished tactics of the music-hall; in other words, traditional positions should be the object aimed at. It is precisely in this particular that M. Cocteau does not always succeed, with the result that certain acrobatic dances, for example, which he has invented, and for which M. Georges Auric has composed a delightfully reminiscent "Fox-Trot" ("Les Enfants, New York") — they were exceedingly skillfully performed by the excellent clowns Footit and Jackey—do not, in their performance, carry one much further than would an ordinary un-sophisticated acrobatic dance in a real music-hall.

In "Le Bouf sur le Toit," "The Nothing-Happens Bar," "M. Cocteau has imagined and executed a worldless "foxe," in which the action is largely directed by punch-tippers, wearing enormous cardboard head-and-mask shoulders, representing types such as: The décollée Lady, The Red-Haired Lady, The Harman, The Policeman, The Negro Boxer, The Jockey, The Gentleman in Evening Dress, and the Negro who plays billiards. The "action" centres in the implosion of a Policeman (American style) into a bar, which causes the disappearance of all "drinks" as if by magic, and the substitution of innocent bowls of milk. The Policeman is then decapitated by the ventilating fan in the ceiling, and after the Red-Haired Lady has sketches a short parody of a "Salome dance" round the head, reposing in a silver obelisk as the customers go away, and the Barman rescues the Policeman to life by pouring gin into his headless trunk. M. Cocteau, in an explanatory note which he read before the curtain, and which contained some extremely sound and illuminating truths, expressly warned us not to look for any symbolism in his farce. This was scarcely necessary; in any case the search would have been laborious and, let us hope, unfruitful.

It is indeed difficult to see the reason for such a performance at all, which, though amusing in a certain degree, did not seem to suggest all that its author, whose sincerity is undoubtedly, would have wished to suggest by supplementary factors, research for the endless trouble and pains bestowed upon the production in every detail. M. Darius Milhaud's accompanying score, however, is a most ingenious evocation of the whole atmosphere of American Bars and Ragtime rhythms, and lent itself admirably to M. Cocteau's choreographic experiments from the point of view of the parrots.

The programme also included the first performance of Erik Satie's "Trois Petites Pièces Montées" (for orchestra). These three little pieces are immediately pleasing and full of a discreet charm.

M. Cocteau's three eccentric "Cocardes," which have been elegantly set by M. Poulenc to the accompaniment of a violin, cornet à piston, trombone, side drum, and triangle, were sung by M. Koubatzky. Both words and music are most ingeniously reminiscent of all the vivid ingredients of the Parisian "vie populaire," and succeed admirably in giving the impression, desired by the authors, of a "fausse musique populaire."

R. O. M.

R. H. M.
Drama

“OTHELLO” AT THE NEW THEATRE

WHATEVER the reservations we may make in the course of this discussion, let it be clearly understood that “Othello,” as interpreted by Mr. Matheson Lang and Mr. Arthur Bourchier at the New Theatre, is a glorious entertainment. It is the old formula, seldom tried, yet infallible: Shakespeare and competent actors, not obsessed by their own idiosyncrasy, nor lost in the mists of ideal interpretation and precious production. The delighted applause of the audience was in the main thoroughly deserved, and we felt towards Mr. Lang and Mr. Bourchier an impulse of real gratitude for what must have been an exacting labour, even if a labour of love. To Mr. Lang, moreover, we believe, belongs much of the credit for a very remarkable series of realistic scenes, wherein the designers have steered with an uncommonly steady hand between the Scylla of opulent vulgarity and the Charybdis of aesthetic affectation.

In short, it was a production of “Othello” of the kind which leaves the critic free to criticize. We feel that we can argue with Mr. Lang and Mr. Bourchier inter pares; and, exhilarated by an opportunity so infrequent, we proceed to do so. They would both, we are sure, admit that the problem of performing “Othello” is to establish an exact relation between one actor’s Othello and another’s Iago. They are absolutely equal protagonists. Neither can be permitted to set the pace for the other. Each possesses, as it were, an irreducible element of idiosyncrasy, and the unity of a performance must be imperilled by any attempt of the actor of the one part to impose his method on the actor of the other. Interpretation by common consent is the only way.

The Moor presents the simpler problem. Shakespeare defined him so clearly as to offer no possibility of error to the actor of intelligence:

Then must you speak
Of one that loved not wisely, but too well;
Of one not easily jealous, but being wrought
Perplexed in the extreme.

A simple enough conception, but one by no means easy to realize. The actor who can make that speech inevitable and true after his own previous performance deserves well of the commonwealth. Mr. Lang not only did this, but he delivered the crucial lines that follow:

And say, besides, that in Aleppo once,
Where a malignant and a turban’d Turk
Beat a Venetian and traduced the state,
I took by the throat the circumcised dog
And smote him, thus—magnificently, triumphantly. The authentic thrill of great dramatic poetry ran through a spell-bound house. For Mr. Lang had given himself scope enough. He had played his Othello throughout with the necessary margin of melodrama, so that the full gesture of his speech was not cramped at a crisis. Yet he never lost the line through momentary indulgence in rododomata.

Mr. Bourchier’s Iago was more questionable. To be in keeping with Mr. Lang’s Othello, he had also to preserve a melodramatic margin; he had to be something of the Renaissance monster not merely by the implication of his actions, but in his manifest self. Iago wears a mask of bluntness, and wears it easily, but the mask should surely be only thick enough to deceive Othello; the audience does not need to be deceived also. Yet when Iago said to Emilia,

Fie, there is no such man; it is impossible, he seemed for a dizzly second not to be committing a supreme monstrosity, but to be uttering a self-evident truth, so complete was the illusion of a hail-fellow-well-met Iago that Mr. Bourchier had produced; by that time, indeed, he had become a second Falstaff. From this angle it was, indeed, a remarkable piece of acting, and we were once more amazed at Mr. Bourchier’s superb ease in carrying out his own conception. But an Iago who almost sets us wondering whether he is not after all engaged in a practical joke which is being carried a little too far is surely a little too original. In such an atmosphere one could not but forget Iago’s declarations of motive. How could this man hate the Moor? It is not possible.

Thus the sheer weight, the dramatic driving force of Iago’s monstrous cynicism was dissolved away. The difficulty of fitting the man to his mask in such a way that we shall be always conscious of the man is, we know, inordinate; but we cannot help thinking that Mr. Bourchier has allowed himself too easily to slide along the path of his own polished perfections. To be sure, his method has what seems the advantage of making the cozening of Othello quite inevitable. This Iago, as we have said, cozenes the audience also. But this apparent advantage reacts detrimentally on the very nerve of the dramatic argument, for not merely a love-exalted Othello would be caught in such toils as these, but the most astute man of the world could hardly escape the persuasions of Iago’s bonhomie. Shakespeare did not ask so much of his Iago. He gave him to play upon only a simple soldier of alien race, and a young blood, Roderigo, who was simple almost in the pathological sense; otherwise there would have been little meaning in Othello’s loving “not wisely, but too well.” And, indeed, what wisdom in love could have availed him against Mr. Bourchier, who thus unwittingly added an impossible villainy to Iago’s long score? For he robbed Othello not merely of his occupation, his peace, his happiness, and Desdemona, but of his tragic eyegoria also. An Iago has somehow to betray enough of his implacable malignity that only an Othello could fail to discover him. Even the ass Roderigo, who is in some sort a caricature of Othello, a nincompoop alter ego of the Moor, becomes more than half-suspicious of his Mentor.

Desdemona is on any showing of secondary importance. In the present case Miss Hilda Bayley’s shortcomings combined with the deep interest of Mr. Lang’s and Mr. Bourchier’s renderings to relegate her completely into the background. At least it may be said that Miss Bayley’s Desdemona could by a stretch of the imagination be conceived as the occasion of so great disasters. Regarded as a symbol this Desdenoma will do, in spite of the fact that in Miss Bayley’s hands she is a 1920 ingénue, well acquainted with jazz and Murray’s. But there is a great deal more to be made of Shakespeare’s Desdemona than a symbol, and that, if Miss Bayley had known it, on the lines parallel to those of her unconscious interpretation. Desdemona is ingenious, but she is also a Venetian aristocrat, and this element in her can be exploited to show cause why Iago can call her “a super-subtle Venetian” without talking manifest nonsense, and Othello ultimately take the conception for his own:

I took you for that cunning whore of Venice
That married with Othello.

Instead of feeling that Othello had been overwhelmed by an aristocratic ingénue whom he could never really understand, we felt at times that a soldier in his dudgeon had succumbed to a minx from the Café Royal. The reason, of course, is that the part is at present completely beyond Miss Bayley’s range.

With Desdemona the debatable characters end. Mr. Murray Carrington’s Michael Cassio was beautifully finished, and his restrained realism in the drunken scene perfect. Miss Hutin Britton, as Emilia, was admirably thorough. Mr. Hignet, as Roderigo, and Mr. Ernest Bodkin, as Brabantio, were both good.
Mr. Cyril Scott composed special music for the performance. As the opening scene of Act III., where there is actually music in the play, was cut, he was confined to the intervals. So long as going to plays is a pleasure, and not a penance, people will talk in the intervals, and the composer must take that into his reckoning. Mr. Cyril Scott did not, and that is a condemnation of his music; the few bars which we managed to hear conveyed to us an impression of that preciousness which we deprecate in the modern attitude to Shakespeare. Shakespeare meant himself to be an entertainment; between Blackfriars and Bayreuth there was, and there still should be, a difference.

Correspondence

THE PHOENIX SOCIETY

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—The Phœnix Society, which has recently produced a play of Webster and a play of Dryden, is appealing to its subscribers, of whom I am one, to endeavour to secure more subscribers at reduced rates for the remaining three performances of the season. It appears that the receipts from subscriptions have been inadequate to the expenses of production.

The so-called cultivated and civilized class is not expected to relieve the necessities of either literature or painting. It is assumed that poetry only pays if it is bought by thousands of people who have never heard of it; and that painting only pays if it is bought by some rich people whom one is not otherwise anxious to know: but a Society like the Phœnix can appeal only to the intelligensia, and at a price quite within the intelligensia’s means. Here then was an opportunity for the intelligensia to declare its convictions: but the sounds are forced, and the notes very few. He also the performers, if not good, has nothing to do with the matter. Apathy is more flagitious than abuse; we can almost condone the offence of Mr. William Archer, whom we never supposed to be a member of the intelligentsia; we cannot excuse the torpor of people who would despise Mr. Archer. The performance of Dryden’s play seemed to me praiseworthy, and the actors had devoted hard work to a production which certainly could not add to their popular notoriety. But the point is that Dryden is a great poet and a great dramatist, and the Civilized Class has not supported the people who would support him, the Civilized Class has not supported Dryden against Archer. If, at the next performance of the Phœnix, the Civilized Class has not taken advantage of the reduced rates, I shall no longer be able to stifle my suspicion that the Civilized Class is a myth.

I am, Sir, your obliged obedient servant,

T. S. ELIOT.

EXPERIEN'TA DUCIT—STULTOS

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Dear Sir,—It is perhaps a just and reasonable tradition which bids us “suffer in silence” before the reviewer; and at any rate I am not, for the moment, concerned with the justice or injustice of J. W. S.’s notice of Mr. Chesterton’s “Superstitio of Divorce” (Athenæum, February 20, pp. 235. 236). But I find there a generalization which surely provokes comment: “Mr. Chesterton remains youthful at heart, which means that he is incapable of profiting by experience.”

Who does profit by experience, if not youth? Do the biasé, the cynical, the war-wear, the pessimist, and the decadent? Do capitalists and proprietors? Do judges and Prime Ministers? Do establishment, vested interests, traditions and dogmas? Do a fine old crusted temper and inherited gout? Do Darby and Joan?

Youth is receptive, impressionable, spiritually sensitive, open-minded, alert, alone really listens to argument, respects reason, and welcomes a new idea. His is the true repentance, the genuine conversion, the serious resolution to do better next time.

Who can possibly learn anything really worth learning from his experience but the man who has kept young? Verily a king of men. It is we others who twist and turn our experience to false issues, shut our eyes to its lessons, blink at truth, and follow our old formulas.

I had an impression that our young people had learned something from the war.

Yours faithfully,

K. BRIMLEY JOHNSON.

UNIVERSITY OPERA

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—I have read with interest Mr. Dent’s article in The Athenæum of the 20th of this month, but is it not rather unjust to “West-End theatre-goers”?

Mr. Dent appears to have overlooked the fact that “those uniquely English institutions, the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge.” are in fact, as his description implies, public institutions and the heritage of the English nation. Therefore even those who have not enjoyed the teaching of Mr. Dent and his confrères may yet be permitted to take an intelligent interest in the University’s achievements—or failures.

For an artistic and technical failure the recent production of the “Faery Queen” must unfortunately be acknowledged to have been—and Mr. Dent, in his apology, practically admits it. It was only the genius of Purcell which justified the faith of one at least of those West-End pilgrims who made the journey to Cambridge.

Apart from the obligation which Mr. Dent, as producer, owes to the public, could he have forgotten that there might be among the “West-End theatre-goers” present at Cambridge some at least who, having reaped the benefit of “theory and principle” so richly taught at Cambridge, had deserted the narrow limits of the University and yet were not quite intellectually deficient?

That the wider education thus assimilated has taught at least one West-End theatre-goer to be critical is natural. It has also taught him that Mr. Dent by his writings is in danger of intellectual snobbishness—and unfortunately in this case attempts to drag Cambridge with him.

Yours, etc.

B. A. AND WEST-END THEATRE-GOER.

THE SOCIOLOGICAL SOCIETY

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—May I beg the hospitality of your columns for two announcements? First, the Sociological Society is moving from the London School of Economics and Political Science to a house of its own at 65, Belgrave Road, Westminster, S.W. I. The Society hopes to get installed there by the beginning of March.

The second is that the Society’s new house affords more accommodation than the Society itself can use, and we should be glad, therefore, to lease from congruent societies or organizations which might desire to rent one or more rooms. The present housing pressure is, we understand, putting not a few societies into considerable difficulty as regards accommodation.

As to the situation, the new house of the Sociological Society is about five minutes’ walk south-east from Victoria Station. It is just over a mile in a direct line from Charing Cross, and two bus routes (24 and 21a) cross Belgrave Road within a couple of minutes’ walk of the house.

I am, Sir, yours, etc.,

T. J. C. Fraser Davies, Secretary.

THE ESSAY COMPETITION

A number of applications for the conditions of The Athenæum Essay Competition have reached this office without stamped addressed envelopes. We wish to point out that no replies can be sent unless stamped envelopes are enclosed for the purpose.

Several intending competitors have written to us to ask for a definition of the term “English Literature since 1914.” It includes all books written in English by English-speaking authors, and published for the first time in England after January 1, 1914.

No correspondence of any kind can be entered into with regard to the Competition.
Foreign Literature

CONTICUERE OMNES

M. Dottin's book will be interesting and valuable to students of Celtic philology as a convenient summary of the known facts concerning Gaulish, understood as the language spoken by the inhabitants of that tripartite Gaul of our schooldays. He excludes from his survey except for purposes of comparison the closely similar dialects distributed in the last centuries of antiquity and the early centuries of the Christian era sporadically over Europe and bither Asia, from Britain in the West to Galatia in the East. In the fourth century A.D. (if St. Jerome's statement may be taken as reflecting a contemporary experience) the Galatians, though they spoke Greek, had a second language which resembled the speech of the Treveri in Gaul. The language of Britain was practically identical with Gaulish. And, scattered across Europe between those two points, place-names still surviving bear witness to the passage of the Celts. The European war began with an ultimatum presented at a city that once had a Celtic name, Belgrade (Saxigundunum); it came to one of its great crises at Verdun (Virodunum), which has the same second element still discernible; and ended in North France and Belgium in territories thick-sown with Celtic names. All these places and many others have the Celtic chariots laden with women and children and baggage passing on their migrations, have known the warriors going into battle crowned with flowers as for a feast and singing as they charged, and have heard the bards intoning their eulogies and their satires to the accompaniment of "instruments like to lyres." But of all this what remains? Those place-names, many personal names, a quantity of inscriptions, a Calendar, a number of isolated words and phrases embedded in Greek or Latin texts, some casual and fragmentary notices in classical writers, and such conclusions as we may draw from the Celtic languages and literatures surviving in a later age on the last shores of Europe.

M. Dottin puts together these remains for the Gaulish area, supplies material for a skeleton phonetic and morphology (necessarily somewhat conjectural), studies the constituent elements of place and personal names, and arranges the surviving vocabulary in an alphabetical series with appended explanations. The Celtic philologist will find his account in the book, although he will question a statement here and there. M. Dottin has the unfortunate habit of using Middle rather than Old Irish as a term of comparison. Thus on p. 289 he connects with a Gaulish tego the Irish verb combige, "I build." If he had considered Old Irish forms like the 3rd singular, present indicative, combiga, he would have seen that the root here is *di-n-*g-; and that his comparison falls to the ground. But an occasional error of this kind does not affect the value of the book as a sober and cautious description of the actual extent of our present knowledge of Gaulish.

Another section, in which M. Dottin traces the history of Gaulish studies, shows us how necessary such caution and sobriety are in this branch of research. The Celtic languages have been constantly exposed to the assaults of the à priori people who deal in insms. Patriotism, romanticism, mysticism and sheer sciolism have all done their worst here. We are justly suspicious to-day of the vast edifices of theory which scholars and half-scholars and no scholars at all have raised in the past on the shakiest foundations of fact. And we are correspondingly grateful for precise and conservative statements of what is actually known at a given moment. From the known it is possible to estimate what is likely to be known in the future. For the possibilities of a subject are governed by the nature of the available material.

All that we know in detail of the literature and history, the social and individual life, the religion and education of the Celts comes to us through Greek and Latin writers. It is true that for the study of their religion we have a considerable number of dedicatory inscriptions, but these again are made difficult of interpretation by the assimilation of Gaulish to Greco-Roman deities. The Gauls, indeed, accepted Latin too readily and too finally to admit of any literary composition in the vernacular. Long before the conquest Roman merchants had been active in Gaul, and very soon after the conquest schools of Latin rhetoric began to flourish. The language flickered out imperceptibly, and with the language all the living tradition of the past.

All languages, once the breath is out of them, pass into the region of ghosts. But, if they have been written down, they continue to haunt the world where once they lived "where breach to melt lies through the memories of men." Then, as Odysseus in the shades by a sacrifice of blood restored a living voice to the simulacra, so we by the sacrifice of a portion of our lives may call back some semblance of that perished breath and hold an uncertain communion with the past. If the means of that incantation cannot be found, then we may believe what we will about the past—and men have believed strange things—but we cannot enter into any real communion with it. M. Camille Jullian, the veteran historian of Gaul, relents against this iron law. In a preface to the present book he admits the scantiness of the material, but yet has hope. To understand the past only by its remains, he says, is to kill it a second time. The Celts thought it nobler to speak, to listen and to remember than to write. And it has been said that spoken languages often possess beauties lacking in written speech. He proceeds:

Toutes les formes de la littérature étaient représentées chez les Gaulois : la rhétorique où excellaient tous leurs chefs de guerre ; les épiphanies cosmogoniques, historiques ou ethniques, composées par les druides ; les poésies lyriques ou les chants satiriques des bardes. Je vous assure qu'il y avait chez eux l'équivalent de l'Iliade ou de la Genèse, des Atelanes ou des odes de Pindare. Je vous assure que cette littérature était aussi riche, plus riche même que celle de Rome avant Ennius. La langue gauloise rendait beaucoup à ceux qui s'en servaient.

M. Jullian is quite safe in assuring us of all this, for we cannot absolutely deny the possibility any more than we can say positively that a given country churchyard does not contain a mite, inglorious Milton. We assert nothing about Roman literature before Ennius. But we can say that, since Homer and Pindar and their fellows have come down to us,

Greece and her foundations are Built below the tide of war.
Based on the crystal sea
Of thought and its eternity.

And, because the Gaulish equivalents of Homer and Pindar have not come down to us, the Gauls are but the shadow of a shade.

On a wall in the dead city of Pompeii there is scribbled among other graffiti a Virgilian phrase, incomplete, but saying all. Conticuere . . . . . Reading this book and trying by its aid to figure to ourselves what manner of men were the living Gauls, we have come to the same sad conclusion of mortality. They have all gone down into silence. Conticuere omnes.

R. F.

The Bach Festival will be given in the Central Hall, Westminster, beginning on Friday evening, April 16. There will be a concert of canctatas on that evening. On April 17 there will be an orchestral concert with vocal and instrumental solos; on April 19 unaccompanied motets with vocal and instrumental solos; and on April 20 the Mass in B minor.
GERHART HAUPTMANN'S LATEST STORY

GERHART HAUPTMANN will always be remembered first as a dramatist; in prose fiction he has hitherto achieved no really enduring success. His novel "Atlantis," he is true, had a very large circulation in Germany, and in an English translation it gained enormous popularity in the United States during the year before the outbreak of the war. The same is true of his story "Der Narr in Christo: Emanuel Quint," which continues to be issued in new impressions of its original German edition and is still circulated in translations. But the first of these was, frankly, very much inferior to Hauptmann's dramatic work; its remarkable popularity— as is not infrequently the case—was not deserved. Of the second, a modern Christ-story, it may be said that, although competently written—anything from Hauptmann would at least be that—its striking subject, not its intrinsic value, was the main reason for the very large circulation it attained.

This latest story, "Der Ketzer von Soana," has a good claim to be considered as Hauptmann's masterpiece in narration. In subject it is not very original; it is the story of a priest's struggle against the allurements of the senses and the temptations of passion, to which he eventually succumbs. The priest, Raffaele Francesco Vela, is a young and earnest man, placed in charge of the small parish of Soana, a village of the Ticino, situated on a height overlooking the Lake of Lugano. It is necessary to note these geographical particulars because they form an important part, an essential part, of the story. Soon after their revival Francesco makes the acquaintance of a strange, wild man, who seeks him out one evening. This unkempt creature is found to be almost incapable of speaking the language of the district, or any recognizable human language at all; and further inquiries, zealously pursued by the priest, show that the man lives higher up the mountain, shunned and abhorred by all the people of the parish. The village gossip ascribes him to a life of peculiarly repellent sinfulness, and he with the woman he calls his wife and the children born of that unnatural union are scarcely ever seen in the parish, or, when seen, are jeered at and stoned. Naturally the story appeals to the priest's religious fervor, and he determines to do his best to reclaim these ignoble creatures and prepare them for religious instruction.

With this object he makes his way to the hut or cave in the mountain where the family of Lucchino Scarabotta— for that was the wild creature's name—lead their isolated existence. The road ascends the Monte Generoso, and Hauptmann, with his account of the young priest's journey, has given us one of the best pieces of Alpine description to be found anywhere in modern literature. Although he is too earnest and too much absorbed in his mission to his flock to be a lover of nature, the gorgeous appearance of the landscape at the end of March makes a new and deep impression on Francesco's mind. This turns to terror as he progresses; signs of primitive nature-worship are seen on the hillside, idolatrous images whose meaning he could only dimly divine from his early reading of the classics. And the conduct of Lucchino Scarabotta, when at last he arrives at the dwelling-place of that abandoned creature, confirms his belief that this country is full of demons. For the almost speechless, shaggy, wild half-animal throws himself at the young priest's feet and kisses them like a dog. Lucchino's wife, more coherent, comes forward and makes a confession, assuring Francesco that she is innocent of the sins she is charged with by the gothesses of the parish below. Finally the eldest daughter is presented, a creature of natural beauty and artlessness. This is the beginning of the temptation, to which at length, in spite of fasting and discipline and the advice of the bishop of the diocese, he ultimately falls, to be thereafter an exile from the parish.

The form of the story is worth noting. What has just been summarized is put into the mouth of a goatherd, living apart from his fellows on the slopes of the Monte Generoso, to whom the writer of the tale chooses on one day, after learning strange rumors about him in the valley. The goatherd is, of course, Francesco himself, and his narration his own story. This kind of reduplication is not a new device in fiction, particularly in the genus, the "Erzählung" or "Novelle," to which Hauptmann's work belongs. But it is employed with undeniably fine effect; as a well-planned piece of narrative the story can have few rivals in contemporary German fiction. Its other remarkable characteristic has already been hinted at. This is the wealth of description it contains.

Picture after picture of extraordinary beauty is brought before us; the whole story is infused with the colour of the region in question. The Picchione mountain is, as it were, itself made to play the part of a character in the tale, a background to the staging symbolizing the luxuriance of Nature, its uncontrollable beauty. And into the scene thus arranged Hauptmann has fitted, with perfect naturalness, the figure of the outcast goatherd, symbolizing in his turn the primitive man, unpolished but also unspoiled by convention, the type which the eclogues of Theocritus and Virgil impressed for ever on the imagination of the world. Rarely in prose German literature has the classic spirit been so finely recaptured as in this story.

BLACK AND WHITE

LETTRES FAMILIÈRES. Par Laurent Tailhade. (Paris, Ollendorff. 5fr.)

The "Open Letters" in this book are addressed to personalities who have played leading parts in the world-tragedy, and for this reason they cannot fail to suggest serious thought. M. Tailhade is a hero-worshipper, and as such is prone to accept the posture of his heroes as their true being. He hailed Kerensky, for example, as the Napoleon of the Russian Revolution. He did not realize that Kerensky's fiery rhetoric, concealing a cautious and calculating soul, would fail when pitted against the statistics of Lenin, which concealed a fiery and fanatical spirit. As becomes a hero-worshipper, M. Tailhade is also a good hater—so good that he seems to believe hate sufficient in itself as inspiration for literature. It may be; but it is not enough to inspire history. And it is history above all things that we require to-day. The moment for patriotic ecstasy, for emotional legislation, for propaganda and recrimination, is past. The time has come when we can and must think of our fellow-mortals as not necessarily black or white, but as most probably grey. M. Tailhade is colour-blind to this tint. This defect of vision conduces to the spirited tone of the book, but it invalidates it as a contribution to truth. The future may very possibly endorse his estimates of William H. of Germany, Constantine of England, Pope Benedict XIV, and M. Clemenceau. But it will not see them as isolated figures. Their blackness will be found to be organic, with roots in vast fields of night. They will appear relatively powerless puppets who developed feebly along the line of least resistance; not leaders of men, but figure-heads interpreting group thought behind them. We imagine of Germany any thing like "Kultur" as of Italy for many years before the war. It was known that he looked forward to a war, that he thought it would be great, and that he represented a solid body of opinion. But no general European machinery existed to restrain him: Europe waited and hoped for the best—and the worst happened. Can we ever exonerate Europe? Or take the case of M. Clemenceau. France—or the section of France temporarily most articulate—dramoured for a tyrant in the last years of the war, and thrust forward M. Clemenceau. Can we blame him if he played the part too well?
List of New Books

Prepared in co-operation with the Library Association.

The method of classification adopted is a series of groups roughly corresponding with the Dewey Decimal System, the sub-classes being indicated, for the benefit of librarians and others familiar with the system, by the class-numbers given at the end of each entry. The first numeral in these represents the main class, the second one of the subdivisions, and so on.

Those works in the List which appear most suitable for purchase by Public Library Authorities are marked with an asterisk.

100 PHILOSOPHY.

See review, p. 271.

This little book contains a clear and elementary discussion of the philosophic ideas which serve as a basis for the mystical view of experience. There is much, of course, about intuition, but the author avoids, as a rule, the vague statements usual in writers of this school.

200 RELIGION.

See review in last week’s Athenæum, p. 240.

Together with a general introduction, this book contains the Greek texts of seven letters written by the Bishop of Antioch during his journey to Rome, there to be thrown to the beasts in the amphitheatre. These epistles are comprised in what is usually called "the short recension." They are addressed to the Ephesians, Magnesians, Trallians, Romans, Philadelphians, Smyrneans, and to Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna. Each text is accompanied by a short protracted English "argument." It is of interest to note that in the letter to the Smyrneans occurs the first mention of the "Catholic Church," and also that the "word 'Christianity,' like the word 'Christian,' comes first from Antioch, for Ignatius uses Χριστιανός as a contrast with the Pauline word 'λόγος.' (Magn. x.).

300 SOCIOLOGY.

Surveying funeral customs and observances in all ages and all countries, and pondering over the long-continued practice of burying with the dead something that would be of use to the living, the writer concludes that graves were originally refuges for the living. His illustrations of this thesis are drawn from Tylor's "Primitive Culture" and "Folk-Lore.

378.541

The six volumes before us ("Evidence and Documents") comprise general memorandum and oral evidence, as well as classified replies to the Commissioners' questions 1-23. A considerable number of valuable information concerning Indian university training is epitomized in these books.

A number of chapters on such subjects as Politics, Government, Sexual Hygiene, etc., vaguely related to Theosophy.

The sentiments are, for the most part, irreproachable, and the connection with Theosophy seems quite irrelevant.

Jennings (J. G.). Addresses to Students, 1918. Blackie, 1919. 8 in. 118 pp. boards, 2/8 n. 378.854

Address delivered in 1918 by the Vice-Chancellor of Patna University. "Reading," "Stoicism," and "Organization" are some of the subjects. A specially suggestive discourse has the title "Take Pains."

The People's Year-Book, and Annual of the English and Scottish Wholesale Societies, 1920: a volume of useful information prepared by the Co-operative Press Agency Manchester, Co-operative Wholesale Society, 1 Balloon Street, Glasgow, and Scottish Co-operative Wholesale Society, 95, Morrison Street, 1920. 8½ in. 400 pp. ill. pors. index, paper, 2/ n. 330.6

The volume before us is the third issue of "The People's Year-Book." Much information relating to co-operative activities, Labour, finance, housing and the like, will be found in this book, which should be of considerable use to students of, and writers or speakers on, industrial, political and social problems.

The author deals first with the principal defects in the administration of United States law "which work in effect a denial of justice to the poor or the ignorant," namely, delay, court costs and fees, and the expense of counsel; and, secondly, with agencies supplementary to the existing machinery, whose object is to remedy these defects. Among the agencies passed in review are those for conciliation and arbitration, and the legal aid organizations.

It is now twenty-two years since the first play centre in England was opened. Here we have the history of the movement and an explanation of its principles and objects. There are now some two hundred centres, and the movement has reached every large city or town, not only influencing the children and their future, but also indirectly benefiting parents, teachers, police, and other classes. This account of the invaluable work done should help materially in the progress of the movement.

400 PHILOLOGY.

See review, p. 286.

Kastner (L. E.). Select Passages in Prose and Verse from Modern and Contemporary French Authors: Intermediate Course—Senior Course. Hachette, 1919. 2 vols. 7½ in. 176, 222 pp. indexes of authors, 4/6 n. each. 448.7

Extracts of medium difficulty from writers of the seventeenth to the twentieth century, chosen and annotated for the use of upper and middle forms in secondary schools, and for junior university classes. Richépin, Fusel de Coulanges, Béranger and François Coppée are among the authors represented in the Intermediate Course. The Senior Course includes extracts from Saint-Simon, Diderot, Baudelaire, Verlaine, Victor Hugo, Sainte-Beuve, Verhaeren and M. Henri de Régner.

600 USEFUL ARTS.

Furniss (A. D. Sandersen) and Phillips (E. Marion). The Working Woman's Housekeeping Guide. Swavannah and Richmond, 1920. 7 in. 84 pp. plans, ill. paper, 1/6 n. 643

Two years ago an inquiry was organized by women of the Labour Party into the kind of house a working woman wants, and then the Women's Advisory Committee of the Ministry of Reconstruction took up the inquiry of which the results are published here. Architects' plans, suggestions for central heating. water-supply, the arrangement of rooms, stairs, etc., cupboards, the inter-oven, and other new features, and a collection of answers to a questionnaire, illustrate the proposals: and the third part of the book has suggestions on co-operative housekeeping.

Lowry (Edith B.). THE WOMAN OF FORTY. Chicago, Forbes, 1919. 7 1/2 in. 203 pp.
$1.25
618 Woman at the "dangerous age" has come to the turning-point of her existence. Dr. Lowry impresses upon women of this age the need for putting their bodies in such a perfect condition that theills common to the majority may be avoided. Definite plans for the future should be formed, for upon such depend the happiness and success of the latter half of her life.

*Read (C. Stanford). MILITARY PSYCHIATRY IN PEACE AND WAR. H. K. Lewis, 1920. 10 in. 175 pp. tables, charts, 10/6 n. 613.851 See review in last week's ATHENÆUM, p. 245.

700 FINE ARTS.

780 MUSIC.

Parry (Sir C. Hubert Hastings), Bt. COLLEGE ADDRESSES DELIVERED TO PUPILS OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC. Edited, with a recollection of the author, by H. C. Colles. Macmillan, 1920. 7 1/2 in. 301 pp., 7.6 n. 780.7 See review, p. 283.

790 AMUSEMENTS, GAMES, SPORTS.

Capablanca (J. R.). MY CHESS CAREER. Bell, 1920. 9 in. 228 pp. ill. por. index to games. 7.6 n. 794 See review in last week's ATHENÆUM, p. 237.

800 LITERATURE.

Erlande (Albert). LA TRAGÉDIE DES EMPIRES. Paris, Editions du "Monde Nouveau" (Cross-Atlantic Newspaper Service), 1920. 10 in. 151 pp. paper, 8.6 n. 842.9 Three hundred years ago Barclay's roman à clef, the "Argenis," depicted the secret diplomacy of the wars of Europe under mythical, but transparent names. This drama represents the affairs of the last five years in a similar fashion, making international events turn upon personal ambitions, and departing from history by allowing the Kaiser, Magnus Empereur d'Auxonie, the dignity of suicide.

Firth (Col. Sir Robert Hamlitt). MUSINGS OF AN IDLE MAN. Bale & Sons, 1919. 7 1/2 in. 371 pp., 7/6 n. 824.9 A collection of essays on very diverse subjects, the author occasionally touches a point of view which promises to be interesting, but the promise is seldom fulfilled. The slight essay has its function, but the majority of these essays are rather too slight.

*Frazer (Sir James George). SIR ROGER DE COVERLEY; and other literary pieces. Macmillan, 1920. 8 in. 331 pp., 8.6 n. 824.9 See review, p. 273.

Inge (Charles). FLASHES OF LONDON; and other reflections. Allen & Unwin, 1920. 7 1/2 in. 182 pp., 6/ n. 824.9 Mr. Inge presents us with a few queer creatures from the vast menagerie that is London. He points out to our attention Among the crowd all specimens of men, Through the crowd the colours which the sun bestows, And every character of form and face: Malayas, Lascars, the Tartar, the Chinese, And Negro ladies in white muslin gowns.

(Wordsworth, too, enjoyed and appreciated his London.) Mr. Inge has made use of a form approximating to that employed by the Character Writers of the seventeenth century. It is an agreeable form which lends itself to a pleasantly epigrammatic and "metaphysical" treatment. Mr. Inge's characters of London and its inhabitants are very readable. Our only complaint is his sentences have a distracting way of turning into blank verse. "Sallow-faced evil men, with cruel eyes, mutter their angry warnings or commands into scared women's faces blotched with tears." The rhythm gets on our nerves, and we find ourselves trying to fit every phrase we read into the Procrustean bed of the decasyllable. Only too many slip in without the least necessity to rack or chop.

POETRY.

Britton (Herbert E.). DIANE; and other poems. Stockwell [1920]. 7 1/2 in. 80 pp. 3/6 n. 821.9 Mr. Britton suffers from one of the mortal diseases of the poet—facility. If he wrote more painfully, he would, one feels, write better. As it is, his overloading vocabulary of poetic words and the case with which he rhymes and modulates his various measures are fatal to his chances of being more than an accomplished performer on the musical glasses of verse.

Burns (Robert). SELECT POEMS BY ROBERT BURNS, arranged in kindred groups ("Plain Text Poets"). Blackie, 1919. 6 in. 96 pp. por. limp cl., 1/ n. 821.67 A commendable gathering of many of Burns's best-known lyrical poems.

*Cromwell (Gladys). POEMS. With an introduction by Padraic Colum. New York, Macmillan Co., 1919. 7 in. 123 pp. index, boards, $1.50. 811.5 Miss Cromwell was not one of those young poets who accept without question the traditionally "poetic" themes and prattle, without a sign of conviction, of love and springtime and the picturesque beauties of nature. She wrote of real spiritual experiences, of what she had herself thought and felt. "I must have peace," she writes:

Oh, not a temporal winter, not
A fitful sleep;
But such a lasting winter as Dark oceans keep.
Beneath all tides there sleeps a depth
Of cold and faculty,
A zone that spins and spins a fine
Transparency.
There must be such a wintry zone
For teeming thought,
Where forms all the midnight ray would crush
Are slowly wrought.

These lines attest a profound insight into the workings of the spirit. At such moments of vision Miss Cromwell showed herself a poet of marked power and originality.

Cuthbertson (David). POEMS OF THE WEST. Aberdeen, Univ. Press, 1920. 7 1/2 in. 83 pp. 6/ n. 821.9 In this volume we prefer the poems in which Mr. Cuthbertson casts off the starchy restraint of traditional forms and lets himself go in Scots. "Dwynnin' awa" and "The Restless Wean" are excellent in their kind.

FICTION.

Clemenceau (Georges). THE STRONGEST. Nash [1919]. 7 in. 317 pp., 7/ n. 843.7 See review, p. 270.

Conquest (Joan). DESERT LOVE. Werner Laurie [1920]. 7 1/2 in. 256 pp., 7. n. There is a novelty in the theme chosen by the author. Jill Carden, who has been brought up in 'England's best society,' is of an unconventional disposition. She seeks adventure, and finds it in Egypt, where she makes the acquaintance of an extremely wealthy Arab, called Halumed, the Camel King. The two fall in love, and are married in Cairo. Then Jill leaves Western ideas behind her, and goes with her Arab husband to an oasis, where he has built a luxurious palace. The pair live very happily, save for a temporary misunderstanding. The book contains beautiful portrayals of life in the desert and in Cairo.

This very conscientious version of a book which, as our readers know, we consider to be, with its companion volume "Vie des Martyrs," the finest of all the war books, deserves a measure of praise. Mr. Conwil-Evans’s appreciation of the niceties of M. Duhamel’s idiom is not, however, quite as fine as we could wish. His method of translating Parisian turns of accent and language into impeccable and rather colourless English is not quite satisfactory, and his expurgation of his original in "Revaud’s Room" gratuitous. A typical instance of the translator’s method is the rendering of "Il sait des tas de bricoles" by "He’s a fellow that’s up to a few tricks. It is not wrong, but it’s not right." "He knows a thing or two and could be much better. It is this touch of préc which prevents us from acknowledging the English version as worthy of the French original. But to those who are unable to read French with fluency—and to those only—we can honestly recommend Mr. Conwil-Evans’s rendering of a book that should be read and pondered by all.

A detective story, the hero of which is the brilliant M. Dupont of the French Secret Service. He solves the mystery connected with some hideous murders which have been committed in France, America, and England. The plot and incidents are arresting and exciting.

Gaunt (Mary).* The Threnody. Other happenings. Waverly Lanier [1920]. 7½ in. 263 pp. 7/6 n.

These eleven short stories are admirably representative of the author’s skill in characterization and in describing stirring episodes. "The Temple of the Great Beneficence" and "White Wolf," tales of risings in China; "Captain Pettifer and the 'U. Boat';" and the title story (which is set in West Africa), are among the most notable items.

Griffith (Mrs. L. W.).* Arthur, Routledge, 1920. 7½ in. 234 pp. 5/6 n.

A sentimental story about a little boy who is left in the charge of his cousin and guardian, Captain Maurice Arlington. Because of Arthur’s resemblance to his mother, who in earlier years was loved by the Captain, the boy, though tiresome and unruly, is a great favourite of his guardian. The latter saves Arthur’s life at the risk of his own.

Haggard (Sir Henry Rider).* The Ancient Allan. Cassell [1920]. 7½ in. 318 pp. ill. 8/6 n.

See review, p. 274.

Jacobsen (Jens Peter). Niros Lyhne. Translated from the Danish by Hanna Astrap Larsen ("Scandinavian Classics," 13). New York, American-Scandinavian Foundation (Milford), 1919. 8 in. 8/6 n. 839-83

An attractively designed and readable translation of this famous Danish novel.

Maier (S. P. B.).* Uncle Lionel. Grant Richards, 1920. 8 in. 313 pp. 7/6 n.

See review, p. 274.

The too susceptible hero is, in turn, a clerk in a railway office, a member of a provincial theatrical company (the delicate and petty shits of which are well depicted), one of a pietist troupe, an employee in an assurance office, and the proprietor of a musical agency. He is too readily attracted by one woman after another, and eventually marries one who is possessed of a formidable undoing. Unfortunately he underrates a really lovely her, and is led to commit bigamy.

The story ends abruptly and unsatisfactorily.

Pain (Barry).* The Death of Maurice. Skeffington [1920]. 7½ in. 288 pp. 7/6 n.

See review, p. 274.

Winston (G. McLeod).* Station X ("Splendid Library"). Jenkins, 1920. 8 in. 317 pp. 2/6 n.

A cheap reprint of a marvellous story, based on the success of attempts to get into communication with Mars and Venus by wireless.

910 GEOGRAPHY, TOPOGRAPHY, ANTIQUITIES.

Greece and Latin versions are considered very fully in this, the latest instalment of M. Laurand’s valuable and scholarly work, which includes a discussion of the latest theories of French and other savants, a noteworthy table of the metres used by Horace, and sections relating to numerous specialized branches of study, of importance and interest to the philologist. The bibliographies are of particular value.

Considering the small size of this book, the English or American reader for whom it is intended will be surprised at the amount of information which the pages convey.

Early Christian sepulchral inscriptions may be seen in the ancient cemeteries of Rome and other cities, in museums such as the Vatican, and in the collections of inscriptions made by pilgrims to Italy during the seventh, eighth, and ninth centuries, before the originals were destroyed. Most of these are printed in the second volume of De Rossi’s "Inscriptiones Christianae." Some of the oldest inscriptions in situ are in the cemetery of Priscilla at Rome. In the inscriptions set up by the early Christians there is nothing morbid or gloomy. On the contrary, a spirit of peace and hope prevails, and there are few signs of the trials through which the Church was passing. Mr. Nunn in nearly all cases adds English renderings to the Latin and Greek texts.

920 BIOGRAPHY.

Clough (Arthur Hugh).* Osborne (James Insole).* Arthur Hugh Clough. Constable, 1920. 9 in. 195 pp. index, 8/6 n.

See review, p. 268.

Mrs. Fels has written an admirable sketch of her husband—a remarkable man who was in advance of his time. Born in Halifax County, Virginia, the fifth, and fourth surviving, child of Lazarus and Susannah Fels, Joseph in 1875 bought the business of a Philadelphia soap manufacturer. He is said to have been "one of the frankest types of good fellowship with his own workers," and to have had "no sympathy with the policy of drive; he did not believe in making the worker the accessory of the machine." Mr. Fels was never strongly drawn to the service of the synagogue, but devoted himself to practical reform. He regarded as erroneous the view that high profits naturally derive from low wages, and was of opinion that wise employers see that "high profits more naturally derive from high wages, plus efficient organisation." Joseph Fels strongly advocated a tax upon the value of land apart from all improvements, was greatly interested in the cultivation of vacant land, and keenly supported women’s suffrage. He died on February 22, 1914.

Maud (Constance Elizabeth).* My French Year. Mills & Boon [1920]. 9 in. 284 pp. ill. 10/6 n.

Very readable narratives of experiences in France during 1917 and 1918 are embodied in this volume, the author of which describes, among other matters, the aspects of some of the devastated regions, the sorrows and privations of the French soldier, life in Paris, and the remarkable work for the Red Cross accomplished by the various associations of French, English and American women. An interesting section of the book deals at some length with the music of César Franck. In 1919 the author came to the conclusion that, highly as the war work of English and American women has been valued by our Allies, yet the women of France "the better it will be for the growth of that delicate plant, the Entente Cordiale."

The writers of these interesting and appreciative letters include Sir Sidney Lee, Messrs. John Masfield and John Drinkwater, Mrs. Drew, Mrs. G. F. Watts, Mrs. Holman Hunt, Miss May Morris, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and Sir Gilbert Parker. The portrait is excellent.

4909 THE GREAT EUROPEAN WAR.

A diary which opens with operations in Gallipoli, and then deals with those in Egypt and Palestine. It thus constitutes an informal history of a large part of our Eastern campaign. Capt. Adams has a readable style and an attractive sense of humour: "Of course, it is a dead secret, and France is referred to as 'Another Front' or 'A Different Scene of Activity', prefixed by the sort of noise a grandfather clock makes before it strikes. The whole thing is given a picnic air.

Already an Army doctor, the writer was mobilized on August 5, 1914, and worked in various capacities which he describes in detail. He criticizes the management of various departments, and especially the red-tape folly that set experienced surgeons and physicians filling up forms when they were in grievous demand for important work. The R.A.M.C., he sums up, is admirably adapted for peace, but requires to be decentralized and made more elastic for service in war.

Major Gibbs describes the life of the subaltern during the war, and supplies one of the best and most realistic accounts of the way they tackled their job and managed their men, during training, in the trenches, and on the battlefield, and how they felt and behaved towards the superior powers. It is a racy, slangy, and outspoken record, without any moralizing, and Major Gibbs's brother undertakes to supply the "philosophy" which is supposed to be essential.

Mure (A. H.). WITH THE INCOMPARABLE 29TH. Chambers, 1919. 7 in. 212 pp., 5/6 n. 940.9

Yet another account of the Gallipoli campaign by an eyewitness. Major Mure writes of his soldiers with a love and admiration which are really moving. One account—a charge by the Australians—is particularly vivid, and shows us once more to what heights of heroism men rose in those days. The author's style is a little crude; he is fond of alliteration and the obvious climax, but his book is vigorous and alive.

Trigo (Felipe). CRISIS DE LA CIVILIZACION: LA GUERRA EUROPEA. Madrid, Ramoncino, San Marcos, 42, 1919. 7 in. 273 pp., 4 ptas. 940.9

The second edition of Señor Trigo's work.

J. CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

Davidson (Gladys). MORE TALES FROM THE WOODS AND FIELDS. Wells Gardner [1919]. 61/4 by 122 pp. il. boards, 19 n. 940.9

A red stag, an otter, and a badger, with other "small deer" in the shape of birds and butterflies, relate the chief events of their lives—ostensibly for the benefit of their young ones, and incidentally for the entertainment of Children.

Gibbs (May). GUM-BLOSSOM BABIES. GUM-NUT BABIES. WATTLE BABIES. Words and pictures by May Gibbs. Sydney, Angus & Robertson (Australian Book Company of London) [1919]. 9 in. 24 pp. each, paper, 1/6 n. each. J. 741

These three booklets contain a number of quaint drawings of babies. Incidentally they will teach British children something about nature in Australia. Miss Gibbs is to be complimented on her fancy and ingenuity.

Capt. Gilson has provided a stirring story of adventure and exploration, telling how three Britons traced a mysterious African river, and released the natives from the thralldom of a Portuguese slave-trader whom they had come to look on as a "Fire-God."

Lanei (Henry W.), ed. THE BOOK OF BRAVERY: being true stories in an ascending scale of courage. Bickers [1919]. 8 1/4 in. 344 pp. il., 7/6 n. 940.9

Among the heroes and heroines of famous escapes, Mr. Lanier tells about Cesar Borgia, Benvenuto Cellini, Cortes, Don Carlos, and Mrs. Scott; the famous treasure-seekers include Morgan the pirate, Admiral Phips, Cortes, and Cecil Rhodes; the soldiers are Horatio, Richard the Lion-hearted, Marshal Ney, Charles XII of Sweden, and Wolfe; the sailors, Grenville, Nelson, Paul Jones, Decatur, and Farragut; and among "Famous Deeds of Discipline" are retold the stories of Thermopylae, the Anabasis, the Old Guard at Waterloo, and Balaclava.

SHRINKAGE OF CAPITAL AND INCOME

Way Out of the Difficulty

Everyone seems to be getting an increase in income commensurate with the increased cost of living—except the investor. He—or she—watches the prices of everything rising higher and higher, while the Income remains the same, or, if lower, may become lower. Before the war the dividends received constituted an Income sufficient comfortably to meet the outgoings. Now there is not enough to do more, perhaps, than secure the bare necessities of life. There is not a penny to spare for even simple luxuries; while pleasures that before could be frequently enjoyed are now entirely things of the past.

The sacrifice of these amenities of life is not the easier with advancing years. The need of rigid economy does not make for prolonged life. Financial worries are harder to bear the older one gets. They prey on the mind; and this is bad for the health.

But what is the man or woman to do whose income depends on dividends or a small fixed rate of interest? Sell his other stocks or shares and purchase with the proceeds a Sun Life of Canada Annuity!

There is the simple solution to the whole problem. There is the way out of the difficulty! The plan has been adopted by retired professional and business men, clergymen, doctors, and by widows, in ever-increasing numbers during the past few years.

Through this plan many of them have doubled, in some cases more than trebled, their income. One man, for instance, aged 65, obtained an Annuity of £200 7s. 8d. instead of the income of £125 he had previously received from his investments. A widow, age 65, whose Capital was only £1,200 when realised, obtained an annuity of £24 4s., whereas before she had pinched and scraped on an income under £60 a year.

It must also be remembered that Sun Life of Canada Annuities are fixed and guaranteed for life. They will neither rise nor fall according to the state of the market. They are unaffected by Political disturbances or labour troubles. They are absolutely secure.

There are annuities to suit every individual case,—Immediate, Deferred, Joint, Educational.

The Sun Life of Canada has Assets of over £23,000,000,000 under strict Government supervision. Write for full details, stating exact date of birth and amount at disposal, to the Manager, J. F. Jenkin, Sun Life of Canada, 10, Canada House Norfolk-street, London, W.C. 2.
ESSAY COMPETITION

WITH the aim of stimulating a critical interest in contemporary English Literature, The Athenæum has decided to offer a number of prizes for the best Essays on the subject:

English Literature since 1914.

Dr. Robert Bridges and Professor George Saintsbury have consented to act together with the Editor of The Athenæum as judges in the competition, the prizes for which will be as follows:

First Prize - £50 0 0
Second Prize - 25 0 0
Third Prize - 10 0 0
Ten Prizes of 5 0 0
Ten Prizes of 3 0 0

ESSAYS for this Competition should approximate, but not exceed, 3,500 words in length, and they should be written on one side of the paper only.

The Competition will close with the first post received on Monday, April 19th, 1920, and the result will be announced in The Athenæum dated June 18th, 1920.

CONDITIONS OF THE COMPETITION

will be forwarded on receipt of a stamped addressed envelope by the Editor of The Athenæum.

THE ATHENÆUM
10, Adelphi Terrace,
London,
W.C.2
Appointments Vacant

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE AND TECHNICAL INSTRUCTION FOR IRELAND.
NATIONAL MUSEUM OF SCIENCE AND ART, DUBLIN.

THE POST OF TECHNICAL ASSISTANT in the Botanical Section of the above Museum is VACANT. Remuneration, including present temporary war bonus, £6s. a week for a man, and £4s. a week for a woman.

Applications should be submitted not later than March 20, 1920, to the Secretary of the Department, Upper Merrion Street, Dublin, on a form which may be obtained from the Department.

COUNTY BOROUGH OF STOKE-ON-TRENT
EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

WANTED for April 19:

1. An ASSISTANT MISTRESS with an Honours degree in History for Advanced Course work with the girls. Teaching experience is essential. Salary according to scale, and commencing salary dependent upon qualifications and experience.

2. An ASSISTANT MISTRESS for Geography with the girls. Salary according to scale. Forms of application (which should be duly filled up and returned to the Director of Education not later than March 10, 1920) may be obtained on receipt of stamped addressed envelope from DR. W. LUDFORD FREEMAN, Director of Education.

Education Offices, Town Hall, Hanley, Stoke-on-Trent.
February 25, 1920.

BOROUGH OF
ROYAL LEAMINGTON SPA EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

1. WANTED for BOYS' SECONDARY and for TECHNICAL SCHOOL a HANDICRAFT INSTRUCTOR (Woodwork and Metalwork), well qualified in Engineering Subjects; part day and part evening work.

Scale of Salary, £180 to £340. Commencing salary will depend on qualifications and experience.

2. WANTED for GIRLS' SECONDARY SCHOOL, an ASSISTANT MISTRESS qualified in Mathematics and French (or German). Scale of Salary, £200 to £280 for Non-graduates, or £180 to £250 for graduates. Commencing Salary will depend upon qualifications and experience.

Applications to be sent to J. E. Pickles, Director's Office, York Road, Leamington.

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION—MEN'S DIVISION.

SIX TEMPORARY ASSISTANT LECTURERS will be appointed for the session 1920-21, at salaries of £300 each. If admissions justify it, the appointments may be continued for the following session 1921-22, and it is hoped that one or two at least may be continued permanently.

Applicants must be trained graduates with good teaching experience. Well qualified women applicants might be considered. Particulars from the Registrar, to whom applications should be addressed not later than March 20,

Appointments Vacant

COUNTY BOROUGH OF SOUTHPORT.
EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

NEW SECONDARY SCHOOL FOR BOYS.
HEADMASTERSHIP.

The Governors of the above school invite applications for the POSITION OF HEADMASTER.

The school will be commenced in temporary premises at the "Woodlands," Lord Street, pending the erection of a new school with accommodation for 500 boys, which is to be proceeded with immediately on a site of 15 acres on the sea front.

Commencing salary, not less than £300 per annum.

It is intended that the school shall be conducted as far as possible after the manner of a Public School for Day Boarders, for which purpose the new school buildings are being specially designed, and it is therefore desirable that candidates should have had some Public School experience.

An Honours Degree of a British University will be looked for.

The School will be grant-earning and be conducted under Articles of Government formulated in accordance with the Board of Education's Regulations.

Applications, endorsed "Headmaster, Secondary School," accompanied by copies of three recent testimonials should reach the undersigned on or before Tuesday, March 9, 1920.

WM. ALLANACH,
Correspondent and
Director of Education.

Education Offices, 2 Church Street, Southport.
February, 1920.

MALVERN GIRLS' COLLEGE, WORCESTERSHIRE.

1. WANTED, after Easter, an experienced MISTRESS to teach Divinity in the Middle and Senior Schools. Churchwoman essential. The post is a resident one, and a good salary is offered to a suitable candidate.

2. A BOTANY SPECIALIST to teach Botany from Form III upwards. Geography subsidiary a recommendation.

3. WANTED, in September, an ASSISTANT MISTRESS to teach Geography on modern lines. Good qualifications and experience essential.

Initial salaries £150-£250 according to qualifications and experience, rising £20 per annum to a maximum of £350. If resident a deduction of £50 is made for heating and residence. Apply, with full particulars to the Vice-Principal, Ivydene Hall, Malvern Girls' College.

LIBRARY ASSOCIATION.

THE NEXT PROFESSIONAL EXAMINATION will be held 10-18th May, 1920, in London and at other centres in the provinces and abroad. 10th May, Classification; 11th May, Cataloguing; 12th May, Library Organisation; 13th May, Library Routine; 14th May, Literacy History; 15th May, Bibliography. Candidates wishing to enter for this examination must already hold I.A. Certificates, have passed the Preliminary Test, or else hold certificates approved by the Education Committee. Fee 5s. for each section. Last day of entry 10th April.

The Preliminary Test will be held on Wednesday, 12th May, 1920. Fee 2s. 6d. Last day of entry 10th April.

Copies of the Syllabus (price 1s. 6d. post free), together with all particulars, can be obtained on application to the Secretary, Library Association, Caston Hall, Westminster, S.W.1.

The Examination for this year only will be held according to the Syllabus of 1915-16.
Art Exhibitions

The MALVENS—Landscape Impressions by Leonard Richmond.

ELDRAD GALLERY, 40, GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET, W.

Admission 1s., 3d., including catalogue.

"GARDENS GAY AND JOYOUS"

By BEATRICE PARSONS

AT THE GREATREX GALLERIES

14, GRAFTON STREET, NEW BOND STREET, W.1.

MARCH 3 to 31.

Daily 10 to 5. Saturday 10 to 1.

NEW ART SALON

160, SHAFTESBURY AVENUE (First Floor)

EXHIBITION OF PAINTINGS by BRACQUE, DERRAIN, LHOTE, MARCHAND MODIGLIANI, PICASSO, SIGNAC, VALMINK.

Daily 10 to 6. From 17th February

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTER ETCHERS AND ENGRAVERS, Sa, PALL MALL EAST, S.W.

38th Annual Exhibition. Daily 10 to 5.

WALKER'S GALLERIES, 118, NEW BOND STREET, W.

Exhibition of Water-Colour Drawings by Alfred H. Hart, F.R.I.B.A.

Rare old coloured Aquatints of Places of Interest.

Water-Colour Drawings by W. W. Collins, R.I.

FROM THE 3RD TO 20TH MARCH ONLY.

AUGUSTUS JOHN'S WAR, PEACE CONFERENCE, AND OTHER PORTRAITS.

THE GALLERY OF THE ALPINE CLUB, MINT STREET, CONDUIT STREET.

"There is one thing Mr. Augustus John has above his contemporaries; that is, an instinct for painting."—Morning Post.

"It needs no prophetic insight to foretell that the exhibition will be one of the sensations of the season."—Daily News.

Booksellers & Catalogues

SCIENTIFIC BOOKS & SERIALS.

JOHN WHEELDON & CO. have the largest stock in the country of Books in all departments of Science and Natural History, also Transactions and Journals of Learned Societies, etc., in sets, runs, and single volumes or numbers.

LIBRARIES OR SMALL PARCELS PURCHASED.

SEPARATE CATALOGUES ON ALL SUBJECTS.

TWOPENCE EACH, POST FREE.

38 GREAT QUEEN STREET, KINGSWAY, LONDON, W.C.2.

Telephone: Gerrard 1412.

THE ART OF PRINTING

A COLLECTION OF FINE BOOKS PRINTED FROM THE FOLLOWING CELEBRATED PRESSES:

CARADOC, ERASD, ELSTON, ESSEX HOUSE, AND THE VALE PRESS.

Prices from 12s. each, post free.

Full particulars on application to

L. CHAUNOIS OF OXFORD LTD.

2, ALBEMARLE STREET, LONDON, W.

EGYPT, PALESTINE, and the FAR EAST: Travel; Arabian Nights; and Napoleon Era. New Catalogue free on application.—J. A. ALLEN & Co., 16, GRENVILLE STREET, LONDON, W.C.1.

W. & G. FOYLE, LTD., 121-125, CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON, W.C.2

Sales by Auction

VALUABLE BOOKS, THE PROPERTY OF THE EARL OF PEMBROKE

WILL BE SOLD BY AUCTION at their Large Galleries, 34 and 35, New Bond Street, W.1, on Monday, March 15, and two following days, at one o'clock precisely.

VALUABLE BOOKS selected from the library at Wilton House, Salisbury, the property of the Right Hon. the Earl of Pembroke, comprising Rare Americans, including the Rev. John Eliot's Indian Bible, 1683; De Bry, Voyages; R. Eburne, Plaine Path-way to Plantations, 1624; Capt. L. Fox, North-West Fox, 1635; T. Morton, New English Canaan, 1637; W. Penn, Frame of the Government of Pennsylvania, 1682; Capt. John Underhill, Newest from America, 1688; Philip Vincent, True Relation of the late Battell fought in New England, 1637; W. Wood, New England's Prospect, 1635; etc. English Literature of the Tudor and Stuart Periods, including C. Aleyne, Battles of Crewe and Poictiers, 1631; Arnold's Chronicle, n.d.; Sir E. Dyer, The Praye of Nothing, 1585; S. Gosson, Schoole of Abuse, 1579; T. Heywood, An Apology for Actors, 1612, and J. Green, Refutation of the Apology, 1615; R. Johnson, Essays, 1607; The Faytene Joys of Maryage, 1509; T. Stanley, Poems, 1650; Tell Trothes New Yeare's Gift, 1593; and Ten Grammatical Tracts printed by Wynkyn de Worde. Devotional and Controversial Works by English and Scotch Writers and Divines, including R. Anton, J. Bale, Bishop Ponte, Henoch Clapham, W. Hurnis, J. Freeman, M. Coverdale, Lady Jane Grey, Alexander Hales, John Harrison, Roger Hutchinson, John Knox, Ninian Winget, William Turner, John Wycliffe, etc. Early Works on the Fine Arts; Broadsides and Tracts; Voyages and Travels; A Large Collection of Elzevirs, etc.

May be viewed two days prior. Catalogues may be had. Illustrated catalogues may also be had, price 2s. 6d.

For Sale

FOR SALE.—Flourishing good first-class PREPARATORY SCHOOL, Seaside. 45 boarders paying high fees. Receipts £5,500 per annum. Profits nearly £2,000. Excellent freehold premises and grounds. May be bought or Cambridge graduate. Price £15,000, of which £9,000 can remain on mortgage. Principals or their solicitors only.—"Felix," c/o Steele's Advertising Service, Ltd., Norfolk House, Norfolk Street, W.C.2.

Entertainments

HOLBORN EMPIRE

HOLBORN TUBE STATION.

LEWIS CASSON AND BRUCE WINSTON'S SEASON OF DAILY MATINEES AT 3.30.

Next Week, "MEDEA" Mar. 15, "Tom-Trotter".

Authors' Agents, etc.

THE AUTHOR'S ALLIANCE are prepared to consider and place MSS. for early publication. Literary work of all kinds dealt with by experts who place Authors' interests first. Twenty years' experience. Please note new address: 93 and 94, CRANCERY LANE, LONDON, W.C.2.

-AUTHORS-

MSS. placed at highest prices: free monthly prizes; terms for stamp.—Cambridge Literary Agency, 8, Henrietta-St., W.C.2

Typewriting &c.

TYPEWRITING OF EVERY DESCRIPTION carefully and promptly executed at home, 1s. per 1,000 words; carbon copy, 3d. per 1,000 words. Duplating, Cambridge Local.—Miss NANCY McFARLANE, 11, Palmeira Avenue, Westcliff Essex.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS., Examination Papers, Letters, Circulars, Testimonials, General Copying, Duplicating, etc.—J. Trimnell, 8, Mina Terrace, Cardiff.

TYPEWRITING accurately and promptly executed, 10d., 1,000 words; carbon copy, 3d. 1,000.—Miss L. MITCHELL, 58, Willow Vale, Cobham's Bush, W.12.
THE CALL of the Stricken Lands of Europe

Fighting Disease and Famine in Austria, Germany and Poland

1. The womanhood and young life of Europe are in peril, and there is no frontier to disease. Tuberculosis, Rickets, and Typhus are decimating the countries of Poland, Austria, Hungary, Germany, Czecho-Slovakia, Serbia, and elsewhere.

2. Food, Warmth and Medical Supplies are the only effective weapons with which to combat the ever-spreading Mid-European scourge.

3. In the face of these needs, money is needed to provide MILK for the three-and-a-half million young children who will die without it.

4. The greatest suffering of this Winter is from the lack of warmth. COAL can be obtained in some parts of Europe if paid for in English pounds.

5. CLOTHING MATERIALS are needed for making into garments to cover the shivering millions of innocent children.

6. Contributions will be gratefully received by the FRIENDS' EMERGENCY and WAR VICTIMS' RELIEF COMMITTEE, (A. Ruth Fry, Hon. Secretary), 27, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.2.

7. Gifts of Clothing (new or partly worn) will be welcomed at the Warehouse, 11, St. Bride Street, London E.C.4.

Kindly mention the "ATHENÆUM" when replying to this appeal.
METHUEN'S POPULAR NOVELS

HOW THEY DID IT. Crown Svo. 8s. net. Gerald O'Donovan
PILATE GAVE SENTENCE. Crown Svo. 7s. 6d. net. C. M. Cresswell
WELL-TO-DO ARTHUR. Crown Svo. 7s. 6d. net. W. Pett Ridge
MOMENTS OF FORTUNE. Crown Svo. 7s. 6d. net. A. C. T. Boon
CALL MR. FORTUNE. Crown Svo. 7s. 6d. net. E. W. Guppy
LOVE WILL FIND OUT THE WAY. Crown Svo. 7s. 6d. net. D. A. Turnball
SESTINA. Crown Svo. 6s. 6d. net. A. Saffron-Middleton

DAD. Crown Svo. 6s. net. Albert P. Terhune
JOHN BULL, JUNIOR. Crown Svo. 6s. net. Grace S. Richmond
RED AND BLACK. Crown Svo. 6s. net. Charles A. Seltzer
FIREBRAND TREVISAN. Crown Svo. 6s. net. Edna Ferber
ROAST BEEF MEDIUM. Crown Svo. 6s. net. John C. Beesham
THE ARGUS PHEASANT. Crown Svo. 6s. net. Edgar R. Bury-Young
THE GODS OF MARS. Crown Svo. 6s. net. Ernest G. Glanville
TYROPA. Crown Svo. 6s. net. Charles Neville-Buck
THE CODE OF THE MOUNTAINS. Crown Svo. 6s. net.
CONTENTS

MARGINALIA AND OTHER NOTES:
- An Unpublished Essay by Shelley ...
- Poetry and Cosmopolisen ...
- A History of the Christian Church ...
- Marginalia, by Anthony ...
- Bibliographical Notes ...
- Book Sales ...

MUSIC:
- Opera at the Surrey, by Edward J. Dent ... 315
- Concerts ... 315
- DRAMA:
- Emotions ... 314
- Dramedy ... 314

LITERATURE, THE ARTS

JOHN CLARE

EST the eternal impulse of poetry should seem mere superstition, unelemental, superinduced, and man-handled; lest poetry itself appear to belong solely to the region of education and mental refinement, from the highways and byways of the land at times have come and shall come signs and utterances to prove its natural origin. There is to-day a profusion of poetic composition; there is surprising command of form and diction, there is brilliance and purpose, and little besides. With a few notable exceptions, we know precisely the level on which the modern poet feels himself to be competent, whether his preference be to describe leaves as "green" or to describe them as "wooden." The new canon may be thus expressed, "You can't put that"; and so while actual bathos is missing, outflash is likewise carefully checked. Well might the cynic of to-day, weary of the search for the real daring of straightforwardness with all its imperfections, return to Cowper's condemnation of "a mere mechanic art"; or to that finest apologia, "In 'Endymion' I leapt headlong into the sea, and thereby have become better acquainted with the soundings, the quicksands, and the rocks, than if I had stayed upon the green shore, and piped a silly pipe, and took tea and comfortable advice." And thus direct was John Clare.

Born two years before Keats, John Clare was by nature and force of circumstances an unquestioning believer of his creed, "Beauty is Truth." In a dismal overcrowded Northamptonshire cottage his tragic life began, and wretched as were the conditions of farm labourers then, Clare's father was deprived by recurring illness of what small livelihood he had once obtained. Accordingly the little boy, who at his birth "might have been put into a pint-pot," was at the earliest age sent out to mind geese and cows, to help with his own miniature flail at corn-threshing, and worse, to follow the plough in heavy soils. There was already something about him which caused the village folk to shake their heads. The horizon puzzled him not a little, and one day he wandered miles and miles to reach it. Rounding up his cows in marshy ground, he always looked fearfully over his shoulder, for there were ghosts in ambush waiting to attack him. Further, he was well known to be fond of an old gipsy-woman, who taught him folk-songs and weather-wisdom. And soon, while jobbing at the Blue Bell, burning lime, or serving in the militia, he made himself at home with reading and writing, and on scraps of paper tried his hand at ballads of his own.

And now his life became complex indeed. Poetry and love constantly beset him with exaltations and depressions, and made him so unsatisfactory a day-labourer that he could afford neither of them. With vast trouble, it is true, he hoarded together a pound and distributed a proposal for publishing by subscription "A Collection of Original Trifles"; but his first sweetheart, who was to him as Fanny Brawne to another John, was forbidden by a hard-headed father to take any further notice of this wild-looking, verse-making, out-of-work whopstraw. This blow was at length the main theme in the tragedy of John Clare.

But good came out of the poetical prospectus, and in January, 1829, the publishers of Keats issued the Poems of John Clare, a Northamptonshire peasant, with a remarkable introduction and a glossary of words "not to be found in Johnson." Now for a time the shadow seemed to lift from Clare; he married, he became fashionable, visitors picked their way through the mud of Helpstone to find his cottage, and a public fund reached such a success that Clare was ensured a sort of annuity of £30. Next year "The Village Minstrel," by "The Northamptonshire Peasant," appeared, and increased the popular admiration, and Clare had made the acquaintance of most of the literary lions of the day, particularly those of the London Magazine.

But, just as the lime-kiln owner had found the poet a poor lime-burner, so now and henceforward Clare found himself a failure in practical matters. Attempts at smallholding came to nothing, and presently the faint praise and fainter sale accorded to his third book of poems overcast his outlook entirely. He wrote for the annuals, which mostly omitted to pay him; and of such a peculiar cast was his nature that he even refused anything like generous remuneration from his great friend Allan Cunningham, who was always glad to use his poems. Meanwhile he was half-starving himself so that his growing family might not go hungry; and wandering dejectedly through the fields he began to encourage hallucination. With a sort of double personality, he saw the tragedy of John Clare and his lost first love Mary, and, as a third person, before his own wife would talk of the troubles of John Clare, to a Mary whom he alone could see. He was at last taken away to a private asylum in Essex, but escaped home, crawling along with bleeding hands and feet, and eating grass. Not even this terrible journey availed him. His last book had appeared, and was scarcely noticed; and then John Clare was condemned, for the stated reason of "having spent years addicted to poetical prosings," to spend his remaining years in the madhouse at Northampton. Almost thirty years afterwards he crept to the window to look on the sunny meadows for the last time.

It cannot be said that Clare's poetry ever had fair play, even while he was alive and sane. His publishers were responsible for the selection and final re-touching of his poems, and doubtless aimed at suiting the taste of the moment rather than the essential Clare. His very rank in life, which brought him such success over his earliest book, eventually darkened his light; for the public, having bought his juvenilia with glibness so readily, soon reckoned him a mere literary curiosity, and left his later, finer work unopened. After his death, more of his poems were edited, in the offensive sense, of the word, by his biographer J. L. Cherry; and then at last Clare, having palely survived the nineteenth century in mild gift-books of the "Sabbath-Bells-Chimed-By-The-Poets" sort, was given a fresh hearing by Mr. Arthur Symons, who was fortunate in recovering from MSS. several astonishing poems. A vast quantity of Clare's manuscripts, however, lies derelict still, and offers the fascination of a treasure-hunt.

Of the poems published up to the present, it is curious to notice that the earlier ones are largely meditative, those written in the asylum chiefly lyrical. Throughout, in happy intimacy with village life and field life, Clare far excels any other English nature poet; indeed, his very variety of detail sometimes makes him monotonous to the less observant reader. Grandeur impressed him less than his customary walk in a swampy pasture; and in his power of making "an old mill and two or three stunted trees" rich and beautiful he is a sort of Ruysdael. He blinks at nothing. Colour and odd sound are natural to him:

"twas sweet, to list
The stubbles crackling with the heat,
Just as the sun broke through the mist
And warm'd the herdsmen's rusty seat;
And grunting noise of rambling hogs,
Where pattering acorns oddly drop;
And noisy bark of shepherd dogs,
The restless routs of sheep to stop;
While distant thresher's swingle drops
With sharp and hollow-twanking raps;
And nigh at hand the echoing chops
Of hardy hedger stopping gaps...

This is the earlier Clare, and it would seem impossible for him ever to exhaust his ruralities. As he wrote more, he took a hint from his kindly critic Lamb and "tempered that rustic slang of his"; and further he gained in intensity. His pictures at length become unsurpassable in their kind:

Where squats the hare, to toors wide awake,
Like some brown clad the harrows failed to break, or again, of house-fies in a mild February,
With feeble pace, they often creep
Along the sun-warmed window-pane,
Like dreaming things that walk in sleep.

His finest work in his contemporaries volumes of verse—let no one insist on damning him for his many failures after Burns and "Grongar Hill"—is contained in sonnets and other brief pieces conveying (like Bewick's tailpieces) momentary impressions of nature with startling power. Of these crystallizations Clare is prodigal; and somewhat akin to them are the longer and more personal or more analytical poems, such as "The Flitting," "Taste," and "Remembrances." The rhythm of the last-named poem of childhood is quite wonderful:

Summer's pleasures they are gone, like to visions every one. And the cloudy days of autumn and of winter cometh on.

There is another important aspect of this truest and unluckiest of poets. As a lyric poet purely, he never really achieved an authentic note until "the shipwreck of his own esteems" had tortured him into a new being. Then came the bursts of song, utterly unspoiled by his old slavish echoing of Burns; nor in his tragedy did he merely moan and cry, but of his happy loves, his childhood in the green land, the warm colour and bright tumult of nature, he would ring out rich and wild as a blackbird. It is true that he often ends in a sob:

I am! yet what I am who cares or knows?— but the glorious buoyancy of Clare in the madhouse is one of the finest things in human history. When he poises, as sometimes he does, on the verge of joy and sorrow, his poetry is the most moving:

now he writes an Adieu!—

I left the little birds,
And sweet lowing of the herds,
And couldn't find out words,
Do you see.
To say to them good-bye,
Where the yellowcups do lie:
So heaving a deep sigh,
Took to sea...

now he grieves for a little child (perhaps the same for whom he wrote those merry songs "Trotty Wagtail" and "Clock-a-Clay"):
THE HUMANITY OF TCHEHOV

LETTERS OF ANTON TCHEHOV TO HIS FAMILY AND FRIENDS.
Translated from the Russian by Constance Garnett. (Chatto & Windsor, 12s. 6d. net.)

THE case of Tchcnev is one to be investigated again and again because he is the only great modern artist in prose. Tolstoy was living throughout Tchehov's life, as Hardy has lived throughout our town, and these are great among the greatest. But they are not modern. It is an essential part of their greatness that they could not be; they have a simplicity and scope that manifestly belongs to all time rather than to this. Tchehov looked towards Tolstoy as we to Hardy. He saw in him a Colossus, one whose achievement was of another and a greater kind than his own.

I am afraid of Tolstoy's death. If he were to die there would be a big empty place in my life. To begin with, because I have never loved any man as much as him. Secondly, while Tolstoy is in literature it is easy and pleasant to be a literary man; even recognizing that one has done nothing and never will do nothing is not so dreadful, since Tolstoy will do enough for all his work is the justification of the enthusiasm and expectations built upon literature. Thirdly, Tolstoy takes a firm stand; he has an immense authority, and so long as he is alive, bad tastes in literature, vulgarity of every kind, insouciant and lachrymose all the hard realities will be in the far background, in the shade.

(January, 1900.)

Tchcnev realized the gulf that separated him from the great men before him, and he knew that it yawned so deep that it could not be crossed. He belonged to a new generation, and he alone perhaps was fully conscious of it.
"We are lemonade," he wrote in 1892.

Tell me honestly who of my contemporaries—that is, men between thirty and forty-five—have given the world one drop of alcohol? . . . Science and technical knowledge are passing through a great period now, but for our sort it is a flabby, stale, dull time. The causes of this are not to be found in our stupidity, our lack of talent, or our insolence, but in a disease which for the artist is worse than syphilis or sexual exhaustion.
We lack "something," that is true, and that means that, lift the robe of our muse, and you will find within an empty void. Let me remind you that the writers who we say are for all time or are simply good, and who intoxicates us, have one common and very important characteristic: they are going towards something and are summoning you towards it, too, and you feel, not with your mind but with your whole being, that they have some object, just like the ghost of Hamlet's father, who did not come and disturb the imagination for nothing. And we? We! We paint life as it is, but beyond that—nothing at all. . . . Flog us and we can do more! We have neither immediate nor remote aims, and in our soul there is a great empty space. We have no politics, we do not believe in revolution, we have no God, we are not afraid of ghosts, and I personally am not afraid even of death and blindness. One who wants nothing, hopes for nothing, and feels nothing cannot be an artist.

You think I am clever. Yes, I am at least so far clever as not to conceal from myself my disease and not to deceive myself, and not to cover up my own emptiness with other people's tags, such as the ideas of the 'sixties and so on.

That was written in 1892. When we remember all the strange literary effort gathered round about that year in the West—Symbolism, the "Yellow Book," Art for Art's sake—and the limbo into which it has been thrust by now, we may realize how great a precursor, and, in his own despite, a leader Anton Tchehov was. When Western literature was plunging with enthusiasm into one cul de sac after another, incapable of diagnosing its own disease, Tchehov in Russia, unknown to the West, had achieved a clear vision and a sense of perspective.

To-day we begin to feel how intimately Tchehov belongs to us; to-morrow we may feel how infinitely he is still advancing us. A man will always be the product of a talent, and in so far as we are concerned with the genius of Tchehov we must accept the inevitable.
We must analyse and seek to understand it; we must above all

When Autumn came, and blasts did sigh
And bare were flower and tree,
As he in ease in bed did lie
His soul seemed with the free,—
He died so quietly.

Fate has not ceased to pursue Clare since his death, and not only has his published work been neglected—notoriety, for instance, the callous and spiritually grotesque article in the "Dictionary of National Biography"—but also his asylum manuscripts, which probably contain his utmost achievement, and number five hundred poems, have long since gone astray. Is it too late to hope that they somewhere exist, and that the genuine, spontaneous, affectionate poetry of Clare may at last be recognized as one of the rarer possessions of England?

EDMUND BLunden.

ROMANTIC RELAPSE

Now is come the season of tranquil retrospect,
Meditation among the tombs of ancestors.
Accepted by those old spirits, I reject
This too crude world and all its groanings and errors.

Out of a clash of azure and scarlet and yellow,
I have come into a region of ivory and old gold.
There are soft edges to things, the air is fruity and mellow.
Smoothly waggle the dusty beards of the graciously old.—

"Welcome, my son. Repose yourself just here, my son,
On this delicious piece of Chippendale I place
Exactly here, that you remark the lines that run
Between the mantle-piece and the larger bookcase.

Every evening I read in great-grandfather's books.
Taste and great-grandpapa are synonymous for me.—
Here a Fragonard, I believe—nymphs pursued by pastry cooks:
The plumpest nymph a little gnawed by rats unfortunately!"

Old men go home in ripeness; their least gesture
Is weighty, thoughtful, significant and sage.
They are sober and harmonious in their vesture.
Old men, I envy your notable gift of age!

I will eagerly grow old, surround myself with antiques,
Move with severe men to a settled plan.
Before Time can whiten my hair and hollow my callow cheeks,
I shall be older and graver than any old man!

J. J. Adams.

THE SORROWS OF WERTHER

In old, dim days—nay, passionate, poignant, true—
Love-drunken Werther raved, despairsed, and died.
The other day I read it all anew,
And, ere I shut the covers, stepped inside
And found good Albert making from the room,
A little puzzled, busy, narrow, trim;
And Werther crouching in ecstatic gloom
While Lotte played that magic air for him,
Young, modest, generous and fair were they.
And when the little melody was played
He kissed her hand and wept—how cool it lay
In his, impassioned, hers, all unafraid!
Their twilight falls. Our insolent daylight shows,
(Bright feathers in the cold desert nest),
Her pretty ribbons and her turbulences,
His curious long blue coat and yellow vest.

F. W. Storck.
realize that since Tchekhov has written and been made accessible to us a vast amount of our modern literary production is simply unpardonable. Writers who would be modern and ignore Tchekhov's achievement are, however much they may persuade themselves that they are devoted artists, merely engaged in satisfying their vanity or in the exercise of a profession like any other; for Tchekhov is a standard by which modern literary effort must and measured, and the writer of prose fiction who is not sufficiently single-minded to apply the standard himself is of no particular account.

Though Tchekhov's genius, is, strictly speaking, inimitable, it deserves a much exacter study than it has yet received. The publication of this volume of his letters hardly affords the occasion for that; but it does afford an opportunity for the examination of some of the chief constituents of his perfect art. These touch us nearly because—we insist again—the supreme interest of Tchekhov is that he is the only great modern artist in prose. He belongs, as we have said, to us. If he is great, then he is great not least in virtue of qualities which we may aspire to possess ourselves; if he is an ideal, it is to which we can refer ourselves. He had been saturated in all the disillusions which we regard as peculiarly our own, and every quality which is distinctive of the epoch of consciousness in which we are living now is reflected in him—and yet, miracle of miracles, he was a great artist. He did not rub his cheeks to produce a spurious colour of health; he did not profess beliefs which he could not maintain; he did not seek a reputation for universal wisdom, or indulge himself in self-gratifying dreams of a millennium which he alone had the ability to control. He was and wanted to be nothing in particular, and yet, as we read these letters of his, we feel gradually forming in our souls the conviction that he was a hero more than that, the hero of our time.

It is important that, in reading the letters, we do not consider him under the aspect of an artist. We are inevitably fascinated by his character as a man, one who, by efforts which we have most frequently to divine for ourselves from his reticences, worked on the infinitely complex material of the modern mind and soul, and made it in himself a definite, positive and most lovable thing. He did not throw in his hand in face of his manifold bewilderments; he did not fly for refuge to institutions in which he did not believe; he risked everything, in Russia, by having no particular faith in revolution and saying so. In every conjuncture of his life that he could trace in his letters, he beheld him merely by himself, and, since he is our great exemplar, by us. He refused to march under any political banner—a thing, let it be remembered, of almost inconceivable courage in his country; he submitted to savagely hostile attacks for his political indifference; yet he spent more of his life and energy in doing active good to his neighbour than all the high-souled professors of liberalism and social reform. He undertook an almost superhuman journey to Sahalin in 1890 to investigate the condition of the prisoners there; in 1892 he spent the best part of a year as a doctor devising preventive measures against the cholera in the country district where he lived, and, although he could do no writing, he refused the government pay in order to preserve his own independence of action; in another year he was the leading spirit in organizing practical measures of famine relief about Nizhni-Novgorod. From his childhood to his death, moreover, he was the sole support of his family. Measured by the standards of Christian morality, Tchekhov was wholly a saint. His self-devotion was boundless.

Yet we know he was speaking nothing less than the truth of himself when he wrote: "It is essential to be indifferent." Tchekhov was indifferent; but his indifference, as a mere catalogue of his secret philanthropies will show, was of a curious kind. He made of it, as it were, an axiomatic basis of his own self-discipline. Since life is what it is and men are what they are, he seems to have argued, everything depends upon the individual. The stars are hostile, but love is kind, and love is within the compass of any man if he will work for it. In one of his earliest letters he defines true culture for the benefit of his brother Nikolay, who lacked it. Cultivated persons, he says, respect human personality; they have sympathy not for beggars and cats only; they respect the property of others, and therefore pay their debts; they are sincere and dread lying like fire; they do not disengage themselves to arouse compassion; they have no shallow vanity; if they have a talent they respect it; they develop the aesthetic feeling in themselves... they seek as far as possible to restrain and ennoble the sexual instinct. The letter from which these chief points are taken is a monument of sympathy and wit. Tchekhov was twenty-six when he wrote it. He concludes with the words: "What is needed is constant work day and night, constant reading, study, will. Every hour is precious, guard it." In that letter are given all the elements of Tchekhov the man. He set himself to achieve a new humanity, and he achieved it. The indifference upon which Tchekhov's humanity was built was not therefore a moral indifference; it was, in the main, the recognition and acceptance of the fact that life itself is indifferent. To that he held fast to the end. But the conclusion which he drew from it was not that it made no particular difference what anyone did, but that the attitude and character of the individual were all-important. There was, indeed, no panacea, political or religious, for the ills of humanity; but there could be a mitigation in men's souls. But the new asceticism must not be negative. It must not cast away the goods of civilization because civilization is largely a sham.

Alas! I shall never be a Tolstoyan. In women I love beauty above all things, and in the history of mankind, culture expressed in carpets, carriages with springs, and keenness of wit. Ach! To make haste and become an old man and sit at a big table!

Not that there is a trace of the hedonist in Tchekhov, who voluntarily endured every imaginable hardship if he thought he could be of service to his fellow-men, but, as he wrote elsewhere, "we are conceived with phases alone." Since life is what it is, its amenities are doubly precious. Only they must be amenities without humbug.

Pharisaism, stupidity and despotism reign not in bourgeois houses and prisons alone. I see them in science, in literature, in the younger generation. That is why I have no preference either for gendarmes, or for butchers, or for scientists, or for writers, or for the younger generation. I regard trade marks and labels as a superstition. My holy of holies is the human body, health, intelligence, talent, inspiration, love, and the most absolute freedom—freedom from violence and lying, whatever forms they may take. This is the programme I would follow if I were a great artist.

What the "most absolute freedom" meant to Tchekhov his whole life is witness. It was a liberty of a purely moral kind, a liberty, that is, achieved at the cost of a great effort in self-discipline and self-refinement. In one letter he says he is going to write a story about the son of a serf—Tchekhov was the son of a serf—who "squeezed the slave out of himself." Whether the story was ever written we do not know, but the process is one to which Tchekhov applied himself all his life long. He waged a war of extermination against the lie in the soul in himself, and by necessary implication in others also.

He was, thus, in all things a humanist. He faced the universe, but he did not deny his own soul. There could be for him no antagonism between science and literature, or science and humanity. They were all ples; it was men who quarreled among themselves. If men would only develop a little more loving-kindness, things would be better. The first duty of the artist was to be a decent man.

Solidarity among young writers is impossible and unnecessary. We cannot feel and think in the same way, our aims are different, or we have no aim at all, and so there is nothing on which this solidarity could be securely hooked... And is there any need for it? No, in order to help a colleague, to respect his personality and work, to refrain from gossiping about him, envying him telling him lies and being hypocritical, one does not need so much to be a young writer as simply a man...

It seems a simple discipline, this moral and intellectual honesty of Tchekov's, yet in these days of conceit and coterie his letters strike us as more than strange. One predominant impression remains: it is that of Tchekov's candour of soul. Somehow he had achieved with open eyes the mystery of pureness of heart; and in that, though we dare not analyse it further, lies the secret of his greatness as a writer and of his present importance to ourselves.

J. M. M.

NEW PROSPECTS

Science and Life. By Frederick Soddy. (Murray. 10s. 6d. net.)

It is surely a great merit in Mr. Soddy's book that it awakens in us once more the feeling of adventure. The war, amongst other things, gave us a surfeit of adventure; the quest of the new, the strange, the thrilling, here suffered a kind of reductio ad absurdum, for we came to see, all too clearly, what weary, stale, unprofitable realities underlay all these dazzling appearances. The world has become old. The great thoughts of the sages, the inspired utterances of the poets, can now stir but a languid interest; we know the ideal does not shape the real. As the war-mongers said, the war brought us back to realities. It did; and we are bored to impotence by them. Even travel books have lost their charm; we remember the words of the great Abbé: "Les postillons nous disent que voici Montbard. Ce lieu m'est inconnu. Néanmoins je ne crains pas d'affirmer, par analogie, que les gens qui vivent là, nos semblables, sont égoïstes, lâches, perfides, gourmands, libidineux. Autrement, ils ne seraient point des hommes..."

Being brought back to realities, and finding that they are purely "material," we can discover hope of essential change only in a profound alteration in the material basis of life. Mr. Soddy's book is exciting because this is exactly what he promises. He implies that the "spiritual" forces, philosophy, literature, the arts, have had a good innings, and that the results they have achieved do not inspire confidence. He suggests that we turn to science and makes it the chief reason for effecting the change. He accepts the intended reproach that science is materialistic. In a civilization which is at the point of disaster for purely material reasons he thinks the first place should be given to that activity which promises the richest material results. The reproach of science has become its glory: its title to immortality now justifies its claim to be regarded as the savour of the world. But this is not all. The choice is not between recognizing and ignoring science; it cannot be ignored, and the choice is between a friend and an enemy. If we do not allow it to build the world, it will infallibly blow it to pieces.

Let us suppose that it became possible to extract the energy which now oozes out, so to speak, from radio-active materials over a period of thousands of millions of years, in as short a time as we pleased. From a pound weight of such substances one would get about as much energy as would be obtained by burning 150 tons of coal. How splendid! Or a pound weight could be made to do the work of 150 tons of dynamite. Ah! there's the rub. Imagine, if you can, what the present war would be like if such an explosive had actually been discovered instead of still being in the keeping of the future. Yet it is a discovery that conceivably might be made tomorrow in time for its development and perfection for the use or destruction, let us say, of the next generation, and which, it is pretty certain, will be made by science sooner or later.

As Mr. Soddy shows, such purely materialistic considerations are extremely pertinent to human welfare. A community which could liberate the energy of the atom could gain wealth surpassing the dreams of avarice. And by wealth Mr. Soddy makes it clear that he means control of nature, ensuring, almost as by-products, food, raiment, health and leisure. Mr. Soddy says that some of the elements of scientific education affect to despise such considerations and that he therefore addresses his remarks primarily to the Labour Party. If the opponents of Labour allow it to monopolize this programme Labour will indeed sweep the country. Practically the whole of Mr. Soddy's book is concerned to emphasize this point that science can no longer be neglected, that it is the potential master of the world, and that even those devotees of the old culture who oppose it do so against their own interests, for science, and science alone, can effect that material reconstruction of society which is necessary if their activities are to endure. But since the opposition exists (Mr. Soddy's remarks on the diversion of the Carnegie funds reveal an interesting case of it) there is the danger that the endowment of science may be made a political issue. That Mr. Soddy is quite alive to this danger the following passage shows:

"The war being now over, it is not out of place to add that an even greater danger than neglect awaits the scientific investigator, the danger that he along with every other creative element in the community will be remorselessly shackled and exploited to bolster up the present discredited social system. But in the meantime the community somehow must contrive to rule through its creative elements, rather than to allow the non-creative elements to rule the creative.

Exactly! But Mr. Soddy does not tell us how this problem is to be solved. Any solution must depend upon an estimate of the morality and intelligence of the average man; this will determine whether or not we can be optimistic about the future. The problem is sinister in view of the fact that science presents two aspects. Those radio-active bombs, for instance, could doubtless make many hideous factories and slums unnecessary; they would also serve excellently to support a tyranny. In the long run, therefore, the future rests, as always, with the will of man. Science only makes the alternative more violent: it points to a brighter heaven or a blacker hell. And because Mr. Soddy emphasizes this alternative and shows us how real and insistent it is, how unprecedentedly great are the possibilities that our actions will make real, he has reawakened in us the spirit of adventure.

J. W. N. S.

MARCH: A SHAKESPEARE READING

Closely the formal hedges close us in,
The real white clouds look down on us to see
How very in many we all begin
To read a trag' dye.

There at our feet like little china toys
The hyacinths many-coloured stand and stare,
Utterly inattentive to this noise
Of quarrel in the air.

The "Duke of Bedford" in a crimson rage
To "haughty Bolingbroke" has given the lie,
When gently slips above his patter: page
An early butterfly.

And there we plead and stammer and get hoarse,
Basking in sunlight, while the breezes bring Down from the common with the scent of gorse
The laziness of spring.

DOROTHEA SUMNER.
PRINTING AND BOOK PRODUCTION

Printing: A Practical Treatise on the Art of Typography.
(Bell. 10s. 6d. net.)

Mr. Jacobi's handbook shares with the two works of Southward and Powell the task of meeting the needs of those who require a text-book on letterpress printing, and they are many. The ambitious apprentice and young journeyman, striving to get a wider view of the trade than can be obtained practically, through the subdivision of labour in the printing office, particularly if he is out of reach of a technical school, must have recourse to a text-book. The buyer of a printing and reading books must have recourse to the text-book in order to get an insight into the production of this very technical commodity. Type, paper, illustration, and format; the essentials of good workmanship—on these points and many others he needs light and guidance. Mr. Jacobi's handbook deals with these matters, though of course, owing to his restricted space, by no means fully. His volume gives a general view of all that relates to practical printing, but each section is little more than introductory. Under these limitations his method is excellent. His presentation of alphabets of various types facilitates comparative study, which, added to the practice of formal pen lettering, is the way to obtain a critical knowledge of the various designs. Unfortunately, he has not revised the section of his earlier editions, with the result that he retains a type like "Grange," and omits the all-important "Cheltenham" series. The recent types that show a close relation with pen lettering are not noticed. True, they are of antipathetic origin, but the designs are of British derivation, and every opportunity should be taken of pointing the moral to the British type-founder.

In dealing with paper Mr. Jacobi gives an excellent and most instructive selection of samples. If the qualities and appearance of these samples are thoroughly mastered, they will prove a sound foundation for a knowledge of paper in its relations to printing. On one point I offer a suggestion. Speaking of "Yellow Wove," Mr. Jacobi says that it is a "Light tint of 'blue wove'—a technical anomaly." If a sample of, say, "blue laid" was added, the comparison would make the anomaly less bewildering.

Another excellent feature of Mr. Jacobi's text-book is the Glossary Index. It does not, however, seem to have been revised, e.g., "American hard packing" can scarcely be said to be in contra-distinction to the normal style adopted in England in these days of half-tone printing, whatever it was when the passage was first written. The definition of "Antique type" is not the sense in which that term is used in the printing office, where it signifies a thickened form of the roman letter (cf. the examples on pp. 20 and 21), and this sense should be noted. "Beard" is not synonymous with "bevel" in general usage, but includes the flat part of the shoulder below the letter; "Counter," in the sense of the whites of a type made by the counter-punch, is not given. The term "Old Style" ought certainly to be referred to the type cut by Miller & Richard, after the revived old face of Caslon.

It is a pity Mr. Jacobi has not seen his way to add a chapter on the productions of the Chiswick Press, "quorum pars magna fuit." It would be a most valuable contribution to the history of printing in this country, for the Chiswick Press has clung tenaciously to the older traditions of the days of the hand-press—traditions that were carried on into machine printing, but have been ousted by the changes consequent on the introduction of half-tone process blocks. The Chiswick Press did much to keep alive a sense of craftsmanship in printing, and has been in touch with that other important chapter in printing history, the rise of the modern private presses, such as the Kelmscott Press and the Doves Press, as well as being closely associated with the late Mr. Proctor's attempt to revive fifteenth-century standards in Greek type design.

The history of printing in England during the last thirty years is, broadly, an account of the work of the private presses; of the renaissance of formal writing and its wide and deep influence on lettering; of the development of the half-tone and three-colour processes; of the growth of advertising, and the effect of men of greater culture and critical powers taking it up as a career; and of the growth of technical schools, particularly those forming part of an arts and crafts school. Schools of this type are far more valuable in developing the artistic side of a trade such as printing than Monotechnics, or even similar schools in Polytechnics, owing to the invaluable intercourse with classes in lettering and illustration; nor would the same purpose be served by setting up such classes in a Monotechnic; for, in their turn, these classes need the fertilizing influence of the main streams of artistic activities.

The private presses of to-day have mostly gone back to the fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries for their models, and interpreted them in a way that has set a standard for good book-work. The early books needed this interpretation, for their accidents made them seem entirely remote from modern work. We have learned that the scale, as well as the design of a type, is very important, and this has been entirely obscured for us by the perverse ingenuity that aimed at microscopical fineness, cf. Johnson's "Typographia," 1824. We have learned to value the texture as against the surface of a paper, simplicity of arrangement of the text, unity of type and illustration, and parsimony in our range of types.

The revival of formal handwriting has given us a standard of letter form, as opposed to the "elegance" so admired by earlier sentimentalism and wayward or grotesque fancy (cf. Stower's "Grammar of Printing," and typefounders' specimen books passim, for the latter constitute the limbo where the queer old types can still be found lingering).

Half-tone printing has developed the technique of printing to a deadly perfection, and the engineers have done their worst to give us perfect machinery. Gone is the honest old hand-press, a little clumsy, perhaps, but never attempting to imitate, in the flatness of its impression, work taken from the lithographer's stone. The sparkling wood-engraving has given place to the scratchy line-block or the vapid half-tone—though occasionally there is a strong reaction—even in colour work.

The technical schools have brought systematized instruction within the reach of the learner, in place of the hand-to-mouth method of "picking up the trade" which obtained in many printing offices. The Day Technical Schools have gone further, for they select boys according to a certain standard of attainment—by no means an ideal selection, but better than the mere drift that brought boys into the trade hitherto.

Advertising has influenced printing enormously—formerly in the direction of extreme vulgarity; but, during this last twenty years or more, with an ever-rising standard. For advertisers have shown themselves sensitively responsive to the improved taste in typography, and, in their turn, have spread this improvement in ever-widening circles. The advertisement, which was formerly a medley of types, is now often an admirable piece of design or pattern, restrained, and in excellent taste: the other kind of taste is still abundant.

In conclusion, let me again emphasize the importance of the work of the private presses; for the Kelmscott Press

* The small type, of which there is a good deal, is about seventeen lines to an inch.
re-established the standards of good paper and ink, of sound design and generous scale in type, and set an example of joyous decoration that fairly exulted in laborious workmanship, and scamped nothing. The Doves Press set a standard of beautiful and austere typography—undecorated except for its large initial letters and words, yet to some of us, in its plain elegance, adorned the most. The Chiswick Press, almost alone amongst the commercial printing offices in London, has, meanwhile, kept alive a high standard of general workmanship in book production.

J. H. Mason.

DEMOCRACY

THE MEANING OF DEMOCRACY. By Ivor J. C. Brown. (R. Cobden-Sanderson. 6s. net.)

Mr. Brown has been irritated by the newspapers. It is an emotion that most of us have experienced, although our reactions to the irritation may have been very different. Some of us, self-conscious intellectuals, have accepted the claim of the newspaper to represent the ordinary man, have decided that so muddle-headed and powerful a creature will inevitably ruin civilization, and have developed a class consciousness. We no longer believe that the great banner of the arts and sciences will lead mankind to a better world. We have fueled the great banner, and each of us waves a little pocket flag for the melancholy interest of seeing how long he can wave it. Mr. Brown has reacted in a different way. He thinks that the newspapers represent, not the ordinary man, but the enemies and exploiters of the ordinary man; that they continually tell the ordinary man that he has achieved democracy in order to prevent him from achieving it. As a counter-blast he proposes to show what democracy really is and leave the ordinary man to decide whether he has got it. He has produced an excellent little book.

He is no doctrinaire: he avoids the mistake made by stupidly logical people of pushing principles to their logical conclusions. We must deal with things in the rough, for the simple reason that we are dealing with great numbers of people. This is his defence of the democratic doctrine of equality, a doctrine which is obviously false, but whose alternatives are unworkable. The more people we deal with, the less practical it becomes to distinguish between them. The seats in omnibuses are designed in the light of this principle, with the result that exceptionally long-legged people are greatly inconvenienced. But any other method is uneconomical and unpractical.

Having established the principles of democracy in this common-sense way, Mr. Brown goes on to consider how democracy may be practically ensured. Large populations mean representative government. Representative government means a certain amount of injustice to minorities. How can this be made a minimum? Mr. Brown here refers the reader to Proportional Representation, the Alternative Vote, and so on. He does not discuss them; his purpose is to show what point in the general theory these schemes come in. The community of equal persons having, on one method or another, elected their representatives, there remain the knotty problems of controlling the never-ending audacity of elected persons, and, more difficult still, of supervising the administrative officials. Again we must be practical. "The ship of State must be steered between the Scylla of pettifigging obstruction and the Charybdis of an autocratic bureaucracy." He proposes committees like those of the French Chamber. But at this point a doubt, which grows more insistent as the argument advances, occurs to him. All this supervision on the part of the electorate means a lot of vigilance and hard work. Will not the ordinary man find this rather tiresome? As Mr. Brown grows more and more detailed, so the ordinary man has to work harder and harder. We see him changing under our eyes. He becomes more and more public-spirited, he grows wiser and more educated, his interests change, and we see the white dawn of the millennium. The consciousness of this worries Mr. Brown a little. He sticks to his guns, however; if democracy is to be a success the ordinary man must take it seriously. "Of course, if mankind refuses to be interested, and prefers beer to ballot papers and backing winners to watching officials, the task is hopeless. We are lost." "But Mr. Brown prefers to believe that mankind will respond. To make the response easier he has to introduce Guild Socialism, of which he gives a very persuasive account. Even now the chief inducement he offers is the pleasure of striking "the bound of an uphill journey with the prospect of a fine view ahead." So we come back to Montesquieu's saying that the principle of democracy is virtue. We shall interpret this as a promise or a warning according to our estimate of the ordinary man.

IN LAVENDER

FROM FRIEND TO FRIEND. By Lady Ritchie. (Murray. 6s. net.)

"What wondrous visionary estate do I not owe to my good friend!" says Lady Ritchie in the story that ends this book, speaking through the lips of a poor teacher in Kensington who lives on her memories of the Highland castle which is the home of one of her pupils. In the author's own case the "good friend" was life, and "the visionary estate" she received from it was boundless and full of charm. It is not, as she paints it, a rugged or romantic landscape; its colours are nowhere dazzling; but it is always a land of peace and sober beauty. If at times, in spite of its delicate artistry, the narrative grows a little prim, there is usually a twinkle of humour to light it up again before many lines are past. Our old-world hostess is too skillful to let us get dull.

As in an agreeable conversation, her good things come out pell-mell, without much plan or sequence. Now we get a subtly amusing sketch of the Tennyson's friends. Mrs. Cameron, a true Victorian grande dame, with her kindly-meaned despotism and her ocean of correspondence; now we hear Liszt replying to an impertinent question of Mme. Metternich about his profits, "Je laisse les aînées aux banquiers et aux diplomates"; now we read of the dignified, but somewhat awe-inspiring, old age of Fanny Kemble, the most lovable, perhaps, of all the tragedy-queens of our stage. While Lady Ritchie tells us of the mature woman, our thoughts fly back to the girl who offered to retrieve the family fortunes by appearing straight from school as Juliet at Covent Garden, and to the picture she has left of herself, waiting tremulously in her dressing-room before the ordeal, with her aunt silently renewing her rouge as the tears steal down her face. Then we wake to find that Lady Ritchie has gone back to the vanished Rome of the fifties, and is telling how "monks in their flapping robes and sandals walked the streets in those days; so did cardinals, followed by their attendant footmen: the Pope himself used to go by, blessing the kneeling people, his great coach following at a little distance." And presently, when travel memories are exhausted, she goes to her esctoir and brings out early letters of her father's, in which the future author of "Esmor" laments, his inability to paint grimy canvases of the Rape of the Sabine Women.

It will be seen that Thackeray's daughter at least knew that to justify a book of reminiscences it was not enough to remember the frocks she wore at children's parties, or how ill she felt when she first crossed the Channel. She was too scrupulous an artist to yield to that temptation. "O si sic omnes!"
A VISION OF THE PAST

WILLIAM SMITH, POTTER AND FARMER. By George Bourne.
(Chato & Windus. 6s. net.)

ONE of the numerous horrible results of the recent war—or rather, perhaps, their total in its effect on the imagination—is the illusion of a gap in the continuity of things. It is as though in and after August, 1914, this unfortunate universe had scraped over a celestial reef, and become permanently damaged—as though little remained for us but to man the pumps and watch the water rise about us. Of course, the catastrophe was, in fact, a much more profound affair, and even if it should prove to have shaken an over-rated civilization to pieces, there is yet no observable deterioration in the colours of sunset, and the reed-beds shake in the wind and sunlight as ever before. That is the really important point—that the elements of beauty are safe for ever.

But, except at indefinable and incalculable moments, the important things, whether of nature or of human nature, lie beyond our ken. We are obsessed by the partial successes and failures of life, by the things that float on the surface—just now particularly by the political scum. Hence a peculiar feeling of gratitude at this time towards a book that draws us away from the surface to the quiet undercurrents of life, and, reminding them of things unnoticed in the past, suggests that depth and motion ensure their own continuity, however strangely the course of the stream may be altered; for it is the depth and motion of the tides of human life.

It may have happened to anyone walking in English country to turn aside, knock at a farmhouse door, and ask if he can be served with tea; to be then admitted to a homely kitchen, and watch the housewife preparing the meal, laying the table, setting twigs to kindle on the sunken fire; and if children be there, dividing their interest between these activities and the occasion of them, he may have wondered how the picture into which he has stepped must appear to those who grow up in familiarity with it. One of the children has grown up, has learned the more complex speech which serves to communicate impressions and memories, and tells us here (Part I.) how the Farmhouse looked to his childish eyes. He was an inmate of Street Farm only at Christmas and in the summer; his mother lived at Farnham, seven miles away. But he belonged to it by kinship, and the house, the outbuildings, and the adjacent grass-land had for him the close, vivid familiarity of happy careless days; and something of this he conveys to us. This is but prefatory matter, however, though charming and essential to the theme he develops in the Second Part of his book: the life of the generations which preceded him at the Farm, as evoked by him with pious skill from his own impression, and from the memory of those whose childhood had lain in the first half of the nineteenth century.

William Smith was born in 1790, and after a career at school which lasted three days, he assumed the dignity, or a share of the dignity, of bread-winner to the family of his newly-widowed mother; this, maybe, at the age of ten or thereabouts. He became a potter's apprentice, and at the age of nineteen bought the pottery business at Farnborough. He added a farm to it as business improved, fostered by his skill and enterprise, and the capital which a second marriage brought to it. At the farm he established himself and his family in a position of stability and comfort, which entailed cares, indeed, and constant occupation, but in its balance of activities, its full use of opportunities within a limited range, its freedom from barren dissatisfactions and ambitions, presents a picture of human development almost ideal in its adjustment to its surroundings.

These surroundings are sketched slightly, but convincingly. Farnborough, set amidst the Surrey and Hampshire heaths, lay off the main road, and over a great part of the time recorded the railway did not cut into its immediate neighbourhood. William Smith, whose business took him not infrequently to London, was something of a travelled man, even in the eyes of the local gentry. The latter did not intrude unduly into the life of the inhabitants of the farm; though Lady Palmer or a friend of hers found it necessary to call and ask for an explanation, having met one of the daughters of William Smith, who had failed to perform the expected curtsey.

"She couldn't think what had come over Ellen—such a nice girl. But—" How the interview went I never heard; but after it Ellen gave out that she wasn't going to curtsey to Lady Palmer. I can believe that she never did; she was my own mother.

It would be interesting to learn William Smith's comment on this occasion. It is not unlikely that it took the form of ironical persuasion, that he recommended Ellen to reconsider her decision, and was well pleased when she abided by it. His children were more than a little puzzled by an ironical turn or vein of dryish humour he had—witness their distress when he threatened to go to church in his "smocked frock," instead of the comely glory of top-boots, drab waistcoat and the rest—a black beard. That he wore. He crowned all; and once he purchased a white one, which must have completed an impressive appearance.

The successive clergymen, too, seem to have had little contact with village life, with the exception of Mr. Eckersell, who, during his eighteen years' residence in the parish, appears to have won the villagers' hearts by a human interest in their concerns, and had warm friends at the farm. His successor, Mr. Clayton, left the villagers to his wife's care; she made a hobby of district-visiting and regarded her husband's flock somewhat as a collection of amusing pet lambs. She was perhaps not thoroughly disliked, in spite of the widespread exasperation which she caused.

William Smith and his family were too busy to be much concerned with the doings of the gentry. The farm and the pottery provided worthier occupation. Not the least interesting chapters are those which deal in some detail with the latter industry, and perhaps the most enthralling pages in the book are those that relate how a rotten elm stump near the kiln brought the potter within an ace of financial ruin, and the curious discovery that saved him. The course of work was relieved by the year's festivals, and by occasional homely junketings with those families whose interests were akin to or interwoven with their own; the rural feasts referred to here and there in the book have an almost poigniant effect on the reader in these days of adulterated foods and rationing.

William Smith dominated his surroundings. He is a slightly enigmatical figure, perhaps because his children, from whose memory this chronicle is made, did not wholly understand him. On returning home late at night from his business excursions to London, he would get his little children out of bed to dance reels with him on the floor; in winter, he was not above sliding on roadside ponds. On the other hand, there were outbreaks of temper that frightened the children; and those recorded, taken in conjunction with a certain fastidiousness that characterized him (in the choice of words, for instance), seem to point to a marked fineness of nervous balance. He annoyed his daughters by scaring the rooks with the potent word "Shiarlup" on the way home from church. It is pleasant to learn that William Smith, with most of his neighbours, not improbably believed in fairies, and almost certainly in witches.

F. W. S.
THE ANTHROPOLOGY OF THE GRAIL

FROM RITUAL TO ROMANCE. By Jessie L. Weston. (Cambridge, University Press. 12s. 6d. net.)

MISS WESTON writes for scholars, nay, for the kind of scholar that goes by the barbarous name of "specialist." This she is entitled to do for at least two good reasons. First, she is herself a leading authority on the sources of medieval legend and can command the respectful attention of the erudite. Secondly, she has elsewhere dealt with the story of the Grail in a popular fashion. Thus the lay reader has already had his due in the form of a partial enlightenment, and cannot complain if he no longer goes on to experience the initiation manqué of a Gawain. Even so, however, those of us who are no experts are here enabled to understand clearly enough both the nature of the problem attacked and that of the proposed solution.

The Grail legends in their extant literary shape belong to the end of the twelfth and the beginning of the thirteenth centuries of our era. As might be expected, all the versions agree in being more or less Christian in tone. In no case, however, do they quite rise to the level of contemporary orthodoxy, as indeed was soon pointed out by puritanical critics such as Jacob van Maerlant; while in their most naive and presumably earliest forms the folk-lore element is very near the surface. Meanwhile, for the student of origins, the question is, not so much how beauty and truth have been evolved out of rude materials, as what those materials are and whence they have been derived. The mediaeval author was not likely to draw on pure imagination for plot or incident. Granted, then, that a tradition of the folk-lore or pagan type is at the back of these stories of a mystic quest, what is the content of this tradition, and what the conditions of its historical development? Such is Miss Weston's theme.

Now, in the first place, it ranks by this time almost as commonplace among scholars that there are echoes in the Grail legend of some fertility cult of the type familiar to readers of The Golden Bough. To Miss Weston belongs the honour of having propounded the definite thesis that effect some years ago in the pages of Folk-Lore; and, indeed as she tells us there, very similar conclusions had long before been reached by certain German authors, even though they lacked the definite clues that Mannhardt and his disciple Sir James Frazer have since given to the world. We must not be deterred from pursuing this promising trail by scurrilous jests about "the Covent Garden school of mythology." No doubt it is possible to ride a willing horse to death, to allow a legitimate hypothesis to degenerate into a stupifying obsession. Just as the sun-ray of the totem has mesmerized some minds, while even the twills of cowry-shells may in moments of speculative abandon seem to provide a key to all the creeds, so the slain god, taken in his sympathetic relation to the weather, the crops and the birth of children, may easily overmaster the critical faculty of the student of comparative religion. But it would be fatal on this account to fly to the opposite extreme and deny the validity of the theory altogether. Shall the excesses of a few cause the multitude of moderate thinkers to go dry?

It is impossible here to do justice to the intricate argument whereby Miss Weston makes good this part of her contention. Suffice it to say that the versions teem with references to a king either dead or sorely stricken in regard to his virility, with weeping women and a wasted land somehow incidental to the matter. The very fact that the narratives are one and all utterly incoherent in their allusions to these topics amounts to proof positive that we are in the presence of a survival, a decayed folk-memory; for spontaneous creation would be bound to achieve greater lucidity. Now this complex of incidents obviously corresponds to that ritual drama of the death of the year which pervades primitive religion. As Miss Weston shows, not only our "Aryan forefathers," whoever they may precisely have been (to tell the truth, we imagined them as so described to be a little out of date), but all sorts of other agricultural peoples, from Nilotic negroes upwards to Syro-Phoenicians and Sumerians, were addicted to like "revivalist" practices. Perhaps she is wise to limit her search for parallels to the more or less "adjacent" anthropologies; but even among the hunting folk of the most rudimentary character the same motif of dying to live as a mystic mode of increasing the procreative energy of nature and of man could be shown to prevail widely. Meanwhile, the complementary half of the rite, the resuscitation of the effete year, the transference of the mana from the old to the new vessel, is but vaguely suggested, if at all, in the Grail stories as we have them. For the rest, the Grail itself—a baffling notion, since the very derivation of the word remains obscure—is at all events the vitality-giving symbol in chief, and, so far as it may be identified with the cup that goes together with the other prominent symbol of the lance, may well have phallic associations. That reminiscences of a fertility ceremony should survive in Wales, the geographical centre from which the Grail stories were probably propagated, is not remarkable, seeing that we need look no further afield than our own country for the mummies' play and folk-customs of similar import.

In the second place, however, there seems to be more in the Grail legend than the echo of a mere agricultural ceremony of a public and exoteric character. Miss Weston is convinced that the atmosphere of mystery in which the whole experience of the hero is involved implies an esoteric application of the fertility idea, a revelation to the individual by way of some kind of initiation that seeks to give him insight into the very sources of the life divine. Nor is it hard to show that such application was familiar in various forms to classical antiquity. Miss Weston lays great stress on a secret document of the Christian-Gnostic type, the Nag Hammadi dating from the second century A.D., which has been recently published by Mr. G. R. S. Mead in his translation of the Hermetic writings. Here Christ, Attis and Adonis are syncretized in a transport of whirling words. But, granted that some subjectivist and salvationist rendering of the rustic theme of "seeing the new year in" might naturally develop wherever the individual note in religion had a chance of being heard, it is quite another thing to explain the actual process by which the emotional quality of a "conversion" has been imparted to the Grail story—a conversion, however, which somehow seems to stop short of fruition, as if the novice failed to complete his rite de passage. Miss Weston has to bridge over a millennium of unwritten history by means of guesswork, and boldly postulates that Oriental faiths which followed in the track of the Roman legionaries had lingered on among the Welsh hills. It may be so; but, unless we accept the definition of the cynic that a truth is a conclusion based on such evidence as would not be accepted in a court of law, we are bound to suspend judgment. At most we can say that transmission is more likely than independent origination, and transmission by Romanized Britons than recent importation from the East by Crusaders. In any case, Miss Weston plays the game, never dogmatizing nor declaiming, but arguing. It is scholarly, scientific work through and through.

R. R. M.

The Times is informed that the family of the late Mr. Joseph Chamberlain have entrusted Mr. J. L. Garvin, editor of the Observer, with the task of writing his biography.
AN OLD HAND

THE TRIUMPHS OF SARA. By W. E. Norris. (Hutchinson. 7s. 6d. net.)

Nowadays a great deal of fuss is made of the younger generation of novelists—nearly so much fuss, in fact, as they make of themselves. They belong, we are told, to the new school; they have ideals; they are misunderstood; they are profound; they are very important people. And somehow—we do not quite know how—we are made to feel that they are of an altogether different and more reputable kind than a number of very respectable practitioners who were born twenty years before them. These are the tradesmen; the others are the artists, the prophets.

It is all very perplexing, not least because it seems so often to amount to this: that a man who writes a prolix story badly is ipso facto to be preferred to one who writes a readable story well. Perhaps this is a little exaggerated, and we could more accurately state the difference in the form of advice to the budding novelist thus. If you wish to be taken seriously, spend less time on your novel than on your lecture on the aim of The Novel. Do not worry about the verisimilitude of your characters; the important thing is that they should seem to be in the latest things—a taste of the Russian blend, the sublime unimportance of marriage—and above all be incomprehensible in parts. Thus you will most easily and persuasively achieve by writing of things you yourself do not comprehend.

In truth, we cannot for the life of us see why such competent, practised writers as Mr. Norris and a hundred others we can think of should not one day turn upon their pontifical successors and rend them. Mr. Norris, for instance, should have a pretty reviewing style, and there are plenty of indications in such a book as "The Triumphs of Sara" that he can tell a whale from a stickleback. We like especially the indigently ironical tone of the chapter which begins:

"To be misunderstood is no rare affliction if one may judge by the incessant plaints in speech and print to which it gives rise; and no doubt those who are unable to make themselves intelligible to their neighbours deserve some pity. Still, for compensation, they can conclude (indeed they generally do) that if the average mortal cannot make head or tail of them, it is because they are a little above the average mortal's grasp; so that perplexity becomes an unconscious tribute to superiority. What is really dreadful is to discover that you have been understood by inferior beings while it is you yourself who have been the dupe of a false estimate.

No, Mr. Norris is not talking of the relation between the mere novelist and the new novelist. He is merely sticking to his theme, and we have no reason to suppose that the disfigurement of the high-minded and aesthetic Estelle Furness by the matter-of-fact and philistine Sara has any symbolical intention. But it very well might have.

The real point, however, is that Mr. Norris has conceived an interesting story and written it well. It will not shake the stars; and it was not meant to. As a natural, readable story of attractive people, with a good deal of unobtrusive but real psychological penetration, it could stand comparison very comfortably with a great many of the prophetic books with which the younger generation vex ourselves and stimulate the critics to a flow of superlatives. "The Triumphs of Sara" has the merit of not pretending to be high art and being bad craft. After all, in a novel the story is the thing. If you are a big man, you will make your story significant in some comprehensible way; if you are a smaller one, you can at least make your story interesting. But you cannot get significance by neglecting the story; you will merely make those who are weary of the fashions of the hour suspect that you are incapable not merely of achieving significance, but of writing a story at all.

The publishers tell us that it is forty years since Mr. Norris published his first novel. We confess that we had no idea he was such a veteran. We can but congratulate him on his latest book and express the mild hope that a few of his successors will master the technique of novel-writing as well as he has done.

AN UNPUBLISHED ESSAY BY SHELLEY

An important prose work by Percy Bysshe Shelley, entitled "A Philosophical View of Reform," which was composed in 1820 and has remained in MS. ever since, will shortly be published by the Oxford University Press. Writing at the close of a long period of warfare, and amid conditions of turmoil, social unrest, soaring prices and shattered finance closely resembling the situation at the present day, Shelley discusses the necessity and the true nature of political reform, and proposes plans for its execution. The MS. remains unfinished, having reached about half the length originally intended, but, as Professor Dowden observes in his "Life of Shelley," it tells us more of that side of Shelley's mind which was presented to politics than any other document we possess. It fills about 200 pages of a vellum-covered note-book which was decorated by Sh. Jey with a remarkable and beautiful drawing, of which a facsimile will be given in the present number in preparation. The text has been transcribed and prepared for press by Mr. T. W. Rolleston, who will furnish a short introduction. The note-book came into Mr. Rolleston's hands on the death of the Rev. Stopford Brooke, who had it from the late Lady Shelley, daughter-in-law of the poet.

POETRY AND COMMONPLACE ("Warton Lecture on British Poetry"). By John Bailey. (Milford. 1s. 6d. net.)—The commonplace, the universal, should be the basis of all poetry, and is, in fact, the basis of all existing great poetry: this is the theme of Mr. Bailey's lecture. We feel, however, that Mr. Bailey might have pointed out that the commonplace, the universally true, very frequently changes. It was once a commonplace that the earth stood still, and that the planets went whirling round on crystal spheres; it was once universally true, for Europe at least, that a fiery hell existed somewhere beneath our feet. Most traits of length originally intended, which to their contemporaries were true and commonplace are incomprehensible to us, unless we invoke the aid of scholarship. One wonders what critics five hundred years hence will think of our contemporaries—five hundred years hence, when the inevitability of death may very likely have disappeared; when the assurance of a new order, which to-day, has disposed of all our current ideas about morality and the soul; when sexual love, by that time (who knows?) entirely divorced from matrimony, will have assumed a singularly different aspect from the passion of to-day and yesterday; when many things unthinkable more peculiar have been brought about by that terrifying demon of science whom we are now beginning to let loose from his long-sealed bottle.

In "The History of the Christian Church" (Edinburgh, T. & T. Clark. 1s. net) Professor William Walker, of Yale University, has performed a difficult task of selection and compression with much success. Seeing that, for the purposes of this volume, he gives no narrower definition of "Church" than the whole complex of bodies claiming the Christian name, it is obvious that the sagacity of the historian lies in his selection. In this respect some 650 pages was an achievement calling for considerable skill. What is especially admirable in Professor Walker's book is the way in which he has avoided the temptation to drop into mere cataloguing; he may not have Duchesne's command over the picturesque phrase, but (parlously, we think, because of his lack of the expository gift, with which there is a singularly readable ecclesiastical historian. To compile a handbook free from "tendency" on this subject would, of course, be impossible, for Church history, being always modern history, is always the topic of controversy. In Professor Walker's chapters the Harnackian flavour is often pronounced, but he does not obtrude this element upon his readers, nor, allowing for the obscurity which still hangs over so much of the field of Christian origins, can he fairly be said to misread his facts through devotion to his theory.
MARGINALIA

"EARTH"s oldest inhabitants probably cannot remember a time when there were so many poets in activity, when so many books of poems were not only read, but bought and sold, when poets were held in such high esteem, when so much was written and published about poetry, when the mere forms of verse were the themes of such hot debate. There are thousands of minor poets, but poetry has ceased to be a minor subject. Anyone mentally alive cannot escape it. Poetry is in the air, and everybody is catching it. Some American magazines are exclusively devoted to the printing of contemporary poems; anthologies are multiplying, not 'Keepsakes' and 'Books of Gems,' but thick volumes representing the bumper crop of the year. Many poets are reciting their poems to big, eager, enthusiastic audiences, and the atmosphere is charged with the melodies of ubiquitous minstrelsy."

Our quotation is from the latest work of Professor Phelps of Yale, who, from tunnelling in the very minor romantic poetry of the eighteenth century, has now turned his attention to contemporary verse. "The Advance of English Poetry in the Twentieth Century" presents us with the results, never—it must be confessed, absorbingly interesting—of his explorations.

In what way, we naturally ask, has English poetry "advanced" during the nineteen years and a month or two since the century was born? To the question inevitably provoked by his title Professor Phelps gives only the vaguest answer. The most conspicuous sign of progress to which he can point is the increase in the quantity of poetry. Earth's oldest inhabitants, he proudly tells us, have never seen so much poetry in all their lives before. We may sincerely hope that earth's youngest inhabitants will never see so much again. Sixty years hence, when we are aged men sitting in the chimney corner, shall we tell our grandchildren of these extraordinary days? And will they, who will not have had the luck to be hatched in a nest of singing birds—will they believe our tales? We shall tell them of the men and women we knew, and how, out of the whole circle of our acquaintance, there were only three persons who did not write and publish verse. We shall enumerate the magazines devoted to the printing of poetry, and all the clubs, parties, and conciliabules of poets and poetry-lovers. We shall lay before them statistics proving that the number of volumes of verse published in the second decade of our century exceeded the figure for any other fifty years of the world's history. But when they ask us to tell them something about the quality as well as the quantity of this flux of minstrelsy, it may be that we shall find it hard to talk with such enthusiasm about the advance of poetry in the twentieth century.

There are signs that the tide of verse has now begun to decline. The output from the publishers, enormous as it still is, is perceptibly smaller than it was two years ago. Poetry is less fashionable, and poets, grown as common as white butterflies in June, have as much or as little attention paid to them as journalists or solicitors. In a few years more it may be hoped that the shouting and the factitious excitement will have died down. Genuine poets will wisely go about their business in this serene atmosphere, and the others, chilled by a little well-directed critical discouragement, will cease to hanker after publicity.

The quantitative advance in poetry, being necessarily only temporary, is of only the slightest interest. It is a curiosity of social history, and has almost no relation to literature. What has Professor Phelps to say of the advance in poetical quality? "Every poet," he tells us, "lives in his own time, has a share in its scientific and philosophical advance, and his individuality is coloured by his experience. . . ." Shakespeare was surely a greater poet than Wordsworth; but the man of the Lakes, with the rich inheritance of two centuries, had a capital of thought unpossessed by the dramatist, which, invested by his own genius, enabled him to draw really from nature, undreamed of by his mighty predecessor. "This is surely sufficiently axiomatic. Nobody expects Dante to grow enthusiastic about a solar system of which he had not heard. A twentieth-century writer naturally knows a good many things of which his seventeenth-century predecessor was ignorant. It is the fact of its up-to-dateness that often makes us prefer a contemporary to an ancient work of possibly higher literary quality. Anyone who has had occasion to confine himself exclusively, for a fairly long period of time, to the study of the literature of some past epoch knows how refreshing, how sympathetic and intelligent seems the first contemporary book, albeit of comparatively slight value, with which he breaks his fast. But the almost unavoidable process of coming up to date can scarcely be called an advance. And yet this and the increase in quantity are the only advances of which Professor Phelps gives us a hint."

An advance in poetry, if it signifies anything, means the discovery of a new subject-matter, with a new method for expressing it. Poets who have made really important advances are very few. One thinks of Chaucer, Shakespeare, Donne, Vaughan, Blake, Wordsworth, and possibly Browning. Which of the poets mentioned by Professor Phelps can be said to have made an advance comparable to that made by the least of these men? It is absurd to talk of Stephen Phillips, Alfred Noyes, William Watson, John Drinkwater, in connection with any advance in poetry. One may or may not like what they write; but their most ardent admirers could not say that their poetry is an advance on previous English poetry in the sense that Blake's or Wordsworth's poetry was. For any advance in the poetry of this century one must look elsewhere. Mr. Hardy's poetry is an advance of considerable importance; Mr. de la Mare's is an advance on a very much smaller scale. Another small but interesting advance has been made by Mr. D. H. Lawrence. The Irish poets have made an advance of a kind; and on the narrowest of fronts, only a few hundred lines wide, Mr. T. S. Eliot has advanced (and this we may say with all due respect to Professor Phelps, who remarks: "There is such a display of cynical cleverness in the verse of T. S. Eliot that I think he might be able to write almost anything except poetry."). Professor Phelps's book would have been more valuable if he had cut out all the superfuous names and confined himself to analysing the work of the few poets who are responsible for whatever advances the art of poetry has made during the twentieth century.

AUTOLYCUS.

THE PEOPLE'S THEATRE SOCIETY (whose headquarters are at 5, York Buildings, Adelphi) has recently effected an amalgamation with the Curtain Group, which is giving its farewell subscription performance at the Lyric Opera-House, Hammersmith, on Sunday, March 14, at 3 o'clock, when a new play by John Galsworthy, entitled "Defeat," will be produced for the first time.

The next production of the Stage Society will be "From Morn to Midnight" ("Von Morgens bis Mitternacht"). a modern play in seven scenes by George Kaiser, a young dramatist whose work, long forbidden by the German censorship, was set free by the revolution of November, 1918. "From Morn to Midnight" has been produced successfully by Reinhardt in Berlin. The English version (to be published in book-form by Hendersons, Charing Cross Road) is by Major Ashley Dukes. The dates of performances are fixed for March 28 and 29, Sunday evening and Monday afternoon.
BIBLIOGRAPHICAL NOTES

One of the surprises collectors are always receiving from old country-house libraries is about to be offered for competition by Messrs. Sotheby on March 23, at the close of the sale of the second portion of Mr. Yates Thompson’s manuscripts. It is a little stained and soiled volume measuring 5 by 3 inches, bound in vellum with a gilt line border and a centre fleuron ornament, stamped by some owner with the initials G. O., but its price will be very great indeed. It comes from the library of Mr. Richard F. Burton, of Longaer Hall, near Shrewsbury, and contains five pieces: a 1599 “Passionate Pilgrim,” not quite complete; the 1600 “Lucrece”; Thomas Middleton’s “The Ghost of Lucrece,” hitherto unknown; “Emardicula,” a sonnet sequence by E. C.; and the 1599 “Venus and Adonis.” The “Passionate Pilgrim” is of especial interest, as it can be shown to be made up of two impressions, one identical with the Britwell copy, the other differing both by misprints and by “make-up.” Messrs. Sotheby incline to think that they are different editions of the same year, but it seems more likely that the work was printed at two presses at once, as would be done if there was a large number required rapidly. We know that there were definite trade rules as to the number of impressions that could be taken off from one setting of type, though this number varied according to the cost of casting and plating, and there is definite proof that two presses and two type-sets were used when certain documents were required to be issued quickly in quantity. Of the third edition of the “Lucrece” no other copies are known other than those in the Bodleian. Middleton’s poem is of no great importance as literature, but it is unique; and of the E. C. sonnets only one print is known. The device on the title-page of the 5th edition of the “Venus and Adonis” is not in McKerrow, and the printer does not seem to have been John Harrison. Altogether, the volume is one of the greatest interest to bibliographers, who should certainly preserve Messrs. Sotheby’s very careful description of it.

We have received from Messrs. Sotheran no. 774 of their catalogue, which contains a large number of works from the libraries of Sir Luke barbey, Mr. Michael Fessett, and his sister Christina. Many of them are presentation copies, and there are a few interesting autograph letters. The books are offered at very low prices, considering the recent rise in value all round of second-hand books, and many are of much rarity.

BOOK SALE

Science

PATIENT FLOGGERS

It is a melancholy fact that the estimable qualities of patience and industry do not, by themselves, enable their possessor to attain eminence in the arts. There is very good reason to suppose that character particularly a certain simple type of integrity and sincerity, is necessary to great artistic achievement, but it is certain that such gifts are not sufficient; they must be allied with very unusual mental qualities. In the sciences, however, we often find work of very great importance being performed by men of quite average intelligence, but of exceptional tenacity. A pure heart seems to be all that is necessary. This is not true, of course, of the mathematical sciences—mathematicians, like musicians, are "born"—but it is very obviously true of what are called the "observational" sciences. A history of Astronomy, in particular, is interesting from this point of view. The fact that the whole of our knowledge of the heavens comes through the sense of sight, and that we cannot experiment, in the ordinary way, upon the heavenly bodies, means that the patient observer, by merely accumulating observations, is performing an absolutely essential function. There is no other subject which yields such rich rewards to mere patience. There is no other subject which has so long a record of valuable discoveries achieved by purely average ability. It is interesting to notice how often a telescope and a capacity for sitting still have made the owners immortal. In the region of stellar astronomy the minuteness of the phenomena which may be observed has narrowed possible competitors to those possessing large instruments, and that usually means public institutions and professional astronomers. But the history of our knowledge of the nearer heavenly bodies, the sun, the planets and the moon, owes much to the industrious amateur. No history of planetary and lunar discoveries would be complete without mention of Schröter, the "Oberamtmann" of Lichtenhal, who watched the moon and planets incessantly for thirty-four years with a patience only equalled by his enthusiasm. He invented a "brilliant invention," a French astrology, for after firing, on the night of April 20, 1813, the Vale of Lilies and thereby destroying, amongst other things, the whole of Schröter's books and writings, the French army under Vandamme broke into and pillaged his observatory. The old man, then sixty-eight years of age, had not the means to repair the catastrophe, and, deprived of his one great interest, he died three years later, leaving, amongst his published works, some of the most long-winded and entertaining observations in the history of astronomy.

But although Schröter is undoubtedly the most amusing of all amateur observers, he has had his prototypes in all countries. Francis Baily, the "philosopher of Newbury," is a good example of our more sober English product. We may have doubts as to what sort of chief magistrate old Schröter was, but we know that Baily took his profession of stockbroking with the utmost seriousness. He did not allow astronomy to interfere with business. Beginning in 1799, he remained on the Stock Exchange in London for twenty-four years, devoting his leisure largely to solar observations, particularly those connected with eclipses. It is with two of these phenomena, the first annular, a ring of the sun being visible round the moon, and the second total, that Baily's name is particularly associated, in each case for the vivid and accurate account he gave of what he witnessed. The first phenomenon is a ring of bright points extending round that part of the moon's circumference which has just entered on the solar disc, is merely a consequence of the lunar edge being serrated with mountains. These "Baily's beads," as they were called, were successful, however, in stimulating interest in the physical aspect of eclipses, with the result that the next total eclipse, that of 1842, was looked for with an unprecedented degree of enthusiasm. Astronomers like Airy, Otto Struve and Arago travelled to Central or Southern Europe to observe the eclipse, and the indefatigable Mr. Baily accompanied them. He fitted up his telescope in an upper room of the University of Pavia.

The result was magnificent. At the instant of totality the sun appeared decorated with a glorious aureole, the famous corona. It was not, of course, an unknown phenomenon, but it had never before excited so much attention. Mr. Baily, in particular, was moved to write a most eloquent description of this flaming object. He calls it splendid and astonishing, but continues: "Yet I must confess that there was at the same time something in its singular and wonderful appearance that was appalling; and I can readily imagine that uncivilized nations may occasionally have become alarmed and terrified at such an object . . . ."

Besides being a specialist on eclipses, Baily was an untiring editor of the catalogue of sun-spots, and also made no fewer than 2,153 laborious experiments, on Cavendish's method, to determine the density of the earth. He was indeed a zealous worker in what Sir John Herschel called the "archaeology of astronomy." He was noted for his unvarying health, undisturbed equanimity and methodical habits.

Another testimonial to the importance of such qualities in astronomical discovery is furnished by the career of Heinrich Schwabe, of Dessau. In the hope of escaping his fate as an apothecary he bought a small telescope in 1826, and began to observe the sun, being advised to do so by a friend. He continued to observe the sun daily (weather and health permitting) for forty-three years. Every day he counted the number of spots visible on the surface of the sun. It was a simple occupation, but it led to important consequences. His immense record of sun-spot statistics showed that the increase and decrease in the number of sun-spots did not occur in a random manner, but fell into periods, maxima alternating with minima, a complete period occupying about ten years. This figure has been modified since, but the fact of sun-spot periodicity is established and is at the present time one of the most suggestive and probably far-reaching of solar phenomena. Schwabe displayed no striking quality of mind or character beyond an almost incomprehensible patience. He was, however, in his spot-counting; however, by the hope of discovering a planet between Mercury and the sun, and in order to distinguish between the tiny disc of the planet crossing the face of the sun and a sun-spot, he found it necessary, in virtue of his instrumental equipment, to count the spots. When he found that, as a consequence of this pastime, he was world-famous, he likened himself to Saul who, going forth to seek his father's asses, discovered a kingdom. His magnificent serenity of body and mind enabled him to attain the age of eighty-six.

Part of his mantle fell on Richard Carrington (born 1826), who built an observatory at Redhill with the intention of devoting himself to a study of sun-spots throughout a complete cycle. He failed to finish the cycle completely, as the death of his father made it necessary for him to divert his energies to controlling a brewery. He achieved results of great importance, however. His observations were concerned with the positions and motions of the spots, and from a series of 5,290 such observations he was enabled, amongst other things, to clear up the uncertainties attending the period of rotation of the sun. Galileo, apparently not appreciating the importance of the matter, had said that the sun rotated in "about a lunar month," and a number of other observers gave figures varying from 27 to 25 days. Carrington illuminating this darkness by remarking that there is no single period of rotation for the sun. The polar regions rotate more slowly than those in the neighbourhood of the equator; the equator rotates in a little less than twenty-five days, while in latitude 70° the period is twenty-seven and a-half days. Thus the mystery was cleared up and a fresh direction given to solar investigation.

It is difficult to say whether Astronomy still offers such rewards to industry. It is probable, however, that it still yields more to character, as distinguished from ability, than any other science, and incomparably more, alas! than the arts.

S.

THE ENDOWMENT OF MEDICAL RESEARCH

Mr. Balfour, in his capacity of Lord President of the Privy Council, received a deputation on Tuesday last from representatives of the British Medical Association and the British Science Guild on the subject of pensions for medical and scientific researches. The proposal which is put forward is that a sum of £20,000 a year should be voted. This would be divided into a number of pensions, some of £1,000, and others of £500 a year.

It is scarcely necessary for us to say how whole-hearted is our support of these proposals. Nothing throws a clearer or more illuminating light on the teaching of our civilization than the fact that, although there is every probability that cures for cancer and tuberculosis could be discovered within a reasonable time at the price of a Dreadnought aipie every year, no Government, and, as far as we know, no political party, has ever seriously thought of making such provision. One hundred millions have been poured out in the past year on an unnecessary war with Russia, yet what chance is there of our seeing one million earmarked for medical research? One would hardly need to be a cynic to define civilization as that condition of mankind in which unlimited wealth is available for the destruction of human lives and none for saving them.

The necessity of endowing the useful sciences is urgent and obvious, and perhaps we must be content for the time being if that peremptory demand is duly satisfied. But the case for providing men of letters and artists with pensions is in reality just as peremptory, though it may be less obvious. The disinterested worker in the arts is no less a true civilisation than the disinterested worker in the sciences. When that truth is recognized we shall feel that the work of The Athenæum is within sight of being accomplished.

The Council of the Royal Society have decided to commend for election into the Fellowship of the Society the following fifteen candidates: Dr. E. Frankland Armstrong, Sir Jagadis Chunder Bose, Dr. Robert Broom, Professor E. Provan Catheart, Mr. A. Clouston Chapman, Dr. A. Price Chattock, Mr. A. W. Hill, Mr. Cargil Gibbon Knott, Professor F. A. Lindemann, Dr. F. H. A. Marshall, Dr. T. R. Merton, Dr. R. C. Lyotyn Perkins, Professor H. Crozier Plummer, Professor Robert Robinson, and Professor J. W. Watson Stephens.

Under the Charrick Trust three public lectures on "Military Hygiene in Peace and War," by General Sir John Goodwin, K.C.B., will be given in the Lecture Room of the Royal Society of Arts on Sundays, March 5, 15 and 22, at 5.15 p.m. Immediately preceding the first lecture the Charrick gold medals and prizes of £100 will be presented to the two naval and military officers who are considered to have distinguished themselves the most in promoting the health of the men in the Navy and Army. The recipients of the prizes on this occasion will be Surgeon-Captain Edward H. Ashman, R.N., and Brigadier-General W. W. O. Beveridge, C.B.

Sir John Cadman's postponed lectures at the Royal Institution on "Modern Development of the Miner's Safety Lamp" and "Petroleum and the War" will be delivered on Monday and Wednesday, March 8 and 10. The Friday evening discourse on March 5 will be delivered by the Hon. J. W. Fortescue on "Military History," and on March 12 by Mr. W. W. Rouse Ball on "String Figures."
SOCIETIES

ROYAL.—February 19.—Sir J. J. Thomson, President, in the chair.

ARISTOTELIAN.—February 16.—Miss Beatrice Edgell in the chair.

—Mr. Alexander F. Shand read a paper on "Impulse, Emotion and Instinct.

The paper specially treated the relation of the primary emotions to the instincts. It started from the conclusion reached in Book II., chap. i., of the author's "Foundations of Character"—that the emotions are not rightly regarded as essentially involved in the operation of instincts, and what are essentially involved are the "impulses"; i.e. the primary emotions being commonly aroused when there was delay or obstruction in the way of instincts—this is not the only cause of the excitement of emotions. If this be true, the question is, What is the difference between emotion and impulse, and what value has it? While under statical analysis impulses bear a superficial resemblance to emotions—both containing within them a group of elements, constant, feeling, and will—emotions are common to all mental facts—the principal differences emphasized by the author centre in the functions which impulses and emotions are severally destined to fulfil.

(1) The "primary" impulses, like the instincts, of which they are a part, are exclusively concerned with biological ends; the "primary" emotions, while still pursuing such ends, are confined to them, because, in man at least, they acquire other ends.

(2) The primary emotions have more general ends than those of the primary impulses: thus the impulse connected with an instinct of concealment is to escape by means of concealment; but the end of the emotion of fear is to escape.

(3) The primary emotions have several instincts organized in their system for use in different situations; the primary impulse is limited to the one instinct of which it is the impulse.

(4) Hence the primary emotion has a variability of behaviour; the primary impulse an invariable nature of behaviour.

(5) The primary emotion has a superior form of organization to that of primary impulse.

Can we then regard the dispositions of the primary emotions as complex instincts? Like instincts, they are hereditary structures; but they cannot be identified with instincts because they possess a variability of behaviour, both in respect of their means and ends, which distinguishes them from instinct. Can an instinct as having, not merely some power to support it in difficulties, but an emotion which distinguishes it, vaguely or definitely, from all other instincts? This theory breaks down when applied to the web and nest instincts, the locomotory instincts of different animals, and to many others.

LINNÉAN.—February 19.—Dr. A. Smith Woodward, President, in the chair.

The President announced that intelligence had been received that morning of the death of Professor Pietro Andreo Saccardo, thus causing another vacancy among the Foreign Members (see ATENÆUM, February 20, p. 246).

Mr. J. S. Huxley, Fellow of New College, Oxford, and Mr. D. F. Leney exhibited living specimens of sexually mature axolotls metamorphosed into the Amblystoma form by feeding with thyroid gland, and of Urodèle larvae precociously metamorphosed by treatment with iodine solution. A discussion followed in which the President, Professor E. S. Goodrich, and Lieut.-Col. J. H. Tall Walsh, Dr. W. Bateson, and Dr. J. R. Leeson engaged, Mr. Huxley replying.

Mr. H. C. Gunton read a paper entitled "Entomological-Meteorological Records of Ecological Facts in the Life of British Lepidoptera." He believed that interesting facts would be obtained by recording and plotting the results of observations made by entomologists in various localities in a scheme exhibiting them derived from his notes from February to December, 1919, within the radius of four miles from Gerrard's Cross, Bucks, which includes oak and beech woods, heath, marsh, and cultivated land. Special signs were used to denote the occurrence of macroscopic Tenthredines on sallow-bloom in the spring, ivy in the autumn, sugar, and light. Thirty-five species of butterflies and 246 species of moths were tabulated and correlated with meteorological data. The diagram placed many facts before the eye, as the long continuance of certain species, the presence of more than one brood, and the like. Sugar hardly appeals when honey-dew is abundant; and artificial light is ineffective during bright moonlight.

FORTHCOMING MEETINGS

Fri. 5. King's College, 4.—"Ecclesiastical Art," Lecture VIII., Professor P. Dearnmer.

King's College, 5.30.—"Ecclesiastical Music: The Choir and the Congregation," Mr. C. Hylton-Stewart.

King's College, 5.30.—"Historical Theories of Space, Time and Movement: I. The Order of Co-existences—Leibniz," Professor H. Wildon Carr.

King's College, 5.30.—"La Dynastie de Macedoine: Le Gouvernement et l'Administration," Dr L. Economics.

University College, 5.30.—"The Social Life of the Greeks," Professor E. A. Gardner.

Philological, 8.—"Leicestershire Place-Names," Mr. A. C. Wood.

Royal Institution, 9.—"Military History," Hon. J. W. Fortescue.

Royal Geographical, 5.—"Army Hygiene prior to the Recent War," General Sir John Goodwin. (Chadwick Lecture.)

King's College, 5.30.—"Portugal: I. Why Portugal went to War," Professor George Young.

King's College, 5.30.—"Light in Pentateuchal Problems," Lecture II., Dr. A. S. Yahuda.

King's College, 5.30.—"The History of Learning and Science in Poland," Lecture IV., Professor L. Tatarkiewicz.

King's College, 5.30.—"Outlines of Greek History: Consolidation, 867-963," Professor A. J. Toynbee.

University College, 5.30.—"Guillaume de Machaut's Literary and Musical Work," Lecture V., Miss Barbara Smythe.

Aristotelian, 8.—"Is there a General Will?" Mr. Morris Ginsberg.

King's College, 5.30.—"The Philosophy of Kant," Lecture VIII., Professor H. Wildon Carr.

King's College, 5.30.—"Contemporary Russia: VI. The First Two Dumas, 1906-7," Sir Bernard Paré.

University College, 5.30.—"The Golden Age in Danish Literature," Lecture V., Mr. J. H. Helweg.

Royal Society of Arts, 4.30.—"Gas in relation to Industrial Production and National Economy," Mr. L. H. Thornton.

Geological, 5.30.—"The Lower Palaeozoic Rocks of the Arthog-Dolgelley District," Professor A. H. Cox and Mr. A. K. Wells.

University College, 5.30.—"Wergeland, Welhaven and Collett," Lecture V., Mr. I. C. Gröndahl.

University College, 5.30.—"English Intonation," Lecture II., Mr. H. E. Palmer.

University College, 5.30.—"August Strindberg," Lecture V., Mr. J. Björkhamn.

University College, 5.30.—"Favolavogli con la sua famiglia de Trioni, di Fiesole e di Roma," Professor Cesare Faligmo. (In Italian.)

Child-Study Society (90, Buckingham Palace Road, S.W. 1.)—"Educational Needs of Adolescence," Dr. M. Jane Reaney.

Fri. 12. King's College, 4.—"Ecclesiastical Art," Lecture IX., Professor P. Dearnmer.

Arts Lecture Service (Big School, Dean's Yard, Westminster), 5.30.—"A Method of Developing an Understanding of Art," Miss Bulley.

King's College, 5.30.—"The History and Theories of Space, Time and Movement: II. The Modern Relativity—Einstein, Minkowsky," Professor H. Wildon Carr.

University College, 5.30.—"The Social Life of the Romans," Professor H. E. Butler.

Malacological, 6.

Royal Institution, 9.—"String Figures," Mr. W. W. Rouse Ball.
Fine Arts

WILCOXISM

To return from Paris, full of enthusiasm for contemporary art, and find oneself forced immediately into an attitude of querulous hostility, is surely a melancholy thing. It is my fate; but it is not my fault. Had I found our native quickness—to use a slightly less excitable humour, had they dashed a little less over their imperial painters at Burlington House, had they made the least effort to preserve a sense of proportion, I, for my part, had held my peace. But, deafened by the chorus of hearty self-applause with which British art has just been regaling itself, a critic who hopes that his country is not once again going to make itself the laughing-stock of Europe is bound at all risks to say something disagreeable.

In that delightful book "The Worlds and I," for bringing me acquainted with which I shall ever be grateful to The Athenæum, nothing is more delightful than the chapter in which Mrs. Wilcox takes us through the list of the great writers she has known. We are almost as much pleased by the authoress's confident expectation that we shall be thrilled to learn any new fact about Miss Aldrich, who wrote "one of the most exquisite lyrics in the language"; about Rhoda Hero Dunn, "a genius" with "an almost Shakespearean quality in her verse," or about Elsa Barker, whose poem "The Frozen Grail," "dedicated to Peary and his band," is an epic of August beauty," and whose sonnet "When I Am Dead" "ranks with the great sonnets of the world," as she would be surprised to discover that we had never heard of any of them. Mrs. Wilcox believed, in perfect good faith, that the crowd of magazine-makers with whom she associated were, in fact, the great figures of the age. She had no reason for supposing that we should not be as much interested in first-hand personal gossip about Zona Gale and Ridgeley Torrence, Arthur Griscom (first editor of the Smart Set), Judge Malone, Theodosia Garrison and Julie Opp Faversham ("even to talk with whom over the telephone gives me a sense of larger horizons") as we should have been in similar gossip about Swinburne and Hardy, Henry James and Mallarmé, Laforgue, Anatole France, Tolstoy, Tchechov or Dostoevsky.

And, as Mrs. Wilcox had no reason for supposing that her friends were not the greatest writers alive, what reason had she for supposing that they were not the greatest that ever lived? Without the taste, the intelligence, or the knowledge which alone can give some notion of what's in art, she was obliged to rely on more accessible criteria. The circulation of her own works, for instance, must have compared favourably with that of most poets. To be sure there was Shakespeare, and the celebrated Hugo—or was it Gambetta? But what grounds could there be for thinking that she was not superior to the obscure John Donne or the obscurer Andrew Marvel, or to Arthur Rimbaud, of whom no one she had ever heard of had ever heard? Mrs. Wilcox was not dishonest in assuming that the most successful writer in her set was the best in the world; she was not conceited even; she was merely ridiculous.

It is disquieting to find the same sort of thing going on in England, where our painters are fiercely disputing with each other the crown of European painting, and our critics appraising the respective claims of Mr. Augustus John and Mr. John Nash as solemnly as if they were comparing Cézanne with Renoir. It is more than disquieting; it is alarming, to detect symptoms of the disease—this distressing disease of Wilcoxism—in The Athenæum itself. Yet I am positive that not long since I read in this very paper that Mr. Wyndham Lewis was more than a match for Matisse and Derain; and, having said so much, the critic not unattractively went on to suggest that he was a match for Leonardo da Vinci. Since then I have trembled weekly lest the infection should have spread to our literary parts. Will it be asserted, one of these Fridays, that the appetizing novels of Mr. Gilbert Cannan are distinctly better than Hardy's Wessex tales, and comparable rather with the works of James or Joyce?

To save ourselves from absurdity, and still more to save our painters from insinuatingly that trickle of fatuity which wells from heads swollen with hot air, critics should set themselves to check this nasty malady. Let them make it clear that to talk of modern English painting as though it were the rival of modern French is silly. In old racing days—how matters stand now I know not—it used to be held that French form was about seven pounds below English; the winner of the Derby, that is to say, could generally give the best French colt about that weight and beat him. In painting, English form is normally a stone below French. At any given moment the best painter in England is unlikely to be better than a first-rate man in the Paris Salon. As second-class men are the best chance for Renoir, Degas, Seurat and Manet; but Whistler, Steer and Sickert may profitably be compared with Pissaro, Sisley and Jongkind. And though Duncan Grant holds his own handsomely with Marchand, Vlaminck, Lhote, de Segonzac, Braque and Modigliani, I am not yet prepared to class him with Matisse, Picasso, Derain and Bonnard.

Having bravely recognized this disagreeable truth, let us take as much interest in contemporary British painting as we can. I will try to believe that it merits more enthusiasm than I have been able to show, provided it is not made a point of patriotism to excite oneself about the Imperial War Museum's pictures exhibited at Burlington House. As a matter of fact, the most depressing thing about that show was the absence of the very quality for which British art has been most justly admired—I mean sensibility. Mr. Wilson Steer's picture seemed to me the best in the place, just because Mr. Steer has eyes with which, not only to see, but to feel. To see is something; Mr. Steer also feels for what he sees; and this emotion is the point of departure for his pictures. That he seems almost completely to have lost such power as he ever had of giving to his vision a coherent and self-supporting form is unfortunate; still, he does convey to us some modicum of the thrill provoked in him by his vision of Dover Harbour.

These thoughtful young men, on the other hand, whose works have been causing such a commotion, might almost as well have been blind. They seem to have seen nothing; at any rate, they have not reacted to what they saw in that particular way in which visual artists react. They are not expressing what they feel for something that has moved them as artists, but, rather, what they think about something that has horrified them as men. Their pictures depict, not from a visual sensation, but from a moral conviction. So, naturally enough, what they produce is merely "anecdote." This, perhaps, is the secret of their success—their success, I mean, with the cultivated public. Those terrible young fellows who were feared to be artists turn out after all to be innocent Pre Raphaelites. They leave Burlington House without a stain upon their characters.

This is plain speaking; how else should a critic, who believes that he has diagnosed the disease, convince a modern patient of his parlous state? To just hint a fault and hesitate dislike (not Pope but I split that infinitive) is regarded nowadays merely as a sign of a base, compromising spirit; or not regarded at all. Artists, especially in England, cannot away with qualified praise or blame; and if they insist on all or nothing I can but
EXHIBITIONS OF THE WEEK
SUFFOLK STREET GALLERY.—The Society of Women Artists. The general level of the pictures at the Suffolk Street Gallery is not appreciably lower than that of the recent R.B.A. exhibition in the same gallery. The two collections are indeed most remarkably alike. But this very similarity makes the women's exhibition infinitely more distressing than the men's, because in an R.B.A. exhibition we do not expect to find anything more than a heterogeneous collection of third-rate paintings. In the present exhibition we have a right to expect something more definite, something which would neither merit nor obtain from the most generous critic more than a passing word of perfunctory encouragement.

Clive Bell.

THE LATE M. MODIGLIANI
The death of the young painter and sculptor Modigliani leaves the same kind of gap in the ranks of the younger artists of the modern school as was caused by the death of Gauclier Breslau. Modigliani worked in Paris, but was of Italian, presumably Jewish, origin or descent. He was primarily a sculptor, but his interest was determined by the human figure, and he devoted his life to the endeavour to study the large rhythms implicit in its structure. His early drawings were conceived with a pure sculptural vision. The lines flow in large simplified curves round ample forms; a tone of red chalk or some other soft medium suggests the depth of the continued planes; the attitudes presuppose execution in solid substance, there are no flying wings, no holes in the design. Many of the figures have the triple twist of Michelangelo, but the extreme simplification of the contours restrains the action and invests it with something of the calm of Mailou. Modigliani executed a considerable number of small drawings, many of great beauty, and sold them, we understand, for a few francs apiece on the Boulevards. Later, possibly owing to the expense of sculpture, he turned to painting, and a set of his pictures, recently exhibited at the Mansard Gallery, are now at the New Art Salon. As a painter Modigliani achieved somewhat more success in his attempts to visualize a combination which does not quite succeed. He retains his sculptor's preconception of the human head as a solid egg-shape-form and at the same time he opens his sensibilities to immediate impressions in other parts of the picture. A disquieting lack of consistency results. Possibly he would have made an artist of himself had he endeavoured the momentary flashes of his idiosyncrasy.
Music

OPERA AT THE SURREY

It is a long time since "The Flying Dutchman" was seen on the stage in London. For, although the obvious allure of the "Ring," the "Tristan" and "Meistersinger," was a period when no one dared profess an admiration for Italian opera, and the old-fashioned Italian style which permeates a good deal of "The Flying Dutchman" used to make ardent Wagnerites feel a little uncomfortable. The opera always remained popular in Germany, where the traditions of Weber and Marschner were deeply rooted in the affections of the general opera-going public. That public, too, always professed to despise old-fashioned Italian opera, but it had a sneaking affection for it, especially when the style was adopted by composers of German birth, such as Flotow and Nicolai.

To modern audiences the weakness of the early Wagner operas lies not in the Italianate quality of their melodies, but in the lamentable fact that Wagner never could manage to write a really strong Italian tune. His model was always Weber rather than Bellini, and in his attempts to give harmonic interest to tunes of a Bellinian cast he, like Weber, fell between two stools and produced such things as the "Evening Star," which both in harmony and melody are awkward and inexpressive. There is another tune of a very similar type in the first act of "The Flying Dutchman," and one of the most horrible examples occurs in the last act of "Der Freischütz." The anti-Italian tendencies of the last century led singers of Wagner to try to disguise the purely vocal ideals of much of his early work. The singers whom Wagner himself trained for Bayreuth were real singers who had been educated in the great Italian tradition; Vogl, the ideal Loge, was also the most finished exponent of Don Ottavio. It was after Wagner's death that the exaggerated declamation of the typical modern German Wagner-singers took the place of bel canto. We are now gradually beginning to realize, as Wagner's music recedes into the distance of past history, that Wagner, even the later Wagner, must above all things be sung. It is an appropriate moment at which to revive the early act of "The Flying Dutchman," and the intensely serious-minded singers, who devoted themselves to the cult of Wagner at the time when such devotion was indeed necessary, thought it incumbent upon them to interpret the early operas in the spirit of the later ones, and hence did their best to pass off the essentially vocal writing of much of his early work as Sprachgesang, with deplorably unsatisfactory results. The only thing to do with early Wagner is to sing it, and sing it with an even more exuberantly vocal delivery than is customary in the performance of Donizetti and Bellini. Such parts as those of Erik and Daland in "The Flying Dutchman," very easily become tedious, for Wagner's melody is very fluent and often limps painfully after the harmony which supports it. Hence the singer must do all in his power to disguise not so much its tunefulness as its lack of a really firm vocal line. An exaggeration of the declamatory style and an undue emphasis on such leading motives as may occur in the orchestra inevitably make these parts patchy and incoherent. There must be no waiting, no impressive pauses; the singer must simply get over the awkward ground as quickly and as smoothly as he can.

Masters Fairbairn and Milner have been remarkably successful in securing good singers for their revival of "The Flying Dutchman." Their company consists almost entirely of young people who have had very little experience. They have what is perhaps more valuable, intelligence and enthusiasm, together with youth and freshness both of voice and of person. The presentation of Senta was a real revelation of the character. The part is generally sung by a dramatic soprano with a heavy voice and figure to correspond. Miss Maryan Elmar, who took the part at the Surrey, looked about seventeen. That romantic attachment for the picture of the legendary Dutchman which always seemed so ridiculous and incredible on the part of a lady obviously old enough to know her way about the world became suddenly intelligible and natural in a Senta who was all girlish impulsiveness and enthusiasm. But Miss Elmar has a great deal more than youth and good looks to bring to the Surrey. She has a voice of beautiful quality and knows how to use it; she is also a most capable actress. Her restrained but always convincing movements and gestures bore witness to the excellence of Mr. Fairbairn's careful training.

The Dutchman was sung by Mr. Augustus Milner, who has for some time been a member of the Zürich Opera. He has a very commanding presence and a well-though-out conception of the character. It is on these two parts that most of the burden of the opera rests; but it must be added that the small parts were all well filled. Even the slight and episodical part of Mary was acted by Miss Myra Munsen with real intelligence. Mr. Frank Webster sang very agreeably in the ungrateful part of Erik; and Mr. Philip Vallentine, though hardly able to compete vocally with Mr. Milner in the duet of the first act, was a very capable Daland. The choruses were full of life, and the costumes and stage setting thoroughly effective.

The orchestra is at present a little rough. It is complete, but hardly strong enough in the strings for a Wagner opera. Mr. Herbert Ferrers understands that prime necessity for an opera-conductor of making the whole thing go ahead, whatever happens on the way, but he must endeavour to restrain the energies of his brass a little. The management have certainly taken a wise step in not cutting down the band.

The advantage of having a complete orchestra was very noticeable in "Maritana," which is an opera that is seldom thus honoured. As given at the Surrey, with another notable soprano, Miss Frances Hall, in the title part, it became a serious opera that entirely justified the popularity which it has always enjoyed. Those musical intellectuals who never miss a new work of Stravinsky, but have never even seen our historic English classics, may be recommended to go and hear "Maritana" at the Surrey. It is a landmark in the history of English opera, and without a knowledge of "Maritana" it is impossible to enter into the full understanding of Sullivan. Moreover, if really English opera is ever to develop a school of its own, neither Sullivan nor Wallace is a composer whose lessons contemporary musicians can afford to neglect.

Edward J. Dent.

CONCERTS

The brunt of the work at the London Chamber Concert Society's third concert on February 18 fell upon the Philharmonic Quartet, who played Beethoven's D major Quartet, and were joined by other instrumentalists as required in Julius Harrison's Quintet, Ravel's Septet, and Dr. Ethel Smyth's "Chrysilla" (in which some sporting passages for flute and triangle hardly compensate for the peremptory quality of the harp and double-bass writing). The playing of the Quartet was marred by frequent roughness and careless intonation on the part of their leader. Lady Maud Warrender appeared as the vocalist of the evening, but we could find no adequate reason for her doing so.

The native music of America is little known in this country. Judging from the example of Red Indian folk-songs sung by Mr. Wright Symons at his recital on February 20, the com-
Drama

EMOTIONS

Lyric Theatre.—"John Ferguson." By St. John G. Ervine.

If the merit of a play is measured by the success with which it raises harrowing emotions in the bosoms of the spectators, then "John Ferguson" must be counted as a drama of the first importance. Mr. Ervine knows how to apply the seme forte et dure with the practised skill of a Grand Inquisitor. It is a pleasure, even in the height of the agony, to see with what skill and agility he skips about the torture-chamber, tightening a thumb-screw, hammering a fresh wedge into the boot, tweaking another muscle with the pincers. Here, you feel, is a man who knows his business very well. Everything has been thought out, the effects all calculated to a fraction, nothing left to chance. There was only one episode in which Mr. Ervine's skill seemed for an instant to fail him, and he was betrayed into something that looked very much like a mistake, and that was the scene where the imbecile beggar, Clutie John, eggs on young Andrew Ferguson to murder the man who had tried to violate his sister. There was a lack of verisimilitude in this, a failure to reveal a motive, which stood out the more strikingly from the plausibility of the rest of the play. And how plausible it all is!—old John Ferguson, too sick to be able to work, but uncomplaining in his trust in God; the mortgaged farm; the villain threatening to foreclose; the daughter consenting to marry Jimmy Caesar, whom she does not love, in order to save the farm; her revolt against this unholy contract; the bad man's assault upon her; Jimmy Caesar threatening to FILL the villain and then too much of a coward to do the deed; Jimmy Caesar arrested for the murder that was finally committed by Andrew Ferguson; Andrew's determination to confess, and his parents' agony of mind; and finally, the mad beggar, Clutie John, who provides the distinctively "Irish" atmosphere, with those phrases about the "wee stars shinin' in the sky" and all the "poetical" things that an English dramatist is not allowed to say. How plausible it is, and how well the agony is sustained! And yet one comes away with a sense of dissatisfaction, with a feeling, very definite, albeit not articulate, that "John Ferguson" is not the real thing. It is not enough to take a situation and exploit it, however well, for its emotions. The point is to do that and to do it in such a way that the tragedy may be of more universal import. "John Ferguson" is simply a situation in the void; one is moved by the emotions which are wrung out of it; but it has no real relation with life in general as one knows it.

Mr. Ervine is supported by a very effective troupe of actors. Miss Maire O'Neill and Miss Moyna MacGill gave remarkable performances as Sarah and Hannah Ferguson; Miss MacGill's emotional acting was at moments quite admirable. Mr. Rea delivered the pious sentiments of John Ferguson himself with conviction and dignity. We should like to see him in a part devoid of pious sentiment in which he could completely shake off the haunting presence of Abraham Lincoln. Mr. Miles Malleson made a lively Clutie John, though it must be admitted that, for the most "Irish" of Irish mad boggars, he talked very much as though he had been born and bred within the sound of Bow bells. It was curious to note that in Clutie's speeches, and in the lubrications of Jimmy Caesar that were set most definitely in an Irish mode, the audience was often quite uncertain whether it ought to laugh or cry. The key was too unfamiliar.

A CONCERT of madrigals and other old English music, given on February 28 by Miss Flora Mann, Miss Winifred Whelen, Miss Lilian Berger, Mr. Steuart Wilson, Mr. Clive Carey and Mr. Cuthbert Kelly, showed clearly that music of this type is much better suited to the English ear than to a German. The best choristers never achieve the lightness and suppleness which it demands. The six singers at this concert succeeded admirably in obtaining a well-blended tone without loss of individuality, and thus were able to bring out with delightful clarity the subtle emotional points, as well as the exhalation and hallucination, of Elizabethan composers. It was a most instructive demonstration in the art of interpreting old music; for all the performers, without the least exaggeration or over-emphasis, sang in a perfectly straightforward and natural style, as if the poetry and music of the sixteenth century were their normal and habitual language.

A CONCERT of madrigals and other old English music, given on February 28 by Miss Flora Mann, Miss Winifred Whelen, Miss Lilian Berger, Mr. Steuart Wilson, Mr. Clive Carey and Mr. Cuthbert Kelly, showed clearly that music of this type is much better suited to the English ear than to a German. The best choristers never achieve the lightness and suppleness which it demands. The six singers at this concert succeeded admirably in obtaining a well-blended tone without loss of individuality, and thus were able to bring out with delightful clarity the subtle emotional points, as well as the exhalation and hallucination, of Elizabethan composers. It was a most instructive demonstration in the art of interpreting old music; for all the performers, without the least exaggeration or over-emphasis, sang in a perfectly straightforward and natural style, as if the poetry and music of the sixteenth century were their normal and habitual language.
DRAMEDY
LITTLE THEATRE. — "Mumsée." By Edward Knoblock.

In the choice of the title "Mumsée" the author has shown a certain frankness and has, to some extent, warned the audience what sort of thing to expect. It is doubtful, however, if even the hardened theatre-goer knows quite how much of the nondescript state of tears and sentimentality is to be thrust upon him at a sitting. The present performance at the Little Theatre opens with a furore of over-emphasis, the usual jokes, the usual broken English, the Dickensian tone carried to bathos which Dickens never attains, the dreary slowness of the first act, the usual inability of the English emotional actress to produce the effect of Frenchness, the heavy pathos, the sermon preached by said actress facing the audience, tears, tears, and a parody of every cliche of the feuilletons: "Men are cruel." Answer: "All the world is cruel,"—thirty-five minutes of it before there comes the first gleam of real humour; and in the whole of the first two acts not enough patter to carry a second-class "turn" through its first five minutes at the Palladium. This is, we presume, "modern drama" as descended or re-descended from Shaw and Ibsen to the earlier and possibly permanent level. There is talk of French conventions, wherein the sweet young things are at once left à deux for narrative and then sentimental gush; there is the Hun cad, there is the char-ring young Englishman, and Mr. Pusey has very little chance, and the curtain goes down with a tempest of applause which can mean only one of two things: either it is the last fading and hesperal flicker of British intelligence or it implies a lifelong and ineradicable devotion to Miss Eva Moore.

The language is one's chief diversion: "Over there under those Southern skies... the stars... seemed clearer than ever." Also, "a charming young Englishman, of course has lost this and many another pearl of precious speech." He took me out to that cursed Casino." Immortal words like these, witty lines that Marlowe never penned, a splendour of imagery such as is known only to the faithful readers of "Sexton Blake" and "Forget-me-not," exude from the interstices of the play between a cinema plot and slices of kittenishness. "Divine men, these who have pierced the secrets of eternity." "Well, I do so with all my heart." "So it is really true." "Yes, what a change!" "Somehow it is the sort of death one would have wished him, among his beloved treasures." There are also bits of "speedy" polish.

There is, in the trade sense, construction, i.e., the author has proved his "long-apprenticeship," he shows us how to do it, the recipe being: portions of chocolate nougat with increasing frequency during the two acts, then some hysteria in the third. He flouts the economy of great art, and to screw up his heroine to the really pathetic sobs of the third act he throws his all into the melting-pot: the town is being bombarded by airplanes, her eldest and boldest son has just sold information to the Boche, he is discovered, he is r-r-revealed; his shame is made known to the super-Charles-Grandison English colonel, who takes this opportunity of declaring his hopeless but honourable passion for the respectable mother whose dear, but elderly husband is soon to be wiped out by bomb-salvation. The traitor leaps on a bicycle, which apparently the colonel cannot ride, and this daring action plus death wipes out the shame of the family. The acts run: 1913, Englishman's Home in France, of course it can't happen, no one has dreamed of it. 1914, July, of course it is most unexpected, 1918, The retreat, 1919, the armistice, the prayer before the crucifix (audience need not be nervous: nothing, absolutely nothing is left out), the colonel with barehead, the lovers' meeting, the pitiful wounded, even though Aeschylus did spare us Agamemnon's bath towels without decreasing the tragedy of the play or making the death less real. But to the ingrained sentimentalists nothing is too sacred for presentation; there is no subject which is, in his eyes, unfit to sandwich in between a joke about Peter the cat and a flapper's desire for caramels.

We sympathize with thehabu who said there were three sorts of plays: Comedy, tragedy and dramey. We now think we know what he meant; but on the whole the cast deserves a better fate than this play. If the use of language is obsolescent among us, the cinema remains; there is also the alternative tradition of the Commedia dell' Arte, and if authors wish to present simple stock figures they might return to the old custom of giving wordless scenarios, for even among monosyllabic conversationists each human being has some trace of personal utterance, some small idiosyncrasy of diction which makes their speech real. And even a second-rate gag would be more vital than a succession of pasteboard sentences of the sort here provided the actors.

T. J. V.

Correspondence
THE PHOENIX SOCIETY

Sir,—Will you kindly allow space for one of the thousands of people one has never heard of, to protest against the careless arrangement of the intelligentsia contained in Mr. T. S. Eliot's letter on the Phoenix Society? Surely Mr. Eliot, of all people, cannot be in danger of forgetting that in order to arrest it is not necessary to be unjust.

Without being a disciple of Mr. Archer, one may consider that the production of plays by Webster or Dryden is not an essential of culture. And it does not argue a strong faith in the greatness of Webster or Dryden to suggest that they need support against Mr. Archer, or even to imply that their greatness can be in any way affected by the production or non-production of their plays in London.

It is difficult to understand why the cultivated classes should not be expected to support the necessities of literature, since nobody else is likely to do so. Mr. Eliot, quite rightly, makes it a point of honour for the "Civilized Class" to expend their usually not too ample means on the support of art, but he does them an injustice when he implies that they are unwilling to do so. It would be a stronger salve to the consciences of many, after reading Webster and Dryden, to purchase and read the excellent, though unadapted, and it is to be feared little read, dramatic poetry of our many contemporaries—for example, of "Michael Field" or Mr. Herbert Trench or Mr. James Wadig.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
H. P. COLLINS

ITALIAN BOOKS

To the Editor of THE ATHENÆUM.

Sir,—In view of the fact that you are the compilers of the most valuable list of weekly publications, may I suggest that the same bibliographical accuracy be adopted in the matter of reviews appearing in the other part of your journal? The discrepancy which now exists between the system adopted in these two heads in the case, for instance, of Italian books, to the commision of grammatical errors, which should not be allowed to pass in so serious a review, is the title of the book is always placed before the title of the book, a formatting which is to me a matter of taste, but that employed above is grammatically incorrect, nor is it possible to translate the English by with a da, a di or a per. In this case "Da Pietro Jabier" means from Pietro Jabier, which does not convey the sense. Moreover, if the price is to be quoted in Italian, the "lire" should precede and not follow the figure.

I beg to remain, Sir,

Taylor Institution,
Oxford.

[We are perfectly well aware that in Italian reviews and book-lists the name of the author is invariably put first and also that in giving prices "lire" is placed before numerals.

As, however, The Athenæum is an English, and not an Italian, journal, foreign books have to be brought into line with English books. The difficulty might have been got over by keeping the word by "in English, but for the sake of uniformity, "da" was adopted as, on the whole, the nearest Italian equivalent.—Ed.]

THE FIRST FOLIO POEM INITIATED "I. M."
To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—Will you permit me to append an important postscript to the letter of inquiry so kindly inserted on my behalf in your issue of February 6?
The cross-sum section of the set of word numerical value coincidences described by me has been submitted, entirely by itself, as thus presenting a clean-cut mathematical problem—that of a three-top-row cross sum of 103 and a five-bottom-row cross sum of 177 being by mere chance or purpose arrangement duplicated as a division, when the numbers involved are placed on a chessboard, by the colour of square division, for all eight rows of 103 White and 177 Black to one of our foremost mathematicians, Professor Andrew R. Forsyth, F.R.S., the Chief Professor of Mathematics at the Imperial College of Science and Technology. And Professor Forsyth replied as follows:

"If digits alone were of importance, precisely the same result would follow from

\[
\begin{array}{ccc|ccc}
4 & 96 & 4 & 65 & 6 & 36 \\
5 & 85 & 5 & 17 & 7 & 52 \\
4 & 59 & 28 & 22 & 1 & 85 \\
3 & 23 & 39 & 83 & 3 & 23 \\
6 & 86 & 75 & 77 & 6 & 77 \\
8 & 5 & 9 & 9 & 4 & 8 \\
3 & 8 & 5 & 9 & 6 & 9 \\
9 & 1 & 89 & 89 & 9 & 8 \\
\end{array}
\]

In the next place, when the sum of the digits on the white squares is 103, the sum of those on the black squares as taken from your table (or mine) is bound to be 177; for the total sum of all the digits is 280. I have thought enough to see that the chances against the mere chance would be multiditionally overwhelming. .

But now for a more important suggestion to you. The impression left upon me is that you are in the presence of one of those cryptograms so dear to some minds through many ages."

I had long before suspected the existence of a cryptogram. Moreover, a belief therein is strongly supported by the fact that the code used, the Elizabethan A=1 to Z=24 code, allotting both I and J the value 9, and both U and V the value 20, happens to give 103 as the equivalent of "Shakespeare," and 177 as the equivalent of "William Shakespeare." But any such cryptogram cannot be limited to a single letter and its frame. And it would be interesting to have the views of readers as to its full extent and correct interpretation.

Respectfully yours,

J. D. Parsons.

45, Sutton Court Road, Chiswick.

To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—I have been waiting for some better qualified mathematician to question the claim of Mr. J. D. Parsons that he has discovered sub-surface signalling in the First Folio (see your issue of February 6, p. 190).

True, his figures and coincidences are correct—on the assumption of Ben Jonson in his "English Grammar" that J is by an alternative form of the 9th letter I, and U but an alternative form of the 20th letter V. But surely anyone who looked out for such coincidences in any set of word numerical values could find comparable coincidences.

Moreover, no meaning is assigned by Mr. Parsons to the supposedly signalled letter F. So it is a fair assumption that no satisfying meaning can be assigned by him thereto.

Yours truly,

February 20, 1920.

Robert Little.

WILSON KING'S "GERMAN FREE CITIES"
To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—May I ask your readers' attention to the fact that the stock of Mr. Wilson King's "German Free Cities" is almost exhausted, and that any who wish to procure this useful work, covering ground so little and so rarely touched in English, should communicate quickly with the publishers (Messrs. Del, London)? Soon it will be impossible to buy this book "first-hand."

Yours faithfully,

6, Arthur Road, Edgbaston.

THE HOLY JUMPERS
To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Dear Sir,—May I point out a small error in your issue of February 20 (p. 257)? Your note-writer seems to think that the Holy Jumpers, described in Mr. Van Vechten's new book, is "an evangelical sect in the Bahamas."

It happens that I published my description of this sect in the Bahamas (calling it, as he does, Holy Jumpers) before Mr. Van Vechten issued his impression of them as seen there, and I was "jumped " upon very stiffly by the native population for my ignorance, in not knowing that these so-called Holy Jumpers are a large sect in America and elsewhere, who practise a sort of primitive Christian Science, and call themselves, with the utmost dignity, the Pentecostal Brethren.

One finds in the Bahamas other sects which seem to us new, but which have a large following in parts of America—as, for example, the Seventh Day Adventists. There are in the seven or so miles around the capital of the Bahamas, about nine different sorts of Christianity, and perhaps twelve different kinds of religion are there represented!

Yours truly,

Amelia Defries.

CHARLES NODIER AND THE ENGLISH
To the Editor of The Athenæum.

Sir,—I have not seen "La Jeunesse de Charles Nodier," by Léonce Pingaud (reviewed in The Athenæum of Jan. 16 by Professor Saintsbury), and cannot say whether it contains any allusion to Nodier's well-known intimacy with members of the English colony in France during the later Revolutionary and Napoleonic periods. This forms, as far as English readers are concerned, the most striking episode of the real "Jeunesse de Charles Nodier." P. L. Jacob in an article entitled "Charles Nodier chez Lady Hamilton" contributed to the Bibliophile Français (year 1869) gives an interesting account of his experiences as "collaborateur, ou plutôt de teinturier, anciennement, devenu traducteur, et de "ghost" author in the service of her ladyship. He was introduced by her son-in-law, Etienne de Jouy, the author of the "Hermite de la Chausée d'Antin (a once popular French imitation of Addison's Spectator)."

Chaque matin, il consacrait deux ou trois heures à cette corvée quotidienne, et chaque soir il lisait à Lady Hamilton le produit de son travail journalier. Lady Hamilton était la plus heureuse des femmes ou plutôt des auteurs; elle se persuadait sans peine que tout ce que Nodier avait écrit pour elle et sous son nom n'appartenait qu'à elle seule, et se trouvait en gerne dans les mains de ses échasses manuscrites.

The first novel, "La Famille de Popoli," was dedicated to Sir Herbert Croft with a lengthy "dédicace que Lady Hamilton n'avait fait que signer." Charles Nodier, however, did not remain long in the service of Lady Mary Hamilton (née Leslie-Melville, the daughter of the Earl of Leven and Melville). She married first a Mr. Walker, and afterwards Captain Hamilton, a relative of the Duke of Hamilton. She was born at Edinburgh in 1739, and died in Paris in 1816, the same year as Sir Herbert Croft.

Il est bien fâcheux pour vous que vous ayez perdu votre secrétaire, disait M. de Jouy à sa belle-mère Lady Hamilton; avec le concours de ce diable de Charles Nodier, vous auriez fait des chefs-d'œuvre sans doute fini par devenir membre de l'Académie Française.

Yours faithfully,

Andrew de Ternant.

36, Somerleyton Road, Brixton, S.W.
Foreign Literature

RAINER MARIA RILKE

RAINER MARIA RILKE. By Robert Faesi. (Zürich and Leipzig: Amalthea Verlag. 4 M.)

THIS volume, by a well-known Swiss novelist and poet, does somewhat tardy justice to one of the most noteworthy figures in contemporary German poetry. It is a little difficult to see why Rilke has been so much neglected. Some ascribe this to the supreme genius of Hugo von Hofmannsthal, others to the exceptionally retiring nature of Rilke's talent. But of the unjustified obscurity in which his name has remained until a comparatively recent date there can be no question. Thus there is a well-known German "History of German Lyric Poetry during the Last Fifty Years," published in 1905, which does not even mention him; his name is equally not to be found in M. Maurice Merot's "History of Contemporary German Literature," which was published in 1907, subsequent to the issue of two of Rilke's finest and most characteristic works. And to-day, although no longer unknown in Germany and on the Continent generally—his position in modern German literature is probably quite as honored as Hugo von Hofmannsthal's—he is still somewhat in the background. This appreciation, the first full-length study we have seen, is therefore all the more sure of a welcome from those who take an interest in German poetry of the past twenty years.

M. Faesi rightly judges that the relations between Rilke's poetry and his life and personal experiences is more than usually intimate, and he first devotes himself to a biographical study. The task was probably not easy, for until M. Faesi attempted it very little was known of Rilke's descent, education and early life generally. He came of an old Carinthian family which had been compelled to leave its ancestral estates and settle in Prague. It was in this city that in 1875—the year after Hugo von Hofmannsthal—Rilke was born. Critics have often pointed out the evident connection between Hofmannsthal's lyrics and German folk-song. In Rilke's first poems the relationship is openly avowed. The poet's early surroundings made a profound impression on his imagination, and although, after a few painful years of study in a military academy and then at the university, he was to leave his birthplace and thereafter be on his travels for most of the rest of his life, it is to Bohemia that he constantly looks back. Thus his first volume, "Larenopfer" (1893), conveys its character in its title. The poet describes the scenery of Bohemia—note, in particular, the poem entitled "Böhmische Landschaft"—thinks sorrowfully of home, and echoes the songs of his childhood. Wistfulness, a certain dreamlike quality, a plaintive music, mark Rilke's ripest work. These first poems of nostalgia are a foreshadowing, as are those contained in the next volume, published two years later and entitled "Traumgekrönt."

But Bohemia was not Rilke's only home. One of the first foreign cities he visited was Moscow, of which he declared that it was "the city of his oldest and deepest reminiscences.... It was home." This deep sympathy with Russian life has led certain critics to look for traces of Slav ancestry in Rilke. M. Faesi, although remarking that there seems to be an extraordinary affinity between Rilke's genius and that of the Russian, does not make the attempt. And, in truth, it would have been rather superfluous. Russian influence there certainly was, but the principal feature of Rilke's poetic genius seems to us of the very stuff of German romanticism. It is Sehnsucht which characterizes the second and most important period in the poet's imaginative development, which came at about the turn of the century. In dealing with this M. Faesi might very well have quoted Matthew Arnold, who in his "Essay on the Study of Celtic Literature" makes the well-known comparison between German Sehnsucht and Celtic "melancholy." "German Sehnsucht," he says, "is wistful, soft, tearful, longing," which sums up Rilke's poetry pretty accurately. M. Faesi conveys the same impression in a passage of much greater length, elucidated by characteristic selected lyrics.

Rilke's next volume, "Das Buch der Bilder," was published in 1902. It gives some explanation of his philosophy, and contains his most striking example of his theory and practice of poetry. Technically, Rilke, who knew contemporary French literature intimately and for some years resided in Paris as private secretary to Rodin, on whom he wrote an extremely good book of criticism, was very much under the influence of the French Symbolists, and of Maeterlinck in particular. "Music transformed to pictures, or pictures transformed to music, is the summing-up of a German critic on this volume. It is precisely the ideal of Symbolism, and the faithfulness with which Rilke served it places him in the same group as Hofmannsthal, Stefan George and all the other German or Austrian disciples of Mallarmé and his school.

Rich as are so many modern German poets—Hofmannsthal, for instance, whose variety and beauty of rhyme and rhythm, there are few who can show skill equal to that revealed in "Das Buch der Bilder." The fineness of workmanship is everywhere remarkable. It is true there are echoes from the poet's favourite writers, but there is an individuality, very closely resembling Hofmannsthal, as M. Faesi points out in an excellent passage of comparative criticism, but with distinct features of its own. Both Rilke and Hofmannsthal are the poets of foreboding, of twilight and atmosphere, of tender early spring, of lobe-leaved autumn, of shy longing and vanishing memories, of dreams and possibilities; they are the artists of the unreal.

Chronologically "Das Buch der Bilder" marks little more than a beginning in Rilke's most notable poetical work. Yet little more remains to be said. There are few innovations in "Das Stundenbuch" or in the "Neue Gedichte," the two most important succeeding volumes.

